"who had once defeated Śakra" yena purā śakro vinirjitaḥ: Ct and Cg note that this phrase explains how Rāvaṇa's son, whose given name is Meghanāda, "Thunderer," acquired his epithet Indrajit, literally, "conqueror of Indra." The story of his subjugation of the god is told at Uttarakāṇḍa 29–30.

Following verse 22, Ñ2,V,B1,2,4,D5–7,9,11,S insert, while Ñ1,B3,D13 insert following verse 23 (many northern manuscripts repeat it in various locations), a passage of one line [751*], which expands the description of Indrajit's arrows that follows in verse 23 below: "[with arrows] golden fletched, swift, with burnished heads, and having a straight flight.[1]"

[1]"having a straight flight" añjogatibhiḥ: Literally, "with straight gait or course." D7,9,11,G2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cm, and Cr read instead rajogatiḥ, "moving like [a] dust [cloud]." Ct understands that the arrows fly like a dust cloud driven by the wind, that is, with no interval between them (vāyunā vistīryamāṇarajovan nīrandhraṃ saṃpatadbhiḥ). The texts and printed editions of Cg read instead adhogatiḥ, "moving downward." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. Cg explains, "moving downward because the shooter was in the sky (prahartur ākāśasthatvena adhogatiḥ).

23. "with iron arrows" nārācaiḥ: These are generally thought to be arrows that are either made of iron or iron-tipped. Cr defines them merely as a type of arrow (bāṇaviśeśaiḥ), while Cg is more specific, characterizing them as arrows with straight and rounded heads (ṛjuvṛttāgraiḥ)."

"[with] half-iron arrows" ardhanārācaiḥ: According to the commentaries, these are arrows half of which are similar to nārācas (ardhabhāge nārācatulyaiḥ [sadṛśaiḥ—Cr] Ck, Ct). Cg believes that they are similar to nārācas cut or split in the middle (madhye bhinnanārācatulyaiḥ).

"[with] crescent-headed arrows" bhallaiḥ: Cg understands, "axe-headed arrows (paraśvadhāgraiḥ)."

"[with] arrows with heads like folded palms" añjalikaiḥ: The commentators agree that these are arrows with heads shaped like the cupped or folded hands of the familiar añjali mudrā (añjalyākāramukhaiḥ—so Ct).

"[with arrows with heads like] calves' teeth" vatsadantaiḥ: The commentators agree that these are arrows with heads shaped like calves' teeth (vatsadantasadṛśāgraiḥ—so Cg).

"[with arrows with heads like] lions' fangs" siṃhadaṃṣṭraiḥ: The commentators agree that these are arrows with heads shaped like lions' fangs (siṃhadaṃṣṭrāsadṛśāgraiḥ—so Cg).

"[with arrows with heads like] razors" kṣuraiḥ: Cg and Crā note that these arrows have razor or razorlike heads (kṣurāgraiḥ—Cg). Cv understands that they have heads shaped like the half-moon (ardhacandraiḥ). Cf. 6.57.57 and note; and 6.55.117 and note.

Excavations have shown evidence of iron-tipped arrows and arrowheads of different shapes, but no true iron arrows have been found (Singh 1965, p. 105). Arrows dating from Moghul times show many varieties of heads, including crescents, circles, narrow-tipped, and broad-tipped. See J. S. Lee 1961, pp. 19–22.

24. "Rāma lay there on the battlefield, a hero's bed" vīraśayane śiśye: Literally, "He lay on a hero's bed." Cg gives the same explanation of this term as he did above at verse 19, whereas Cr, silent above but eager as always to show that Rāma is not seriously incapacitated, explains, "he stood in a spot befitting a hero (vīrocitadeśe śiśye tasthau)." See verse 19 above.

"clutching" ādāya: Literally, "having taken, having held." We follow Cg, who glosses, "having clung to, having supported [himself] on (avalambya)." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead āvidhya, literally, "having thrown away, having cast off." The commentators who follow this reading interpret it variously. Ct glosses, "having released, having abandoned (tyaktvā)." Cr, in keeping with his continuing interpretation of this passage, glosses, "having firmly grasped (dṛḍhaṃ gṛhītvā)."

"gilded" rukmabhūṣitam: Literally, "ornamented with gold." Cg glosses, "with gilded cloth binding (rukmapaṭṭabandham)." The two printed editions of Cg's text that were consulted [KK and VSP 6.45.24] both print the variant ratnabhūṣitam, "ornamented with jewels," a reading known to M. The apparatus of KK lists ten manuscripts that share the critical reading. Cg does not acknowledge the variant in his commentary. GPP, as a result of a typographical error, reads the meaningless rukyabhūṣitam.

"thrice-curved" triṇatam: Literally, "triply bent." The reference is to a recurved bow, which, as Cg mentions, is bent in the middle and at each end (triṣu sthāneṣu pārśvayor madhye ca natam). Ck glosses śārṅgam, a term referring to the composite type of bow made partly of horn, to a bow in general, or, as a proper noun, to Viṣṇu's great bow. See Emeneau 1953, pp. 77–87.

"now unstrung" vijyam: Literally, "devoid of a bowstring." Cg explains, "the string is removed because of the lack of any opportunity to fit an arrow to the bow (vijyaṃ śarasaṃdhānaprasaṅgābhāvād vigatajyam)." Cr, in keeping with his continuing denial that any harm has come to Rāma, exploits the vowel sandhi between śiśye and vijyam to read [śiśye] avijyam in the sense of "strung." See notes to verse 9 above. Gita Press (6.45.24) and GPP (6.45.24) both print an avagraha between the two words, indicating that their editors understand the elision of the negative prefix (śiśye 'vijyam). Among the translators, only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1525) follows this reading, translating, "which was (still) strung." NSP (6.46.24), which gives the text of Ct, like the critical edition, shows no avagraha. KK and VSP (6.45.24), following Cg, both read with the critical edition.

"its grip shattered" bhinnamuṣṭiparīṇāham: Literally, "the place for the fist severed." Cg explains, "the fist binding slackened (śithilamuṣṭibandham)," the sense of which is that Rāma has slackened his own grip on the bow. Cr, in keeping with his idiosyncratic reading of the passage, takes bhinna in its sense of "different," glossing, "whose grip was quite different from [that of] an ordinary [bow] (prākṛtavilakṣaṇamuṣṭiparīṇāho muṣṭigrahaṇadeśo yasya)."

25. "in the midst of that hail of arrows" bāṇapātāntare: Literally, "within a fall of arrows." Ct, Cg, Cv, and Ck gloss, "on a bed of arrows (śaratalpe—so Ct)," an interpretation that Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 111) follows. Cr understands, "in the midst of the fallen arrows (patitabāṇamadhye)." Dutt (1893, p. 1234) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1526) understand the obscure expression to refer to the fact that Rāma has fallen within an arrow's range of his brother. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 129), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 111) and Pagani (1999, p. 974), renders, "jonchée de flèches."

"despaired of his own life" nirāśo jīvite 'bhavat: Literally, "he became devoid of hope in respect to life." Cr glosses jīvite as "protecting the world (lokapālane)."

Following verse 25, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of three lines [754*]: "Seeing his brother Rāma, his eyes like lotus petals, fallen to the earth, afflicted by the bondage of those arrows,[1] he grieved. And the tawny monkeys, too, when they saw him, were moved to the greatest sorrow."

[1]"afflicted by the bondage of those arrows" śarabandhaparikṣatam: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead śaraṇyaṃ raṇatoṣiṇam, "who was fit for refuge, and who delighted in battle."

Following 754*, D7,10,11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr insert a passage of one line [755*]: "Afflicted with sorrow, they wailed dreadfully, their eyes overflowing with tears."

26. "two fallen heroes" vīrau patitau: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead tau vīraśaye, "those two . . . on a hero's bed."

"who lay in bondage" baddhau: Literally, "bound." Cr provides a theological interpretation in line with his reading of this sarga. He explains, "those two who themselves bind the whole universe to their commands (svājñāyāṃ nikhilajagadbandhakau)." See, too, note to 6.39.1–2.

"In their affliction" ārtāḥ: Literally, "afflicted." Cr understands the term here to suggest that the monkeys actually remain apathetic because they are unable to discern the actual form of the rākṣasa [Indrajit] (rākṣasasvarūpādarśanenodāsīnāḥ).

The meter is upajāti.

1. "glancing nervously" vīkṣamāṇāḥ: Literally, "looking." We have added the word "nervously" in keeping with Ct's comment, "in their great fear (atibhayāt) (so, too, Ck—bhayād iti śeṣaḥ)." Cr makes it explicit that they are looking around for Indrajit (rākṣasoddeśenāvalokayantaḥ).

"riddled" saṃtatau: Literally, "stretched, extended." We follow the commentators who gloss, "covered, pervaded (vyāptau)."

2. "When the rākṣasa had accomplished his task and ceased his onslaught like the god Indra after pouring down the rains" vṛṣṭvevoparate deve kṛtakarmaṇi rākṣase: Literally, "When the rākṣasa had accomplished [his] mission, like the god who desists after having rained." The reference is undoubtedly to the god Indra, who is universally recognized in Indian mythology as the divinity of the monsoon. The image is apposite because of Indrajit's having showered down arrows like rain. A number of manuscripts (Ñ2,B1,2,D6,7,9,11,T2,3,M5) and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Cr read dṛṣṭvā, "having seen," for vṛṣṭvā, "having poured down." Although the critical apparatus indicates that manuscripts associated with the texts of Ct (D11) and Cg (D6) read dṛṣṭvā, the apparatus later indicates that both of these commentators read with the critical edition, a situation borne out, in fact, by the printed editions of these commentators' texts. Left without a verb suggestive of the god's rain-making powers, Cr exploits the vowel sandhi between uparate and deve to read uparate 'deve, "when that anti-god (i.e., Indrajit) had desisted." Cr then understands Vibhīṣaṇa to be the subject of the gerund dṛṣṭvā, "having seen." Thus he takes the verse to mean "When that non-god, that is, that foe of the gods, the rākṣasa [Indrajit], had accomplished his feat and desisted somewhat from shooting arrows, Vibhīṣaṇa, seeing Rāma, came to that place with Sugrīva (adeve devavirodhini kṛtakarmaṇi rākṣasa uparate bāṇaprakṣepāt kiṃcin nivṛtte sati dṛṣṭvā rāmam iti śeṣas taṃ deśaṃ sasugrīvo vibhīṣaṇa ājagāma)."

3. "Sumukha" -sumukha-: Ś,Ñ1,2,V,B1–4,D1–4, 7–13,T2,3,G1,M3 and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators, Lahore, and Gorresio read instead -kumuda- or kumudaḥ, "Kumuda."

"began at once to mourn" tūrṇam . . . anvaśocanta: Literally, "they swiftly mourned." Several translators, apparently inspired by the unusual adverb in collocation with the verb "to grieve or mourn," have supplied some verb of motion, giving the passage the sense of "approaching in haste [they mourned]." Dutt (1893, p. 1235) translates, "came in all haste"; Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 130) and Pagani (1999, p. 974), "accourus"; and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 112), "came to that place in haste." The lack of a verb of motion suggests to Cg that Nīla, etc., had, in fact, arrived on the spot before Sugrīva in verse 2 above (nilādayaḥ sugrīvāt pūrvam evāgatāḥ). In this notion he is followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 111), who translates, "he [Vibhīṣaṇa] found Nīla . . . [all grieving greatly]."

4–7. "motionless, barely breathing . . . immobilized . . . labored breathing . . . barely moved . . . barely moving" niśceṣṭau mandaniḥśvāsau . . . stabdhau . . . niḥśvasantau . . . niśceṣṭau . . . mandaceṣṭitau: Several of the commentators indicate disquiet with the apparent redundancy of these adjectives. Cg, who reads the synonymous aceṣṭau for niśceṣṭau in pāda 4a, offers two at least partial solutions to the problem. In the first, he understands that the condition of being stabdhau, "immobilized," is a direct result of the heroes' motionlessness. He then suggests that the different or repeated descriptions of the heroes' movements and respiration are to be understood as occurring sequentially over intervals (madhye madhye). He ascribes the repetitiveness to excessive grief (presumably on the part of the poet) (atra punaruktayo duḥkhātirekāt). Alternatively, Cg proposes to minimize the sense of repetition by construing verse 4 with verse 3 rather than with the following verses (yadvāceṣṭāv iti ślokaḥ pūrvaślokenānvitaḥ). See note to 6.2.14.

"Lying on beds of arrows" śayānau śaratalpayoḥ: Cr, in keeping with his interpretation of this entire episode (see notes to 6.35.9,17,19,20,22,23), regards virtually all the afflictions visited upon the heroes as merely illusory, as they are feigning their suffering. See, too, 6.37.19 and note.

"tightly bound with webs of arrows" śarajālācitau: Literally, "covered or heaped up with networks of arrows." Compare 6.35.17 above, where the context seems better to support the translation of "pierced." See below at 6.40.2–3, where the phrase is used again.

"Their labored breathing was like the hissing of snakes" niḥśvasantau yathā sarpau: Literally, "hissing like snakes." See 6.39.1–2 and note; cf. 6.41.18 and note.

"their strength had all but left them" mandavikramau: Literally, "with little strength or energy."

"on the battlefield, a hero's bed" vīraśayane: Literally "on a hero's bed." See 6.35.19,24 and notes above.

9. "through his own magical powers" māyayaiva: Literally, "by māyā alone." Cr and Cg regard this power as a special spell or esoteric knowledge (vidyā) that enables one to see invisible things (antarhitavastudarśanahetubhūtayā vidyayety arthaḥ—so Cg). Ck ascribes Vibhīṣaṇa's unique ability to discern his invisible nephew to his (avuncular) affection (prītim āśrayeṇa rāvaṇiṃ dadarśa).

10. "through the gift of a boon" varadānāt: Ck and Ct remark that Indrajit's gift consisted of a spell of invisibility that he had obtained through a boon that Brahmā had granted him (brahmavaradānalabdhayāntardhānavidyayā) in return for releasing Indra whom Indrajit had captured. The boon contained the following condition: Indrajit would be granted invulnerability if he were to perform a complete sacrifice to the Sun before entering battle (7.30.10–13). See 6.34.29; 6.40.30; 6.47.15; 6.67.27; 6.72.12,13,32; and notes. See, too, note to 6.34.28.

Following verse 10, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [756*] expanding the description of Indrajit: "and who was endowed[1] with power, glory, and valor . . ."

[1]"endowed" saṃyutam: D9–11,T3,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the nominative saṃyutaḥ for the critical edition's accusative. According to this reading, the three attributes mentioned in this line are ascribed to Vibhīṣaṇa rather than to Indrajit.

11. "as he observed his handiwork and the two heroes lying there" ātmanaḥ karma tau śayānau samīkṣya ca: Literally, "having observed his own work and those two lying." Our interpretation follows that of Ct and Cg in taking both karma, "handiwork," and tau, "the two [heroes]," as the objects of the gerund samīkṣya, "as he observed." Cr, however, proposes a somewhat more difficult construction in which karma, "handiwork," is taken as the object of uvāca, "he spoke." The sense would then be the following: "observing the two heroes . . . he proclaimed his feat to the sons of chaos." Among the translations consulted, only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1527) follows this interpretation.

"supremely pleased with himself" paramaprītaḥ: Literally, "greatly pleased."

"to the delight of" harṣayan: Literally, "gladdening, delighting."

"sons of chaos" -nairṛtān: Literally, "descendants of Nirṛti." Nirṛti is a goddess, the personification of "death, destruction, or chaos." She is the supervising deity of the southwestern quarter. See 6.4.46 and note. Ñ2,V,B1,2,4,D7,9–11,13,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead -rākṣasān, "rākṣasas."

pāda d = 23d.

12. "slayers" hantārau: Cs, alone among the commentators, observes that, in fact, it was Rāma alone who slew Khara and Dūṣaṇa. However, he ascribes Indrajit's inclusion of Lakṣmaṇa here to the use of the chatrinyāya, "the maxim of the people with umbrellas (dūṣaṇasya ca hantārāv ityādy uktiś chatrinyāyena rāmasyaiva taddhantṛtvāt)." The idea is that just as we say that people are carrying umbrellas, when, in fact, only some of them are, we may include Lakṣmaṇa as a killer of Khara and Dūṣaṇa by association.

"Khara and Dūṣaṇa" dūṣaṇasya ca . . . kharasya ca: These are the rākṣasa chieftains whom Rāma killed in the Daṇḍaka Forest at Araṇyakāṇḍa 24–29. Cf. 6.21.32.

14–15. "put an end" nihataḥ: Literally, "killed, destroyed." D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cm read instead śamitaḥ, "quieted, extinguished, pacified."

"the menace they posed" anarthaḥ: Literally, "the calamity, danger."

"which could have destroyed us all" mūlaharaḥ . . . sarveṣām: Literally, "the root destroyer of all." Cf. 6.98.20 and note.

"three watches of the night" triyāmā . . . śarvarī: Literally, "the night with its three watches." A yāma is a unit of time corresponding to three hours, or an eighth of a day.

"without . . . so much as touching his bed" aspṛṣṭvā śayanaṃ gātraiḥ: Literally, "not having touched the bed with limbs." The commentators agree that the idea here is that Rāvaṇa is spending sleepless nights [worrying about Rāma] (anidra eva niśāḥ kṣapayatīty arthaḥ—so Ct). Cg notes that the sense is that he does not sleep through even one of the watches of the night (śarvaryām ekasminn api yāme na nidrātīty arthaḥ). Cs ingeniously wishes to break the sequence gātrais triyāmā, "by limbs, the three watches," as gātrai[ḥ] striyā amā, "by limbs, with the woman." This he takes to mean that Rāvaṇa has not been able to sleep with Mandodarī (striyā mandodaryā amā saha śayanaṃ śayyāṃ gātrair aspṛṣṭvaiva cintayānasya mama pituḥ śarvarī yāti).

"turbulent" ākulā: Literally, "agitated, overcome." It is difficult to find a single adjective that can apply equally to the city and river here. Cg notes that the term "city" actually refers to "the people of Laṅkā (laṅkāsthajanaḥ)." Cg takes the adjective to mean "turbid (āvilā)" in connection with the river and "alarmed (vyagrā)" for the citizens of the city. (nadīpakṣa āvilety arthaḥ. lāṅkāpakṣe vyagrety arthaḥ.)

16. "valorous deeds" vikramāḥ: Cg notes that these would be "the building of the causeway, etc. (setubandhanādayaḥ)."

"as fruitless as rain clouds in autumn" niṣphalāḥ . . . yathā śaradi toyadāḥ: The reference is to the large, but unproductive, rain clouds that mark the autumn sky after the end of the monsoon.

17. "who stood beside him" paripārśvagān: D7,9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead the participle paripaśyataḥ, "who were looking on." Cr understands this participle to modify the monkey troop leaders (paripaśyato yūthapān api).

"monkey troop leaders" yūthapān: Literally, "troop leaders."

Following verse 17, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of ten lines [759*]: "That slayer of his enemies struck Nīla with nine excellent arrows and Mainda and Dvivida with three each.[1–2] That great archer pierced Jāmbavān in the chest with an arrow and loosed ten at swift Hanumān.[3–4] Then, in the battle, swift Rāvaṇi shot Gavākṣa and Śarabha of immeasurable power[1] with two arrows each.[5–6] Then swift Rāvaṇi pierced the lord of the langurs[2] and Aṅgada, Vālin's son, with many arrows.[7–8] Then, when he had pierced those foremost of monkeys with arrows that were like flames of fire, the strong and mighty Rāvaṇi roared.[9–10]"

[1]"of immeasurable power" amitatejasau: D7,10,11,G3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead amitavikramau, "of immeasurable valor."

[2]"lord of the langurs" golāṅgūleśvaram: According to Cg and Cm, this is an epithet of Gavākṣa. This interpretation is rendered in the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1528). This interpretation seems unlikely, however, as the epithet comes two lines away from Gavākṣa's name. Cr understands the epithet to refer to Aṅgada, with whose name it at least shares a line. We are uncertain and have taken the epithet as a reference to a separate, unnamed langur. See note to 6.34.26.

18. "them . . . monkeys" tān . . . vānarān: Cr and the translators consulted understand both terms to refer to a single group of monkeys who are the object of both the gerunds ardayitvā, "having afflicted," and trāsayitvā, "having terrified." We feel, however, that tān refers specifically to the monkey troop leaders who are attacked in the preceding verse, whereas vānarān refers to the larger mass of monkey troops who are terrified to see their leaders wounded.

19. "right in front of their troops" camūmukhe: Literally, "in the face or in front of the army."

22. "both" tāv ubhau: Ñ,V,B,D7,9–11,T3,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead bhrātarau, "the two brothers."

"he assumed" anvamanyata: Literally, "he thought." We follow Cr in bringing down "Rāvaṇi" as the subject from the preceding verse. Perhaps because the most immediately preceding subject is the plural rākṣasāḥ of verses 20 and 21 above, several of the translators consulted give the singular verb here a plural subject (Dutt 1893, p. 1236; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 131; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 113; and Pagani 1999, p. 976). Only Gorresio's text (6.21.23) reads the plural viduḥ, "they knew or thought."

23. pāda d = 11d. See note to verse 11 above.

"entered the citadel of Laṅkā" praviveśa purīṃ laṅkām: Indrajit appears to repeat his entrance to Laṅkā at verse 39. See verse 39 below and note.

24. "in each and every limb" sarvāṇi cāṅgopāṅgāni: Literally, "[as were] every limb and subsidiary limb." The commentators agree that one has to supply a second participle in the plural, "riddled (citāni)," to modify the compound. Cg alone specifies that the aṅgas, "limbs," are such things as "hands, etc. (karādīni)" whereas the upāṅgas, or subsidiary limbs, are "fingers, etc. (aṅgulādīni)." The awkward phrasing conveys an idea similar to that expressed above at 6.35.20, where the heroes were described as wounded "down to their very fingertips." See 6.35.20 and note.

25. "his eyes suffused with sorrow" śokavyākulalocanam: Ś,Ñ1,D3,4,6–13,T2,3,G1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read krodha, "anger, wrath," for śoka, "sorrow." This reading is rendered in the translations that follow the text of Ct with two exceptions: Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1529) reads with Cg and the critical edition, and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 114), unaccountably, translates, "his eyes wild with terror," a reading for which we find no textual support.

26. "Battles are often like this" evaṃprāyāṇi yuddhāni: Literally, "battles are generally this way." The idea, as clarified in pāda d, is that the course of battle is uncertain. Cr, however, understands the phrase to mean "battles may be largely illusory, and [potential] victory may be turned to defeat through a deceitful agent and therefore is uncertain. (evaṃprāyāṇy etādṛśāni māyāmayānīty arthaḥ. yāni yuddhāni tatra vijayo māyikakartṛkaparābhavo naiṣṭhiko nīścito na.)" The point of this, Cr continues, is that "the sight of [Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa] in bondage may itself be illusory (māyayāpīdṛśadarśanasaṃbhavād iti tātparyam)."

27. "any remnant of good fortune left" saśeṣabhāgyatā: Literally, "the state of possessing good fortune with a remainder." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sabhāgyaśeṣatā, "the state of having a remainder that includes good fortune." The inversion of the word order, however, yields a similar meaning.

"the brothers Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa" bhrātarau rāmalakṣmaṇau: D5,7,9–11,T1,3, G3,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead mahātmānau mahābalau, "those two great and mighty [heroes]."

"will regain consciousness" moham . . . prahāsyete: Literally, "those two will abandon their swoon."

28. "So pull yourself together . . . and thus encourage me" paryavasthāpayātmānam . . . māṃ ca: Literally, "compose yourself and me." We follow Cg, who suggests that "in gaining control of himself, i.e., steadying his mind, Sugrīva will cause Vibhīṣaṇa, too, to be steady. (paryavasthāpayātmānaṃ mano niścalaṃ kuru. svātmaparyavasthāpanena māṃ ca paryavasthāpaya. dhairyaṃ kārayety arthaḥ.)"

"who am without any recourse" anātham: Literally, "without a lord or protector." Ct and Cs understand Vibhīṣaṇa to be saying that he requires bracing at the hands of Sugrīva because, unlike the latter, he has no independent kingdom to fall back upon [in the event of defeat]. (tava tu svatantraṃ rājyam apy asti. ahaṃ tv agatir iti bhāvaḥ.)

29. "dipped his hand in water and, with it" jalaklinnena pāṇinā: Literally, "with a hand wet with water."

Following verse 29, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [762*]: "Then righteous Vibhīṣaṇa took water that he had sanctified with a spell and wiped Sugrīva's eyes."

30. "calmly" asaṃbhrāntam: Literally, "without agitation." We agree with Cg, who reads the variant asaṃbhramam, found in D5,6,T1,2,G3,M3,5, adverbially. Cr reads the critical reading adjectivally, glossing, "dispelling agitation (saṃbhrāntinivartakam)."

31. "at this inopportune moment" akāle 'smin: D5,7,9,T1,3 read kāle, "in time, at the proper moment," for akāle. The sense then is "at this particular moment or juncture."

"could prove fatal" maraṇāyopapadyate: Literally, "it would lead to death."

32. "which undermines all endeavors" sarvakāryavināśanam: Literally, "destroying all undertakings."

33. "Rather, you should stand guard" athavā [printed as atha vā in the critical edition] rakṣyatām: Ct argues that Vibhīṣaṇa is saying that if Sugrīva lacks the fortitude to rally his own troops, then he himself will do so while Sugrīva stands guard over the fallen Rāma (yadi tava senāsamāśvāsane dhairyaṃ nāsti tadā tad ahaṃ karisyāmi tvayā tu rāmo rakṣaṇīya ity āha).

"until he regains consciousness" yāvat saṃjñāviparyayaḥ: Literally, "so long as there is loss or inversion of consciousness."

34. "This is nothing to Rāma" naitat kiṃcana rāmasya: As Cg points out, the reference is to Rāma's bondage, which Vibhīṣaṇa does not regard as life-threatening. (etac chastrabandhanaṃ rāmasya na kiṃcana. idam asatprāyaṃ bādhakaṃ na bhavatīty arthaḥ. ato na mumūrṣati.) Cr takes the reference to be to the temporary delusion [of the monkeys] in Rāma's presence. He regards this as nothing serious (etad alpakālaṃ prati bhāsamānaṃ mohādi rāmasya samīpe kiṃcana na tuccham ity arthaḥ). Ct and Ck explain that Rāma has experienced nothing fatal (rāmasya naitat kiṃcana. apāyakaraṇam ity arthaḥ—so Ct).

"nor is he about to die" na ca rāmo mumūrṣati: Literally, "and Rāma does not wish to die." The desiderative here is used in an inceptive sense. This is the position of Cg, who here reads the desiderative (sannanta) form of the root $\sqrt{mṛ}$, "to die," in the sense of "anticipation," and cites Siddhāntakaumudī vārttika 2622 (= Pā 6.4.17) to that effect. (marisyatīti śaṅkā na kartavyety arthaḥ. "āśaṅkāyām upasaṃkhyānam" iti mṛyateḥ san.) Cr reads the desiderative as a causative, taking the sense of the form to be "he does not wish to cause us to die (asmān mārayituṃ necchati)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3 p. 132) and Pagani (1999, p. 976) take the desiderative in its primary sense of "wishing to die."

"that vital glow" lakṣmīḥ: We agree with Cg and Cr, who understand, each in his own way, that the reference is to the perceptible vital spark that differentiates the living, even when unconscious, from the dead. Cr glosses, "bodily splendor (śarīraśobhā)," an interpretation followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1530). Cg glosses, "facial luster or brightness (mukhakāntiḥ)." He is followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 113). Pagani (1999, p. 976) also understands the term in this sense, translating, "éclat." Dutt (1893, p. 1237), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 114), and Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 267) all understand the reference to be to Lakṣmī, the goddess of fortune. See 6.38.31 and note for the same idea. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 132) leaves the term lakṣmī untranslated.

"is not deserting him" na hy enaṃ hāsyate: Literally, "it will not leave him." We agree with Ct, Cr, and Cg in understanding the future in the sense of the present (na jahātīty arthaḥ—so Cg). Ct additionally reads a future sense (idānīṃ na jahāty evāgre 'pi na hāsyatīty arthaḥ).

35. "you must console . . . rally" āśvāsaya . . . āśvāsaya: Literally, "[you] console . . . console."

"forces" balam: Ct and Ck understand the term in its other sense of "strength, vital force," glossing, "life force (prāṇam)." This interpretation has been followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1530), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 132), Pagani (1999, p. 976), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 114).

"regroup" saṃsthāpayāmi: Ct glosses, "[while] I steady [them] (sthirāṇi karomi)."

"all the troops" sarvāṇi sainyāni: D5–7,T1,2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead "all the things that need to be done," while D9,T3 read sarvāṇi kāryāṇi. With the verb saṃsthāpayāmi, Cg then interprets the phrase to mean "while I take care of everything that needs to be done." Cg also notes that some interpreters read the adverb yāvat, "while," adjectivally with kāryāṇi in the sense of "as many things as need to be done (kecit tu yāvat kāryāṇi yāvanti kartavyāni tāni sarvāṇīty āhuḥ)." The reading kāryāṇi is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 113).

36. "bull among tawny monkeys" haripuṅgava: D6,10,11,T2,G3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cg read instead harisattama, "best of tawny monkeys."

"spreading rumors from ear to ear" karṇe karṇe prakathitāḥ: Literally, "make announcements in ear after ear." Ct and Ck understand that the monkeys are spreading reports of Rāma's death (rāmaviṗadviṣayaṗrakathanavanto bhavanti—so Ct). Cr merely notes that they are talking about what has happened to Rāma (rāmavṛttāntakathanavantaḥ santīti śeṣaḥ), while Cg and Cm believe that they are encouraging one another to flee (palāyanārthaṃ pravṛttakathā ity arthaḥ).

37. "see me rushing about to encourage the army" māṃ tu dṛṣṭvā pradhāvantam anīkaṃ saṃpraharṣitum: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read the adjective saṃpraharṣitam, "cheered, encouraged," for the critical edition's infinitive saṃpraharṣitum. This reading introduces an ambiguity in that the adjective can modify either the accusative pronoun mām, "me," or the nominative noun anīkam, "army." Commentators who share this reading construe the adjective with anīkam, as do all translators who follow the text of Ct, with the exception of Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 114), who translates, "seeing me cheerfully going about."

38. "he set about rallying" samāśvāsayat: Literally, "he comforted, reassured." Cg understands Vibhīṣaṇa to be reassuring the troops that he is, in fact, Vibhīṣaṇa and not Indrajit (nāham indrajit kiṃtu vibhīṣaṇa iti samāśvāsayad ity arthaḥ). This is not an unreasonable anticipation, as we see at 6.39.32 below that the monkeys actually do mistake Vibhīṣaṇa for Indrajit.

"terrified" vidrutam: We understand the participle in this sense rather than in its other sense of "fled." We do so against virtually all translators consulted on the grounds that there has been no indication up to this point that the monkeys have indeed been put to flight. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 114) attempts to avoid the problem by understanding the action of the verbal root as incipient, translating, "army that was on the point of flight." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 132), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 114), deals unconvincingly with the problem by taking vidrutam apparently adverbially with samāśvāsayat, translating, "Vibhīshana, parcourut les rangs Vānara et y rétablit la confiance." Shastri renders, "Bibishana, passed through the monkey lines reviving their confidence." See 6.38.31 and note below, where Vibhīṣaṇa's success at preventing a rout is mentioned.

39. "entered the city of Laṅkā" viveśa nagarīṃ laṅkām: Cg notes the repetition of this action, which was first mentioned in verse 23 above, arguing that the repetition is employed for the sake of the narrative flow (kathāsaṃghaṭṭanāya pūrvoktam anuvadati).

40. "who was seated there" āsīnam: Ñ2,V1,2,B2,4,D5–7,9–11,T,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead āsādya, "having approached."

42. "he kissed him on the head" upāghrāya sa mūrdhny enam: The verb upa + ā √ghrā means either "to smell" or, especially when its locus is the head, "to kiss."

"everything" sarvam: D1,2,7,10,11,13,T2,G3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead tasmai, "to him."

Following verse 42, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [766*]: "[and] how the two had been deprived of movement and luster by the bonds of his arrows."

43. "His heart flooded with a great access of joy" harṣavegānugatāntarātmā: Literally, "his inner self overtaken by a current of joy."

"that Dāśarathi had caused" dāśaratheḥ samutthitam: Literally, "arisen from Dāśarathi." Ś,Ñ,V,B,D2,3,7,8,13,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read samuttham, "sprung or produced from," for samutthitam, apparently to correct the hypermetric quality of pāda c as it stands in the critical edition.

"in great delight, praised" prahṛṣya vācābhinananda: Literally, "having experienced delight, he praised with words." Cm, noting the seeming pleonasm of the expression "praised with words," remarks, "for the pleasure of his son [Indrajit] he praised him with words alone but not in reality [i.e., with any material gifts] (putraprītyai kevalaṃ taṃ vāṅmātreṇa nananda na tu paramārthataḥ)." D6,7,10,11,T2,3,G1,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead prahṛṣṭavācā, "with joyous words."

The meter is upajāti; pāda c is hypermetric, with twelve syllables, unnoted in the critical apparatus.

Cg observes that some scholars understand that on the night [of the battle that has just ended], the first day of the lunar half month of the new moon has passed (anayā rātryā pratipad gatety ūcuḥ). Cm observes that the battle between the monkeys and the rākṣasas that took place on the night of the new moon and was described from 6.31.15 to 6.36.39 has now been concluded (kālajño rāghavaḥ kāle saṃyugāyābhyacodayad ity ārabhyendrajit tu mahāmāyaḥ sarvasainyasamāvṛtaḥ / viveśa nagarīṃ laṅkām ity antena vānararakṣasāṃ pratipatpravṛttaṃ yuddham uktam). See note to 6.4.4.

1. "Indrajit, the son of Rāvaṇa" rāvaṇātmaje: Literally, "the son of Rāvaṇa."

"in great distress" ārtāḥ: Ñ2,V2,B2,D1,6,7,9–11,13,G2 read instead atha, "now."

"surrounded . . . to protect" parivārya . . . rarakṣuḥ: Literally, "having surrounded, they protected."

2–4. "Gavaya, Śarabha, Gandhamādana" gavayaḥ śarabho gandhamādanaḥ: As with many of the epic's lists of proper nouns, we see numerous variations among the manuscripts. The printed text of the vulgate associated with Ct and Cr (GPP) reads instead panasaḥ sānuprastho mahāhariḥ, "Panasa and the great tawny monkey Sānuprastha." Gita Press (6.47.2), which normally reads with the text of Ct, here reads with the critical edition.

"Sunda" sundaḥ: Printed editions associated with Cg (VSP and KK = 6.47.2) and Gita Press (6.47.3) read instead skandhaḥ, "Skandha."

"maintaining a watch on all sides" yattāḥ . . . sarvataḥ: Literally, "being watchful or attentive on all sides." The adverb sarvataḥ, "on all sides," is construed with other phrases by the various translators consulted.

"armed themselves with trees" drumān ādāya: Literally, "having taken up trees."

"they thought at the mere stirring of the grass that the rākṣasas had come" tṛṇeṣv api ca ceṣṭatsu rākṣasā iti menire: Literally, "whenever the blades of grass moved, they thought, 'Rākṣasas!' "

5. "the rākṣasa women who were guarding Sītā" sītārakṣaṇī rākṣasīḥ: These are the women described in exuberant detail at Sundarakāṇḍa 15 and 20.30–33. They torment Sītā at Sundarakāṇḍa 21–22.

6. "together with Trijaṭā: trijaṭā cāpi: Literally, "and Trijaṭā." This would be the rākṣasa woman whose dream foretells Rāma's triumph and Sītā's rescue at Sundarakāṇḍa 25. Cs is the only commentator to note that Trijaṭā is mentioned separately from the other rākṣasīs. He feels that this suggests that Rāvaṇa suspects her of taking Sītā's side. (rākṣasya itarāḥ. trijaṭeti tābhyaḥ pṛthakkṛte[?]tyoktir uttaratrasāmānyato rākṣasīr ity uktiś ca trijaṭā sītāpakṣe vartata iti rāvaṇamanasi sandeham sūcayataḥ.)

7. "take her in the flying palace Puṣpaka" puṣpakaṃ ca samāropya: Literally, "having caused her to board Puṣpaka." The Puṣpakavimāna is described elaborately at 5.7. 9–15.

8. "she stubbornly spurned me" avaṣṭabdhā neyaṃ mām upatiṣṭhati: Literally, "obdurate, she does not come to me." The commentators and translators generally interpret the participle avaṣṭabdhā in the sense of "proud, arrogant (garvitā—Ct, Cr, Cg)."

9. "free from anxiety, longing, and hope" nirviśaṅkā nirudvignā nirapekṣā ca: Literally, "free from fear, free from sorrow, and free from expectation." Each of these terms is ambiguous and subject to meanings that overlap with one another. Our understanding is that the first term refers to freedom from anxiety as to Rāma's fate, whereabouts, intentions, etc. The second, we feel, means freedom from the specific kind of distress associated with being separated from one's beloved. We understand the third term to refer to the loss of any hope or anticipation of rescue by, and reunion with, her husband. The commentators offer a number of similar interpretations. Thus, for nirviśaṅkā, Ct and Cr gloss, "devoid of fear or anxiety for Rāma (rāmaśaṅkārahitā)," while Cg glosses, "free from indecision or hesitation (nirvicārā)." For nirudvignā, Ct, Cm, and Cg gloss, "without grief (niḥśokā)." For nirapekṣā, Ct glosses,

"devoid of any hope that Rāma will meet [with her] (rāmo milisyatīty āśārahitā)." Cr glosses, "without expectation of returning to Ayodhyā (ayodhyāprāptyapekṣārahitā)." Cg and Cm understand as Ct does, "without hope that Rāma will meet [with her] (rāmaḥ sameṣyatīty āśārahitā)." See note to 6.2.14.

"adorned with all manner of jewelry" sarvābharaṇabhūṣitā: For a discussion on the importance of Sītā's jewelry, see S. Goldman 2000.

"will surely come to me" mām upasthāsyate: Cm, in keeping with his larger theological interpretation, understands the word mām here not as the accusative first person pronoun but rather as the accusative of the feminine mā, "mother," which he takes to be a reference to the goddess Lakṣmī. With this and his reading of the various forms of the root √han, "slay," in verses 7ff., to mean "come" (see note to 6.27.9), Cm creates a scenario in which Rāvaṇa is arguing that Sītā, having seen her husband come to the battlefield to fight with Indrajit, will realize, as a perfectly devoted wife, that she has no other interest than Rāma. She will then come to [merge with] the goddess Lakṣmī, who has been temporarily placed in the care of Rāvaṇa. (māṃ lakṣmīṃ madīyām iti śeṣaḥ. nopatiṣṭhati nānubhavatīty arthaḥ. asyā bhartā raṇamūrdhani bhrātrā saha nihata āgataḥ khalu. taṃ dṛṣṭvetaḥ paraṃ nirviśaṅkā nirudvignaitāvat paryantaṃ nirapekṣāpi maithilī sarvābharaṇabhūṣitā satī māṃ madīyāṃ lakṣmīṃ niveditāṃ lakṣmīm ity arthaḥ. upasthāsyate 'nubhaviṣyatīty arthaḥ.) See notes to 5.18.4ff. for Cm's theological reading of the text. See, too, notes to 6.23.1–3.

10. "succumbed to the power of Kāla" kālavaśaṃ prāptam: This phrase is one of several epic euphemisms for death.

*"and finding no alternative" nānyāṃ gatim apaśyatī: The critical text, apparently supported by a number of southern manuscripts (D5,9,M,T,G3), contains a difficult double negative, which would translate literally as "failing to see no alternative." This seems to be directly opposite to the expected meaning in the context. D6,7,10,11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of the commentators read ca, "and," for the negative particle na, and we have translated in accordance with this reading. Northern manuscripts avoid the problem entirely by substituting two lines [774*]. See 6.92.15 and 6.95.24 and notes. For additional examples of double negatives, see 6.12.3; 6.52.3; 6.67.36; 6.93.15; 6.95.24; 6.101.36; and notes. See, too, 6.99.24, 3132*, lines 7–8 and note 4. Cf. 6.38.33.

"her hopes finally dashed" vinivṛttāśā: D6,9–11,G,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead vinivṛttā sā, "she [would] desist or turn back."

Following verse 10, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [775*]: "Devoid of hope, the wide-eyed woman will come to me of her own accord."

12. "fetched" samupānayan: The verb sam + upa √nī has several meanings, such as "fetch, bring to, lead." Translators have interpreted variously to indicate that the rākṣasa women went together to Sītā, rejoined her, or conducted the flying palace to her. Cr, the only commentator to deal with this term, accepts the latter sense, glossing, "causing [Puṣpaka] to reach [her] (prāpayan)."

"aśoka grove" aśokavanikā-: This is, of course, the well-known site of Sītā's confinement. See Sundarakāṇḍa 12 for a description.

13. "seized" ādāya: Literally, "having taken." We follow Cr, who reads more strongly, glossing, "seizing with their hands (karair gṛhītvā)."

"who was lost in sorrow for her husband" bhartṛśokaparāyaṇām: The reference is probably to Sītā's ongoing grief over her separation from her husband as described so poignantly at 5.13.18ff., etc. Cr, however, appears to understand that Sītā is suffering from the fresh sorrow of learning of her husband's apparent death from the conversation of the rākṣasa women who have come to take her (bhartṛśokena rākṣasīvacanaśravaṇajanitabhartṛviṣayakapaścāttāpena parājitām [v.l. for parāyaṇām]).

Ś,Ñ2,V1,2,D2,4,5,7,8,10,12,13,T1,2,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead bhartṛśokaparājitām, "overwhelmed with sorrow for her husband."

"forced her into" tām . . . āropayāmāsuḥ: Literally, "caused her to mount."

14. "Once Rāvaṇa had seen to it that Sītā had been taken aboard" āropya sītām . . . rāvaṇaḥ: Literally, "Rāvaṇa having caused Sītā to mount." Following 14ab, D5,T1,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm (VSP, KK = 6.47.14cd; GPP bracketed after 6.47.14ab), as well as the text of Gita Press (6.47.15ab), insert a passage of one line [777*], which makes the rākṣasa women, and not Rāvaṇa, the subject of the gerund āropya, "having caused to mount." This would then yield the meaning: "And the rākṣasa women went off to show Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa to Sītā." Cg, the only commentator to discuss this line, observes that Rāvaṇa ordered both Sītā and Trijaṭā to mount the Puṣpakavimāna. He goes on to say that he gave this order to Trijaṭā specifically because of her cleverness and because she was his daughter. (trijaṭayā saha sītām āropya. ubhayor eva vimānārohaṇam anujñāyety arthaḥ. putrītvān nipuṇatayā ca trijaṭāyā vimānarohaṇānujñā.) Vālmīki nowhere mentions a filial relationship between Trijaṭā and Rāvaṇa (cf. verses 6 above and 16 below; and also 5.25.4,7,9; 5.28.1; and 6.38.22,35,36).

"had Laṅkā festooned with flags and banners" akārayal laṅkāṃ patākādhvajamālinīm: Literally, "he caused Laṅkā to have flags and banners as garlands." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read cārayāmāsa, "caused to move about," for akārayal laṅkāṃ. The sense of the line then becomes: "He caused her to be taken around [Laṅkā], which was festooned with flags and banners." Translators who follow Ct are divided as to whether the causative here suggests that Rāvaṇa merely sent Sītā off with the rākṣasa women (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 135; Pagani 1999, p. 978; and Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1522, which also reads 777*) or actually accompanies her on the flight (Dutt 1893, p. 1239 and Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 115).

16. "practically the entire . . . army" sarvaṃ sainyam: Literally, "the entire army." We have added the word "practically" in keeping with Ct's eminently sensible gloss, "many (bahv ity arthaḥ)." It is contextually impossible, of course, to understand that the entire monkey army has been destroyed.

17. "while the monkeys . . . were afflicted with sorrow" vānarāṃś cāpi duḥkhārtān: Literally, "and also the monkeys afflicted with sorrow." V2,D7,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read cātiduḥkhārtān, "and [the monkeys] exceedingly afflicted with sorrow," for cāpi duḥkhārtān.

18. "lying . . . on their beds of arrows" śayānau śaratalpayoḥ: Literally, "the two lying on two arrow-beds." Ñ2,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read śaratalpagau, "gone to arrow-beds," for śaratalpayoḥ. See 6.35.19,24 and notes; and 6.36.4–7 and note.

"riddled with arrows" śarapīḍitau: Literally, "oppressed or afflicted by arrows."

19. "Their armor was shattered" vidhvastakavacau: Cr, as ever unwilling to admit injury or defeat in the case of his heroes, reads this and the following two compounds as bahuvrīhis in which Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa become the subjects of the participles that form the first members. He thus understands the compounds as references to Rāma's and Lakṣmaṇa's heroic feats in their battle with the rākṣasas in Janasthāna, where, according to him, the two heroes inflicted the damage described in the verse upon their enemies (Araṇyakāṇḍa 24–29). Thus, Cr translates the compound as "those two [heroes] by whom the armor of the rākṣasas was destroyed in Janasthāna (vidhvastā janasthāne vināśitāḥ kavacāḥ rākṣasavarmāṇi yābhyāṃ)." See note to 6.35.9.

"their bows had slipped from their grasp" vipraviddhaśarāsanau: We follow Cg, Ct, and Cm, who gloss the participle vipraviddha with its common meaning of "fallen, cast aside (bhraṣṭa—so Ct, Cg)." In keeping with his interpretation, noted above, Cr understands the participle in its other common sense of "pierced, shattered." He would thus read: "the two by whom the bows [of the rākṣasas] were shattered (vipraviddhāni śarāsanāni yābhyām)." See note to 6.35.9.

"Their every limb riddled with arrows" sāyakaiś chinnasarvāṅgau: Cr continues to understand the adjectives as references to Rāma's and Lakṣmaṇa's heroic feats in the Araṇyakāṇḍa (sargas 24–29). He interprets, "by whom every limb [of the rākṣasas] had been severed with arrows (śāyakaiś chinnāni sarvāṅgāni yābhyāṃ tau)." See note to 6.35.9.

"looked like two pillars of arrows fallen to the ground" śarastambhamayau kṣitau: Literally, "the two on the ground [were] made of arrow-pillars." The visual image intended here is not entirely clear. Apparently, we are to understand that the bodies of the two heroes are so thickly riddled with arrows that they themselves resemble [fallen] columns made of arrows. So we understand Ck, the only commentator to read with the critical edition, who glosses, "having the form of [two] pillars made of arrows that were embedded in every limb (sarvāṅgakhacitaśarakṛtasthūṇārūpau)." The situation is further complicated by the scattered nature of the textual evidence. The critical reading is apparently shared by D5,9,M,G2,3,T1, and Ck. Several southern and northern manuscripts, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators other than Ck read -stamba-,"clump, cluster, thicket," for -stambha-, "pillar." This reading allows for an ambiguity in the meaning of the word śara, which can be read as either "arrow" or "grass, reeds." The image becomes either "a clump or thicket of reeds or a cluster of arrows." Cg thus explains, "made of thickets of reeds [arrows?] (śaragulmamayau)" but notes that others understand -stamba- to mean -samūha-, "collection" (stambaḥ samūha ity eke). He is evidently quoting Cm, who gives this same gloss, as does Ct. Compare the similar reference to Lakṣmaṇa's "having become [like] an arrow (śarabhūtaḥ)" in the text of Ct at note to 6.39.15.

20. Following 20ab, D5,6 (line 1 after 20ab; line 2 after 19),7,9–11,T,G1(adds after 19),2,3,M insert a passage of two lines [780*]: "The two lotus-eyed princes, those bulls among men, who were like sons of Agni, the purifier, were lying in that condition on beds of arrows."

Following verse 20, D5–7,9–11,S insert an additional passage of two lines [781*]: "When Janaka's dark-eyed daughter, whose limbs were flawless, spied her husband and Lakṣmaṇa, both writhing in the dust, she began to weep."

21. "who were equal in power to the gods" devasamaprabhāvau: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -suta-, "sons," for -sama-, "equal," yielding the sense "as powerful as the sons of the gods."

"assumed that they were dead" vitarkayantī nidhanaṃ tayoḥ: Literally, "presuming the death of those two."

The meter is indravajrā (with the first syllable of pāda c irregularly light).

1. "had been struck down" nihatam: Literally, "had been slain." Cm and Ct add the comparative particle iva, "like," giving the sense "seemed to be slain."

"lamented" vilalāpa: Several of the commentators feel compelled to explain how the omniscient goddess Sītā could give way to lamentation when Rāma is not really dead. Cm argues that, although she knows the truth, she laments in order deceive the rākṣasas (vāstavārthe 'yam āśāyaḥ sarveśvarā sarvajñā devī rāmalakṣmaṇayoḥ kāpi hānir nāstīti jñātvāpi rākṣasān vañcayituṃ bahuvidhaṃ pralapatīti). Ct adds that she laments as an actress might in order to firmly establish in the rākṣasas' minds the notion of her humanity (sarvajñāpi devī rākṣasānāṃ mānuṣabuddhisthairyāya naṭavad vilalāpety arthaḥ).

2. "scholars who know the science of bodily signs" lakṣaṇikāḥ: Literally, "having to do with marks or signs." The form is not well attested and is apparently known only to six of the manuscripts collated for the critical edition (D6,11,12,T2,M4,5). The better-attested lākṣaṇikāḥ is found in Ñ2,V,B,D9–11,T2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr. Ct and Ck explain this as "those who know the signs in the sāmudrikaśāstra (sāmudrikalakṣaṇajñāḥ)," a reference to the science of prognostication by bodily characteristics (see 5.33.15–19 and notes to 5.31.9). Cr glosses, "knowing the signs that indicate auspiciousness and inauspiciousness (śubhāśubhasūcakalakṣaṇajñāḥ)." A number of manuscripts (Ś,D1–6,8,13,T1,G,M3), and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read instead lakṣaṇinaḥ [lākṣaṇinaḥ Ñ1,D7,M5]. Cm glosses, "experts in the sāmudrikaśāstra (sāmudrikāḥ)." Cg understands that the term lakṣaṇa, "sign," here by secondary derivation refers to the knowledge of signs so that the term means those possessing such knowledge, which, Cg continues, consists of knowledge of the sixty-six bodily signs specific to women. (lakṣaṇaśabdenātra lakṣaṇajñānaṃ lakṣyate tad eṣām astīti lakṣaṇinaḥ. ṣaḍuttaraṣaṣṭilakṣaṇasāmudrikaśāstrajñā ity arthaḥ. ṣaṣṭiṣṣaḍuttarā yoṣidaṅgalakṣaṇam īritam ity uktaḥ.)

"would bear sons and never be a widow" putriṇy avidhavā: Cg quotes relevant verses from the sāmudrikaśāstra that link specific bodily characteristics to the states of non-widowhood and motherhood. The first verse states:

> A woman whose chest is hairless, smooth, and free from indentation will enjoy power, will never be a widow, and will gain the love of her beloved.
> nirloma hṛdayaṃ yasyāḥ samaṃ nimnatvavarjitam /
> aiśvaryaṃ cāpy avaidhavyaṃ priyaprema ca sā labhet //

Cf. GaruḍaP 1.64.8 and 1.65.118, where hair on the breasts of women is considered inauspicious; and Garuḍa P 1.65.98, where the absence of such hair is considered auspicious.

The second says:

> A woman with long fingers and long hair will have a long life and sons.
> dīrghāṅguliś ca yā nārī dīrghakeśī ca yā bhavet /
> dīrgham āyur avāpnoti putraiś ca saha vartate //

*"those wise men" [a]jñāninaḥ: The critical edition, supported only by Ck, reads ajñāninaḥ, literally, "ignorant ones." Given the phonological environment in the verse, in which the locative rāme precedes the term, and given that manuscripts generally omit the avagraha, it is difficult to determine on what basis the critical editors have decided on the negative here and in the following three verses. The critical apparatus provides no textual support for the reading and offers no explanation for their choice. All printed versions consulted of both northern and southern texts read jñāninaḥ, "wise men," which, we believe, makes better sense contextually. Sītā is, as we and other translators agree, arguing that the scholars have made an error, not that they are ignorant. Cg (quoted in the critical apparatus) glosses jñāninaḥ as "those who possess the knowledge of [bodily] signs (lakṣaṇajñānavantaḥ)." Ct and Cr both concur. Only Ck definitively reads ajñāninaḥ (ajñānina iti padam). All things considered, we have emended the critical text to read jñāninaḥ.

3. "of a king who performed the rites of royalty" yajvanaḥ: Literally, "of one who performs [vedic] sacrifices." This can refer to any sacrificer. However, in the context of the term mahiṣī, "chief queen," we agree with Ct, Cr, Cv, Cg, and Cm, who take the reference to be to the sacrifices associated with kingship, such as the aśvamedha, etc. Thus, for example, Cg, quoting the Amarakośa (2.7.8), comments, "yajvanaḥ kṛtāśvamedhādikasya. yajvā tu vidhineṣṭavān ity amaraḥ." Ck, who reads this verse following our verse 14 below, understands the sacrifices to be the agniṣṭoma, etc. (yajvano mahiṣīm agniṣṭomādi yājirājamahiṣīm).

"a great patron of sacrifices" satriṇaḥ: Literally, "a performer of satras." The term satra (v.l. sattra) can refer to any sacrifice. However, the term is frequently used, as the commentators indicate here, to refer to long sacrificial sessions presided over by many officiants (satriṇo bahudinasādhyabahukartṛkayāgakartuḥ—so Ct). Apparently the two terms (yajvan and satrin) are used to refer, respectively, to Rāma's kingly role as the chief officiant of the realm and as his role as a householder-sacrificer. See Bālakāṇḍa 11–13 and notes. See, too, 6.116.81 and note.

*"those wise men" [a]jñāninaḥ: See note to verse 2 above.

4. The order of verses 4 and 5 varies in different manuscript traditions. The texts of Cv, Crā, Cg, Cm, Ck, and Cr read verse 5 before verse 4. Printed editions of VSP and KK (6.48.4–5) read in this order as well. Among the commentators, only Ct reads with the critical text. Printed editions of GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read with the critical edition. Gorresio's edition reads with the critical edition but reverses the order of verses 3 and 4 (6.23.5–7). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 116) is the only translator consulted who reads in the inverted order.

"they told" viduḥ: Literally, "they knew." The context obliges us to read the simplex as a causative. Cg glosses, "having known, they told (viditvā ūcuḥ)." Ct simply glosses, "they told (prāhuḥ)."

"And although they told me, 'You shall be the wife of a heroic king and very fortunate' " vīrapārthivapatnī tvaṃ ye dhanyeti ca māṃ viduḥ: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr, Ct, and Ck and the text of Gita Press read instead vīrapārthivapatnīnāṃ ye vidur bhartṛpūjitām, "And although they foretold that I would be honored among the wives of heroic kings and honored by my husband." The reading is awkward, and the word pūjanīyām, "to be honored," must be supplied according to Ct and Ck (pūjanīyām iti śesaḥ). Cv insists that the critical [=Cg] reading is the authentic one (iti samyakpāṭhaḥ), while Ck, equally emphatically, insists on the authenticity of the variant (bhartṛpūjitām iti vai pāṅktaḥ pāṭhaḥ).

5. "in my presence" saṃśravaṇe: Literally, "within the range of hearing." We follow Ct, Ck, Cm, and Cr, who understand, "in my presence (matsaṃnidhau—Cr)." Cg offers this as his second alternative, arguing, probably correctly, that the prophecy would have been made to Sītā's mother, etc. (mātrādisamīpa iti śeṣaḥ). For his first interpretation, he takes the term more literally to mean "directly within my range of hearing (mama saṃyak śravaṇe)," glossing, "while I was listening (mayi śṛṇvantyām)."

"that I should enjoy good fortune" mām . . . śubhām: Literally, "me . . . fortunate." The commentators generally agree that here "good fortune" means that she, Sītā, would never be widowed (avidhavām—so Ct). Cg glosses, "ever-auspicious [married woman] (nityamaṅgalām)" and gives a list of appropriate physical characteristics:

> For lovely ladies, the following [characteristics] betoken good fortune: a pleasant smile, unblinking eyes, and a nose with even and round sides (lit., coverings), with small nostrils.
> smitaṃ praśastaṃ sudṛśāṃ animīlitalocanam /
> samavṛttapuṭā nāsā laghuchidrā śubhāvahā //

*"those wise men" [a]jñāninaḥ: See note to verse 2 above.

6. "those lotus marks" padmāni: Literally, "lotuses." The commentators agree that the reference is to lines on the hands and/or feet in the shape of a lotus (padmāni pāṇipādavartirekhārūpapadmāni—so Ct, Ck). In a note, Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, pp. 370–71, note 119), quotes Cl as well, who glosses, "lotus signs (padmacihnāni)." These marks betoken royal sovereignty (see GaruḍaP 1.65.105–106).

"whereby it is said women" kila striyaḥ: Literally, "women, it is said." B1,D5,7,9–11,T1,G, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read kula-, "good family," for kila, yielding the compound kulastriyaḥ, "women of good family."

7. According to Ct, many authorities regard this verse as an interpolation (idaṃ padyaṃ prakṣiptam iti bahavaḥ). None of the other commentators consulted, however, makes this claim.

"though I search for them" paśyantī: Literally, "[I] looking." We follow the interpretation of Cg and Cr, who understand that Sītā is looking in vain for the signs [of widowhood to explain her ill fortune] (vimṛśantī). Ct, however, understands, "although I see auspicious signs [the signs on my body are meaningless] (sulakṣaṇāni paśyanty api)."

"inauspicious signs" alakṣaṇaiḥ: The reading of the critical edition is shared by a number of manuscripts, including the texts and printed editions of Ct, who indicates that this is his reading (yair alakṣaṇaiḥ). Printed texts of Cg and Cm read instead lakṣaṇaiḥ, "signs." Cm specifically notes that this is the correct dissolution of the sandhi (lakṣaṇair iti chedaḥ). Cs also reads lakṣaṇaiḥ and explains it as meaning either "those who know the science of signs or the signs themselves. (lakṣayanti janān iti tajjñaiḥ kartṛbhiḥ. lakṣaṇaiḥ karaṇair vā.)"

"Indeed, the signs on my body are meaningless." hatalakṣaṇā: Literally, " I, having worthless signs." We agree with Ct, Cg, and Cm in understanding that what Sītā is saying is that the presence of auspicious marks on her body (and the absence of inauspicious ones) has proven meaningless. Cr offers a rather idiosyncratic explanation, in keeping with his position that Sītā cannot even have imagined that Rāma had been killed. He does this by taking hatalakṣaṇā not as the compound hata-lakṣaṇā but rather as the emphatic particle ha plus the compound tala-kṣaṇā, which he takes as a bahuvrīhi in the sense of "one who has auspicious [literally, "festival-producing"] signs [literally, "moments"] on the palms of her hands and the soles of her feet (talayoḥ pāṇipādatalayoḥ kṣaṇam utsavapradacihnaṃ yasyāḥ sāham)." Cr understands, "I who have these auspicious signs on my palms and soles do not see any of the inauspicious signs that foretell widowhood." This, he suggests, indicates that Rāma's death could not possibly have occurred (sāham ātmano naiva paśyāmy etena rāmanidhanaṃ na saṃbhavatīti sūcitam). Cf. note to 6.35.9.

As before, Cg quotes the sāmudrikaśāstra's listing of some of the physical signs that indicate auspiciousness and inauspiciousness for women:

> If her toes ride up on one another, then a woman, after killing many husbands, will become a servant. If the little toe of a woman fails to touch the ground while she is walking, it kills two husbands. If it is the first or second [toe], it kills three husbands. If a woman has a single hair growing out of each pore, she becomes the wife of a king; if she has two, she experiences supreme felicity, but if she has three, she suffers the miseries of widowhood.

Cf. GaruḍaP 1.64.11; 1.65.112; and 1.65.7,8.

8. "In the science of bodily signs" lakṣaṇe: Literally, "in the sign." We take this by secondary derivation to refer to the science of signs, following the lead of Cg on verse 2, who says, "by the word lakṣaṇa, the science of signs is indicated by secondary derivation (lakṣaṇaśabdenātra lakṣaṇajñānaṃ lakṣyate)." B1,D5–7,9–11,T,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Crā, Cm, Cg, Ct, and Cr read instead lakṣaṇaiḥ, which Ct and Cr take to mean "those knowledgeable in the bodily signs (lakṣaṇa[abhi]jñaiḥ)." Cg takes this to be an instrumental of accompaniment and thus understands, "lotus marks along with such marks as the 'banner,' etc. (dhvajādilakṣaṇaiḥ saha padmāni)."

"the . . . infallible" satyānīmāni: Literally, "these [are] true." D5–7,9–11,T,G1,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Crā, Cm, Cg, Ct, and Cr read instead satyanāmāni, "accurately named." Ct and Cr gloss, "having unfailing results (amoghaphalāni)." Cg struggles with the literal meaning, playing first with the name padma and then simply arguing that the marks are aptly named because they consist of lines that are said to represent a lotus (yāni satyanāmāni padmāny uktāni tāni me).

9. Ck claims that this and the following verse are interpolated in some manuscripts (atra madhye dvau ślokau prakṣiptau kvacit). This claim, however, finds no support in the critical apparatus of either the critical edition or KK.

"My eyebrows do not meet." bhruvau cāsaṃgate: Cf. GaruḍaP 1.65.102. Ś,Ñ1,V1,D1–3,8,10–12,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read asaṃhate, "are not closely joined," for asaṃgate, "not meeting."

"My legs are smooth and tapering" vṛtte cālomaśe jaṅghe: Literally, "my legs are round and hairless." The word jaṅgha can refer either to the calf or the thigh. We have taken it to refer to the entire leg. Translations consulted vary from "leg" (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 117; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 136; and Pagani 1999, p. 979) to "shanks" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1534 and Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 116) to "hips" (Dutt 1893, p. 1240). Cg quotes a verse he attributes to the Skandapurāṇa:

She whose legs are hairless, beautiful, smooth, free from veins, and gently tapered will become the lovely wife of a king.

romahīne śubhe snigdhe yajjaṅghe kramavartule /
sā rājapatnī bhavati viśire sumanoharā //

Cf. GaruḍaP 1.64.25 and 1.65.94–96.

10. "And my . . . are nicely developed" ca me citau: Literally, "and my . . . [are] piled up." We follow Cv, Ck, Ct, and Cg, who gloss, "increased or full grown (upacitau)." Cr glosses, "fleshy (māṃsalau)." The texts and printed editions of Ct read samau, "equal or even," for ca me, "and my."

"temples" śaṅkhe: The commentators agree that this term, whose most common meaning is "conch shell," refers to the temporal bones at the outer corners of the eyes (netropāntabhūtalalāṭapārśve—so Cg). But see 6.84.28 and note.

"nails are rounded" anuvṛttā nakhāḥ: V3,D6,9–11,T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cm, Cg, and Cr read instead the compound anuvṛttanakhāḥ, which thus becomes a bahuvrīhi compound subordinated to the noun aṅgulayaḥ, "toes and fingers," in pāda d. The sense would thus be "my toes and fingers have rounded nails." Several of the translators evidently follow this reading. If one accepts this reading, then one must construe the adjective snigdhāḥ, "glossy," with aṅgulayaḥ, "fingers and toes," in the sense of "soft or smooth."

"fingers and toes" aṅgulayaḥ: The term may refer equally to the fingers or the toes. We agree here with Cg, who understands that both are intended (pādahastāṅgulayaḥ).

"well proportioned" samāḥ: Literally, "equal, identical, or similar." We understand the term here to mean that the fingers and toes are even and regular in their shape. Cg, evidently puzzled by the term, offers three distinct alternative explanations. First, the digits are "equal" in the sense that they are roughly the length of the hand; that is, they are neither too long nor too short. (hastaparimāṇasadṛśāḥ. nātidīrghā nātihrasvā ity arthaḥ.) Second, the digits of one hand [or foot] are equal to the [corresponding] digits of the other (yadvāikahastavad dhastāntare 'pi tulyaparimāṇā ity arthaḥ). Third, the digits are neither deficient nor excessive in number (anyūnādhikasaṃkhyākā iti vārthaḥ).

11. "with sloping sides" utsaṅginī: Cg understands this to mean that the navel "has a protuberant or elevated area surrounding it (unnataparyantapradeśaḥ)." D5,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead utsedhanī, "possessing an elevation," for which Ct and Cr provide the same gloss as Cg does for utsaṅginī. Ck, who reads with the critical edition, glosses utsedhavat, "possessing an elevation." In other words, this latter reading suggests that the navel protrudes.

12. "Since I stand so firmly on my feet—all twelve points making contact—they said that I was possessed of auspicious signs." pratiṣṭhitāṃ dvādaśabhir mām ūcuḥ śubhalakṣaṇāṃ: Literally, "they said that I was possessed of auspicious signs [and] was established with twelve." The phrase is both elliptical and enigmatic. The number twelve could refer to twelve auspicious marks, but none of the commentators suggests this, and the number twelve in this context does not provoke the commentators to refer to any specific set of signs with this number. The adjective pratiṣṭhitām, "fixed, established," can also mean, among other things, "celebrated or endowed." Apte (s.v. pratiṣṭhita) gives "endowed" as his meaning number eleven, a meaning he documents with this verse. Apte, however, evidently uncertain about this meaning, attempts to reinforce his interpretation by quoting Ct on the verse, although, as stated below, we do not believe that Ct understands it in this sense. Ct, Cg, Cm, Cv, Cl, and Ck all understand that the reference is to Sītā's standing firmly [on the ground—so Ck, Cg, Cm, Cl] with twelve points of contact consisting of her ten toes and the two soles of her feet (pādadvayavartyaṅgulidaśakaṃ dve pādatale ca—so Ct). This appears to make some sense in light of the view of the sāmudrikaśāstra, namely, that toes that do not make contact with the ground are signs of inauspiciousness. (See notes to verse 7 above.) Our translation reflects this interpretation. Cr, the only commentator to dissent from this interpretation, understands the number twelve to refer to the ten senses plus the mental faculty and the higher intellectual faculty (daśabhir indriyair manobuddhibhyām). Cr does not make clear, however, how he then understands the adjective pratiṣṭhitām for which none of the normal meanings seems to make much sense, given his interpretation. Gorresio's text (6.23.15) reads śubhalakṣaṇaiḥ for śubhalakṣaṇām, providing, in effect, a lectio facilior in which the number twelve is directly linked to the auspicious signs. In his note 121 on this passage (1856, vol. 9, p. 371), Gorresio quotes Cl, whose explanation is identical to that of the southern commentators. Gorresio notes, however, that the verse has elicited a different interpretation on the part of Vimalabodha, although he fails to provide the interpretation. Gorresio declares that he is unable to determine which of the two interpretations is correct. He contents himself with merely noting that inadequate attention has been given to the ancient art of bodily features, an art, he claims, that was widely believed in and practiced in ancient India and one that had its followers even in his own day. Of the translators consulted, Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 272), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 116), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1534) base their translations, as do we, on the interpretation of the overwhelming majority of commentators. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 137), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 117), Pagani (1999, p. 979), and Dutt (1893, p. 1241) all understand the verse merely to be saying that Sītā was said to be endowed with twelve auspicious signs.

13. "of excellent color" varṇavat: Literally, "possessing color." We follow the interpretation of Ct, Cr, Ck, and Cm in reading the possessive suffix -vant in the sense of "having an excellent glow (praśastakānti)." Cg glosses, "of rosy or reddish hue (aruṇavarṇam)." Cg is followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 116) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1534). Cs, citing the Viśvakośa, glosses, "beautiful (rūpavat)." See GaruḍaP 1.65.92.

"without gaps" acchidram: The commentators explain the term to mean that the fingers and toes lie close to one another without spaces in between (śliṣṭāṅgulyantarālam—so Cg). See GaruḍaP 1.65.92; cf. 1.65.46–47.

"marked with the auspicious sign of a whole barleycorn" samagrayavam: Literally, "possessing a whole yava [mark]." This is an auspicious mark on the thumb (of a man) mentioned in the Garuḍapurāṇa (1.65.45–46). It is described by Ct, Cr, and Ck as a mark the size and shape of a barleycorn formed by double lines in the middle of the joints of the digits (aṅguliparvamadhyagasamagrayavapramāṇadvidvirekhāvat—so Ct). Cg and Cm describe it merely as a line in the shape of a whole barleycorn (saṃpūrṇayavākārarekham). Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 117), in a note, explains the term as "a natural line crossing the thumb at the second joint resembling a barley corn, which is considered auspicious." Pagani (1999, p. 1662) includes a similar note. See GaruḍaP 1.65.104.

"Those who know the science of the bodily signs of girls said of me" māṃ kanyālakṣaṇikā viduḥ: Literally, "Those who interpret the marks of girls knew regarding me." M3 and the printed editions of Cg read dvijāḥ, "brahmans [literally, twice-born ones]," for viduḥ, "they knew." See notes to verse 2 above.

"She has that faint smile." mandasmitety eva: Evidently, this is a permanent feature of the countenance (nityamandasmitā—Cg) and not merely a transient sign of pleasure. It is also apparently considered to be auspicious. Cf. GaruḍaP 1.65.99–104, however, where no mention is made of such a sign.

14. "together with my husband" patinā saha: Literally, "with the lord." Cs reminds us that the proper instrumental for the noun patiḥ in the sense of "husband" is patyā. He thus understands the term pati, "lord," to mean "husband" by secondary derivation. (patinā patyā. patir ity ākhyātaḥ patir iti lākṣaṇikaḥ.)

Following verse 14, D5,T1,G2, and the text of Ck read or repeat verse 3. Cg and, according to the critical apparatus, Crā note this fact and attribute it to carelessness on the part of scribes. (tataḥ paraṃ yajvano mahiṣīṃ ye mām ity adhastanaślokaḥ keṣucit kośeṣu dṛśyate. sa tu lekhakapramādakṛtaḥ—so Crā.)

15. "After scouring Janasthāna" śodhayitvā janasthānam: Literally, "having purified Janasthāna." We agree with Cr that the reference is to cleansing Janasthāna of the evil rākṣasas as described at Araṇyakāṇḍa 24–29 (duṣṭavadhena saṃśodhya). Cg, however, glosses, "having searched (anviṣya)," while Cm glosses, "having destroyed (nāśaṃ nītvā)."

"finding out what had become of me" pravṛttim upalabhya: Literally, "having obtained news." We have supplied the phrase "of me," in agreement with Cr, who glosses, "having obtained news of me by means of sending out Hanumān, and so forth (hanumatpreṣaṇādinā madvṛttāntam upalabhya)."

"crossed the . . . ocean" tīrtvā sāgaram: Literally, "having crossed." The reference here is to the great feat of bridging and crossing the mighty ocean (Yuddhakāṇḍa 15). Ct understands the word sāgaram, "ocean," to refer both to the sea and, metaphorically, to the army of rākṣasas (sāgaraṃ samudraṃ rākṣasasenāsāgaraṃ ca). Dutt (1893, p. 1241) finds the second interpretation "hardly necessary."

"a petty skirmish" goṣpade: Literally, "in a cow's hoofprint." A cow's hoofprint or the small puddle formed therein is a common metaphor in Sanskrit for something trivial or insignificant. Compare, for example, the well-known invocatory stanza from the Rāmāyaṇa Māhātmya tradition in which Hanumān is represented as leaping over the ocean as if it were nothing more than a cow's hoofprint (goṣpadīkṛtavārīśaṃ [maśakīkṛtarākṣasam / rāmāyaṇamahāmālāratnaṃ vande 'nilātmajam]). The expression "battle in a cow's hoofprint (goṣpade yuddham)" is also used to refer to an insignificant squabble, or a "tempest in a teapot." The idea here is that Sītā is referring to the great irony that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa should have accomplished the enormously heroic feats she enumerates, only to fall in this petty encounter with the solitary Indrajit. Ct, however, in keeping with his metaphor of the army as an ocean, thinks that the term goṣpada refers to the small remnant of the [monkey] army in which, as noted at verse 6.37.16 above, only a few of the troop leaders remain standing after many days of battle. It is in this small circle of survivors that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are bound by Indrajit's arrows. (goṣpade 'lpāvaśiṣṭasainye hatāv ity arthaḥ. anena bahudinayuddhottaram alpāvaśiṣṭe sainye katipayayūthaparūpe 'yaṃ śarabandha iti labhyate.) Cg understands the reference to be to the mere illusion of Indrajit (indrajinmāyāmātra iti bhāvaḥ).

16. "Didn't . . . obtain" nanu . . . pratyapadyatām: The particle nanu has a number of uses, including that of raising a question, especially of a rhetorical nature. Sītā is wondering why Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa allowed themselves to be defeated when they controlled such powerful weapons. Ct argues that we should supply the phrase: "Since [they had obtained] them earlier, how is it that they did not remember [them] now (nanu itaḥ pūrvam tatkim idānīṃ na smṛtam iti śeṣaḥ)?" Cg, citing Amarakośa 3.4.10 on the various uses of the particle nanu, thinks that the two most appropriate meanings in this context are that of indicating that something is well known or as a marker of invocation (nanv iti prasiddhāv āmantraṇe vā praśnāvadhāraṇānujñānunayāmantraṇe nanv ity amaraḥ). Cg further suggests that invocation may occur for no particular reason in the case of lamentation (pralāpe nirnimittam āmantraṇaṃ saṃbhavati).

"divine weapon-spells . . . divine . . . weapon-spell" astram: The term here is used collectively. These astras, or divine weapon-spells, of the various divinities named in the verse are weapon-spells that generally employ the elements of which the divinities are the personifications or presiding deities. These and other divine weapon-spells were given to Rāma by Viśvāmitra at 1.26.2–24. See note to 6.35.5.

17. "My two protectors . . . Now there is no one to protect me." mama nāthāv anāthāyāḥ: Literally, "the two protectors of me, who am without a protector."

"by an invisible foe" adṛśyamānena: Literally, "by an invisible one."

18. "whom Rāghava could see" dṛṣṭipathaṃ prāpya rāghavasya: Literally, "having reached Rāghava's field of vision."

"with his life" jīvan: Literally, "living."

19. "I see that nothing is beyond the power of Kāla and that it is impossible to avert one's destiny" na kālasyātibhāro 'sti kṛtāntaś ca sudurjayaḥ: Literally, "No burden is too heavy for Kāla [Time], and destiny is completely unconquerable." The commentators differ considerably in the ways in which they read this verse. Our interpretation follows that of Cg and Cm. Ct reads the negative particle na with both phrases so that he understands, "Since there is no obstacle to Kāla's accomplishment of its good and evil ends, it is able to defeat even destiny. (kālasya śubhāśubhaphalaprāpakasya tatprāpaṇe 'tibhāro nāsti. atas tad upasthāpitaphalanirvartako yaḥ kṛtānto daivaṃ sa na sudurjayaḥ.)" He thus takes the second phrase as a substantiation of the first general principle (samarthanarūpo 'rthāntaranyāsaḥ). This interpretation, as far as we can determine, is followed only by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1535). Cr offers a somewhat forced interpretation in which kālaḥ and kṛtāntaḥ are seen to be in apposition, and the negative particle na is read only with the compound atibhāraḥ, which he later glosses as atibhītiḥ, "great fear." His interpretation then is that "Kāla, that is, destiny, is, in fact, capable of being overcome by some individuals. Therefore one should not be overly fearful of Kāla. (kṛtāntaḥ kālaḥ sudurjayaḥ kaiścid api jetuṃ śakyaḥ. ata eva kālasyātibhāro 'tibhītir nāsti.)" This, Cr continues, is "intended to suggest that everyone will come to have no fear of Rāvaṇa (rāvaṇam evāśritya sarve nirbhayā bhaviṣyantīti sūcitam)." Cf. 6.27.21; 6.53.46; 6.97.16; and notes.

20. "my mother" jananīm: Literally, "mother." Cg glosses, "my mother (manmātaram)." Cs understands the reference to be to Janaka's wife (who, of course, would be Sītā's stepmother) and, by secondary denotation, to Janaka himself. (janakabhāryām. janako 'py upalakṣyate.) Sītā's actual mother is said to be the goddess Earth (see 1.65.14–16 and notes). See, too, 5.37.2 and note; and Uttarakāṇḍa 88.

"mother-in-law" śvaśrūm: The reference, as Cr notes, is to Rāma's mother, Kausalyā. Sītā, as the ideal daughter-in-law, thinks first of her mother-in-law. Cs offers an explanation as to why Kausalyā is the principal object of Sītā's grief. It is, he says, because of Kausalyā's advanced age, because her husband is deceased, and because she had only one son (vārdhakād gatapatitvād ekaputratvāt tām eva śocāmīti bhāvaḥ).

D5–7,9–11,T,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators substitute a passage of one line for 20ab [789*]: "I do not grieve so much for Rāma and that great chariot-warrior[1] Lakṣmaṇa."

[1]"great chariot-warrior" mahāratham: D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead mahābalam, "mighty." Cf. 6.47.16 and note.

21. "Rāma . . . together with Sītā and Lakṣmaṇa" sītāṃ ca rāmaṃ ca sahalakṣmaṇam: Literally, "Sītā and Rāma together with Lakṣmaṇa." D9–11,T3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentaries read instead sītāṃ ca lakṣmaṇaṃ ca sarāghavam, "Sītā and Lakṣmaṇa along with Rāghava."

22. "But as Sītā was lamenting in this fashion" paridevayamānāṃ tām: Literally. "to her who was lamenting."

23. "convincing" sadṛśāni: Literally, "suitable or conformable." Ct, Cg, and Cm gloss, "conformable to experience (anubhūtatulyāni)," and then explain, "expressive of what is observed (dṛṣṭasaṃvādāni)." Ck understands, "believable because of their propriety (śraddheyāny aucityena)," and Cr glosses, "suitable or appropriate (yogyāni)."

24. "would not be so suffused with anger and animated with excitement" na . . . kopaparītāni harṣaparyutsukāni ca: As Ck, Ct, and Cg note, Trijaṭā is arguing ex silentio (vyatireka) for the absence of the cause, i.e., Rāma's death, from the absence of the effect, i.e., the expected facial expressions of the monkey troops. For the first compound, Ct and Ck understand that, if their lord had actually been killed, then the faces of the monkey warriors would not display manifestations of eagerness and anger expressive of such thoughts as "Let us kill the enemy! Where has he gone?" (tāny eva vyatirekamukhenāha. na hīti. patau patyau nihate sati yodhānāṃ mukhāni kṣaṇena śatruṃ hanisyāmaḥ kva gacchatīty evaṃ kopena vyāptāni na bhavanti—so Ct.) For the second compound, we follow Cg's simple gloss, "pleased, delighted (prasannāni)." Ct, Ck, and Cr have a somewhat more complex explanation. They understand that were Rāma actually dead, the monkeys would have no expectation of the cessation of Rāma's faint, which would bring them joy, but instead would simply be weeping. Since this is not the case, Sītā should understand that Rāma is indeed alive. (harṣajanakamohaśāntidarśananotsukāni na bhavanti. api tu rudanti kevalam. naivaṃ prakṛte. ato jīvatīti niścinu.)

25. "those two heroes" etau: Literally, "these two."

"had really lost their lives" gatajīvitau: Literally, "were those from whom life has departed."

"goes by the name of" nāma nāmataḥ: Literally, "namely by name." This redundant idiom is not uncommon in Vālmīki. See 1.24.6; 1.26.10,14,16; 1.37.3; 1.69.24; 1.70.5; 2.32.14; 4.40.9; 4.58.8; 7.9.3; 7.23.19; 7.32.26; and 7.67.3.

"this" idam . . . idam: Literally, "this . . . this." The critical text, which agrees with the text of Ct, Ck, and Cr, is redundant, although none of the commentators remarks on this. M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg substitute evam, "in this fashion," for the second occurrence of the pronoun. Of the translators consulted, only Pagani (1999, p. 980) appears to follow this variant.

"would not be carrying you" tvāṃ dhārayen na: Only Cr among the commentators seeks to make explicit the reason for this statement. He says it is because the flying palace Puṣpaka will not transport a widow. See Cs's comments at App. I, No. 72, lines 26–28 (note 6) following notes to verse 6.111.14. Cf. 6.7.5; and 6.37.7 and notes.

26. "dispirited and irresolute" hatotsāhā nirudyamā: The nouns utsāhaḥ and udyamaḥ are nearly synonymous in the senses of "resolve, energy, or strenuous action." The commentators make no effort here to distinguish the two, while translators have rendered them variously.

"across the battlefield" saṃkhyeṣu: Literally, "in battles." All translators consulted, with the exception of Raghunathan, translate as we do. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 117) reads the locative with the compound hatavīrapradhānā in pāda a, yielding the meaning "[an army] that has had its great chiefs slain in battle."

"rudderless" hatakarṇā: Literally, "whose rudder is destroyed." Cr, Cm, Cv, and Cg, and, as an alternate, Ct gloss, "whose helmsman has been slain (hatakarṇadhārā)." They do so, no doubt, to forge a parallelism between the death of a general and that of the helmsman. We, however, agree with Ck's and Ct's first explanation: "which has lost the board (i.e., rudder) under the control of the helmsman (hatakarṇadhārādhiṣṭhitaphalakā—so Ct)." Ck's gloss is for an apparent variant hatakaṇṭhā not noted in the critical apparatus. The translators are divided. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1536), Dutt (1893, p. 1242), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 117) translate, "helmsman" for karṇa, while Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 137), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 118), and Pagani (1999, p. 980) understand, "rudder." Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 273), who shares the reading of the critical text, oddly appears to have ignored the nautical image entirely.

27. "But . . . On the contrary" punaḥ: Literally, "then again or on the other hand."

"nor despondent" nirudvignā: Literally, "devoid of despondency."

"it is moving swiftly" tarasvinī: Literally, "swift." D6,11,T2,3,G,M3,5, and the text of Cr read tapasvinī, "suffering." D7,9,10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read the vocative, tapasvini, "poor, wretched," which would then refer to Sītā. Translators are divided. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1536) and Dutt (1893, p. 1242) clearly read with Ct. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 117) reads with Cg, who, in turn, reads with the critical edition. Pagani (1999, p. 980), rendering, "pleine d'énergie," appears to translate following Cg, even though Cg's variant is overlooked in the apparatus of GPP, the text she indicates she is translating. Perhaps she is taking tapas here in its sense of "ascetic energy." It is not clear to us exactly what Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 137), who renders "brave" (followed by Shastri [1959, vol. 3, p. 118], "intrepid"), is translating. Gorresio's text (6.23.31) reads here with the critical edition.

"who have been defeated in battle by the power of illusion" māyayā nirjitau raṇe: The reading of the critical edition appears to be attested in only three Malayalam manuscripts (M1,2,4). The north, including devanāgarī manuscripts associated with it, has three variant readings: 1) śayānaṃ [or śayānau] raṇa[bala-]mūrdhani, "lying in the forefront of the battle [or the army]"; 2) śayānau śaratalpayoḥ, "lying on two beds of arrows"; and 3) śayānaṃ śaratalpagam, "lying on a bed of arrows." With the exception of M1,2,3, the entire south, including devanāgarī manuscripts associated with it, and the texts and printed editions of all southern commentators read instead "mayā prītyā niveditau, "I have told [you] about [those two] out of affection." The commentators flesh out this phrase: "I have reported to you that those two are alive (niveditajīvitau—so Cg)." Given the manuscript evidence, we regard the critical reading as highly suspect. It should have, at the very least, been marked as doubtful. See note to 6.35.19. See Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv.

28. "by these signs, which presage happiness" anumānaiḥ sukhodayaiḥ: Literally, "by inferences whose outcome is happiness." Cr and Cg understand sukhodayaiḥ to mean "easily made clear or understood (sukhena pratibhāsamānaiḥ—Cr; sujñeyaiḥ—Cg)."

29. "nor will I ever" na ca vakṣye kadācana: Literally, "nor will I speak [a falsehood] ever." Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,6–13,T2,3,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead na ca[V3 vaco] vakṣyāmi maithili, "nor will I speak [a falsehood], Maithilī."

"virtuous conduct" cāritra-: Ct, Ck, Cg, and Cm gloss, "devotion to your husband (pātivratyam—Cg, Cm)." Cr glosses, "spotless conduct (nirmalācāreṇa)." Cg provides an alternative gloss: "because of your having a delightful nature (āhlādakasvabhāvatvāt)."

"you have found a place in my heart" praviṣṭāsi mano mama: Literally, "you have entered my heart or mind." Ct observes that the underlying meaning of Trijaṭā's comment is that, because of her affection for Sītā, she is telling her these things, even though they are opposed to the interests of her own lord, Rāvaṇa (ata etat sarvaṃ svasvāmino rāvaṇasya viruddham api mayā tavoktam iti bhāvaḥ).

30. "together with Indra" sendraiḥ: Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 138), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 118) and Pagani (1999, p. 980), understand -indra in its sense of "chief or best." They thus understand the compound to mean "[the gods and asuras] together with their leaders."

"on the basis of my observation of their faces" etayor ānanaṃ dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen the face of those two." The critical reading has weak textual support. Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B,D1–8,10–13,T1,2,G3,M3, Cv, Crā, Cm, Cr, Cg, Ct, Ck, and Lahore all read instead tādṛśaṃ darśanaṃ dṛṣṭvā, "having seen such a sight." Gorresio (6.23.34) reads tādṛśaṃ lakṣaṇaṃ dṛṣṭvā, "having seen such a sign." Apparently only V3,D9,T3,G1,2,M1,2,4,5 read with the critical edition. Based on the principles articulated in the Bālakāṇḍa (Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv), the reading should at least be marked as doubtful. The southern commentators vary somewhat in their understanding of the term darśanam. Ct understands it in the sense of "signs indicating life [on the part of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa] and the appearance of the troops (jīvanasūcakam anayoḥ sainikānāṃ cākāram)." Cr, Cm, and Cg analyze the terms tādṛśam, "of such an appearance," and darśanam, "sight," separately. Cr understands the former to mean "indicative of the absence of defeat (parābhāvābhāvasūcakam)" and the latter to mean "a sign (lakṣaṇam)." Cg and Cm understand the former to mean "suggestive of life (jīvanavyañjakam)" and the latter to refer to "[the sight of] the happy faces of the soldiers, etc. (sainyamukhaprasādādikam)." Cv and Cg, as an alternative explanation, understand darśana to be a reference to the auspicious dream-vision foretelling Rāma's victory reported by Trijaṭā at 5.25.4–34 (pūrvadṛṣṭaṃ svapnam iti vārthaḥ).

31. A few manuscripts show a number of variants in this verse, most significantly involving the words cihnam, "sign," and śanaiḥ, "carefully," in pāda a, and apy ubhāv etau, "although they [are] both," in pāda c. The texts of Ct and Cr thus read idaṃ tu sumahac citraṃ śaraiḥ paśyasva maithili / visaṃjñau patitāv etau naiva lakṣmīr vimuñcati //, "And behold, Maithilī, this great marvel. Although the two of them are fallen and rendered unconscious by arrows, their vital glow does not abandon them."

"carefully" śanaiḥ: We follow Cg's suggestion in reading śanaiḥ, normally, "slowly, quietly," in the sense of "carefully (sāvadhānena)."

"vital glow" lakṣmīḥ: See 6.36.34 and note above.

"has not left them" etau na . . . viyujyate: Literally, "it is not separated [from] those two." The syntax here is rather awkward. Ct, whose text reads the facilior: na . . . vimuñcati, "it does not abandon," acknowledges, as a variant, the reading of the critical edition. He notes, however, that this does not change the meaning (lakṣmīr naiva viyujyata iti pāṭhe 'pi na muñcatīty evārthaḥ).

32. "invariably" prāyeṇa: Literally, "for the most part, as a general rule." Given the force of Trijaṭā's logic, we feel that the term should be interpreted so as not to admit exceptions.

"a terrible change is apparent in their faces" dṛśyamāneṣu vaktreṣu paraṃ bhavati vaikṛtam: Literally, "on their faces, when they are observed, there is a great transformation."

33. "grief, pain, and delusion" śokaṃ ca duḥkhaṃ ca mohaṃ ca: Cg differentiates these terms. He understands śoka, "grief," to mean "the facial transformation produced by grief (śokakṛtaṃ mukhavikāram)"; duḥkha, "pain," to mean "mental anguish (manovyathām)"; and moha, "delusion," to mean "incorrect ideas or thoughts (viparītabuddhim)."

"For it is not possible that they could have been killed this day." nādya śakyam ajīvitum: Literally, "It is not possible not to live today." The infinitive construction is awkward here, and the commentators gloss and rephrase it in a number of ways. Ct and Ck explain: "Thus by virtue of their bright faces, it is not possible that they could be in a condition that is devoid of life. Therefore, you must conclude that he [Rāma] is alive. (evaṃ prasannamukhābhyām ajīvituṃ jīvanarāhityenāvasthātum aśakyam. ato jīvatīti niścinu.)" Cr explains: "It is not possible to snuff out the lives of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa (rāmalakṣmaṇayor jīvanaṃ nivartayituṃ na śakyam)." Cg rephrases the expression in the positive, saying that it means: "They can be alive (jīvituṃ śakyam eva)." Cm, whom we most closely follow, reads the simplex infinitive as a causative, ajīvayitum, meaning: "It is impossible to make them not live." Dutt (1893, p. 1242), alone among the translators consulted, understands Sītā to be the subject of the infinitive construction, translating, "For the sake of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, thou canst not today put a period to thy existence." For other examples of double negatives in Vālmīki, cf. 6.12.3; 6.67.36; 6.93.15; 6.95.24; 6.101.36; and notes. See, too, 6.99.24, 3132*, lines 7–8, and note 4.

34. "these words of Trijaṭā" vacanaṃ tasyāḥ: Literally, "her speech."

"cupped her hands in reverence" kṛtāñjaliḥ: Cg, evidently concerned that Sītā should make a respectful gesture to a lowly rākṣasī, observes that anyone who provides instruction concerning the Lord is worthy of reverence regardless of who he or she may be (anena bhagavadviṣayopadeṣṭā yo 'pi ko 'py ādaraṇīya ity uktam)."

35. "Trijaṭā . . . turned around . . . Puṣapaka . . . took . . . Sītā back to Laṅkā" puṣpakam . . . saṃnivartya . . . trijaṭayā sītā laṅkām eva praveśitā: Literally, "having caused the Puṣpaka to turn around, Trijaṭā made Sītā enter Laṅkā." We agree with Cg in taking the instrumental trijaṭayā as the subject of the causative forms saṃnivartya and praveśitā (sannivartane praveśane ca trijaṭaiva kartrī). Most of the translators consulted, including Dutt (1893, p. 1242), Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 274), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 138), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 119), and Pagani (1999, pp. 980–81), ignore the causative construction and take the instrumental as one of accompaniment, rendering variations on the idea: "Sītā reentered Laṅkā with Trijaṭā." Only the translator of the Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, pp. 1536–37) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 118) read the verse as we do.

36. "the rākṣasa women" rākṣasībhiḥ: Cg says, "We are to understand 'by the rākṣasīs' to mean that [Sītā] was taken out of the presence of Trijaṭā (rākṣasībhir ity anena trijaṭādarśanāyānīteti gamyate)."

37. "she had just seen" saṃprekṣya: Literally, "having seen." Commentators are divided as to how to understand the gerund. Cr thinks that Sītā is merely looking around her in the aśoka grove (sarvatrāvalokya). Cg understands either that she is gazing about as part of her brooding (prekṣitaprakāreṇa saṃcintyety arthaḥ) or that, through the extremity of her emotional state, she is actually visualizing [Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa] standing before her (yadvā bhāvanāprakarṣāt puraḥsthitau saṃprekṣyety arthaḥ).

The meter is upajāti.

1–2. "bound" baddhau: As before, Cr understands the form to mean that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are merely acting as if they are bound (baddhāv iva). See 6.35.16,26 and notes.

"their labored breathing was like the hissing of great serpents" niśvasantau yathā nāgau: Literally, "hissing like nāgas." See 6.36.4–7 and note. Cf. 6.41.18 and note.

3. "because he was so hardy and through the exertion of his strength" sthiratvāt sattvayogāc ca: Literally, "because of his steadfastness and the exertion of his strength." Our translation of sthiratvāt, "from steadfastness," basically follows Ck and Ct, who understand both terms to refer to physical characteristics. They gloss sthiratvāt as "because of the extraordinary toughness of his body (atidṛḍhagātratvāt)" and sattvayogāt as "because of his possession of great strength (mahābalayuktatvāt)." Cr takes the first term to be a consequence of the second, glossing sattvayogāt as "because of his permanent possession of superiority that is utterly distinct from that of ordinary beings [i.e., because of his supernatural essence] (nityaṃ prākṛtavilakṣaṇasattāsaṃbandhāt)." Because of this capacity, Cr argues, Rāma possesses sthiratva, or "freedom from any contact with fear (udvegasaṃsargarahitatvāt)." Cg takes sthiratvāt as a moral quality, glossing, "courage, steadfastness (dhīratvāt)." Like Ct and Ck, he takes sattvayogāt as a reference to the possession of physical strength (balayogāt). Cs reads sthiratvāt in a fully theological fashion, glossing, "because of the unique stability of him [Rāma] even through such events as the end of the world, etc., that is, because of his being unqualifiedly eternal. (pralayādāv apy ekasyaiva sthairyāt. nityanityatvād iti yāvat.)" Cs glosses, "by means of his strength (balopāyāt)" for sattvayogāt.

"bound" saṃdānitaḥ: Cr and Cs do not accept the idea that Rāma could be bound against his will. The former argues that the verse suggests that Rāma has concealed his consciousness earlier in order to honor his observance of the limits of Brahmā, etc., that is, to maintain his voluntary submission to the power of the weapons that Brahmā had conferred upon Indrajit (etena pūrvaṃ tādṛśaprabodhatirobhāvaḥ svaniyamya-brahmādimaryādāpālanāyaiveti sūcitam—so Cr). Cs argues that we are to understand that Rāma has voluntarily submitted to the binding in order to delude the demons (etenāsuramohanāya rāmaḥ svecchayaiva saṃdānita iti jñāyate)." On Brahmā's boon, see note to 6.36.10. See, too, 7.30.10–13.

4. "stricken" viṣaṇṇam: Literally, "downcast, dejected."

"deeply wounded" gāḍham arpitam: We read the term arpitam in the sense of "pierced [with arrows]" as used by Vālmīki at 3.27.17. Ct glosses, "tightly bound by arrows (śarair baddhaṃ gāḍham)." Ck and Cg suggest adding the words "with an arrow or arrows (śareṇeti śeṣaḥ—so Ck; śarair iti śeṣaḥ—so Cg)," but offer no gloss of arpitam. Cr breaks the adjective "covered with blood (sarudhiram)" into the pronoun sa[ḥ] (he = Rāma) and rudhiram (blood). He then reads arpitam in the sense of "spattered (prakṣiptam)." According to him, then, we are to read the verse as follows: "when he saw the spattered blood and his brother." See note to 6.35.9.

"his face deathly" dīnavadanam: Literally, "with a downcast or wretched face."

"in his desolation" āturaḥ: Literally, "pained, distressed."

5. "What do I care for Sītā or even for my life itself" kiṃ nu me sītayā kāryaṃ kiṃ kāryaṃ jīvitena vā: Literally, "what of mine is to be accomplished by Sītā or what is to be accomplished by life?" Ñ1,D6,7,9–11,T2,3,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr substitute the feminine instrumental adjective labdhayā, "[by her] obtained," for the second occurrence of kiṃ kāryam. This yields the sense "Of what use would Sītā, even if recovered, be to me?" Compare 6.89.28 and note.

"defeated" nirjitam: Cr, continuing his denial that Rāma or Lakṣmaṇa could actually suffer defeat or injury, argues that we are to take this term in the sense of the emulation of defeat. He sees the participle as an example of the zero, or kvip, suffix in the sense of imitation or acting like something (nirjitaśabda ācārakvibantaprakṛtikadvitīyāntaḥ). See 6.35.9 and note.

6. This verse is well known and frequently quoted. It is one of a series of remarks that Rāma makes in which he appears to value his male relations and companions over Sītā. See R. Goldman 1980. Compare 6.89.28 and note.

"Were I to search the world, I could find" śakyā . . . prāptuṃ loke vicinvatā: Literally, "by one searching in the world, it would be possible to obtain." There is a considerable amount of variation among the manuscripts here. D5,7,9–11,T1,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read martyaloke, "in the world of mortals," for prāptuṃ loke, "to obtain in the world." This reading is elliptical and lacks any verbal form meaning "to find." Consistent with his denial of any negative references to Rāma or Sītā, Cr insists on reading the negative particle na from pāda c with the word śakyā in pāda a to refer to both Sītā and Lakṣmaṇa. This yields the meaning: "Searching, that is, by gathering my army, I could not find a woman equal to Sītā in this world of mortals (sītāsamā nārī vicinvatā senāsaṃcayaṃ kurvatā mayā martyaloke na śakyā labdhum iti śeṣaḥ)."

"a companion" sacivaḥ: We agree with Ct, Ck, and Cg in taking this word in the sense of "friend, companion (sahāyaḥ—so Ct)." Cr prefers its other sense of "counselor, minister (sācivyakartā)." Cr concludes by saying that the point of this verse is "to indicate the absence of anyone to equal either of the two [Sītā or Lakṣmaṇa] (etena tatsadṛśayor abhāvaḥ sūcitaḥ)."

7. "returned to the elements" pañcatvam āpannaḥ: Literally, "attained fiveness." This expression, which refers to the dissolution of the body into the five fundamental elements of ancient Indian science, is a common literary euphemism for death. See 6.15.4; 6.89.4; and notes.

8. "Whatever shall I tell Kausalyā, and what shall I tell mother Kaikeyī? And how shall I tell mother Sumitrā" kiṃ nu vakṣyāmi kausalyāṃ mātaraṃ kiṃ nu kaikeyīm / katham ambāṃ sumitrāṃ ca: Literally, "What shall I tell Kausalyā and what mother Kaikeyī? And how mother Sumitrā?" We go against virtually all translators consulted, who understand the term mātaram, "mother," of pāda b to refer specifically to kausalyā in pāda a rather than to kaikeyī in pāda b. We do so because of the pāda structure of the verse and because of the use of the term ambā, "mother," in connection with sumitrā, in pāda c, which suggests that the poet intended to differentiate Kausalyā from her two junior wives. The commentators are silent.

9. "And how shall I console Sumitrā, trembling . . . at the loss of her darling son" vivatsāṃ vepamānām . . . katham āśvāsayiṣyāmi: Literally, "How shall I console [her] who is trembling [and] bereft of her child." Like Cg, we understand the reference here to be specifically to Lakṣmaṇa's mother, Sumitrā. Cr, however, understands the reference to be to the collectivity of the heroes' mothers, Kausalyā, etc. (kausalyāprabhṛtim).

"shrieking like an osprey" krośantīṃ kurarīm iva: The crying of the hen osprey, kurarī, is a frequent upamāna for the lamentations of a woman in Vālmīki. Compare 6.23.1–3 and 6.98.26. D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the redundant and inapposite vepantīm, "trembling," for krośantīm. Most translators, even those who follow the text of Ct, have, however, rendered some word such as mourning, moaning, crying, etc. Only Pagani (1999, p. 981) appears to follow Ct's reading exactly, rendering, "secoué de sanglots." Compare 6.98.26 and notes. See Fitzgerald 1998.

10. "illustrious" yaśasvinam: Cg believes the use of this term indicates that Rāma is despondent at the thought that he has not attained [his] Bharata's glory (yaśasvinam ity anena tadyaśo mayā na labdham iti khidyati). Perhaps he is thinking of Rāma's regret at his loss of the throne while Bharata governs as regent.

Compare note at 6.89.8 to 2029*, lines 13–14.

11. "Alas" bata: Ñ2,V2,B2,4,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read ambā-, "mother." The resulting compound ambāsumitrayā would then have the meaning "by mother Sumitrā."

Compare note at 6.89.8, 2029*, line 11.

12. "evildoer" duṣkṛtakarmāṇam: Cg asserts that the wrongful deed referred to here is that of taking Lakṣmaṇa to the forest (lakṣmaṇavanānayanam eva duṣkṛtaṃ karma).

"on whose account" yatkṛte: Ñ1,V2,B,D6,7,9–12,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead matkṛte, "for my sake." In this reading, the compound sentence of the critical edition is transformed into a pair of simple sentences.

"on a bed of arrows" śaratalpe: See note to 6.35.19.

"his life breaths ebbing" gatāsuvat: Literally, "like one whose life breaths have departed." Since the following verses indicate that Rāma understands that Lakṣmaṇa is not quite dead but is dying, we have avoided the literal translation. See note to verse 13 below.

13. "You always used to comfort me" nityam . . . mām āśvāsayasi: Literally, "you always comfort me."

"your life breaths ebbing" gatāsuḥ: Literally, "one whose life breaths have departed." Ct, Ck, and Cr gloss, "as if dead (gatāsur iva)." No doubt Ct and Ck understand, as we do, that Rāma sees Lakṣmaṇa as dying but not yet dead. Cr, however, in keeping with his reading of the text, notes, in addition, that we must take the term as a metonym, much in the way that one would call a king the "royal preceptor" (purohito 'yaṃ rājetyādāv iva gatāsuśabdo lākṣaṇikaḥ). See note to verse 12 above.

14. "who struck down so many . . . on the field of battle" yena . . . bahavaḥ . . . nihatāḥ kṣitau: The texts and printed editions of Cg reads nihatāḥ, "struck down, killed," for bahavaḥ, and vinipātitāḥ, "felled," for nihatāḥ kṣitau. This yields the sense of "who struck down [and] slew." This reading is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 119), who adds the word "many" despite its omission from Cg's text.

"on the field of battle . . . on the very same field" kṣitau . . . tasyām eva kṣitau: Literally, "on the ground . . . on that very ground."

"That hero . . . now lies on the very same field struck down by his foes" tasyām eva kṣitau vīraḥ sa śete nihataḥ paraiḥ: There is considerable variation in the rendering of pādas cd. The texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead tasyām evādya śūras tvaṃ śeṣe vinihataḥ śaraiḥ, "On that very [field], you, a hero, now lie struck down by arrows."

15. "bound in a web of arrows, he looks like" śarajālaiś cito bhāti: The manuscripts show considerable variation in pāda c. The texts and printed editions of Cr, Ck, and Ct read instead śarabhūtas tato bhāsi, "you, having become an arrow, look like." Ct explains the peculiar phrase śarabhūtaḥ as "looking like an arrow because of his body being completely covered with arrows (śarair vyāptaśarīratvāc chararūpaṃ prāptaḥ)." Cr explains similarly. See note to 6.37.19, where Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are said to resemble "fallen pillars made of arrows." See note to 6.35.19.

"like the sun, bringer of light, as it sets" bhāskaro 'stam iva vrajan: Literally, "like the light-bringer going to the setting mountain." Ct explains the image by noting that "the arrows covered with the blood flowing from their respective wounds take the place of the sun's rays (tattadrandhraniḥsaradrudhiravyāptaśarāḥ kiraṇasthānīyāḥ)." Cr and Cg agree with the comparison of the arrows to rays, while Cg additionally suggests that the setting mountain is in place of the bed of arrows and that the reddish color [of the sunset] is in place of the blood (atra śaratalpasthānīyo 'stagiriḥ . . . śonitasthāne rakta-varṇatvam)." Cf. notes to 6.57.20; 6.47.16; and 6.78.43.

16. "he can no longer see" na śaknoty abhivīkṣitum: D7,9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead na śaknoṣīha bhāṣitum, "you can no longer speak here."

"the expression of his eyes" dṛṣṭirāgeṇa: Literally, "the feeling or emotion of his eyes." The term is ambiguous and lends itself to a variety of interpretations. We understand it here in the sense that it is used at Abhijñānaśākuntalam 2.10.6. Ct and Ck understand the expression to refer not only to the look in Lakṣmaṇa's eyes but also to the changed appearance of his face (anyayā mukhaśobhayā). Ct, who reads "cannot speak" for the critical edition's "cannot see," additionally notes that the use here of the word dṛṣṭi, "eye," suggests that Lakṣmaṇa is still able to see (anena darśanaśaktimattvaṃ sūcyate). Cr interprets the compound to mean "the redness of the eyes (nayanā-ruṇyena)." Cg takes rāga in yet a third of its meanings, that of "passion, love, affection," glossing, "by the love in his glance (vīkṣaṇapremṇā)."

17. "Just as . . . so" yathaiva . . . tathaiva: Ct, Cm, and Cg understand the adverbs to mean that just as Lakṣmaṇa disregarded his affection for his parents, etc., in order to follow Rāma, so now will Rāma do the same in following him (yathāyaṃ mātrādiṣu sneham aparyālocyaiva mām anugatas tathāham api tatsnehaṃ tyaktvānuyāsyāmīti bhāvaḥ—so Ct).

Verse 17 is virtually identical to 2029* lines 1,2 (see note to 6.89.8, 2029*).

18. "through my failed tactics—ignoble as I am" mamānāryasya durnayaiḥ: Literally, " through the bad policies of me who am ignoble." Cr, in keeping with his larger project, is unwilling to associate Rāma with anything deficient or unworthy. He therefore understands anāryasya to refer to the rākṣasa [Indrajit] and durnayaiḥ to refer to Indrajit's powers of illusion. He then reads the pronoun mama, "mine," with a supplied word, agre, in the sense of "right before me." He understands the half verse then to mean: "But now through the evil tactics of that ignoble wretch [Indrajit], that is, his powers of illusion, you have been reduced to this condition right before me. (anāryasya rākṣasasya durnayair māyābhir ity arthaḥ. mamāgra imām avasthāṃ gato 'si.)" Many of the translators understand durnayaiḥ in the sense of "misdeeds," which we believe is not quite the meaning here.

19. "even when he was enraged" suruṣṭenāpi: Rāma seems not to recall Lakṣmaṇa's violent outbursts at Ayodhyākāṇḍa 20 and 90.

"a harsh or unpleasant word" paruṣaṃ vipriyaṃ vāpi: Literally, "harsh or even unpleasant." Ct, Cm, and Cg understand ahitam, "harmful," to mean vipriyam, "unpleasant."

20. "could loose" visasarja: Literally, "he released."

"in one swift motion" ekavegena: Literally, "with one impulse." Cg and Cm gloss, "with a single effort (ekaprayatnena)."

"surpassed even Kārtavīrya" adhikas tasmāt kārtavīryāt: Literally, "greater than Kārtavīrya." The reference is to the legendary Haiheya monarch Arjuna Kārtavīrya, often referred to by the epithet "thousand-armed (sahasrabāhu)." This figure appears in the Mahābhārata (3.116.19ff.), where he or his sons kill the Bhārgava sage Jamadagni, and at Uttarakāṇḍa 32, where he fights with and defeats Rāvaṇa. The idea here, as explained by Ct, Cm, and Cg, is that, whereas Kārtavīrya had a thousand arms and could thus presumably discharge five hundred arrows simultaneously, Lakṣmaṇa, with a mere two, is able to fire the same number of arrows in the same time. In this manner, he is said to surpass Kārtavīrya (ekavegena pañcabāṇaśatāni visasarja kārtavīryas tasmāt kārtavīryāt sahasrabāhor ayaṃ dvibāhur ekena vegena tāvato bāṇān visṛjann adhika ity arthaḥ—so Ct). See R. Goldman 1977.

"in archery" iṣvastreṣu: Literally, "in respect to bows (lit., arrow throwers)." Ck appears to read the compound as a dvandva referring to iṣus, ordinary arrows, and astras, "missiles or divine weapon-spells," in the use of both of which Lakṣmaṇa excels Kārtavīrya (iṣvastre . . . bāṇaprayoge divyāstrayoge ca).

21. "on the bare earth" urvyām: Literally, "on the earth."

22. "what has proven to be my idle boast" mithyāpralaptam: Literally, "false prattling." As the commentators remind us, the reference is to Rāma's earlier promise to consecrate Vibhīṣaṇa as king in place of his brother. This now seems to have been but an idle boast (vibhīṣaṇo rājā na kṛta iti yad yataḥ tasmāt tad vibhīṣaṇam abhiṣeksyāmīti mithyā pralaptaṃ pralapitam—so Ct). See note to 6.13.9. The formal consecration of Vibhīṣaṇa occurs at 6.100.

"will torment me" māṃ pradhakṣyati: Literally, "it will burn me." The issue here is the epic aristocracy's fierce adherence to the truth of the given word. As Cg points out, the failure to deliver on a promise is regarded as equivalent to lying (āśrutakāryanirvāhābhāvena mithyety ucyate—so Cg).

23. "you should return home" pratiyātum ito 'rhasi: Literally, "you should return from here." Cg explains that we must add "to Kiṣkindhā." Printed editions of Ct (NSP and GPP 6.49.23) read the awkward iva, "as if, like," for itaḥ, "from here."

"for once mighty Rāvaṇa realizes that you no longer have me to assist you, he will attack" matvā hīnaṃ mayā rājan rāvaṇo 'bhidraved balī: Literally, "having realized [you] to be deprived of me, mighty Rāvaṇa may attack." D6,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read sattva-, "strength, power," for the gerund matvā, "having realized." D1,3,4,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read abhibhaviṣyati, "he will conquer," for abhidraved balī, "the mighty one might attack." The sense of the text of Ct, as found in GPP and NSP, is then: "O king, Rāvaṇa will overpower you, who are deprived of strength."

24. "once again . . . by that very same bridge" punas tenaiva setunā: D5–7,9,11,T,G3,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead nīlena ca nalena ca, "and with Nīla and Nala as well."

"together with your . . . allies" sasuhṛjjanaḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead saparicchadam, "together with [your] entourage."

25. "Hanumān accomplished feats" kṛtaṃ hanumatā kāryam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead kṛtaṃ hi sumahat karma, "a very great feat was accomplished." This reading fails to specify the agent of the feat, and translators differ in assigning it. Ct understands the referent to be to all the monkey heroes, starting with Hanumān (hanumadādibhir). Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1539) and Dutt (1893, p. 1244) take the reference to be to Sugrīva, whom Rāma is addressing. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 120) and Pagani (1999, p. 982), who usually read with Ct, here appear to follow Cg and the critical edition in assigning the feat to Hanumān. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 140) assigns the feat to the monkey troop leaders mentioned in the second half of the verse.

"the king of the apes" ṛkṣarājena: The reference here is to Jāmbavān. See Goldman 1989. See, too, 6.4.17 and 6.86.8 and notes.

"the overlord of the langurs" golāṅgūlādhipena: The reference here is to Gavākṣa. See 6.86.8 and note. Cf. 6.4.17.

26. "great deeds" karma: Literally, "deed, feat."

"Kesarin" kesariṇā: This is the name of Hanumān's earthly father, although, given the free use of names among monkeys and rākṣasas, it is by no means clear that this is the individual meant here. See Bulcke 1959 and S. Goldman 1999. See, too, 4.65.8; 6.4.30; and 7.35.20. Cf. 6.21.2.

"Saṃpāti" saṃpātinā: Cg reminds us that this is a monkey (i.e., not the vulture of the same name who informs the monkeys of Sītā's whereabouts at Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa 57.26ff.).

"fought fearsome battles in the war" yuddham . . . saṃkhye ghoram . . . kṛtam: Literally, "a terrible battle was made in the war."

27. "fought" yuddham: Literally, "battle." The verse is elliptical, and one must construe the noun with the adjective kṛtam, "was done," from the previous verse, as Ct suggests (kṛtam iti pūrveṇa saṃbandhaḥ).

"on my behalf" madarthe: D6,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead durdharam, "formidable, impossible to accomplish." The critical edition erroneously ascribes its reading to Ct instead of Cg. With the exception of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1539), which reads with Cg and the critical edition, all printed editions of the text of Ct as well as all translators who follow that text render the variant.

"heedless of their lives" tyaktajīvitaiḥ: Literally, "by whom life has been abandoned."

28. "in your anxiety lest you transgress righteousness" bhavatādharmabhīruṇā: Literally, "by you, who fear unrighteousness." The commentators and printed editions differ as to how to break up the sequence. One can break it either as bhavatā + adharmabhīruṇā or as bhavatā + dharmabhīruṇā "by you who fear righteousness." The word division is, of course, a matter of interpretation, since manuscripts would show no break between the two words. The different readings are signaled in printed editions by the presence or absence of a space between the two words. Cm states unequivocally that the second word should be adharma, and Cg gives this as a second alternative. Ct takes strong exception to Cm's reading, denouncing it as "quite pointless" (adharmabhīruṇeti cheda iti tīrthas tad viphalam eva). He admits that, even with the reading he prefers, it is possible to interpret the sequence to mean "you who are fearful of abandoning righteousness (dharmabhīruṇeti chede 'pi dharmatyāgād bhīruṇeti vyākhyātuṃ śakyatvāt)." Cg explains this reading as meaning "fearful of the thought, 'righteousness will be destroyed' (dharmo naśyatīti bhīruṇety arthaḥ)." Translators render the expression variously, but, as with the commentators, both readings yield much the same sense. Dutt (1893, p. 1245), who follows the reading of Ct, observes, "Dharma-bhiru—fearing righteousness—is the epithet generally applied to persons fearing not in fact righteousness, but unrighteousness. This may be taken as an idiotism in Sanskrit."

29. "You have discharged the obligations of friendship." mitrakāryaṃ kṛtam idam: Literally, "This duty of a friend has been done."

30. "tawny-eyed" kṛṣṇetarekṣaṇāḥ: Literally, "whose eyes were other than black." The normal meaning of kṛṣṇetara would be "white," but this seems unlikely here. Commentators and, after them, translators differ in their understanding of the ambiguous compound. Ct and Cr, whom we have followed, gloss, "having yellow eyes or tawny-eyed (piṅgākṣāḥ—so Ct; piṅgalanayanāḥ—so Cr)." This kenning for monkeys is found elsewhere in the epic (see 6.22.33; 6.49.5; and notes). Cg and Cm, however, gloss, "red-eyed (raktekṣaṇāḥ)," presumably understanding that the monkeys' eyes are red because they are weeping.

"Rāma's" tasya: Literally, "his."

"began to weep" vartayāṃcakrur aśrūṇi netraiḥ: Literally, "they caused tears to flow through [their] eyes."

31. "having prevented all the troops from fleeing" sarvāṇy anīkāni sthāpayitvā: Literally, "having stabilized or immobilized all the troops." The reference is to Vibhīṣaṇa's efforts to prevent the flight of the terrified monkeys at 6.36.38 above. See note to 6.36.38.

32. "the monkeys" vānarāḥ: Ct and Ck indicate that these are the monkeys standing with Sugrīva [and so distinct from those whose flight Vibhīṣaṇa has just prevented] (sugrīvasamīpasthā iti śeṣaḥ).

"rushing toward them" tvaritaṃ yāntam: Literally, "going swiftly."

Following verse 32, Ś,Ñ1 [lines 1–2],V,B,D1–3,8,12,13,M3,D4 [after verse 31] insert a passage of six lines (two verses) [807*]. This passage is printed in brackets as verses 6.49.34–35 in KK with the notation that it does appear in the older manuscripts. VSP prints the passage as a footnote after verse 6.49.33: "Vibhīṣaṇa came up to find [the two heroes] lying on beds of arrows, motionless, unconscious, covered with the dust of the battlefield.[1–2] When the forest-dwelling monkeys, who had witnessed the might of the son of the rākṣasa king, saw the two princes struck down, they began to scatter from back to front, like clouds driven before the wind in autumn.[1] [3–6]"

[1]"the forest-dwelling monkeys . . . they began to scatter from back to front, like clouds driven before the wind in autumn" jaghanyato vivyathire vanaukaso vāteritās te śaradīva meghāḥ: The reading of M3, which is recorded in VSP and KK, substitutes a variant for lines 5 and 6, vibhīṣaṇaṃ vivyathire ca dṛṣṭvā meghā yathā vāyuhatāḥ plavañgamāḥ, "When the leaping monkeys saw Vibhīṣaṇa, they scattered like clouds whipped by the wind."

The meter is upajāti with a hypermetric pāda c.

1. "Why is the army fleeing wildly, like a ship driven to and fro by contrary winds at sea" kim iyaṃ vyathitā senā mūḍhavāteva naur jale: Literally, "Why is the army agitated, like a ship [caught in] contrary winds on the water?" The image of a ship driven off course or foundering in a violent storm at sea is a popular one with the epic poets. Vālmīki has used this same phrase to describe the plight of Sītā at 5.26.8. Ct and Ck gloss, "possessing [i.e., caught in] winds blowing to and fro so as to cause confusion as to the [desired and undesired—so Ck] course ([iṣṭāniṣṭa]digvyāmohakaravātyāvātavatī)." Cg and Cm take the meaning to be "battered by winds blowing in the contrary direction, that is, driven off course by the wind. (viruddhadigvāyvantarābhihata ity arthaḥ. vātyāhateti yāvat.)"

2–3. "mighty" mahābalam: D7,9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahāratham, "great chariot-warrior."

"tightly bound with webs of arrows" śarajālācitau: The phrase occurs above at 6.36.4. See 6.36.4–7 and note above.

4. "son" putram: Either the term is used loosely for a relative of a younger generation or Sugrīva is now regarded as having effectively adopted his brother's son.

"I do not doubt that that is one reason." nānimittam idaṃ manye: Literally, "I do not think that this is not a reason" or "I do not think that this has no cause." The commentators are divided as to the reference of the pronoun idam, "this, that." Cs, Ck, and Cm (second alternative) understand the reference to be to the flight of the monkeys (kapipalāyanam). Thus, they and all translators of the southern recension understand the meaning of the phrase to be "I do not think that there is no reason for this [the flight of the monkeys]." This interpretation makes little sense to us, since there is no indication that Sugrīva does not think that there is no reason for the monkeys to flee. He has merely inquired as to that reason. We follow Ct, Cr, Cm (first alternative), and Cg in understanding the pronoun to refer to the reason proposed by Aṅgada for the flight, that is, the apparent death of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. What the commentators are saying in essence is that, while not denying the causal power of Rāma's apparent demise, Sugrīva feels that the sudden panic must be the result of some more immediate cause (idaṃ raghusiṃhayoḥ śaratalpaśayanam animittaṃ na bhavatīti manye kiṃ tu bhayenānyabhayahetunātra bhavitavyam ity arthaḥ—so Cm).

"Still, there must be some other cause for their alarm." bhavitavyaṃ bhayena tu: Literally, "But there must be a danger."

5. Ct and Ck argue that, although the monkeys (in their distress over Rāma's fall) have downcast faces and have dropped their weapons, they have hitherto stood their ground. Only now, however, do they run away. This, these commentators hold, is proof that there has been some new cause for alarm. (viṣaṇṇavadanās tyaktapraharaṇāś ca santa etāvatparyantam ihaiva sthitāḥ. saṃprati tv ito diśaḥ pratipalāyante. tat tu trāsāt sāṃpratikād eva nānyathety arthaḥ.)

"dropped their weapons" tyaktapraharaṇāḥ: Literally, "by whom weapons were abandoned." Cg meticulously notes that this would refer to stones, etc. (tyaktaśilādyāyudhāḥ).

"terror" trāsāt: Cs, as well as Ct and Ck, as noted above, stresses that this is some new cause for alarm (nūtanabhīteḥ).

6. "They have no sense of shame before one another" anyonyasya na lajjante: As Ct and Ck explain, they experience no shame, even though they are engaged in cowardly flight that is condemned by all true heroes (śūragarhite palāyane kriyamāṇe na lajjāṃ prāpnuvantīty arthaḥ).

"They drag one another out of their way" viprakarṣanti cānyonyam: Literally, "they drag one another." We have embellished the phrase in keeping with the comments of Ct and Ck, who supply the phrase "those who obstruct their flight (palāyana[patana—Ck] pratirodhakān)," and Cg, who adds, "in order to go faster (drutagamanārtham)."

7. "hailed" vardhayāmāsa: Literally, "he magnified, congratulated." Ct and Ck remark that he hailed him with the words, "Be victorious!" (vijayī bhaveti vacanenety bhāvaḥ).

"stared" niraikṣata: D6,9–11,T2,3,G3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead jayāśiṣā, "with blessings of victory." With this reading, one must take Rāghava, along with Sugrīva, to be the object of the verb vardhayāmāsa. This seems particularly inapposite in light of the fact that Rāma is apparently near death.

8. "Vibhīṣaṇa, who was the cause of the monkeys' terror" vibhīṣaṇaṃ tam . . . vānarabhīṣaṇam: Literally, "Vibhīṣaṇa, the terror of the monkeys." Note the play on Vibhīṣaṇa's name, literally, "the terrifier."

"Jāmbavān . . . who was close at hand" samīpasthaṃ jāmbavantam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahātmānaṃ samīpastham, "the great [king of the apes], who was close at hand."

9. "fleeing in terror, fearing" vidravanti paritrastāḥ: The critical editors mark this pāda (c) as doubtful, a rare occurrence in this book. Ñ,V,B,D1,3–7,9,10,T1,G2,3,M5 read instead dravaṃty āgatasaṃtrāsāḥ. V1 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read dravanty āyatasaṃtrāsāḥ. The meaning is much the same as that of the critical edition.

10. "in all directions" bahudhā: Literally, "in many ways."

"as fast as they can" śīghram: Literally, swiftly, at once." The adverb might also be construed with the imperative paryavasthāpaya, "you must stop."

"only Vibhīṣaṇa" vibhīṣaṇam: Literally, "Vibhīṣaṇa."

13. "deeply distraught" vyathitendriyaḥ: Literally, "one whose senses were agitated." Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,7–13,T3,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vyathitas tadā, "[was] then distraught."

16. "evil and unworthy son" putreṇa . . . duṣputreṇa durātmanā: Literally, "by that son, that evil son, that bad one." We follow Cg, who explains duṣputreṇa as "bringing disgrace to his father through his treacherous fighting (kapaṭayuddhena pitur avadyāvahena)."

"has tricked these two" chalitau: Literally, "[the two were] deceived." D9–11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vañcitau, "[those two were] tricked." T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead cālitau, literally, "[the two were] caused to move." Cg glosses, "tricked (vañcitau)."

"whose valor was untainted by guile" ṛjuvikramau: Literally, "[those two] of straightforward valor."

17. "they . . . they" imau . . . imau: Cs, alone among the commentators, is disturbed by the apparent redundancy. He proposes to resolve the problem either by taking the two halves of the verse as separate utterances, as we have done, or, in his own idiosyncratic fashion, reading at least one of the pronouns lexically as a compound in the sense of "possessing the beauty of the god of love (iḥ kāmaḥ tasyāpi mā śobhā yābhyām etau)." By this he understands that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa have not lost the beauty associated with Kāmadeva.

"lie sleeping" suptau: Literally, "are asleep."

"two hedgehogs" śalyakau: The idea here is that the many arrows protruding from the bodies of the heroes make them resemble spiny creatures. Sanskrit does not appear to consistently distinguish between the common Indian porcupine (Hystrix Leucura) and such spiny creatures as the collared hedgehog (Erinaceus Collaris), both of which range widely over India. Ck and Ct gloss śvāvidh, a term generally used to indicate the porcupine but one that appears similarly nonspecific. Cg glosses, kaṇṭakivarāhaḥ, "spiny boar or pig," which also lacks specificity. At 4.17.34, two animals, śalyaka and śvāvidh, are named among the five-clawed animals deemed fit for consumption by high-caste Hindus. There the commentators are more copious in their discussion of these animals. (See notes to 4.17.34. Cf. Mahābhāṣya [Kielhorn], p. 5, lines 14–17.) At 4.17.34, the two terms were translated as "hedgehog" and "porcupine," respectively, and, for consistency, we use the same terminology here, despite the fact that all translators consulted, with the exception of Dutt and Gorresio, understand the animal to be a porcupine. Dutt (1893, p. 1246) leaves the term untranslated as "Salyakas [sic]," noting in a footnote that it refers to "a tree." Dutt is no doubt reading the term as a variant of sallakī or śallakī, which can refer either to a porcupine or a tree (specifically, the Shorea Robusta). The image of a tree, however, does not seem to suit the context. Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 279) takes śalyaka in the sense of śalya, "stake, staff, dart," translating "pali."

18. "upon whose might I had pinned my hopes for royal consecration" yayor vīryam upāśritya pratiṣṭhā kāṅkṣitā mayā: Literally, "relying upon the might of whom, I had desired installation." The word pratiṣṭhā has many meanings, several of which, including "high station, inauguration, or desired goal," would be suitable in the context. We have added the word "royal," following Ct, who glosses, "placement in the kingship (rājye sthitiḥ)." See 6.13.9; 6.19.26–27; and 6.100.9 and notes.

"on the point of death" dehanāśāya: Literally, "for the destruction of the body." The phrase is ambiguous here, as Cs points out. It can refer either to the death of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa or the death [at Rāvaṇa's hands] of Vibhīṣaṇa himself. (svadehanāśāya. yadvā maddehanāśaya.) Cr, the only other commentator to remark on the expression, glosses, "for the destruction of our advancement (asmadvṛddhipradhvaṃsanāya)." Translators are divided. Dutt (1893, p. 1246) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1541) understand as we do. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 143), Pagani (1999, p. 984), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 122) understand as does Cr. Gorresio's text (6.25.19) reads mama, "my," for deha-, "body," avoiding the ambiguity of the critical text. We believe it is more likely that Vibhīṣaṇa is referring to what he sees as the impending death of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, since he refers to his own probable demise in the following verse.

19. "as good as dead" vipannaḥ: Literally, "dead."

"accomplished his vow" prāptapratijñaḥ: Ck, Ct, and Cs understand that this refers to Rāvaṇa's vow never to give up Sītā (nirvṛttasītāparityāgābhāvapratijñaḥ—so Ct).

"has had his wish fulfilled" sakāmaḥ . . . kṛtaḥ: Literally, "has been made one with a wish." Ck and Ct explain that Rāvaṇa has had his desire fulfilled by his son [Indrajit]. Cr says that this has been accomplished by time or fate (kālena). Cs specifies the nature of the wish, saying that it was "to attain unrivaled kingship through the death of me [Vibhīṣaṇa]," and understands that this has been accomplished through the sleep or comatose state of the two heroes. (mannāśena niṣkaṇṭakarājyaprāptyā kṛtaḥ. anayor evaṃ svāpeneti śeṣaḥ.)

20. "Vibhīṣaṇa . . . embraced him" taṃ pariṣvajya vibhīṣaṇam: Literally, "him . . . having embraced Vibhīṣaṇa." Cs thinks that, by effecting a change in the expected word order, i.e., in separating the noun and its pronoun by the gerund, the poet is signaling a change in the expected outcome of Vibhīṣaṇa's lamentation (padavyatyāsena vilāpaphalakasya vibhīṣaṇotprekṣitasya vyatyāsaṃ kavir avagamayāmāseti jñeyam).

21. "Rāvaṇa . . . will not retain the kingship here" rāvaṇaḥ . . . sa rājyaṃ neha lapsyate: Literally, "He, Rāvaṇa, will not acquire the kingship here." The textual support for the word rājyam, "kingship," is quite weak. Only two manuscripts (T2,3) read with the critical edition. Two devanāgarī manuscripts (D7,9) read svarājyam, "his own kingship," for sa rājyam, "he . . . kingdom." All other manuscripts read either svakāmam, "his own desire" (D5,6,10,11,Ct,Ck,Cr), sa kāmam, "he [will not obtain] his desire" (T1,G,M,Cg,Cm,Crā,Cv), or sakāmaḥ [na bhaviṣyati], "he will not be one whose desire is fulfilled" (Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,8,12,13). The reading that probably should have been selected (although marked as doubtful) is sa kāmam.

22. "merely pinioned by arrows" śarasaṃpīditau: Literally, "tormented or afflicted by arrows." Our translation attempts to express Sugrīva's reassurance that, despite appearances, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are not mortally wounded. Textual support for the reading is strong. However, the texts of the southern commentators, printed editions of their texts, and the translations that follow them show significant variants for this phrase. Thus, D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, Cr, and Cs read garuḍādhiṣṭhitau, "under the protection of Garuḍa." Ct explains that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are garuḍopāsakatayā vijñātau, "well known as devotees of Garuḍa," or, as a bahuvrīhi, "have Garuḍa as their devotee." Cs regards Ct's gloss of the compound in the first interpretation as "unfounded (nirmūlam artham)." Cs himself understands the compound to refer to the fact that Rāma, as Viṣṇu, uses Garuḍa as his vehicle (garuḍe 'dhiṣṭhitau garuḍavāhano rāmaḥ). He then generalizes this epithet of Rāma to include Lakṣmaṇa. Cs regards this reading as authentic, since the role of Garuḍa in releasing the serpent-weapons is well known from this passage and from many purāṇic sources. (ayam eva pāṭho nyāyyaḥ. garuḍāgamanena nāgapāśaviyogasyātrottaratreva bahupurāṇeṣu śravaṇāt.) Cs further notes Ct's quotation of Cm, saying that Ct, in accepting his own reading in preference to Cm's, suggests that the latter's reading is fanciful (na rujā pīḍitāv iti paṭhitveti tīrthapāṭhasya tadutprekṣitatvaṃ sūcayan nāgojibhaṭṭaḥ svayaṃ pāṅktaṃ garuḍādhiṣṭhitāv iti paṭhitvā garuḍopāsakatayā viditāv iti nirmūlam arthaṃ vadaṃs tādṛśa eveti saṃtoṣṭavyam). See verse 23 below, where Cs continues his attack on Ct.

The reading garuḍādhiṣṭhitau raises controversy among the commentators, since it suggests that Sugrīva has some kind of precognition regarding Garuḍa's impending intervention (see verse 33ff. below). Thus, Cr remarks that this phrase makes clear the fact that Sugrīva possesses knowledge of the past, present, and future (etena sugrīvasya trikālajñatvaṃ vyaktam). Cv strongly criticizes this reading, however, regarding it as "a lapse on the part of the scribe," since, as he asserts, "Sugrīva has no knowledge of future events." (garuḍādhiṣṭhitāv iti lekhakapramādāl likhitaḥ. sugrīvasya bhaviṣyadarthajñānaṃ nāsti.) Cv further bolsters his argument with reference to Sugrīva's instructions [to Suṣeṇa (see verse 23 below), which make no allusion to any expected help from Garuḍa]. Cv concludes his remarks by noting, as a variant, the reading of the critical edition.

D7,G1,M3, and Cv, Crā, Cg, and Cm read instead na rujā pīḍitau, literally, "[those two] are not afflicted by [serious] injury." As Cv, Cg, and Cm [quoted by Ct] explain, the sense of the reading is that the heroes are not fatally wounded, but their injuries are such as to lead to only a temporary loss of consciousness (iyaṃ rujānayor ātyantikahānikarī na bhavati. kiṃtu mohamātrakāriṇīty arthaḥ—so Cg). All translators of the southern recension follow the reading of Ct, with the exception of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 121), who follows Cg.

23. "consoled and reassured" sāntvayitvā tu samāśvāsya ca: Commentators differ both as to the exact meanings of these near synonyms and to their objects (see note to 6.2.14). Ct and Ck understand that the first term refers to Sugrīva's reassurance of Vibhīṣaṇa concerning the anticipated grace of Garuḍa (garuḍānugrahasaṃbhāvanayā). By the second, Ct understands that Sugrīva's words suggest his own knowledge that Rāma is an avatāra of the Lord (anena sugrīvavākyena rāmaviṣayaṃ svasya bhagavadavatāratvajñānaṃ sūcitam). Cs understands the first gerund to have Vibhīṣaṇa as its object and the second to be directed toward Suṣeṇa. This second gerund, he argues, refers to the instructions to Suṣeṇa to go [and take Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa back to Kiṣkindhā] in verse 24 below. Cs then continues his attack on what he views as Ct's muddled theology and confused syntactical skills. He quotes Ct, faulting him for the inadequacy of his syntactical knowledge. He contends that Ct is in error in so frequently construing groups of two or three verses as a single syntactic unit (nāgojibhaṭṭasya bahusthaleṣu dvitrādīnāṃ ślokānām ekānvayaṃ bruvato 'nvayajñānadāridryaṃ dyotyate). He then quotes Ct's remarks about the grace of Garuḍa and Sugrīva's alleged knowledge of Rāma's avatāra-hood, recommending that these contradictory statements be utterly disregarded. He claims that it is well known that the devotee (i.e., Garuḍa) would be the receptacle of the grace of the Lord, who is an avatāra [rather than the other way around]. (iti svavacanavyāhatam ity upekṣyam. tena bhagavadavatāratvahetor upāsakatvasya tadanugrahapātratvasyaiva ca pratīteḥ.) See note 22 above, where Cs begins his attack on Ct.

Cr understands sāntvayitvā to mean "having informed (bodhayitvā)" and samāśvāsya as "having dispelled the grief [of] (tāpaṃ nirasya)." Both are understood as referring to Vibhīṣaṇa.

24. "once they have regained consciousness" labdhasaṃjñau: Ck and Ct understand, "until they will have regained consciousness (yāval labdhasaṃjñau bhaviṣyataḥ)." These commentators, followed by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 143) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 122), thus understand that the monkeys are to carry the unconscious brothers to Kiṣkindhā and guard them there until they recover. Our interpretation, which accords with that of Cr, is followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1542), Dutt (1893, p. 1247), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, pp. 121–22). Pagani (1999, p. 984) fails to translate the compound. Gorresio, following his text (6.25.24), which reads visaṃjñau, "unconscious," translates, "che son qui fuor di senso" (1856, vol. 9, p. 280).

25. "just as Śakra did Śrī when she was lost" śakro naṣṭām iva śriyam: Literally, "like Śakra the lost Śrī." The mythological reference is obscure, and the commentators are silent. The allusion, however, appears similar to the one Sītā herself made at 5.36.51. There the commentators provide a variety of mythological references. See notes to 5.36.51.

26–27. "this speech" etat: Literally, "this."

"I have heard about" anubhūtam: Literally, "experienced." We follow Cg in supplying the pronoun mayā, "by me," and in understanding the participle in the sense of "known by me (mayā jñātam)." Several of the translators consulted take the term literally to imply that Suṣeṇa had been an actual witness of this mythical contest. See Dutt (1893, p. 1247), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 122), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1542). We think, however, that this reading may be too strong. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 143), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 123) and Pagani (1999, p. 984), reads the participle in the rather unusual sense of "took place," thus ignoring the force of the upasarga. We think that this reading may be too weak.

"terrible" sudāruṇam: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead purātanam, "ancient."

"concealed themselves" chādayantaḥ: Literally, "covering, veiling." We follow the interpretation of Ck and Ct, understanding that the dānavas, like Indrajit in the present circumstance, concealed themselves from view through their powers of illusion (māyayendrajidvad ātmānaṃ prachādayantaḥ).

"who were expert in the use of arrows" śarasaṃsparśakovidāḥ: Literally, "[those who were] expert in arrow contact." We follow the reading of the commentators, who understand this unusual use of the term saṃsparśa- to refer to "expertise taking the form of striking the target with respect to arrows (śarasaṃsparśe śaraviṣaye lakṣyavedhanarūpe kovidān—so Ck, Ct)." Cg glosses sparśa with dānam, which here he uses in its sense of "cutting, piercing." He glosses, "able to use arrows." (śaraprayogasamarthāḥ. sparśo dānam iti.) B2,D4,10,11,13,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read the accusative -kovidān for the nominative -kovidāḥ. In this reading, the epithet thus applies to the gods rather than to the asuras.

28. "Bṛhaspati" bṛhaspatiḥ: Bṛhaspati is the purohita, or spiritual preceptor, of the gods. He is normally depicted as lacking the life-restorative skills possessed by his arch rival, Uśanas Kāvya or Śukrācārya, the purohita of the asuras. According to Mahābhārata 1.71, Bṛhaspati, whose patrons are suffering from this unequal distribution of knowledge, dispatches his son Kaca to secure the life-restorative spell (mṛtasaṃjīvanī vidyā) through the deceitful courtship of Uśanas's daughter, Devayānī. The present passage is one of the few, if not the only one, in which allusion to Bṛhaspati's use of this magical skill is made. Cf. MatsyaP 47 and PadmaP 5.13.202ff. See R. Goldman 1977 and Sutherland 1979. See 6.7.9–10; 6.11.42; 6.115.51; and notes. Cf. 6.4.42; 6.45.12; and notes.

"with magical spells" vidyābhiḥ: Cg and Cm identify these spells as "such spells as the one for bringing the dead back to life (mṛtasaṃjīvanīprabhṛtibhiḥ)." Ck and Ct add to this "mental concentration on Garuḍa, etc. (garuḍādidhyānarūpāmṛtajīvanībhiḥ—so Ct)." This is in keeping with their reading of verse 22 above, where they seem to prematurely introduce Garuḍa into the narrative. See note to verse 22 above.

29. "the ocean of milk" kṣīrodam . . . sāgaram: Literally, "the ocean having milk for water." This is one of the seven oceans of purāṇic cosmology that separate the concentric dvīpas, or continents of the earth. The tale of the churning of the ocean for amṛta, the nectar or elixir of immortality, is told in the Bālakāṇḍa (1.44.14–27 and notes) and many other places in the epic and purāṇic literature (MBh 1.15ff.; BhāgP 8.6–9; MatsyaP 249.51; ViṣṇuP 1.9; etc.) See Bedekar 1967, pp. 7–61 and Dange 1969, pp. 239–80. See, too, 6.12.22; 6.41.17; 6.53.23; 6.80.19; 6.105.19; and notes. The mythic association of the ocean of milk with the production of amṛta, as noted in verse 32 below, is undoubtedly behind the notion expressed here that that particular ocean is the source of life-restorative healing herbs. See note to verse 30 below. See note to 6.34.17.

30. "Those tawny monkeys" harayaḥ: We agree with Cr, Ck, and Ct in understanding the term here to be restricted to Saṃpāti, Panasa, and their party (saṃpātyādayo harayaḥ—so Ck, Ct).

"the two powerful healing herbs that grow on the mountains there" pārvatī te mahauṣadhī: Literally, "the two great mountain herbs." A number of southern manuscripts (D5–7,T,G1,3,M3) and the texts and printed editions of Cv, Crā, Cm, and Cg read instead the plural, pārvatīs tā mahauṣadhīḥ, in place of the dual.

"the divine saṃjīvakaraṇī, restorer of life, and the viśalyā, healer of arrow wounds" saṃjīvakaraṇīṃ divyāṃ viśalyāṃ: Literally, "the divine saṃjīvakaraṇī and the viśalyā." These are two of the four herbs that Jāmbavān will dispatch Hanumān to procure from the mountain of herbs at 6.61.33 below, where, for a second time, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa permit themselves to succumb to the power of the weapons Indrajit had received from Brahmā (see 6.36.10 and note).

In the Rāmopākhyāna (MBh 3.272.5–6), Sugrīva actually employs the viśalyā herb along with mantras to free Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa from the bonds of Indrajit's arrows. This is in stark contrast to Vālmīki's version in which, in fact, the herbs are neither used nor even fetched at this point since Garuḍa will shortly intervene to make them otiose. In Vālmīki, the herbs will only be secured and employed later on in the narrative as noted above. The abortive reference to the herbs here and the sudden appearance of Garuḍa may suggest that Vālmīki's version of this episode is, in fact, a somewhat clumsy Vaiṣṇava expansion of the narrative. See Brockington 1984, pp. 194–95, 199. See, too, note to verse 32 below.

According to Pagani (1999, p. 1662), the viśalyā and saṃjīvanī are used on Yudhiṣṭhira to remove Karṇa's arrows in the Karṇaparvan (see MBh 8.58.21). A plant called viśalyā (Delphinium denudatum) is mentioned in the medicinal literature. See, for example, Bhāvaprakāśa 3.7; Rajanighaṇṭu 3.14; 5.158; 6.127; and 24.3; Aṣṭāṅgahṛdaya 1.84; 6.38; 15.28; 22.69; etc. It is said to grow in the Himalayas at altitudes between seventeen hundred and twenty-three hundred meters. See 6.61.32–33; 6.89.14–16; and notes.

"created by the gods" devanirmitām: The compound is ambiguous, as the prior member can refer to one god or many. Ck and Ct take deva- in the singular and see it as a reference to Brahmā (brahmaṇā nirmitām). They do this possibly with the thought that it takes a healing herb created by Brahmā to cure a wound inflicted by one of Brahmā's weapons. Cr glosses paramātmanā, "by the Supreme Spirit," a term that is itself laden with ambiguity. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 143), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 123), and Pagani (1999, p. 984) all understand the herb to have been produced by a single unnamed divinity. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1542) follows Ck and Ct and translates, "Brahmā." Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 281), Dutt (1893, p. 1247), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 122) translate as we do. Our reading seems more in conformance with the plural term devaiḥ, "by the gods," in verse 32 below.

31. "two mountains" parvatau: D5–7,9–11,T,G1,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead kṣīrode, "in the ocean of milk." Compare 6.61.2–30; 6.89.14–15; and notes, where Hanumān is instructed to go for the medicinal plants to a single mountain of healing herbs (oṣadhiparvata), which is there said to be situated between Mount Kailāsa and Mount Ṛṣabha in the Himalayas.

"called Candra and Droṇa" candraś ca nāma droṇaś ca: Compare 6.61.29–30 and notes. Both Droṇa and Candra are mentioned in the Brahmāṇḍapurāṇa (1.18.76). Mount Droṇa (Droṇācala or Droṇagiri) is well known and mentioned in various purāṇas as a source of healing herbs (see, for example, BhāgP 5.19.16; BrahmP 20.26; BrahmāṇḍP 1.19.38; GaruḍaP 1.56.6; KūrmaP 1.47.14; Liṅgapurāṇa 153.6; Nāradapurāṇa 1.104.19; and ViṣṇuP 2.4.26).

32. "Those two supreme herbs of healing were planted on the mountains there by the gods." te tatra nihite devaiḥ parvate paramauṣadhī: We agree with Cg in reading parvate, "on the mountain," as a collective singular (jātyekavacanam) for the dual. Manuscripts show considerable variation in the first half of the verse. The texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead tau tatra vihitau devaiḥ parvatau tau mahodadhau, "and those two mountains were placed there near [or in] the great ocean by the gods."

"Hanumān" hanūmān: The abrupt introduction of Hanumān, hitherto unnamed in this passage, provokes various explanations on the part of the commentators. Ck and Ct note: "Although Panasa and the rest are able to recognize [the herbs], still, Hanumān should go to ensure a speedy return (yady api panasādayo jānanti tathāpi śīghram āgamanārthaṃ vāyusuto yātu)." Cr suggests that the reason for sending Hanumān is that a mission of a single individual is more likely to succeed (ekakartṛkagamanenaiva kāryaṃ setsyatīty abhipretyāha) and claims that the verse suggests the extraordinary speed of Hanumān (etena hanūmato vegātiśayaḥ sūcitaḥ). Cg thinks the idea is that, while Panasa and the rest are to go and bring other herbs, Hanumān is specifically sent to bring the two potent herbs first mentioned in verse 30 above. (auṣadhyantarānayane panasādayo gacchantu. saṃjīvaviśalyānayane tu hanumān gacchatv iti vijñeyam.)

Following verse 32, some northern and southern manuscripts (Ś,D1–3,8,12,13,T2,3) insert a lengthy passage of ninety-four lines (App. I, No. 25) in which the divine sage Nārada appears to remind Rāma of his divinity and exhort him to action. Lines 88–94 are known to the entire northern recension (including Ñ,V,B, and Gorresio). In these lines, the wind god, Vāyu, arrives on the scene to whisper a similar exhortation into Rāma's ear and to urge him to call to mind the divinity Garuḍa, enemy of the serpents. In the southern recension and critical edition, no such transitional figures appear. Instead, Garuḍa, unheralded and without any initiative on Rāma's part, suddenly bursts upon the scene, rendering otiose the plan to send Hanumān and the other monkeys to bring the restorative herbs. This mission, however, will be taken up later in the narrative when Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and the monkeys are again incapacitated by Indrajit's weapons (see 6.60–61 below). The disruption of the narrative here is curious, especially in light of the Rāmopākhyāna, where Sugrīva restores the brothers with the two powerful herbs but without having to send anyone to fetch them. Here, as in the north, it would seem that a Vaiṣṇava hand has expanded and somewhat distorted the narrative. See notes to verse 30 above.

33. "hurling up the water . . . driving away the lightning-streaked clouds" meghāṃś cāpi savidyutaḥ / paryasyan: Literally, "tossing the waters and clouds with [their] lightning. D6,7,9–11,T3,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead the nominative meghāḥ, "clouds," for the critical edition's accusative. This, of course, obliges one to read the adjective savidyutaḥ, "with lightning," as a nominative as well. Given this reading, the translation would be, "there arose clouds flashing with lightning and a wind hurling up the waters in the ocean."

"the very mountains" parvatān: Literally, "mountains." D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read instead medinīm, "the earth."

34. "That powerful wind, driven by a pair of wings, snapped the branches of all the island's great trees and sent them flying, roots and all, into the salt sea." mahatā pakṣavātena sarve dvīpamahādrumāḥ / nipetur bhagnaviṭapāḥ samūlā lavaṇāmbhasi //: Literally, "By [means of] of the great wind from wings, all the great trees of the island fell, their branches broken, along with their roots, into the salt sea."

"That . . . wind, driven by a pair of wings" pakṣavātena: The blast of wind, of course, is created by Garuḍa's mighty wings, although our text does not introduce Garuḍa explicitly until verse 36 below. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 144) oddly translates, "coup d'aile de Vāta," seeming to read the compound in inverted order. In this unhappy choice, he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 123), "stroke of Vata's wing," and Pagani (1999, p. 985), "souffle d'aile du vent."

"snapped the branches . . . sent them flying" nipetur bhagnaviṭapāḥ: Literally, "[their] branches broken, they fell." The text of GPP (6.50.34) shows a typesetting error in which the syllables petu[r] have been omitted, yielding an erroneous and hypermetric reading: nirbhagnaviṭapāḥ, "their branches broken."

"all the island's great trees" sarve dvīpamahādrumāḥ: A variety of manuscripts and the printed editions of the southern commentators read instead sarvadvīpamahādrumāḥ, which makes it ambiguous as to whether to read the compound as "all the great trees on the island" or "the great trees of all the islands." Among the commentators consulted, only Ct opts for the second reading, referring to the islands in the ocean. In this he is followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1248), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 144), and Pagani (1999, p. 985).

"roots and all" samūlāḥ: Literally, "along with [their] roots." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read salile, "in the water."

35. "hooded" bhoginaḥ: Literally, "possessing hoods [or coils]." This term is often used as a kenning for snakes, particularly cobras, but here it must be taken as an adjective modifying pannagāḥ, "serpents." The commentators generally understand the term here to mean "having huge bodies (mahākāyāḥ—Ct, Cr, Cm; praśastakāyāḥ—Cg).

"who dwelt there" tatravāsinaḥ: Ck, Ct, and Cr take the reference to be to those snakes living in the nearby Malaya mountains (tatsamīpamalayanivāsinaḥ—Cr). Cg understands, "those living on the island of Laṅkā (laṅkādvīpavāsinaḥ)." Cm thinks the reference is to "those that live in the ocean (samudravāsinaḥ)."

"the great sea serpents" yādāṃsi: The term normally refers to any large marine animal. Here, however, the reference is probably to sea snakes, since, like their terrestrial cousins, they would instinctively fear Garuḍa.

"plunged deep into the salt sea" jagmuś ca lavaṇārṇavam: Literally, "they went to the salt sea." We agree with Ct, Cg, and Cm, who understand that, in their fear, the sea serpents plunged into the depths (bhayād antarmagnāni—Ct). Cr notes that their flight suggests that Garuḍa is aware of Rāma's desire [to have the snakes destroyed] (etena garuḍasya rāmābhiprāyābhijñatvaṃ sūcitam).

37. "those two virtuous . . . men" tau satpuruṣau: Literally, "those two good men." B1,2,D1,5,7,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead tu tau puruṣau, "but those two men."

"immensely powerful" mahābalau: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–5,7–13,T3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the instrumental mahābalaiḥ, in which case the adjective applies to the great serpents rather than the two heroes.

38. "Suparṇa" suparṇaḥ: This epithet of Garuḍa, meaning "having splendid wings," is frequently used as an alternate name for Garuḍa as well as a generic term for the class of supernatural birds.

"spying" dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen." V,D7,9–11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead spṛṣṭvā, "having touched."

"greeted them" pratyabhinandya: Literally, "having greeted." Ck, Ct, and Cr understand that Garuḍa greets the brothers with blessings of victory (vijayāśiṣā—Ck, Ct). D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead pratyabhinanditaḥ, "greeted, welcomed," which then becomes an adjective modifying Suparṇa.

"with both his hands" pāṇibhyām: This term raises the issue as to how we are to visualize Garuḍa. He is sometimes depicted in painting and sculpture as a bird with no human attributes, but also frequently as a sort of bird-man with a human body plus wings and a beaklike nose. Evidently here the poet sees him as somewhat anthropomorphic. See, too, verse 44 below, where the commentators discuss Garuḍa's form.

39. "wounds" vraṇāḥ: Ct, Cg, and Ck all take this term in its normal sense of "wounds," presumably those caused by the arrows that had pierced the two heroes. Cr, however, who rejects the idea that these divinities could actually suffer wounds, understands the reference to be to "woundlike indentations caused by the constriction of the nāgas (nāgānāṃ sthityā vraṇavadavabhāsamānāvanatapradeśāḥ)." See note to 6.35.9.

"lustrous" suvarṇe: Cf. note to 6.61.32–33.

40. Ct observes that we are to understand that assistance has been rendered by Garuḍa at the command of the primal form of Lord Rāma, who has incarnated himself here with other divinities (atrānyair devair avatīrya bhagavato rāmasya mūlamūrter ājñayopakāraḥ sampāditaḥ garuḍena tu svarūpata eveti bodhyam). Ck also elaborates on this theme, bringing out, once more, that, although endowed with divine weapons, Rāma does not kill Indrajit, who is operating under the protection of Brahmā's boon.

Cg and Cm observe that the syllable -dhi- in the word buddhiḥ of pāda c marks the seventeenth syllable of the Gāyatrīmantra, which is used as an index of Vālmīki's text. See note to 6.1.1.

"their cardinal virtues" mahāguṇāḥ . . . tayoḥ: Our translation agrees with Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 144), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 123), and Pagani (1999, p. 985). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 122) translates, "priceless."

"courage, prowess, strength, vigor, and fortitude, as well as their insight, intelligence, and memory" tejo vīryaṃ balaṃ cauja utsāhaś ca . . . / pradarśanaṃ ca buddhiś ca smṛtiś ca: The qualities enumerated fall into two groups, one dealing with martial virtues and the other with mental abilities. Within each group there is considerable synonymity and overlapping of meaning. Commentators attempt to provide specific differentiated meanings for each of the terms: 1) tejaḥ: "the ability to defeat one's enemies (parābhibhavasāmarthyam—Ct, Cg, Cm)." Cg gives this and an alternative definition: "intolerance of insult at the hands of one's enemies (parādhikṣepāsahanam vā)"; 2) balam: "physical [strength] (śārīram—Ck, Ct, Cg, Cm)"; 3) vīryam: "heroism or prowess (parākramaḥ—Ct, Cg, Cm)"; 4) ojaḥ: "brilliance, luster (kāntiḥ—Ct, Cg, Cm)"; 5) utsāhaḥ: "unrelenting effort in superhuman [ever-increasing—Cm] undertakings (lokottarakāryeṣu sthirataraprayatnaḥ—Cg, Cm)"; 6) pradarśanam: "the determination of obscure matters through textual sources and inference (śabdānumānābhyāṃ parokṣārthaniścayaḥ—Ct, Ck)"; "knowledge of subtle matters (sūkṣmārthaparijñānam—Cg)"; 7) buddhiḥ: "determination of mundane matters (aparokṣaniścayaḥ—Ct)"; "discrimination (vivekaḥ—Cg)"; "perseverance (adhyavasāyaḥ)—Cm"; and 8) smṛtiḥ: "recollection of things that are experienced (anubhūtārthāvismaraṇam—Cg, Cm)." See note to 6.2.14.

41. "Helping the two . . . to their feet" tāv utthāpya: Literally, "having caused the two to rise."

"the two . . . heroes" mahāvīryau: Literally, "having great strength or heroism" D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the singular mahātejāḥ, "of great power," which must then be construed with Garuḍa.

"embraced" sasvaje: Cr, eager to maintain the appropriate level of deference for Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, explains, "he grasped their feet (caraṇānām ālīṅganaṃ cakāra)."

"delighted" hṛṣṭau: V3,B1,3,D6,7,10,11,T1,3,G1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the nominative singular hṛṣṭaḥ. The adjective then would modify Garuḍa.

42. "we . . . here" āvām iha: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead upāyena, "through [some] contrivance." Cr glosses, "by you who understand effort (yatnajñena tvayā)," a reference to Garuḍa.

"and . . . swiftly" śīghraṃ ca: M1–3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, and Crā read instead pūrvavat, "as before."

"restored to our full strength" balinau kṛtau: Literally, "made strong."

43. "my father, Daśaratha, or my grandfather, Aja" tātaṃ daśaratham . . . ajaṃ ca pitāmaham: Literally, "my father, Daśaratha, and my grandfather, Aja." Ct and Ck read a theological interpretation into the verse. Ct notes that "I, who am a portion of the primal being Hiraṇyagarbha [Viṣṇu], have a father, Daśaratha, who is a partial incarnation, or fragment, of Prajāpati Kaśyapa, conformable [to Rāma's own incarnation], and a grandfather, Aja, who is a partial incarnation of four-faced Brahmā (daśarathaṃ svāvatārocitaṃ kaśyapaprajāpatyaṃśam ajaṃ ca pitāmahaṃ caturmukhabrahmāṃśaṃ me hiraṇyagarbhātmanas tadaṃśasya)." This latter identification plays on the epithet Pitāmaha, "grandfather," which is often ascribed to Brahmā, as well as the epithet Aja, "unborn," which is often applied to Brahmā and other manifestations of godhead. As we understand it, Ct's reasoning is that, since Kaśyapa was the father of Viṣṇu in his vāmanāvatāra, or dwarf incarnation, and is himself one of the mind-born sons of Brahmā, the human Rāma's father and grandfather must also be incarnations of these divinities. Ck, whose explanation is similar, notes that we should understand that Daśaratha is "a partial incarnation of Virāṭ, Prajāpati, and Viṣṇu (svāvatārocitavirāṭprajāpativiṣṇvaṃśam iti śeṣaḥ)." Ck further notes: "Grandfather Aja [lit., the unborn one] is Virāṭ, who is devoid of all conditionality or limits in all three times [past, present, and future] and who is free from any connection with the conditionalities of birth, death, etc. He is the grandfather (pitāmaha), the universal ruler, and the four-faced Brahmā, whose innate form is subtle. (yathājaṃ ca pitāmaham ajaṃ kālatraye 'pi vinā virāḍ upādhyanaṣṭaṃ [bha?] janimṛtimadupādhisaṃbandharahitaṃ pitāmahaṃ saṃrājaṃ caturmukhabrahmāṇaṃ nijasūkṣmamūrtibhūtam ity arthaḥ.)"

Cr thinks that the reference to Rāma's forebears suggests that Garuḍa, too, is senior [to Rāma] (etena garuḍasya vṛddhatvaṃ sūcitam). See 6.49.1–2; 6.59.7; 6.79.4; 6.87.9–10; 6.105.15; and notes.

44. "spotless garments" viraje vastre: Literally, "two garments free from dust." The dual is used to refer to the traditional upper and lower garments.

"Who are you, sir?" ko bhavān: Ct and Ck are eager to explain why Rāma appears unable to identify the universally recognizable form of Garuḍa, the great lord of the birds. Their understanding is that Garuḍa retains his natural avian form until he is close enough to the heroes to terrify and drive off the serpent-arrows that have bound them. When he comes close to the fallen heroes, he assumes a human shape in order to stroke and embrace them. Because Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa do not see his avian form, they do not recognize Garuḍa. (ayaṃ praśno 'pi manuṣyaśarīrocitavyavahāra eva tatsatyatvaprakhyāpanārtho 'tra rāmasamīpāgamanaparyantaṃ pakṣyākāreṇaivāgatya saṃnidhimātreṇa nāgabandhanaṃ ca nirasya rāghavasparśanādyarthaṃ puruṣākāreṇa vyavahṛtavān iti bodhyam.) See verse 38 above.

45. "his eyes lighting up with joy" harṣaparyākulekṣaṇaḥ: Literally, "his eyes filled with joy." Two devanāgarī manuscripts (D10,11) and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read the accusative harṣaparyākulekṣaṇam for the nominative of the critical text. This then makes the description apply to Rāma rather than Garuḍa.

46. "your dear comrade . . . of you both" sakhā te . . . yuvayoḥ: Cs feels that the shift from the singular to the dual reflects Garuḍa's embarrassment at having first addressed Rāma with the informal pronoun "te (your)." Cs then documents the comradeship of Viṣṇu and Garuḍa, quoting the passage from the Sauparṇākhyāna of the Ādiparvan of the Mahābhārata (1.29.13–16) in which the two exchange boons so that Garuḍa will be placed above Viṣṇu as the insignia on his battle flag and will serve as Viṣṇu's mount. Cs continues, noting that the poet wants us to understand that, although the dual would have been appropriate in accordance with the chatrinyāya, or the "maxim of the people with umbrellas" (that is, although Garuḍa is the comrade and servant only of Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa can be included in the general statement), Garuḍa could not have been expected to know that (evaṃ sati sati ca cchatrinyayāvakāśe na pratyaveyād vainateya iti bhāvo 'pi kaver jñātavyaḥ). Cg observes that the hidden sense of the word "comrade" here is that of an assistant in the form of a mount (sakhā vāhanatvena sahāya iti gūḍhoktiḥ). Cf. 6.47.112 and note.

"your second life breath outside your body" prāṇo bahiścaraḥ: Vālmīki is fond of this expression to describe the most intimate comrades and helpers of Rāma. He uses it or a variant at least twice elsewhere to describe Lakṣmaṇa: once at 3.32.13, once at 1.17.17 (bahiḥ prāṇaḥ), and again, in reference to all his brothers, at 7.43.12. The sense is similar to the English expressions "a second self" or "alter ego." See, too, notes on 6.19.24; 6.47.123; and 6.89.6 (2026*).

47–48. "the . . . dānavas" dānavāḥ: D6,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vānarāḥ, "monkeys." This variant might have been motivated by an effort to avoid the seeming redundancy of asurāḥ and dānavāḥ, terms that are generally used interchangeably.

"with Indra of the hundred sacrifices at their head" puraskṛtya śatakratum: Literally, "having placed Śatakratu before [them]."

49. "the sons of Kadrū" kādraveyāḥ: Kadrū is the half sister and arch rival of Garuḍa's mother, Vinatā, and the ancestress of all snakes. The story of the rivalry of the sisters and their respective descendants, the snakes and the birds, is well known to the epic and purāṇic literature. The best-known account of the story is at Mahābhārata 1.14ff. See note to 6.78.23.

50. "Along with your brother Lakṣmaṇa, a slayer of enemies in battle" lakṣmaṇena . . . ripughātinā: Cr appears to understand the epithet as belonging to Indrajit, since he glosses, "these events [see note to verse 51 below] brought about by that slayer of enemies in battle (ripughātinā samare kṛtam imaṃ vṛttāntam)."

51. "what had happened" vṛttāntam: As Ct and Ck remark, the reference is to the heroes' bondage by the serpent-arrows, which Garuḍa had heard about from the mouths of the gods. (nāgabandhavṛttāntaṃ śrutvā. devatānāṃ mukhād iti śeṣaḥ.) D10,11,T3,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct (GPP, NSP = 6.50.51) read vikrāntaḥ, "valorous," an adjective that here must modify Garuḍa himself. Even though the printed editions of Ct show this variant, his commentary is based on the reading of the critical edition. This has led to mixed results among the translators who follow the text of Ct. Dutt (1893, p. 1249), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 144), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 124) translate the variant, vikrāntaḥ, whereas Pagani (1999, p. 985) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1544) translate the reading found in the critical edition.

52. "be . . . on your guard" apramādaś ca kartavyaḥ: Literally, "non-carelessness must be practiced." Cr understands the injunction to refer prospectively to the following verse. Thus, it is because the rākṣasas fight unfairly that the brothers must be particularly vigilant (prakṛtyā svabhāvenaiva rākṣasāḥ kūṭayodhino bhavanty ato yuvābhyām apramādaḥ pramādarāhityaṃ kartavyaḥ). Cg and Cm understand the phrase in a more restricted and technical sense to mean that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa must be vigilant with respect to the use of divine weapons that will counteract in each case those of their enemies (tattadastrānuguṇapratyastraprayogeṣu sāvadhānābhyāṃ bhavitavyam ity arthaḥ).

53. "the strength . . . lies in the fact that they are honorable" ārjavaṃ balam: Literally, "[their] strength is honorableness or straightforwardness."

54. "This very example serves to show" etenaivopamānena: Literally, "by this very comparison." The example, of course, is Indrajit's defeat of the brothers.

55. "with the affection befitting a friend" suhṛtsnigdham: Literally, "with the affection of a friend." Ś,Ñ,V,B3,4,D1–3,7–13,T3,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ca susnigdham, "and very affectionately." We agree with most of the translators, who understand this term (or the variant susnigdham) adverbially. Of course, it can also be taken adjectivally to modify rāmam in pāda a, as Cr suggests, to yield the meaning "Rāma, who showed the affection befitting a friend."

56. "compassionate even to your enemies" ripūṇām api vatsala: Rāma's compassion, even for his enemies, is part of the poet's construction of Rāma as the ideal man. Cg, however, understands the epithet here to illuminate the fact that Rāma does not yet know how to accomplish the destruction of Indrajit (anena indrajidvadhopāyo na jñāta iti dyotyate).

"just as I came" yathāgatam: D9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead yathāsukham, "at my pleasure."

Following verse 56, Ñ,V,B,D2,4–7,9–11,13,S insert a passage of two lines [835*]: "And you must not be overly curious regarding our friendship, Rāghava.[1] Once, hero, you have accomplished your purpose on the battlefield, you will know about our friendship."

[1]"Rāghava" rāghava: The text of GPP, represented as "B (ed.)" in the critical apparatus, alone among all manuscripts and editions consulted, reads the unattested form kāṅkṣiṇāḥ (kāṅkṣiṇā—so critical edition), a grammatically incorrect derivative of the verbal root $\sqrt{kāṅks}$, "to wish, desire." This solecism is perhaps a typographical error, as the editors of GPP fail to note Cg's reading (which is the same as the critical reading) as a variant. Only Pagani (1999, p. 986) among the translators consulted has attempted to render this erroneous reading. She translates, without comment, "Quelque désir que tu en aies."

This verse, which is represented in all manuscript traditions except Ś and the northwest (except D2) and the Lahore edition is an attempt to deal with the touchy issue of Rāma's self-awareness as an avatāra of Vīṣṇu. According to the terms of Rāvaṇa's boon, Rāma must be a man and therefore subject to human limitations. Should he inquire here about the nature of his relationship to Garuḍa, that of a bhaktin and a bhakta or a deva and his vāhana, it would, in effect, undermine his self-imposed ignorance as to his true nature (Pollock 1991, pp. 15–54). Cm and Cg observe that Garuḍa, anticipating that Rāma will question him about their friendship, which was mentioned in verse 46 above, urges him not to raise questions on this subject at this point because it is a secret matter. After Rāvaṇa is killed, Rāma will come to realize the nature of their relationship on his own. (ahaṃ sakhā te kākutsthetyādinoktaṃ sakhitvaṃ katham iti rāmāśayam āśaṅkya rahasyatvād idānīṃ tadviṣayapraśno na kartavyaḥ. rāvaṇavadhānantaraṃ svayam eva jñāsyatīty āha.) Ct understands that Rāma is not to show excessive interest in this matter in order that he may continue to deceive people [i.e., about his true nature] (maduktasakhitvaṃ prati lokapratāraṇāyāpi vismayo na kārya ity āha). See note to 6.28.28–29.

57. "Once you have slaughtered the male population of Laṅkā . . . sparing only the children and the aged" bālavṛddhāvaśeṣāṃ tu laṅkāṃ kṛtvā: Literally, "having made Laṅkā such that its remnant consists of children and the aged." The expression is difficult to render literally in English, and we have therefore translated somewhat freely. The idea is that Rāma, chivalrous as ever, will direct his shafts only toward the male rākṣasas of fighting age, sparing the noncombatants and thus avoiding collateral damage.

58–59. "Suparṇa . . . Suparṇa" suparṇaḥ . . . suparṇaḥ: Since the two verses form a single syntactical unit, several of the commentators are disturbed by the repetition of the name/epithet "Suparṇa." Cr attempts to avoid redundancy by taking one of the occurrences as a descriptive adjective, "characterized by splendid wings (śobhana-pakṣavisiṣṭaḥ)," and the other as a proper noun. Cg, on the other hand, argues that the repetition of the name is acceptable because several different actions are described (kriyābhedena suparṇapadadvayānvayaḥ). See note to verse 38 above.

"swift in flight" śīghravikramaḥ: We normally render vikramaḥ in its sense of "valor, prowess, might." Here, however, the context leads us to agree with Cg, who takes the term in its sense of "stride, pace," glossing, "of swift gait (śīghragatiḥ)."

"had healed Rāma of his wounds" rāmaṃ ca virujaṃ kṛtvā: Literally, "having made Rāma wound-free."

"reverently circled" pradakṣiṇam . . . kṛtvā: Ck and Ct believe that, in making this ritual sign of reverence, Garuḍa is demonstrating to the rank and file of the monkeys that Rāma is indeed an incarnation of heavenly divinity (anena divyadevatāvatāro rāma iti sarvān prākṛtakapīn praty api bodhitam).

61. This verse provokes Cg to provide a somewhat extensive disquisition on the ironies of Rāma's situation and on the nature and purpose of this avatāra of Viṣṇu. His remarks are evidently inspired by, and to a significant extent extracted from, a lengthy discussion triggered by this very same passage on the part of the usually laconic Cv. Both commentators are trying once again to grapple with the apparent irony that Rāma, who is the all-powerful and all-knowing Lord, is subject to the pains, injuries, and indignity of his apparent defeat at the hands of the relatively insignificant Indrajit. Cv explains, in part, that Rāma's near calamity is intended to illustrate that the virtuous and righteous will survive even the most life-threatening disasters, while conversely, the evil and perverse [e.g., Rāvaṇa and Indrajit] will see their plans frustrated, even when success seems within their grasp. Cv then tries, interestingly so, to contextualize the Rāmāvatāra within the larger concept of incarnation, arguing that there are several types of avatāra, classified according to the types of assistance (upakāra) they render in the world. These include not only the familiar vīrya (martial) types, such as Matsya, Kūrma, Varāha, and Narasiṃha, but also the ācārya ([world] teacher) or sarva (universal) types, such as Haṃsa, Hayagrīva, and Kṛṣṇadvaipāyana. Basically, Cv contends that avatāras play two roles: one is to physically destroy evil-doers and the other is to teach the ways of righteousness through instruction or example. Cv believes that Rāma represents both functions so that, although he can and does slaughter the evil rākṣasas to save the world from their depredations, he also undergoes pain, hardship, and defeat in order to serve the latter function as well.

Cg argues somewhat similarly, saying that, although one of the principal purposes of Rāma's avatāra is to kill Rāvaṇa, if that were the only purpose he accomplished, his effort would have been in vain. For, Cg continues, the avatāra must also instruct the world in dharma but not merely by repeating teachings that are available in the vedas and śāstras but through his own personal example. It is thus, according to Cg, that Rāma takes on the characteristics of a human being in order to teach dharma through his own conduct.

"the bherī drums . . . and mṛdaṅgas" bherīḥ . . . mṛdaṅgāṃś ca: On bherīs, see 6.17.31–33 and note.

"frolicked about happily" kṣvelanti: The verb √kṣviḍ can mean "to play or frolic," on the one hand, or "to roar, whoop, or murmur," on the other. Either sense is appropriate here, and both appear in the various translations. The commentators are silent on this matter, but compare note to 5.60.12.

62. "who used trees as their weapons" nagayodhinaḥ: Literally, "fighting with immovable objects." The term naga, "that which does not [na] move [ga]," is used as a kenning for trees and mountains, both of which the monkeys employ as weapons.

"clapped their upper arms again and again" āsphoṭyāsphoṭya: Literally, "having clapped their upper arms, having clapped their upper arms." This is a common gesture of belligerence in the Indian martial tradition, but it may also be a sign of delight as at 5.8.50. D7,9–11,G2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead apare sphoṭya, "others brandishing or breaking [trees]." See note to 6.17.13–15.

"they took their stand there by the hundreds of thousands" tasthuḥ śatasahasraśaḥ: A number of the translations consulted read the numerical adverb with the gerund utpāṭya, "having ripped up," instead of with the finite verb. This reading, proposed by Cr, gives the sense "ripping up trees by the [hundreds of] thousands (sahasraśo drumān utpāṭya tasthuḥ)."

64. Ct tells us that there has been a two-day cessation of hostilities at this point, a position he ascribes to the Āgniveśyarāmāyaṇa. This break, it seems, is a medical leave to account for the disability of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa (atra sthāne dinadvayaṃ yuddhāvahāra ity āgniveśyaḥ). See note to 6.41.8, where Ct again makes mention of the cessation of hostilities. On the chronology of epic events, see notes to 6.4.4. For additional comments from the Āgniveśyarāmāyaṇa, see notes to 6.4.63 and 6.97.33.

The meter is upajāti.

1. "Then Rāvaṇa and the rākṣasas heard" rākṣasaiḥ sārdhaṃ tadā śuśrāva rāvaṇaḥ: Literally, "Rāvaṇa along with the rākṣasas then heard." Our reading of the syntax here accords with that of Cr, Cg, and the majority of the translators consulted. Ct and Cm, however, construe the phrase rākṣasaiḥ sārdham with the participle nardatām, "of them who were roaring," understanding that the rākṣasas Vibhīṣaṇa [and his four companions] are roaring (rākṣasair vibhīṣaṇādibhiḥ—so Ct). This reading is followed only by Dutt (1893, p. 1250).

"swift" tarasvinām: D7,9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahaujasām, "powerful or energetic."

2. "uproar" ninadam: Literally, "sound." Cm reads the term as a bahuvrīhi compound in the sense of "by which the ocean [i.e., its roar] is overcome or drowned out." This would then construe adjectivally with -nirghoṣam, "resonance," of pāda a. This, according to Cm, is tantamount to saying that the roar was deeper than the ocean [or the ocean's roar]. (ninadaṃ nirasto nado 'rṇavo yena tam. tad apekṣayā gambhīram iti yāvat.)

"with its deep and joyous resonance" snigdhagambhīranirghoṣam: Literally, "having a smooth and deep sound." The semantic range of snigdha does not normally include the sense of "joyous, exuberant." Nonetheless, the context of the passage, including Rāvaṇa's deduction from the sound that the monkeys are now filled with delight, in verse 4 below, lends credence to Ct's explanation that, from the two qualities of the sound, we are to understand that there has been a transformation of the sound of lamentation born from the monkeys' grief [over Rāma's apparent death] (snigdhagambhīratvena duḥkhamūlarodanādiśabdavyāvṛttiḥ).

3–4. "it is clear . . . tremendous" vyaktaṃ sumahatī: Ñ1,D4,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead suvyaktaṃ mahatī, "it is very clear . . . great."

"the ocean itself, abode of Varuṇa" varuṇālayaḥ: Literally, "the abode of Varuṇa." D9–11,T3,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead lavaṇārṇavaḥ, "the salt sea."

6. "who stood at their posts all around him" samīpaparivartinaḥ: Literally, "surrounding him nearby."

7. "why . . . rejoicing at a time when they ought to be grieving" śokakāle samutpanne harṣakāraṇam utthitam: Literally, "the reason for rejoicing when the time for grieving is at hand."

8. "they climbed the ramparts" prākāram adhiruhya: Literally, "having ascended the rampart." That the rākṣasas could climb the ramparts suggests to Ct that the cessation of hostilities, which he believes to have followed the disability of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, is still in effect (anenātrāvahāraḥ sūcitaḥ). See note to 6.40.64 above, where Ct suggests that there has been a two-day cessation (avahāra) in the hostilities. See, too, notes to 6.33.2–3; 6.49.33; and 6.62.2.

9. "When those rākṣasas saw" prekṣya rākṣasāḥ: Literally, "the rākṣasas having seen." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sarvarākṣasāḥ, "all the rākṣasas." This poorly attested reading is syntactically defective in that it lacks a verbal element to govern the accusative rāghavau, "the two Rāghavas."

"illustrious" mahābhāgau: Printed editions of the text of Cg (VSP and KK = 6.51.9) and GPP (6.51.9—Cg's variant) read instead mahāvegau, "very swift or greatly energetic."

"their hearts sank" viṣeduḥ: Literally, "they despaired."

10. "with faces downcast" viṣaṇṇavadanāḥ: The textual evidence for this verse is somewhat complicated. A number of manuscripts and the vulgate text of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead vivarṇā rākṣasāḥ, "pale rākṣasas." See note 14 below.

"all" sarve . . . sarve: The textual evidence does not support the repetition of the term. Northern manuscripts tend to substitute other words for the first, while southern manuscripts tend to substitute other terms for the second. D5–7,T1,2,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators substitute ghorāḥ, "dreadful." It appears from the critical apparatus that only one manuscript (M4) collated for the critical edition may include both occurrences of the term.

11. "Their dismay evident in their faces" dīnamukhāḥ: Literally, "with sad faces."

"the night-roaming rākṣasas" niśācarāḥ: Literally, "night-roamers." D9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead ca rākṣasāḥ, "and the rākṣasas."

14. "grief" -śoka-: Ś,Ñ,V,B1,3,4,D1–5,7–13,T1,3,G1,2,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead -roṣa-, "anger or rage."

"downcast face" viṣaṇṇavadanaḥ: Ś,Ñ,V,B2,4,D1–4,7–13,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead vivarṇavadanaḥ, "with face pale or drained of color."

"he said" abravīt: D9–11,13,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead abhavat, "he became [downcast or pale-faced]."

15–16. "Indrajit had struck down and bound those two" baddhau . . . pramathyendrajitā: Literally, "having been struck down by Indrajit, the two were bound."

"they were given to him as a boon" dattavaraiḥ: Literally, "having a given boon." We agree with Cg in reading the compound as a paranipāta for varadattaiḥ, "granted through a boon." Ct explains, "the meaning is 'acquired through a boon by means of long and arduous penances' (cirakāladuścaratapasā varaprāptair ity arthaḥ)." Cr understands that the weapons were acquired as [part of] a grant of immunity, and it is this that makes them unfailing (prāptābhayapradānair ata evāmoghaiḥ). It is made clear at 5.46.34 that Indrajit possesses binding weapons that are derived from Brahmā although there they are not associated with serpents. Elsewhere (Uttarakāṇḍa 25), Indrajit is said to have received the boon of invisibility along with various weapons as a boon from Śiva for performing various sacrifices. Cf. notes to 6.36.10.

"army" balam: The term is ambiguous and can also mean "power or strength." Several translators have chosen this latter meaning.

17. "as powerful as the great serpent Vāsuki" vāsukitejasaḥ: Literally, "with the energy of Vāsuki." Vāsuki is one of the great mythic nāgas of epic and purāṇic tradition. He is, perhaps, most noteworthy for his role as the churning rope in the myth of the churning of the primal ocean for the nectar of immortality. See, for example, 1.44.16,17 and notes. B3,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead pāvakatejasaḥ, "with the brilliance or energy of fire." On the story of the churning of the ocean, see 6.12.22; 6.40.29; 6.53.23; 6.80.19; 6.105.19; and notes.

18. "hissing like a serpent" niśvasann urago yathā: This is one of the most common tropes in the epic to express the rage of a warrior. It is also used, however, to describe the labored breathing of wounded heroes. See 5.4.11; 5.8.10,26; and 5.13.30–31 and notes. See note to 5.54.10. See, too, 5.36.4–7 and note. See 6.48.22–23; 6.57.81; and 6.76.1. Cf. 6.36.4–7 and note.

19. "Take a large force" balena mahatā yuktaḥ: Literally, "joined with a large force."

"fearsome in their deeds" bhīmakarmaṇām: D5,6,T,G2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cv, and Cr read the vocative bhīmavikrama, "O you of fearsome valor." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read the nominative bhīmavikramaḥ. Both variants would then describe Dhūmrākṣa.

"go forth" abhiniryāhi: D6,7,9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead āśu niryāhi, "go forth at once."

"to slaughter" vadhāya: Cg suggests that the expression "go forth for slaughter" is, in fact, inauspicious [as it might equally suggest the destruction of Dhūmrākṣa and his troops] (tvaṃ vadhāyābhiniryāhīty amaṅgalasūcakaṃ vacaḥ).

20. "made his obeisance and, in great excitement" kṛtvā praṇāmaṃ saṃhṛṣṭaḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead parikramya tataḥ śīghram, "having reverently circumambulated [him] and swiftly."

21. "the palace gates" taddvāram: Literally, "the gate of that." We take the reference to be to the gate of the king's residence (nṛpālaya) mentioned in the previous verse.

"the officer in charge of the garrison" balādhyakṣam: Literally, "supervisor of the army." Ck understands that the officer in question is Prahasta. See 6.43.1 and note, where a number of commentators make the same identification.

"Mobilize" tvarayasva: Literally, "cause to hasten."

22. "the leader of his troops" balānugaḥ: Literally, "having the army as his followers."

"quickly" drutam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bhṛśam, which can be read either adverbially, in the sense of "energetically," or adjectivally with the noun balam, in the sense of "large, numerous, powerful."

23. "fastened on their war bells" baddhaghaṇṭāḥ: Literally, "those by whom bells are tied on or having bells tied on." The commentators and translators differ as to the purpose and location of these bells. Ct, Cr, and Ck all understand that the bells are fastened to the various weapons wielded by the rākṣasas (prāsaśaktyādiṣv iti śeṣaḥ). In this they are followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1251), who translates, "with bells tied to their arms." Cg understands that the warriors tie the bells around their hips to advertise their valor (śūratvajñāpanāya kaṭibaddhaghaṇṭā ity arthaḥ)." In this he may be thinking of the kaṭitra, an ornament that consists of a string of small bells worn around the waist or the loins (Apte s.v.). It is not clear whether this is worn by men during combat, as such ornaments are not commonly associated with men. See Sahay 1973, p. 112. However, a dagger belt is known to have been worn at least from the fifth or sixth century CE (Dikshitar 1944, p. 134). Cg's interpretation is followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1548) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 126). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 147) and Pagani (1999, p. 988), for some reason, believe that the bells are worn around the neck. Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 286), like us, is uncertain as to the location of the bells and simply translates literally, "legati lor titinnabuli."

24–25. "terrible" ghorāḥ: Ś,V1,2,B1–3,D2–6,8,12,13,T1,G1,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead digbhyaḥ, "from [all] directions."

"vigorously" bhṛśam: D7,9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead api, "as well as."

"armed": The word "armed" has been added.

"short javelins" bhiṇḍipālaiḥ: On bhiṇḍipālas, see 6.32.30; 6.42.19; 6.53.32; 6.83.25; and notes.

"darts" prāsaiḥ: D9–11,T3,G3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read pāśaiḥ, "nooses."

26–27. "drawn by donkeys" kharaiḥ: Literally, "by or with donkeys." We follow Cr and Cg, who both understand that the donkeys as well as the banners are attributes of the chariots. This position gains support from the fact that Dhūmrākṣa's chariot is being yoked to donkeys in the following verse. The construction is elliptical, however, and so it is equally possible to understand that the donkeys are yet another mode of transportation, along with the chariots, horses, and elephants. This interpretation is seen in the translations of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1548) and Dutt (1893, p. 1252).

"with faces of many different kinds" vividhānanaiḥ: The rākṣasas' mounts, like the rākṣasas themselves, are often represented as having the heads or faces of a variety of animals. Compare verse 28 below and 5.15.4–17. These grotesque variations are also commonly represented in the courtly illustrations of the Rāmāyaṇa.

28. "With harsh cries" kharanisvanaḥ: The term khara-, "harsh," has no doubt been chosen because it echoes the word kharaiḥ, "with donkeys," in pāda b. Indeed, the compound can be translated as "with the cry or braying of a donkey," as several of the translators do. We find this interpretation less persuasive. The commentators are silent.

"wolves" vṛka-: B4,D9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct substitute mṛga-, "deer or antelope."

29. "proceeded . . . to the western gate" niryātaḥ . . . paścimadvāram: Literally, "went out to the western gate." D6,7,10,11,T2,3,G1,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Cr read instead the ablative paścimadvārāt, "from the western gate." Most translators, even those who read with the critical text, understand, "issued from the western gate."

"where the troop leader . . . was stationed" yatra yūthapaḥ: Literally, "where the troop leader [was]." D9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read tiṣṭhati, "he stands [i.e., is stationed]," for the critical edition's yūthapaḥ, "troop leader." This reading makes it unnecessary to supply the verb, as we have done.

Following verse 29, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [846*]: "Him [Dhūmrākṣa], who with harsh cries, having mounted that excellent chariot yoked to donkeys." This line must be construed with verse 30 below.

30. For similar passages listing inauspicious omens, see 6.26.21–30; 6.31.3–12; 6.45.31–37; 6.53.41–45; 6.65.17–19; 6.94.14–27; and notes.

"fearsome looking" bhīmadarśanam: Ñ,V2,3,B,D3,4,T1,G1,M3, and the printed editions of Cg [KK (6.51.29) and VSP (6.51.30)] and Gorresio read instead bhīmavikramam, "of fearsome valor." This reading is rendered in the translations of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 126) and Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 287).

"birds of ill omen" śakunāḥ: The term can refer to birds in general or more specifically to a species of carrion bird, buzzard, or kite. We follow Cg, who glosses, "birds indicative of [evil] omens (nimittasūcakāḥ pakṣiṇaḥ)." See notes to 6.4.6 and 6.26.8. See also note to verse 31 below.

"blocking his path" pratyavārayan: Literally, "they warded [him] off." D7,9–11,T3,G1,2,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead pratyaṣedhayan, "they obstructed."

31. "long lines of carrion birds perched on the edge of his battle standard" dhvajāgre grathitāś caiva nipetuḥ kuṇapāśanāḥ: Literally, "corpse-eaters strung together, perched on the tip of his standard." Compare 6.83.33c and note. See, too, 6.53.43; 6.94.16; and notes.

32. "ghastly pale" śvetaḥ: Literally, "white."

"in Dhūmrākṣa's path" dhūmrākṣasya samīpataḥ: Literally, "close to Dhūmrākṣa." GPP (6.51. 33b), Gita Press (6.51.33b), and NSP (6.51. 33b) (the critical apparatus for 32d is omitted from the critical edition) read nipātitaḥ, "thrown down, hurled down," for samīpataḥ, "close to."

33. "It rained blood" vavarṣa rudhiraṃ devaḥ: Literally, "The god rained blood." As Cg notes, the god in question is the vedic god Parjanya. This deity's normal and beneficent function is to shower down rain in a timely fashion. For blood raining down, see 6.26.22; 6.31.5; 6.45.926*–36; 6.83.33; 6.94.15; and notes. Cf. note to 6.76.2, inserted passage 1674*, lines 5–7.

"in an unfavorable direction" pratilomam: Literally, "inversely or against the hair." As in many cultures, a wind blowing from one's back is considered favorable. In this case, the wind was blowing directly in Dhūmrākṣa's face, constituting yet another unfavorable portent. See 6.4.41; 6.43.8; 6.45.35; 6.53.44; 6.65.19; and notes.

"were no longer visible" na cakāśire: Literally, "they did not shine."

34. Following verse 34, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [850*]: "And all the rākṣasas in Dhūmrākṣa's vanguard were stupefied."

35. "that . . . very fearsome rākṣasa" subhīmaḥ: Literally, "very fearsome one." For some reason Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 148), perhaps influenced by the fact that, in verse 34, Dhūmrākṣa had been shaken at the sight of the evil omens described in verses 30–33, erroneously translates, "terrifié." In this he has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 127) and Pagani (1999, p. 988).

"an ocean" samudra-: D5,6,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead mahaugha-, "a great flood." Cg understands this simply as a kenning for the ocean. Ck, Ct, and Cr understand the reference to be to the [overflowing] ocean at the time of the cosmic dissolution (pralayasamudraḥ—Ct). Dutt (1893, p. 1252) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1549) render this interpretation in their translations.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

1. "fearsome cries" bhīmanisvanam: Manuscript evidence shows a variety of readings in place of this compound. B3,D5,7,9–11,T1,3,M3, and the texts of the southern commentators read instead bhīmavikramam, "of fearsome valor."

2. "one another—the former . . . the latter" anyonyam: Literally, "one another." We have elaborated the translation somewhat in keeping with the fact that the monkeys fight only with trees, stones, and other found objects, whereas the rākṣasas use standard weapons.

"terrifying" ghoraiḥ: D5,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead the adverbial ghoram, "fiercely, dreadfully," which would then modify the participle nighnatām, "slaughtered."

Following verse 2, D5,6,S, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read 6.42.5cd, "with . . . various and dreadful iron clubs, and sharp tridents (ghoraiś ca parighaiś citrais triśūlaiś cāpi saṃśitaiḥ)." According to the critical apparatus, these manuscripts repeat the line in its proper place. This repetition, however, does not appear either in KK or VSP. Therefore, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 127), among the translators consulted, translates the line here, but not at its "proper" place. See notes to verses 5–6 below.

3. "smashed . . . to the ground" bhūmau samīkṛtāḥ: Literally, "made them level on the ground." Ct understands that the rākṣasas have been made equal or level with the ground (bhūmau samatāṃ prāpitāḥ). Cr understands that they have been made similar to the earth (bhūmisādṛśyaṃ prāpitāḥ). Ck understands that they have been made similar to the earth in that they are no longer moving (bhūmisamī[pa?]kṛtā bhūmyā samatām aspandatāṃ prāpitāḥ). Each of these commentators understands the expression as a euphemism for "killed." Thus, Cg and Cm merely gloss, "felled (pātitāḥ)."

4. "fletched with heron feathers" kaṅkapatraiḥ: See 6.35.12 and note.

5–6. See notes to verse 2 above.

"various" citraiḥ: Most translators construe the adjective with triśūlaiḥ, "tridents," in pāda 5d. We feel, however, that it is best to respect the pāda boundary and construe the adjective with parighaiḥ, "iron clubs," in pāda c.

"sharp" saṃśitaiḥ: D9–11,M5 (second time), and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the somewhat awkward saṃśritaiḥ, "clung to, embraced," which Ct glosses as "grasped (gṛhītaiḥ)." Translators who follow the text of Ct generally translate, "held, brandished," etc. G1,3,M3,5 (first time), and the printed editions of Cg read instead samhataiḥ, "closely joined, compact." Cg glosses this as saṃgataiḥ, "grouped together or massed," and takes it as an adjective describing the rākṣasas (so Cg, Cm) rather than the weapons. (saṃhataiḥ saṃgataiḥ. rākṣasaviśeṣaṇam etat.) Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 127), who follows the text of Cg, reads the line after verse 2 and follows Cg's interpretation, rendering, "by . . . Rākshasa bands."

"accomplished great feats" cakruḥ karmāṇi: Literally, "they did deeds."

8. "calling out their names" nāmāni . . . babhāṣire: Literally, "they spoke names." We understand, with the commentators, that the monkeys are proclaiming their own names on the battlefield, presumably as part of their challenging of the rākṣasas (svanāmāni—so Cg).

"the fearsome rākṣasas" rākṣasān bhīmān: D7,9–11,T3,G1,2, and the printed editions of Ct read vīrān, "heroic," for bhīmān, "fearsome."

9–10. "With a victorious air" jitakāśibhiḥ: The compound is used idiomatically in this sense elsewhere in the literature (cf. MBh 2.58.43; 3.21.13; 3.233.6,7; 3.270.17; 3.271.13, etc.; and Mudrārākṣasa 2.1.18). See Apte, s.v. Ck, Cm, and Ct gloss, "having conquered fear (jitabhayaiḥ)," while Ct and Cm add, as an alternative, "having controlled their breathing (jitaśvāsaiḥ)." See 6.44.36. See, too, 6.32.17; 6.42.9–10; 6.43.1, App. I, No. 46, line 32; 6.44.36; 6.49.36 note (1094*); 6.78.38; and notes.

"some of the rākṣasas . . . Other rākṣasas" rākṣasāḥ . . . kecit . . . kecit: Literally, "some rākṣasas . . . some."

"accustomed to drinking blood" rudhirabhojanāḥ: Literally, "eating blood." On the bloodthirstiness of rākṣasas, see, for example, 3.4.2–8 and 3.65.12–20. See, too, Pollock 1991, pp. 68–75 and S. Goldman 2004b.

11. "were beaten to a shapeless mass" rāśīkṛtāḥ: Literally, "were made into piles or heaps." We follow the idea of Ck, Ct, and Cm, who seem to understand that the rākṣasas are reduced to "heaps" [presumably of flesh] by the blows of the trees (drumaprahārair hatvā rāśīkṛtā ity arthaḥ—so Ct). Cr, however, seems to understand that the rākṣasas' bodies are piled up in one place (ekatra sthāpitāḥ).

12–860*. Verse 12, as it stands in the critical edition, can neither be grammatically construed by itself nor credibly linked syntactically to either of its neighboring verses. It consists, in fact, merely of a string of nouns and adjectives in the instrumental with no appropriate verbal element to make it into a sentence. This situation is unknown to any of the manuscripts collated for the critical edition or the printed editions consulted, all of which have some kind of participle in the nominative that functions as a verb to provide a coherent syntax to the passage. For this reason, we have included 860*, which is found in D5–7, 9–11, and S. This passage adds elephants, horses, and riders to the list of things destroyed by the monkeys and, most critically, adds the phrase, "kīrṇam . . . vasudhātalam (the ground was littered)." See Sutherland 1992.

14. "Their faces pale" vivarṇavadanāḥ: V2,3,D9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead viṣaṇṇavadanāḥ, "with dejected faces."

"the rākṣasas fell" nipetuḥ: Literally, "they fell."

"fainting" mūḍhāḥ: The term normally means "stupefied or confused." We follow Cg and Cm, who gloss, "fainting, unconscious (mūrcchitāḥ)," and Cr, who glosses, "without consciousness (saṃjñārahitāḥ)."

15. "fearsome in their valor" bhīmavikramāḥ: D5,T1,2,G3,M3, and the printed editions of Cg read instead bhīmanisvanāḥ, "with fearsome cries."

"which struck like thunderbolts" vajrasparśasamaiḥ: Literally, "whose touch was equal to the vajra." The word vajra in this context can refer either to the thunderbolt or the powerful weapon of the god Indra. See note to 6.55.43.

16. "as they rushed swiftly onward" āpatantaḥ: Literally, "[those] rushing onward." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the somewhat awkward pātayantaḥ, "felling, knocking down." The participle must take the rākṣasas as its subject, thus leading to a problem of interpretation. Translators who follow the texts and printed editions of Ct appear to ignore the term, interpret it as a simplex as in the critical reading, or, in the case of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1550) alone, attempt to give its causal meaning. Thus, Gita Press renders, "capable of felling down their adversaries."

Following verse 16, Ñ2,V (V3 after 16ab),B,D13 insert a passage of two lines [862*], while D5,T1,M3, and Cg insert the first line only: "Being slaughtered by the monkeys, the rākṣasas, trembling in fear,[1] [1] fled in all directions, as they pleased, like deer beset by wolves.[2]"

[1]"trembling in fear" bhayakātarāḥ: D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg (VSP 6.52.17ef; KK 6.52.16ef), as noted, insert the first line [862.1*], substituting the verb vipradudruvuḥ, "they [the rākṣasas] ran away," for bhayakātarāḥ, "trembling in fear."

The verse has probably been inserted to provide a better transition, since the reading of the vulgate and the critical edition makes no mention of the flight of the rākṣasas until it has already been completed. The two versions of this passage are translated, respectively, only in Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 289) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p.127).

19. "with short javelins" bhiṇḍipālaiḥ: On bhiṇḍipālas, see 6.32.30; 6.41.24–25; 6.53.32; 6.83.25; and notes.

20. "knocked to the ground" vinihatā bhūmau: M1–3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read śūlaiḥ, "with lances," for bhūmau, "on the ground." This yields the meaning "struck with lances."

"furious" saṃkruddhaiḥ: D5,6,T1,2,G1(first time),M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead sabalaiḥ, "with their troops." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg slightly change the word order. This yields the reading "by the rākṣasas and their troops." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 128) translates this reading as "by the strong rākṣasas."

21. "lay" śāyitāḥ: Ñ2,V1,2,B2,D5,G1,2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead dāritāḥ, "torn open." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 128), the only translator consulted who shares this reading, renders, "others had one flank sheared down." The reading is similar to that of Gorresio (6.28.23cd), who renders, "lacerato ai fianchi" (1856, vol. 9, p. 289).

"entrails" āntraiḥ: Ck, who is also quoted by Ct, glosses purītadbhiḥ. According to Apte (s.v.), the term purītat can refer either to entrails in general or to a specific organ that lies close to the heart.

22. "With . . . its abundance of weapons" śastrabahulam: D6,T1,2,G1,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead śabdabahulam, "with its tremendous noise."

23. "With the twanging of bowstrings in place of the sweet sound of the lute" dhanurjyātantrimadhuram: Literally, "sweet with bowstrings for stringed instruments." The commentators agree that the term tantri (irregular for tantrī) here refers to the vīṇā, or traditional Indian lute. Cr understands the term madhuram, "sweet," to mean here, in the context of battle, "a battle delightful to heroes (śūramanohāri yuddham)." See Te Nijenhius 1970 and 1974. See, too, note to 1.4.7. Cf. 6.59.36 and note.

"the gasps of the dying for the beating of time" hikkātālāsamanvitam: Literally, "with gasps or hiccups for the rhythmic clapping of hands." The clapping of hands is the classic way to mark tempo in Indian music. See note to 1.4.7. Our translation follows Cg, who explains the term hikkā as "the exiting of breath from the throat after repeated pauses (viramya viramya kaṇṭhāt pavanodgamaḥ)." Cs also supports this interpretation, glossing, "a kind of sound produced by the upper or outgoing breath (ūrdhvavātapravartitaśabdaviśeṣaḥ)." The idea is probably that of the so-called death rattle. Ck, Ct, and Cr all understand the term to refer to the neighing of the war-horses (aśvaheṣā). Cs quotes Ct's opinion but prefers an interpretation closer to Cg's and ours, as indicated above. We believe that the neighing of horses would be less likely to be rhythmic than the stertorous breathing of the gravely wounded. Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 289) interprets similarly to us; he renders, "i singhiozzi."

"the faint cries of the wounded in place of singing" mandrastanitasaṃgītam: Literally, "with low sounds for singing." Here again we have followed Cg [v.l. manda-], who explains, "in which the speech, faint on account of weakness, took the place of excellent singing (aśaktyā mandabhāṣaṇaṃ tad eva saṃgītaṃ samyaggānaṃ yasmin)." Ck, Ct, Cr, and Cs take manda- [v.l. for mandra-] in its sense of a type of elephant and thus understand, "with the trumpeting of manda elephants for singing (mandānāṃ mandākhyagajaviśeṣāṇāṃ stanitaṃ bṛhmitam eva gītaṃ yatra tat—so Ct)."

"the battle resembled a musical recital" yuddhagāndharvam ābabhau: Literally, "it seemed to be a battle-concert." Cv, Cg, and Cm gloss, "battle music (yuddhasaṃgītam)," with Cg going on to further gloss saṃgītam as "dancing, singing, and instrumental music (nṛttagītavādyam)." Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 289) translates, "ell' era come la danza dei Gandharvi," following his commentator (Cl), whom he quotes as saying, "the battle resembled a dance of the gandharvas (tat [sic] yuddhaṃ gāndharvanṛtyam iva [sic] ābabhau)." Although Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, pp. 373–74, n. 129) follows this suggestion, he remarks that the notion of the gandharvas as celestial musicians is a late, popular one and that the earlier notion of these beings was one of fierce warrior followers of Indra. He thus raises the possibility that the poet's original conception might have been rather different than that suggested by the commentator, that is, the concept of a martial dance, the horrid dance of war. Compare 6.46.25–28, where the battleground is compared to a river. See, too, Introduction, pp. 22–23.

26. "Equal in might to his father" pitṛtulyaparākramaḥ: Hanumān's father is, of course, the mighty wind god, Vāyu.

"his eyes now doubly red with rage" dviguṇatāmrākṣaḥ: Literally, "his eyes doubly red." See 6.31.72 and notes.

27. "When Dhūmrākṣa . . . took his stand" vyatiṣṭhata: Literally, "he stood."

28. "with its wheels, poles, horses" sacakrakūbaraṃ sāśvam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sacakrakūbaramukham, "with its wheels, poles, and front."

29. "After smashing" bhañktvā: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tyaktvā, "leaving aside" (GPP reads tyatvā [sic] for tyaktvā).

"trunks, branches, and all" saskandhaviṭapaiḥ: Literally, "with their trunks and branches." Ck, Ct, Cm, and Cr understand skandha in its sense of "a large branch (sthūlaśākhā)," and understand viṭapa in the sense of "a smaller branch (sūkṣmaśākhā)." Only Dutt (1893, p. 1255) among the translators consulted follows this interpretation.

30. "Some of the rākṣasas" rākṣasāḥ . . . anye: A number of the translators (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1551; Dutt 1893, p. 1255; and Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 128) understand that two groups of rākṣasas are described in this verse: those whose heads are smashed in pādas ab, and those who are felled by trees in pādas cd, as if the verse contained the normal anye . . . anye construction for this type of expression. Since the anye is not repeated, we are inclined to read the verse as a single sentence, as Cr proposes and as it is rendered by the other translators consulted.

33. "Then, in a fury . . . forcefully" tataḥ kruddhas tu vegena: The pāda is subject to considerable variation in the various subrecensions and probably should have been marked, in part or whole, as uncertain by the critical editors. Certainly the repetition of the particle tu in pādas a and d appears suspicious and is found in no version other than the critical edition. See Sutherland 1992. Ñ2,V,B1,2,D6,7,9–11,T2,3,G,M5 read instead tasya kruddhasya vegena, "through the force of that angry one." D7,9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read roṣeṇa, "in anger," for vegena, "forcefully, swiftly." According to Ct's reading, which is rendered in those translations that are based on his text, not only Dhūmrākṣa but Hanumān is described as "enraged." The verse would thus be rendered: "Then, in anger, Dhūmrākṣa brought his mace, with its numerous spikes, down upon the skull of the enraged Hanumān."

34. "fearsome-looking" bhīmarūpayā: D9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bhīmavegayā, "of fearsome impact."

"shrugged off" acintayan: Literally, "[he] not thinking or caring about."

35. "his every limb buckling" vihvalitasarvāṅgaḥ: V3,B2,D7,9–11,M1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read visphārita-, "quivering, trembling," for vihvalita-. Cr glosses, "torn, split open (vidīrṇāni)."

36. "surviving" hataśeṣāḥ: Literally, "the remnants of the slain."

"They fled back to Laṅkā" praviviśur laṅkām: Literally, "They entered Laṅkā."

37. "his enemy" śatrum: D5–7,9–11,T3,G1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead śatrūn, "enemies."

"he succumbed to the fatigue born from slaughtering his enemies" ripuvadhajanitaśramaḥ: Literally, "he possessed fatigue produced from the slaughter of enemies." Cs understands the internal compound vadhajanitaśrama—which we, along with Cr and all translators, read as an instrumental tatpuruṣa—as a dvandva. This compound, in turn, when read as part of its contextualizing bahuvrīhi, yields the sense "he who caused the death and exhaustion of his enemies. (vadhaś ca janitaśramaś ca tau. ripūṇāṃ vadhajanitaśramau yena sa tathā.)" Cs explains the distinction between the two actions by noting that Hanumān slaughtered those who stood their ground and exhausted those who fled. (sthitānāṃ vadhaḥ. vidrutānāṃ ca śrama iti vivekaḥ.)

The meter is puṣpitāgrā.

Cv, Cg, and Cm regard the death of Dhūmrākṣa as a point at which to continue their precise chronology of the epic narrative. Cv claims that the battle between Hanumān and Dhūmrākṣa marks the conclusion of the second day of battle (dhūmrākṣayuddhena dvitīyam ahaḥ samāptam). Cm notes that [some] authorities (referring, of course, to Ct's tradition—see note to 6.44.38) claim that Dhūmrākṣa's death occurred on the second day of the bright half of the lunar month Bhādra [August–September] (dhūmrākṣavadho bhādraśukladvitīyāyām ity āhuḥ). Cg notes, elliptically, "the killing of Dhūmrākṣa took place on the second [lunar day (tithi) of the lunar fortnight of Phālguna/Caitra] (dvitīyāyāṃ dhūmrākṣavadhaḥ)." See notes to 6.4.4 and 6.43.1.

1. "the officer in charge of the garrison" balādhyakṣam: This must be the same officer who was put under the command of Dhūmrākṣa at 6.41.21 above and identified there by Ck as Prahasta. Ct, Cm, and Cg join Ck in making the same identification here. He must now have returned to report the bad news to Rāvaṇa.

Following 1ab, D5–7,9–11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of 142 lines, App. I, No. 26 (= GPP 6.53.1cd–6.55.1ab; VSP 6.53.1cd–6.55.1ab; KK 6.53.1cd–6.55.1ab; and Gita Press 6.53.1cd–6.55.1ab). This passage describes the duel between Aṅgada and the rākṣasa Vajradaṃṣṭra. This same duel is described by Ñ,V (V2 missing up to line 148),B2–4,D4,13 in App. I, No. 28, which is inserted following verse 6.45.1. The passage closely parallels the duel with Dhūmrākṣa at sargas 41 and 42 above.

According to Cv, the death of Vajradaṃṣṭra marks the end of the third day of battle, whereas for Cm and Cg, it falls on the third lunar day (tithi) [of the lunar fortnight of Phālguna/Caitra], and for Ct, on the third lunar day (tithi) [of the bright half of the month of Bhādra]. See note to 6.4.4. Cf. notes to 6.42.37 and 6.44.38.

[GPP 6.53.1; VSP 6.53.1; KK 6.53.1] When Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, heard that Dhūmrākṣa had been slain [= 6.43.1ab], he flies into a towering rage and, beside himself with fury, heaves hot sighs like a hissing snake. He then speaks to the mighty heroic rākṣasa Vajradaṃṣṭra.[1–3] He orders Vajradaṃṣṭra to sally forth with a complement of rākṣasas in order to kill Rāma and Sugrīva along with the monkeys. [4–5] The rākṣasa lord Vajradaṃṣṭra, who is described as possessing great powers of illusion, agrees to go and quickly sets out with many troops, elephants, horses, donkeys, camels, chariots, etc.[6–8] Adorning himself and putting on armor, he takes his bow and mounts a grand, gilded chariot. He then sets forth with a vast army of rākṣasas bearing every sort of weapon, as well as war-elephants. With its loud roars and flashing weapons, the great army resembles a series of storm clouds in the rainy season with their thunder and lightning.[9–23] Vajradaṃṣṭra's expedition passes through the southern gate of the city, where the troop leader Aṅgada is stationed. There they see inauspicious omens. Meteors fall from the sky, hideous jackals, breathing fire, howl, and fearsome beasts cry out foretelling the destruction of the rākṣasas. Moreover, the rākṣasa warriors stumble fearfully as they advance. Although he sees these inauspicious omens, mighty Vajradaṃṣṭra summons all his fortitude and pushes onward, eager for battle.[24–31] Seeing the rākṣasas issuing forth, the monkeys, with a triumphant air, set up a mighty roar, which fills all quarters. A tumultuous battle between the monkeys and the rākṣasas ensues, with the combatants on both sides described as fearsome looking and eager to slaughter one another. The description of the battle follows, with the valiant warriors on both sides cut down with a variety of weapons, fists, rocks, trees, etc.[32–39] The terrifying sound of the clashing weapons, the rumbling chariot wheels, the twanging of bows, and the sounding of conches and drums is heard.[40–43] When the weapons of the rākṣasas are lost or destroyed, the battle continues hand to hand, with the monkeys using trees and rocks.

In the course of this battle, many rākṣasas are killed.[44–47] At the same time, Vajradaṃṣṭra terrorizes the monkeys with his arrows on the battlefield, just like Yama, himself, ender of all things, armed with his noose at the destruction of the world. Enraged rākṣasas, armed with all manner of weapons and expert in the use of divine weapon-spells, continue to slaughter the monkeys.[48–51] Seeing the *rā*kṣasas engaged in this slaughter, Vālin's son, Aṅgada, redoubles his fury, like the fire at the destruction of the universe. Seizing a tree, he slaughters the rākṣasas, just as a lion might slay lesser beasts.[52–56] The fearsome rākṣasas who have confronted Aṅgada now lie like broken trees, their heads smashed in, while the battleground looks terrifying, covered as it is with various chariots, banners, horses, and the blood and bodies of monkeys and rākṣasas.[57–60] By the same token, the ground, littered with the jewelry, garments, and parasols of the fallen, is described as resembling an autumn night. The impetuousness of Aṅgada's attack has caused the great army of rākṣasas to tremble like a cloud in the wind.[61–64]

[GPP 6.54.1; VSP 6.54.1; KK 6.54.1] Infuriated by Aṅgada's triumphs and the destruction of his forces, mighty Vajradaṃṣṭra twangs the bowstring of his fearsome bow with a sound like that of Indra's thunderbolt, and he begins to shower the monkey army with arrows.[65–68] The rākṣasa leaders, too, rally and, mounted on their chariots, continue the battle with various weapons. The heroic monkeys regroup themselves and fight armed with boulders.[69–72] The rākṣasas employ thousands of weapons against the principal monkeys, while the heroic monkeys, who resemble rutting elephants, hurl mountains, trees, and huge boulders at the rākṣasas.[73–76] The battle continues, and the destruction of the combatants is described. Some have their heads smashed, while others have their arms and feet severed. Their bodies are mangled with weapons and drenched in blood, while carrion birds and jackals swarm about. Headless corpses leap about, terrorizing the faint of heart, while rākṣasas and monkeys, with arms, hands, heads, and bodies hacked to pieces, lie fallen everywhere.[77–85] When Vajradaṃṣṭra sees the rākṣasa forces being destroyed by the monkeys, he charges into the monkey ranks, bow in hand, cutting them to pieces with his accurate, heron-feathered shafts, five, seven, eight, and nine at a time.[86–93] The terrified hosts of monkeys, their bodies rent by arrows, run to the shelter of Aṅgada as creatures might to the creator, Prajāpati. Seeing the shattered hosts of monkeys, Vālin's son, Aṅgada, is filled with fury and glares at Vajradaṃṣṭra, who returns his gaze. The two warriors, both in a towering rage, at last clash like a lion and a rutting elephant.[94–99] Vajradaṃṣṭra strikes the mighty son of Vālin, Aṅgada, in the vitals with hundreds of thousands of arrows resembling flames of fire. His entire body drenched with blood, mighty Aṅgada, of fearsome valor, hurls a tree at Vajradaṃṣṭra. But the rākṣasa, seeing the tree coming, calmly cuts it to pieces so that it falls, shattered, to the ground.[100–105] Observing Vajradaṃṣṭra's prowess, the bull among monkeys seizes a huge boulder and hurls it at him with a roar. But once again the powerful rākṣasa sees it coming and calmly leaps from his chariot, mace in hand, to take up his stand on the ground. The boulder hurled by Aṅgada smashes the rākṣasa's chariot, along with its wheels, poles, and horses, in the forefront of the battle.[106–111] The monkey then uproots a huge hill, trees and all, and brings it down upon Vajradaṃṣṭra's head. Vomiting blood, Vajradaṃṣṭra is momentarily dazed and stands grasping his mace, breathing heavily. Recovering, he smashes Aṅgada on the chest in a towering rage.[112–117] Vajradaṃṣṭra drops his mace, and the two, monkey and rākṣasa, batter each other with their fists. The two valorous warriors, exhausted from each other's blows and vomiting blood, resemble the planets Mars and Mercury.[118–121] Then immensely powerful Aṅgada, an elephant among monkeys, rips up a tree filled with fruit and flowers, while Vajradaṃṣṭra seizes a huge and shining sword and a shield of oxhide, covered with a network of bells and ornamented with leather.[122–125] Then the monkey and the rākṣasa furiously strike at each other without pity, executing various maneuvers in their desire for victory. Fallen to their knees on the ground in their exhaustion, they fight on, glowing with their bleeding wounds, so that they resemble two kiṃśuka trees in blossom.[126–129] Finally, in the blink of an eye, the elephant among monkeys Aṅgada, eyes blazing, springs up, like a serpent prodded with a stick. And, with a shining, spotless sword,[1] Aṅgada, mighty son of Vālin, strikes off Vajradaṃṣṭra's enormous head. Struck off by the sword and severed from his blood-drenched body, Vajradaṃṣṭra's beautiful head falls, its eyes still wide with anger.[130–135] When the rākṣasas see that Vajradaṃṣṭra has been slain, they are stupefied with fear and dejected, their faces downcast and averted in shame. They flee back to Laṅkā in terror with the leaping monkeys still slaughtering them. But as for mighty Vālin's son, Aṅgada, whose power was equal to that of Indra, bearer of the vajra, he rejoices, honored in the midst of the monkey army, like thousand-eyed Indra surrounded by the thirty gods.[136–140]

[1]"with a . . . sword" khaḍgena: A number of the commentators, conscious of the fact that the monkeys do not carry formal weapons, observe that, when Aṅgada's tree has been destroyed, he seizes Vajradaṃṣṭra's own sword (khaḍgenācchidya gṛhītena vajradaṃṣṭrīyeṇa—so Ct).

Following App. I, No. 26 but before 6.43.1cd, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [872*], which provides a transition from the appendix to the present sarga: "When Rāvaṇa heard that Vajradaṃṣṭra had been killed by Aṅgada, Vālin's son . . ."

2. "Akampana" akampanaṃ: Literally, "unshakeable." A character of this name is known to the southern recension of the Araṇyakāṇḍa, where it is he who reports Rāma's slaughter of the rākṣasas in Janasthāna to Rāvaṇa. He is the one who first puts into Rāvaṇa's head the idea of abducting Sītā. See Araṇyakāṇḍa, App. I, No. 10 (= GPP 3.31). See, too, notes to 3.29.20. See note to verse 5 below. Cf. 6.47.14.

"skilled in the use of every weapon" sarvaśastraprakovidam: D9,10,T2,3,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sarvaśastrāstrakovidam, "skilled in the use of all weapons and divine weapon-spells."

Following verse 2, Ñ,V,B,D2,5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [873*]: "He subdues and he defends,[1] and he is esteemed as a leader in battle. He is constantly desirous of my success and is always fond of warfare."

[1]"He subdues and he defends" eṣa śāstā ca goptā ca: Literally, "he is a subduer or chastiser and a protector." The expression is elliptical, and the commentators explain that he subdues his enemies and protects his own forces (śāstā śatrūṇāṃ goptā svabalasya—so Ct).

Following 873*, D2,5–7,9–11,S, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr continue with, while Ñ (Ñ1 after 877*),V,B, and the critical apparatus insert after 5cd, a passage of four lines [878*]: " 'He will defeat the two Kākutsthas and mighty Sugrīva. That scorcher of his foes[1] will slaughter the other fearsome monkeys as well.' When he received that command of Rāvaṇa, that mighty warrior with quick strides made his army hurry."

[1]"That scorcher of his foes" paraṃtapaḥ: D7,9–11,G3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead na saṃśayaḥ, "without doubt."

4. "Wearing earrings of burnished gold" taptakāñcanakuṇḍalaḥ: Literally, "having earrings of burnished gold." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the accusative taptakāñcanabhūṣaṇam, "having ornaments of burnished gold." In this reading, the adjective must refer to the chariot rather than Akampana.

Following 4ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [875*], continuing the description of Akampana: "Looking like a storm cloud, the color of a storm cloud, and with a thunderous sound like the sound of a storm cloud . . ."

5. "He was incapable of being shaken . . . Thus he was called Akampana, the unshakeable" na hi kampayituṃ śakyaḥ . . . akampanas tataḥ: Literally, "since he was incapable of being shaken, he was Akampana." The poet here provides an etymological explanation of the rākṣasa's name. See note to verse 2 above.

"in their midst" teṣām: Literally, "of them." The pronoun is elliptical in its reference here. We are inclined to agree with Cg, who understands the reference to be to the rākṣasas surrounding Akampana (teṣāṃ rakṣasāṃ madhye tejasāditya iva sthita ity arthaḥ). The idea is that, in his radiance, Akampana shines among his cohorts. In this interpretation he is followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 134) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1559). Ct and Cr, on the other hand, understand that Akampana was like a sun among the monkeys, in the sense that they were unable even to gaze upon him because of his radiance (teṣāṃ vānarāṇāṃ tejasāditya iva duṣprekṣo 'bhūd iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct). This interpretation is followed in the translations of Dutt (1893, p. 1262), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 158), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 135), and Pagani (1999, p. 995).

Following 5cd, Ñ (Ñ1 continues after 877*),V,B,D4 (continues after 877*) insert a passage of four lines [878*], while D2,5–7,9–11,S insert it following 873* above. See note to verse 2 above for a translation of the passage.

6. "were seized with a lethargy" dainyam āgacchat: Literally, "depression or lassitude came [to them]." Ck, Ct, Cg, and Cm add the word manaḥ, "mind, heart," giving the sense "depression came upon the minds [of the horses]." As Cr notes, this will be the first of the signs indicative of Akampana's impending defeat (parābhavalakṣaṇāny āha tasyetyādibhiḥ).

"that had no apparent cause" akasmāt: Cr, Ct, and Ck, with whom we agree, understand the adverb in this sense, glossing, "without cause (nirhetuḥ—so Ct, Ck)" or "without visible cause (dṛṣṭakāraṇābhāvāt—so Cr)." Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 291) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 134) also interpret in this way. The term can also mean "suddenly," and the remaining translators consulted have interpreted it accordingly.

7. "Though normally he delighted in battle" yuddhābhinandinaḥ: Literally, "delighting in combat." We have added the words "though normally" to highlight the sudden change in Akampana's demeanor.

"his left eye now began to twitch" vyasphuran nayanaṃ cāsya savyam: Literally, "and his left eye twitched." Throbbing or twitching on the left side of the body is an inauspicious omen for a male. See 6.4.6 and note. See, too, 6.53.43 and note.

"his face took on a sickly hue" vivarṇo mukhavarṇaś ca: Literally, "the color of his face was devoid of color." Translators of the southern recension understand this somewhat awkward phrase to mean that his face grew pale. We, however, prefer to follow Cg and Cr in understanding the phrase not to mean "devoid of color (vivarṇaḥ)" but rather "having an unfavorable or adverse color (viparītavarṇaḥ)."

"his voice began to crack" gadgadaś cābhavat svaraḥ: Literally, "his voice was choked or stuttering."

8. "Although the weather had been clear, the sky grew dark and a harsh wind blew." abhavat sudine cāpi durdinaṃ rūkṣamārutam: Literally, "and even on a fair day, there arose foul weather with harsh winds." D9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read for cāpi, "and even," kāle, "at a time [of good weather]." See 6.4.41; 6.41.33; 6.45.35; 6.53.44; 6.65.19; and notes.

"Fierce birds and beasts all uttered fearsome cries." ūcuḥ khagā mṛgāḥ sarve vācaḥ krūrā bhayāvahāḥ: The line is somewhat ambiguous, since both the adjectives krūrāḥ, "fierce," and bhayāvahāḥ, "fearsome," can be taken to modify the birds, the beasts, the birds and the beasts together, or the cries of the birds and beasts. With the exception of Dutt (1893, p. 1262), all translators consulted construe both adjectives with the cries. We, however, prefer the reading of Cr, who applies the first to the creatures and the second to their cries (krūrāḥ khagamṛgā bhayāvahā vāca ūcuḥ). See note to 6.26.8.

9. "Akampana" saḥ: Literally, "he."

11. " the vast army . . . armed with trees and boulders, arrayed itself for battle" mahācamūḥ / drumaśailapraharaṇā yoddhuṃ samavatiṣṭhata: Literally, "the great army, having trees and boulders for weapons, stood in order to fight." Manuscript evidence shows considerable variation for the verbal form samavatiṣṭhata, "it stood." Most variants show a finite verb. However, D9–11,T3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck show the genitive plural of the present participle of the synonymous verb sam + upa √sthā, samupatiṣṭhatām, which construes with the vulgate reading drūmaśailaprahārāṇām, yielding "of them [teṣām—verse 11 below] who took up their positions and who struck with trees and boulders." In the vulgate texts, this phrase belongs to a separate verse (= GPP 6.55.15).

12. "who were prepared to lay down their lives" samabhityaktajīvinām: Literally, "who had abandoned their lives." The southern commentators show some variation here. Cg reads with the critical edition and glosses, "valuing their bodies [no more highly] than a blade of grass (tṛṇīkṛtaśarīrāṇām)." Cm and Cr prefer the variant samabhityaktadehinām, "[of them] who [were prepared] to sacrifice their bodies." Cm glosses this reading as "those who had given up their embodied spirits (samabhityaktā dehina ātmāno yais te teṣām)." Ck and Ct have the same compound but in the nominative rather than in the genitive plural (samabhityaktadehinaḥ), which reading must then construe with the nominative plurals in our 6.43.13 (= GPP 6.55.16cd–17ab). Ck and Ct gloss this reading similarly to Cm, adding that it means that the warriors were "heedless of self-protection (ātmarakṣānirapekṣāḥ—so Ct)." Most of the translators consulted, regardless of the text they follow, translate, "lives." Only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1559) and Dutt (1893, p. 1262) follow Ct literally, translating, "souls" and "selves," respectively.

"for the sake of Rāma and Rāvaṇa, respectively" rāmarāvaṇayor arthe: Literally, "for the sake of Rāma and Rāvaṇa."

14. "roared . . . bellowed" vinardatām . . . abhigarjatām: The two roots √nard and √garj share the meanings "roar, bellow, etc." Cr attempts to distinguish them, explaining, "abhigarjatām means they were challenging one another to battle, and for that very reason they were roaring [vinardatām] (anyonyam abhigarjatāṃ yuddhārtham āhvayatām ata eva vinardatām)." Cg glosses vinardatām as "making leonine roars (siṃhanādaṃ kurvatām)" and abhigarjatām as "bellowing in [one another's] faces (abhimukhyena garjanaṃ kurvatām)."

15. "red" aruṇavarṇābham: Literally, "resembling the color red." Several of the commentators are unhappy with this collocation. Ct, Ck, and Cm take the term aruṇa-, "reddish color," here as a synonym for smoke, although they offer no lexical support for this. They thus understand the compound to mean "in which there was the appearance of a substance the color of smoke (dhūmravarṇasya vastuna ābhā yasmiṃs tat)." Cg understands it as an instrumental tatpuruṣa with the sense "that shines with the color of dawn or the color red, that is, with redness (aruṇavarṇena raktimnābhāti)."

16. "as pale as floating silk" kauśeyoddhūtapāṇḍunā: Literally, "white as raised up silk." D6,9–11,G2, and Ck, Ct, and Cr read -uddhata-, which can have a meaning similar to that of the critical reading, -uddhūta-, although the commentators and translators render the compound variously. All commentators agree that we are to read the compound as a paranipāta, i.e., as uddhūta [v.l. -uddhata-]kauśeyapāṇḍunā. Ct and Ck understand the compound to mean "slightly whitish like uddhata silk (uddhatakauśeyavadīṣatpāṇḍuravarṇena)." According to Apte (s.v. uddhata), who cites this verse, we are to understand the term here to mean "shining, glittering." Cr understands, "of a slightly reddish or pale pink color (īṣadaruṇavarṇenety arthaḥ)." Cg, who reads with the critical edition, claims that we are to understand that "the dust is both red [as mentioned in verse 15 above] and white, owing to the different types of earth that are stirred up (rajaso raktatvapāṇḍutve bhūbhedād iti jñeyam)." Cm, who reads with the critical edition, attractively, but with little lexical support, glosses, "washed, bright, shining or white (-dhauta-)." Many northern manuscripts, including the text of Gorresio (6.29.19), read aruṇa- for uddhūta-, yielding the meaning "reddish and whitish like silk."

"the opposing forces" bhūtāni: Literally, "creatures, beings." Our translation follows the interpretation of Ct, Ck, Cr, and Cm, who take the term in the nominative to refer to the rākṣasas and the monkeys. Cg takes the term in the accusative to refer to objects (vastūni) that are shrouded in dust and that the monkeys and the rākṣasas (terms he has to supply) therefore cannot see.

17. "armor" varma: The manuscript evidence shows considerable variation here, substituting bows, elephants, etc., for armor. Ñ,V,B3,D9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead carma, "shield."

18. "tumultuous" tumule: D7,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead the nominative tumulaḥ, which must then be construed with śabdaḥ, "din," in pāda a.

"though nothing at all could be seen" na rūpāṇi cakāśire: Literally, "forms were not visible." Cg understands that these are other things, i.e., articles other than those mentioned in the previous verse (rūpāṇi padārthāntarāṇi).

20. "they drenched the earth with blood, making it slick with mud" rudhirārdrāṃ tadā cakrur mahīṃ pañkānulepanām: Literally, "they then made the blood-drenched earth such that it had mud for its ointment."

21. "spattered" siktam: Literally, "sprinkled."

"settled" vyapagatam: Literally, "vanished or went away."

"dead bodies" śarīraśava-: Literally, "bodies and corpses." The commentators generally interpret, "bodies in the form of corpses (śavarūpaiḥ śarīraiḥ—Ct)."

22. "trees, javelins" drumaśakti-: As Cg notes, the trees and boulders would be used by the monkeys, whereas the javelins and other weapons would be used by the rākṣasas. (drumaśailā vānarīyāḥ. śaktyādayo rākṣasīyāḥ.)

23. "huge as mountains" parvatopamāḥ: Literally, "comparable to mountains." Ñ,V1,2,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the accusative, parvatopamān, so that the description is applied to the rākṣasas instead of the monkeys.

24. Following verse 24, D5–7,9–11,S (Ñ1,B2,3,D4, after verse 25) insert a passage of two lines [885*]: "Enraged, Akampana, lord of the army of the rākṣasas, encouraged all those rākṣasas of fearsome valor."

25. "bravely" vīryataḥ: This can also be understood in the sense of "forcibly, vigorously" as Dutt (1893, p. 1263), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 159), and Pagani (1999, p. 997) have done.

"seized those weapons from them" śastrāṇy ācchidya: Literally, "having seized weapons." We follow the commentators' interpretation in taking the gerund ācchidya in the sense of "having seized or snatched." The verb ā $\sqrt{}$chid can also mean "to break up or cut," and it has been interpreted—less persuasively in our opinion—in this sense by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 158), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 136) and Pagani (1999, pp. 996–97).

26. "in a towering rage" paramakruddhāḥ: B3,D3–5,T1,M1–3, the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm, and Gorresio's edition read dvividaḥ, "Dvivida," for parama-, "great." Ś2,Ñ2,V3,B1,2,D2,6–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the nominative singular, paramakruddhaḥ, making the adjective modify only the monkey Mainda.

"charged with unparalleled speed" cakrur vegam anuttamam: Literally, "they made unsurpassed speed."

27. "immensely swift" mahāvegāḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr, Ct, and Ck read instead mahāvīrāḥ, "heroic or mighty."

"leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys" hariyūthapāḥ: Ś,B2,D2,7–12,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead haripuṃgavāḥ, "bulls among the tawny monkeys."

Following verse 27, D5,6,9–11,T,G1,2,M (D7,G3, after 889*) insert a passage of one line [890*]: "All the monkeys, troop by troop,[1] powerfully crushed the rākṣasas."

[1]"the monkeys, troop by troop" vānarā gaṇaśaḥ: D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Cr, Ck, and Ct read instead nānāpraharaṇaiḥ, "with various weapons."

Ck believes that [some scribes] pointlessly or wrongly make a break, or a sarga division, here (i.e., between sarga 43 and 44 of the critical edition [=GPP 6.55–56]) (atra ca mudhā sargam avacchindanti). Cm and Ct paraphrase Ck's comments, attributing to him the idea that the sarga division here is the result of carelessness (atra sargāvacchedaḥ pramādād iti katakaḥ).

3. "at once" tvaritam: We read the term adverbially, although it could also be taken adjectivally to modify "chariot," in the sense of "the swift chariot." V,B3,D9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the nominative singular masculine, tvaritaḥ, "swift," which would modify an implied tvam, "you," i.e., the charioteer.

"where so many monkeys" [a]tra bahavaḥ: Literally, "here many." A few devanāgarī manuscripts (D7,9–11) and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead ca balinaḥ, "and mighty [monkeys]."

4. "with fearsome bodies" bhīmakāyāḥ: Ñ2,V,D7,10,11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bhīmakopāḥ, "in a frightening rage."

5. "these boastful warriors" samaraślāghinaḥ: Literally, "those who are boastful in battle." The term could also be taken to mean "praiseworthy in battle," although it seems unlikely that Akampana would be in any mood to accord them this tribute. The commentators are silent on this term, and among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 135), who renders, "foemen worthy of my steel," takes it as a compliment.

6. "whose horses were whipped to a gallop" prajavitāśvena: Literally, "with horses that had been urged on." D7,9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead pracalitāśvena, "whose horses were running or galloping."

"in his fury, assailed" abhyahanat krodhāt: Literally, "he struck or slew out of anger." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead abhyapatad dūrāt, "he attacked from afar."

7. "to stand before him" sthātum: Literally, "to stand."

8. "had come under the power of Akampana" akampanavaśaṃ gatān: V3,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead akampanaśarānugān, "pursued by the arrows of Akampana."

"rushed over" upatasthe: Literally, "he approached."

9. "the . . . leaders of the troops of leaping monkeys" plavagayūthapāḥ: D3,10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions Ct and Cr read instead te plavagarṣabhāḥ, "those bulls among the leaping monkeys."

"together" sahitāḥ: M1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Gita Press (6.56.9) read instead saṃhṛṣṭāḥ, "excited or delighted."

10. "the leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys" hariyūthapāḥ: D7,9–11,G1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead plavagarṣabhāḥ, "the bulls among the leaping monkeys."

"they recovered their strength, placing their trust in that powerful warrior" babhūvur balavanto hi balavantam upāśritāḥ: Literally, "resorting to that mighty one, they became mighty."

12. "sharp" śitān: D9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead kapiḥ, "the monkey."

"the mighty monkey" mahābalaḥ: Literally, "the one of great strength or the mighty one."

13. "Laughing" prahasya: D5,6,G2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead prasahya, "violently, forcefully." Among the translators consulted, this reading is rendered only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 136), who translates, "with all the force he could summon."

17. "With it": Since the simile provides a weapon, the vajra, as the upamāna, but none as an upameya, we agree with Cg that one needs to understand that Hanumān is using the mountain mentioned in the previous verse as a weapon (tatra sa śailenety adhyāhāryam).

"just as" yathā . . . iva: Literally, "just as . . . like." D7,10,11,G2,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read purā, "formerly, long ago," for yathā, "just as." This may be an attempt to eliminate the redundancy.

"Indra, smasher of citadels, with his vajra . . . Namuci" namucim . . . vajreṇeva puraṃdaraḥ: Literally, "the smasher of citadels with his vajra . . . Namuci." See note to 4.22.11. The story of Indra and Namuci is popular and known from the earliest literature, e.g., ṚV 1.53.7 and 8.14.13 and TaiBr 1.6–7. See, too, Keith 1925, pp. 130–31. The story is also related at MBh 9.42.28–31. See also Pagani 1999, p. 1663, n. 2 and Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 374, n. 130. The name Namuci also appears in a list of demons at 7.99*, line 1 (= GPP 7.6.34).

18. "held aloft" samudyatam: Ct and Cr understand, probably on the basis of the following verse, that Hanumān has actually hurled the mountain (hanumatā prakṣiptam), although the verse does not say so explicitly. Ck wants to have it both ways, glossing, "as if loosed (muktavat)."

"with huge half-moon-headed arrows" mahābāṇair ardhacandraiḥ: See 6.35.23; 6.55.117; 6.57.57; and notes.

19. "in midair" ākāśe: Literally, "in the air." See note to verse 18 above.

"in pieces" vikīrṇam: Literally, "scattered."

20. "raced over" samāsādya: Literally, "having approached."

21. "with its vast trunk" mahāskandham: The term skandha can refer equally to the trunk of a tree or its large boughs or branches, and the translators who share this reading are more or less equally divided between the two choices. The exception is Dutt (1893, p. 1265), who idiosyncratically takes the term skandha in its sense of "shoulder." Since the poet distinguishes skandha, "trunk," from viṭapa, "branch," at 6.42.29 above, we believe that he probably intends skandha to refer to the trunk here as well.

"Hanumān, blazing with splendor" mahādyutiḥ: Literally, "that one of great splendor."

"in battle" saṃyuge: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions Ct and Cr read instead bhūtale, "on or above the ground." This variant is rendered in the translations of Dutt (1893, p. 1265), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 162), and Pagani (1999, p. 998).

"laughing" prahasya: V2,3,D9–11,T1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the redundant pragṛhya, "having seized."

22. "with tremendous speed" uruvegena: Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 162), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 137) and Pagani (1999, p. 998), renders, "à grandes enjambées."

D1,3,5,12,T,G1,2,M, as well as KK (6.56.22), VSP (6.56.22), Lahore (6.32.22), and the texts of Cg read instead ūruvegena, "with the force or impact of his thighs." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 136), who most probably reads with Cg, as is his practice, attempts to evade the issue by rendering, simply, "by the force of his impact." Only Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 294) among the translators consulted understands the reference to be to Hanumān's thighs, even though his text reads uruvegena (6.30.22). He renders, "con tutta la foga de'suoi femori."

"breaking down . . . tore up" prabhañjan . . . dārayat : We agree with Cg, who understands dārayat as an augmentless imperfect (adārayat). D4,6,7,9–11,T2,3,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the finite verb babhañja, "he broke," for the present participle prabhañjan, "breaking down."

"with the pounding of his feet" caraṇaiḥ: Literally, "with his feet." The odd use of the plural here has prompted Ct, Cg, and Cm—with whom we concur—to gloss, "with his footsteps (caraṇanyāsaiḥ)."

23. "Wise" dhīmān: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the accusative plural bhīmān, "fearsome, formidable," which then would most probably modify the rākṣasa foot soldiers (padātikān) of pāda d. Manuscript evidence shows that there are six widely differing variants of the reading in fourteen manuscripts, both northern and southern. The choice of dhīmān should be considered doubtful and should be marked as such.

"foot soldiers" padātikān: Normally, the term means "a footman or peon." Cg and Cr, who read the variant padātigān, literally, "going on foot," gloss, "those who go in the state of being pedestrians are padātigas (padātitvena [so Cr; padātitayā Cg] gacchanti)." Cr additionally proposes breaking up the term into the elements padā and atigān. In this reading, padā, "with a single foot," becomes the means through which Hanumān destroys the swift-moving (atiga) elephants, etc. (kiṃcātigāñ chīghṛagamanakartṝn gajādīn padaikacaraṇena jaghāna).

24. "enraged and wreaking slaughter" kruddham . . . prāṇahāriṇam: Literally, "angry . . . taking lives." These two adjectives can be taken to refer to Hanumān, as we have done, to Yama (Antaka, "the Ender"), or to both of them. Translators vary in their ascription of the adjectives accordingly.

"on the battlefield" samare: Ñ2,V2,3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead sadrumam, "[armed] with a tree."

"like Yama himself, the ender of all things" tam antakam iva: Literally, "like Antaka (lit., the ender)."

"they fled in all directions" vipradudruvuḥ: Literally, "they ran away or they scattered."

25. "flew into a rage" cukrodha: Literally, "he became angry." B4,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead cukṣobha, "trembled, was agitated."

26. "with fourteen" caturdaśabhiḥ: This number has a particular resonance for Vālmīki. Compare the fourteen years of Rāma's exile (2.10.28; 2.16.24; etc.) and the fourteen (3.18.17–25) and then fourteen thousand rākṣasas slain by Rāma (3.21.8ff.).

27. "Riddled in this fashion with many volleys of arrows" sa tathā pratividdhas tu bahvībhiḥ śaravṛṣṭibhiḥ: The various subrecensions show considerable variation throughout this half verse. The printed texts of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead sa tathā viprakīrṇas tu nārācaiḥ śitaśaktibhiḥ, "covered in this fashion with iron arrows and sharp javelins . . ."

"densely forested" prarūḍhaḥ: Literally, "overgrown." We follow Cv, Cg, Cm, Ck, Cr, and Ct in understanding the term to mean "having trees that are grown (prarūḍhavṛkṣaḥ—so Cg, Cm)."

Following verse 27, D5,7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [903*–902*, line 2]: "Then the huge, heroic, and very wise[1] Hanumān resembled[2] a flowering aśoka tree."

[1]"very wise" mahāmanāḥ: Literally, "the very wise one." D9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahābalaḥ, "of great might."

[2]"Then . . . Hanumān resembled" prababhau hanūmāṃs tataḥ: D5–7,9–11,S read instead vidhūma iva pāvakaḥ, "like a smokeless fire." The critical editors' choice of mahāmanāḥ is difficult to justify. Only Ñ1,B2,3,D2,4 read with the critical edition, whereas the entire south, including the devanāgarī manuscripts aligned with the south, read the variant.

30. "lying on the ground" bhūmau: Literally, "on the ground."

31. "Terrified" trastāḥ: D9–11,T2,3,M5, and texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead trāsāt, "out of fear."

32. "running" sravat-: B1,D8–11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bhayāt, "out of fear."

"gasping for breath" śvasanto [vi-]: Literally, "breathing." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the instrumental participle prasravadbhiḥ, "flowing [with sweat]." The adjective then modifies "limbs (aṅgaiḥ)."

33. "Trampling" pramamanthuḥ: Literally, "they bruised, crushed, or injured." Ct and Ck, who read instead pramathnantaḥ, "bruising, injuring," take this as a reference to their crushing one another at the gates to the city (dvāradeśe saṃmardaṃ kurvāṇāḥ).

35. "endowed with strength" sattvasampannaḥ: This can also be translated here—less plausibly in our opinion—as "endowed with goodness or virtue."

"in great delight" prahṛṣṭaḥ: D9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the somewhat awkward pravṛddhaḥ, "large, great, mature." D7 and the texts of Cr and Cm(?) read the accusative plural pravṛddhān, which would make the adjective apply to the monkeys in general. This appears to be the basis for Dutt's rendition, "the seniors" (1893, p. 1266).

"graciously" anukūlataḥ: According to Ck and Ct, the adverb refers to Hanumān's friendly glances, words, and embraces (anukūladarśanavacanāliṅganaiḥ).

"honored" saṃpratyapūjayat: Cg believes that Hanumān is telling the monkeys that he achieved victory only through their assistance (bhavatsāhāyyenaiva mayā jitam iti).

36. "With a victorious air" jitakāśinaḥ: See 6.32.17; 6.42.9–10; 6.43.1, App. I, No. 26, line 32; 6.49.36; 6.78.38; and notes.

"dragged about" cakarṣuḥ: Ck and Ct, who read cakṛṣuḥ, note that the monkeys do this in order to kill the surviving rākṣasas (prāṇanāśārtham iti śeṣaḥ). Cr reads instead cukruṣuḥ, "they shouted at, reviled," a variant unnoticed by the critical apparatus.

37. "slaughtering . . . slaying" nihatya: Literally, "having killed."

"great . . . and mighty asura" mahāsuram . . . balinam: In order to maintain the plural parallelism with the many rākṣasas, several of the commentators suggest that the term asura here is collective for Madhu, Kaiṭabha, and other notorious demons slain by Viṣṇu (madhukaiṭabhādirūpam—so Ct). See 7.4.14; 7.22.22; 7.61.27; and 7.94.6. Raghu-nathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 137) appears to mistake the adjective balinam, "mighty," for the accusative of the proper name of the famous demon Bali [Mahābali], who, it should be noted, was not killed by Viṣṇu but merely subdued. See note to 6.105.12.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

38. Cg and Cm note that the slaying of Akampana takes place on the fourth lunar day [of the lunar fortnight of Phālguna/Caitra] (caturthyām akampanavadhaḥ). Ct specifies that this is the fourth lunar day of the bright half of the month of Bhādra (bhādraśukla-caturthyām akampanavadhaḥ). Cv understands that the killing of Akampana ends the fourth day [of the battle] (akampanavadhena ca caturtham ahas samāptam). See note to 6.4.4.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

2. "its military encampments" gulmān: See 5.3.27; 6.3.27; 6.27.20; 6.28.31; 6.31.31; 6.62.5; 6.71.1; 6.72.5; 6.84.6; and notes.

Following 2ab, D5–7,9–11,T1,3,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [912*]: "Then, in the morning, Rāvaṇa, overlord of the rākṣasas . . ."

Following 2ab, many northern manuscripts insert a passage of three lines [911*]. Following 911* most northern manuscripts (except Ś,B1,D1,2,8) insert a passage of one hundred fifty-eight lines (App. I, No. 28) describing an unsuccessful sortie by Vajradaṃṣṭra, similar to, but not identical with, the southern version in App. I, No. 26. See above under note to 6.43.1.

One wonders what the text-critical status of this incident is. It occurs in all the manuscripts, both northern and southern, except for the six just listed (but, of course, including both Ś manuscripts). That the two accounts differ so much would indicate that they are independent retellings of the same incident. Textual reconstruction seems impossible. It may be necessary simply to understand that the incident may have been, if not original, very early.

3. "Laṅkā" laṅkām: D5,7,9–11,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead rājā, "the king."

4. "angrily" amarṣitaḥ: D9–11,T2, the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Cv, and the text of Gita Press read instead ātmahitam, "beneficial to himself." Translators who follow the texts and printed editions of Ct take the term as an adjective modifying Prahasta, with the sense of "loyal, devoted, well-wishing." All printed editions of Cg consulted show the variant amarṣataḥ, which must be read adverbially in the sense of "out of anger, angrily." This variant is unattested in the critical apparatus.

"at that critical moment" kāle: Literally, "at that time or at the proper time." We agree with Cr, who glosses, "even at that time of crisis (āpatkāle 'pi)." Cg explains, "at a moment suitable for giving orders (nideśārhasamaye)." See note to verse 15 below.

5. "You are skilled in warfare." yuddhaviśārada: Literally, "O you who are skilled in warfare." Ñ2,V2,B2,4,D6,9,10,T2,3,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the vocative plural yuddhaviśāradāḥ, "O you [all] who are skilled in warfare," evidently referring to the rākṣasa counselors in general.

"means other than war" anyaṃ yuddhāt: Literally, "other than war." Printed editions of Ct, as well as Gita Press (6.57.5), read instead the compound anyayuddhāt, "through the fighting of another," a reading not reported in the critical apparatus. This reading is, however, rendered in some of the translations that follow the text of Ct and Gita Press. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 164), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 139), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1564) all understand this variant to mean that no warrior other than those listed in verse 6 will be able to lift the siege.

6. "Nikumbha" nikumbhaḥ: The monkey Nīla killed a rākṣasa warrior named Nikumbha at 6.33.34. But, in all likelihood, this is a reference to a second Nikumbha, one Nikumbha Kaumbhakarṇi, first introduced at 6.8.12. At 6.63.37 this same Nikumbha is apparently identified as the elder brother of Kumbha, who, at 6.63.4, is identified as the son of Kumbhakarṇa. This Nikumbha is slain by Hanumān at sarga 64.

7. "placing them under your command" parigṛhya: Literally, "having mastered, having taken possession of." We follow the interpretation of Ct, who glosses, "putting them under your control (svādhīnaṃ kṛtvā)."

8. "In the face of your sortie . . . surely" niryāṇād eva te nūnam: Literally, "because of your sortie alone . . . surely." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read tūrṇaṃ ca, "and quickly," for te nūnam, "your . . . surely."

"irresolute" capalāḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead calitāḥ, "agitated, shaken."

10. "fall into your hands" te . . . vaśam eṣyati: Literally, "he will go to your control."

11. "We risk a great calamity, and victory is far from certain in this matter." āpatsaṃśayitā śreyo nātra niḥsaṃśayīkṛtā: Literally, "calamity is doubtful [and] benefit is not free from doubt here." The sentence is obscure and elliptical, and it contains at least one grammatical difficulty. The word śreyaḥ, "benefit," which is neuter, appears to be modified by the feminine adjective niḥsaṃśayīkṛtā, "free from doubt." Our interpretation is supported by the commentators as well as by the northern recension, where the adjective, or its substitute, is found in the neuter. The sentence is subject to a variety of interpretations, and the commentators basically fall into two interpretive camps. Most of them agree that the term āpat, "calamity," refers to "death in battle (yuddha āpan mṛtiḥ—so Ct)," although Cs offers, as an alternative, "the agony of defeat (paribhavabhavaṃ duḥkhaṃ vā)." The commentators similarly agree, for the most part, that the issue in the verse is whether, despite Rāvaṇa's utterance in verse 5 above, the rākṣasas should fight. Ct, Ck, Cg, and Cm all quote a verse from the nītiśāstra, which has the following sense: "When it is certain that refraining from combat will result in one's death and there is at least a chance of remaining alive if one offers combat, then, according to the learned, that is the appropriate time to fight (yatrāyuddhe dhruvo mṛtyur yuddhe jīvitasaṃśayaḥ / tam eva kālaṃ yuddhasya pravadanti manīṣiṇaḥ //)."

It is in the interpretation of the term śreyaḥ that the commentators principally differ. For Ct, Ck, Cr, Cs, and Ctr, the word here means "victory (jayaḥ)," which they claim Rāvaṇa considers to be assured. Cr continues this line of argument by saying that, even if death cannot be ruled out, still victory, or the highest good, is assured because the rākṣasas will attain worldly rewards if they are victorious and otherworldly benefits should they die (tathāpi śreyaḥ kalyāṇaṃ na saṃśayitaṃ vijaya aihikaphalaprāptir maraṇa āmuṣmikaphalaprāptir iti kalyāṇaṃ niścitam eva).

Cs regards this explanation as the conventional one but feels that Rāvaṇa would avoid it because it mentions the possibility of death and this is an occasion for encouragement. Cs argues: "The ordinary explanation is 'if you live, you gain the benefits of this world, and if you die, of the next.' But because it is an occasion for encouragement, [Rāvaṇa avoids the allusion to death] (śreyo 'mṛta aihikaṃ mṛte pāratrikam iti prakṛtānupayuktaṃ vyākhyānaṃ protsāhanasamayatvāt)."

Cg, Ctr, and Cm understand the term śreyaḥ in its somewhat adverbial sense of "better, preferable." Cg and Cm read the passage to mean: "Death in battle itself confers welfare because of the uncertainty of victory and defeat, and the possibility of victory falling to either side (jayāpajayayor avyavasthitatvena [vyavasthitatvena—so GPP, VSP] pākṣikajayasyāpi saṃbhavād iti bhāvaḥ)." Cg then argues that, in the second half of the line, Rāvaṇa rejects an alternative position by stating that, in his [that is, Rāvaṇa's] opinion, "if death is certain, it is better to die fighting than to be killed unresisting by one's enemies (pakṣāntaraṃ pratikṣipati na tv iti niḥsaṃśayīkṛtā niścitā mṛtis tu yuddhaṃ vinā śatrubhir maraṇaṃ tu na śreya etan mama matam)." Ctr agrees with the general tenor of these statements. In other words, instead of merely pondering the alternatives, Rāvaṇa is urging battle.

Gorresio's text (6.31.12cd) substitutes, for pāda b, na tu niḥsaṃśayaṃ kṛtam. This gives the sentence the following meaning: "There is risk of death, but actions that lack certainty are better." Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 297) translates, "Egli èpur meglio una calamità incerta che l'operar fuor d'incertezza," and provides a note to this passage (p. 374, n. 131) in which he quotes his commentator, Cl, to the effect that "An action that lacks uncertainty is not the best one. Therefore, one should engage in battle and not turn back from it. (niḥsaṃśayaṃ niḥsaṃdigdhaṃ kṛtaṃ karma na śreyo 'to yuddhaṃ kāryaṃ na tu tannivartanam)." Gorresio explains this somewhat obscure comment as follows: "Per chi é prode, val meglio il travagliarsi in cose il cui successo felice o calamitoso sia incerto, perché quell' incertezza avvalora e stimola il coraggio, che adoperarsi in cose il cui evento sia certo; perché quella certezza allenta ed infiacchisce il vigor dell' animo (For a hero, it is better to engage in actions in which the outcome, whether happy or calamitous, is uncertain, because this very uncertainty valorizes and stimulates courage, than to engage oneself in matters of which the outcome is certain, because the certainty slackens and weakens the vigor of one's spirit)."

"So tell me what you think is best for us, whether I find it agreeable or not." pratilomānulomaṃ vā yad vā no manyase hitam: Literally, "whatever you think beneficial for us, whether it is disagreeable or agreeable." We agree with the majority of the commentators who flesh out this elliptical phrase by adding an imperative form of a verb meaning "to say or speak."

12. "Uśanas" uśanā: Uśanas Kāvya is everywhere regarded as the purohita of the asuras. See 6.4.42; and 6.40.28 and notes.

13. "with your . . . counselors" mantribhiḥ: The commentators agree that the reference is to the debates involving Vibhīṣaṇa, Mālyavān, and other rākṣasa advisers at 6.6–10 (vibhīṣaṇādibhiḥ saha no 'smābhir idaṃ vakṣyamāṇaṃ mantritapūrvam—so Cg).

"We debated the matter" vivādaś cāpi no vṛttaḥ: Literally, "And our debate transpired." According to Ct, Cr, and Ck, the term vivāda, "debate," indicates that, on that earlier occasion, the rākṣasas could not reach a unanimous decision as to what was to be done. Cg further comments that it was this debate that caused Vibhīṣaṇa to defect. (parasparaṃ samavekṣya bahumatitayālocya. no 'smākaṃ vivādaś cāpi vṛttaḥ. yena vibhīṣaṇo niragacchad iti bhāvaḥ.)

14. "I concluded . . . I foresaw" vyavasitaṃ mayā . . . dṛṣṭam: If Prahasta indeed thought that Rāvaṇa should return Sītā to Rāma, he seems to have been curiously reticent in expressing this view. At any rate, his sage counsel is not recorded. His only part in the council of the rākṣasas in sargas 8 and 9 was to boast of the slaughter he would wreak among the monkey troops. See 6.8.1–5 and 6.9.1–6.

"war" yuddham: Cg believes the word is used figuratively here to mean total extermination [of the rākṣasas] (sarvamaraṇaṃ yuddhaśabdenopacāryate).

15. "gifts, tokens of respect, and all manner of kind words" dānaiś ca mānaiś ca . . . sāntvaiś ca: Cg explains that "gifts" refers to gifts of jewelry, etc., and that "tokens of respect" refers to such flattering remarks as "my life is in your hands" (dānair bhūṣaṇādipradānair mānais tvadadhīnaṃ jīvitam ityādipriyabhāṣaṇaiḥ). Ctr notes that servants who are honored with gifts and expressions of esteem are willing to sacrifice their lives for their masters' sake (anena dānamānādibhiḥ pūjitā bhṛtyāḥ prāṇān api svāmikāryārthe parityajantīti sūcitam).

"at such a critical moment" kāle: Literally, "at that time or at the proper time." We agree with Cg in understanding "the time of crisis or calamity (āpatkāle)." See note to verse 4 above.

"what pleases you" priyaṃ tava: D9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead hitaṃ tava, "what is beneficial to you."

16. "I do not care for" na . . . me . . . rakṣyam: Literally, "not to be protected by me."

"as I strive to sacrifice" juhūṣantam: Literally, "desiring to offer as oblation." Cg notes that the metaphor of one's life as a sacrificial offering carries with it the metaphor of warfare as a fire. He further points out that the verse indicates that the offering of one's life as an oblation brings with it great rewards and that mere involvement in such a battle involves one's own destruction. (anena jīvitasya haviṣṭvaṃ yuddhasyāgnirūpatvaṃ ca gamyate. tena cātmahaviḥ pradānasya mahāphalatvaṃ yuddhasaṃgatimātreṇa svavināśaś ca dyotyate.) In addition, he says: "Those who follow conventional wisdom understand 'juhūṣantam' to mean 'one who desires to abandon.' That is the meaning. (gatānugatikās tu juhūṣantaṃ tyaktum icchantam ity arthaḥ.)"

18. "the forest-dwelling monkeys . . . their" kānanaukasām: Literally, "of the forest dwellers." Ś1,V3,B2,4,D1,6–13,G,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the nominative plural, kānanaukasaḥ, which makes the adjective modify the birds instead of the monkeys.

"with the crushing force of those thunderbolts that are my arrows" madbāṇāśanivegena: Literally, "with the force or speed of my arrow-thunderbolts." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead madbāṇānāṃ tu vegena, "with the force of my arrows." Printed editions of Cg and Cm (VSP 6.57.18; KK 6.57.19) read madbāṇaśatavegena, "with the force of hundreds of my arrows," a reading not recorded in the critical apparatus.

"the carrion birds may eat of their flesh to their heart's content" tṛpyantu māṃsena pakṣiṇaḥ: Literally, "let the birds be satisfied with flesh." D6,7,9–11,T2,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read the adjective māṃsādāḥ, "flesh eating," in place of māṃsena, "with flesh," giving the phrase the sense "flesh-eating birds." See note to 6.26.8.

19. "Addressed in this fashion by Prahasta" ity uktās te prahastena: D7,9–11,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead tasya tad vacanaṃ śrutvā, "having heard that speech of his."

"making haste" kṛtatvarāḥ: D9–11,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahābalāḥ, "very powerful."

"at the rākṣasa's palace" rākṣasamandire: The precise locus of the muster is uncertain. The term mandira here can refer to a palace, any large building, an abode, or a camp. The commentators are silent, and the translators render the term variously. It would appear that these events take place after Rāvaṇa has returned from his tour of the city's fortifications at verses 2–4 above, and it is likely that they occur in or just outside his palace.

20. "Within the hour" muhūrtena: The term can refer to any short period of time, e.g., a moment or an instant. Vālmīki, indeed, often uses it in this sense (2.11.4; 2.16.14; 2.19.5; etc.), and the majority of the translators consulted have read the term in this way (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 140; Pagani 1999, p. 1000; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 165; Dutt 1893, p. 1268; and Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 297). Given the context, however, we agree with Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 139) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1565), who evidently take the term in its technical sense of a period of forty-eight minutes, the traditional Indian "hour." Cf., for example, 2.48.9,11; 2.83.21; 4.41.37; and 4.48.20.

"who, armed with every sort of sharp weapon, resembled elephants" tigmanānāvidhāyudhaiḥ . . . gajair iva: The figure is evidently based on the similarity between the large and dark rākṣasas, armed with sharp weapons, and elephants with their sharp tusks. D9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read bhīmaiḥ, "fearsome," for tigma-, "sharp." This adjective then modifies the rākṣasas.

21. "clarified butter" ājya-: According to Apte (s.v.), ājya is the liquid form of clarified butter or ghee, whereas ghṛta is the solidified form.

22. "took garlands . . . and adorned themselves with them" srajaḥ . . . jagṛhuḥ . . . dhārayan: Literally, "took garlands and wore." Following the commentators, we read dhārayan as an augmentless imperfect. We agree with Ct, Ck, Cg, and Cr in understanding that the garlands are to be taken as the object of both verbs. The sequence is somewhat more confusing in the texts and printed editions of Ct, where the verbs belong to separate verses (NSP, Gita Press, and GPP 6.57.22cd and 23ab). Most of the translators consulted follow the commentators as we do. Dutt (1893, p. 1268) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1565), however, take dhārayan as part of an entirely separate sentence and supply its object as "armor" and "military accoutrements," respectively.

"had been consecrated with sacred spells" abhimantritāḥ: Cg observes that the garlands would have been consecrated with a spell of victory (vijayamantreṇābhimantritāḥ).

23. "leapt up" āplutya: Literally, "having leapt up." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead utsṛjya, "having abandoned or having set in motion." Ct and Cr, who share this reading, supply, as an object of the gerund, vāhanāni, "vehicles." Of the translators who follow Ct's reading, Dutt (1893, p. 1268) renders, "leaving [their vehicles]" and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 165), "et lançant vivement leur attelages." In this interpretation Roussel is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 140) and Pagani (1999, p. 1000).

24. "bid them beat the . . . bherī drum" bherīm āhatya: Literally, "having beaten the bherī." Like many of the translators consulted, we find it unlikely that an aristocratic general like Prahasta would actually beat a drum. Thus, we take the gerund in the sense of the causative. See 6.17.31–33 and note.

"celestial" divyam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead yuktaḥ, an adjective that would refer to Prahasta himself. This term has a wide range of meanings. Some of the translators who follow the text of Ct understand it to mean "equipped [with weapons]." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1566) takes it in its sense of "active."

"well equipped for war" sajjakalpitam: Literally, "made ready, equipped." The commentators gloss, "equipped with every weapon (sarvāyudhayuktam—so Cr)."

25. This verse and the next consist entirely of adjectives and adjectival phrases in the accusative modifying ratham, "chariot," either in verse 24c above or in 27a below.

"driven by a skilled charioteer" samyaksūtasusaṃyutam: Literally, "well provided with a proper charioteer." D10,11,T3 read instead samyaksūtaṃ susaṃyutam, "having a proper charioteer [and] well furnished." Although D11 is said to be a text of Ct, printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the variant saṃyataṃ [the reading of G1 in the critical apparatus], "well guided, controlled." Despite this, several of the translations that follow Ct appear to translate saṃyutam. Printed editions of Cg and Cm read samyaksūtasusaṃyatam, "controlled by a proper charioteer."

"blazed with the brilliance of the moon and sun" sākṣāccandrārkabhāsvaram: Literally, "having the radiance of the sun and moon themselves." Cg breaks down the figure by arguing that the chariot was like the moon in its quality of delighting and like the sun in brilliance. (āhlādakatvena candrasāmyam. tejasārkasāmyam.)

26. "beautiful in every part" svapaskaram: Literally, "having good parts." According to Pā 6.1.149, apaskaram refers to a part of the chariot (rathāṅgam). PW (s.v.), followed by Monier-Williams, defines the term as a wheel or any part of a chariot. Apte (s.v.), on the other hand, claims that the term can refer to any part of the chariot except the wheel.

"fretwork of gold" suvarṇajāla-: Cg reads jāla here as a synonym for gavākṣa, "air-hole or window," although he neglects to do so in his comment on 5.45.3, where the same term is used in a similar context. Compare, however, the note to 5.7.14–15, where jāla, there translated as "skylight," does appear to be a kind of opening or window. Cf. 6.50.2 and 6.87.26.

"seemed almost to be laughing with its splendor" prahasantam iva śriyā: The figure is based on the common Sanskrit literary convention that laughter is white or bright. The idea is that the chariot is shining brightly. See Ingalls 1965, p. 166, verse 389; p. 226, verse 684; etc.

27. "Prahasta . . . drove . . . out" niryayau: Literally, "he went out."

28. Following 28ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [923*]: "and the blare of musical instruments, which seemed to fill the very earth[1] . . ."

[1]"earth" medinīm: D5,T1,G2,M3, and the printed editions of Cg read instead sāgaram, "the ocean." This reading is reflected in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 139).

29. Following verse 29, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [924*]: "And closely surrounding him, Prahasta's ministers, Narāntaka, Kumbhahanu, Mahānāda, and Samunnata, marched forth."

30. "in military array" vyūḍhena: Perhaps disturbed by the comparison of an orderly group of soldiers to a herd of elephants, Cg insists on glossing the term as "clad in armor (saṃnaddhakaṅkaṭena)."

31. "swiftly in anger . . . he resembled Kāla, the ender of all things" tūrṇaṃ kruddhaḥ . . . kālāntakopamaḥ: Literally, "swiftly, in anger . . . comparable to Kāla, the ender." Ñ,V1,2,B,D9–11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read kālāntakayamopamaḥ, "like Yama, who brings time [Kāla] itself to an end." The southern commentators compensate for the additional two syllables by dropping either the adverb tūrṇam, "swiftly," (Ct, Ck, Cr) or the adjective kruddhaḥ, "angry," (Cg, Cm, Cv). These differences are reflected in the various translations. Cr and Cg gloss kāla, "Time," as pralaya, "the time of universal destruction." Cg thus explains the compound as "that Yama, who is the destroyer at the time of universal destruction (kāle pralayakāle antako vināśako yo yamaḥ)." Compare 6.21.26 and note.

32. "As he and the roaring rākṣasas set forth, their clamor" tasya niryāṇaghoṣeṇa rākṣasānāṃ ca nardatām: Literally, "by the exit sound of him and of the roaring rākṣasas." According to Cr, the uproar Prahasta causes consists of the sound of his chariot, etc. (prayāṇakālikarathādisvanena), whereas Cg attributes it to his lionlike roar (nirgamakālikasiṃhanādena).

"unnatural cries" vikṛtaiḥ svaraiḥ: The evil omens described in the following verses (32–38; 41–44) are fairly stereotypical and quite similar to those described below at 6.53.41–44 at the time of the sortie of Kumbhakarṇa. The howling or shrieking of beasts of prey, especially jackals, is a common ill omen. See 6.26.24; 6.31.7; 6.45.34; 6.53.42; 6.83.33; 6.94.22; and notes.

33. "the cloudless sky" vyabhram ākāśam: Cg points out that the circling of birds in a cloudless sky is untimely [and thus ominous], since birds normally circle in cloudy weather. (anena maṇḍalakaraṇasyākālikatvam uktam. sābhrakāle hi pakṣiṇo maṇḍalāny ācaranti.)

"clockwise" apasavyāni: Literally, "not left." Commentators are divided as to whether the birds are circling clockwise or counterclockwise. The normal meaning for the term is "rightward," in this case referring, as several commentators indicate, to pradakṣiṇa, or circling something while keeping it always on one's right. The difficulty here is that pradakṣiṇa is normally associated with auspiciousness, which in the present context is far from the author's intention. Commentators deal with the issue in one of two ways. In the first, proposed by Ck and followed by Ct, circling in the pradakṣiṇa, i.e., clockwise direction, is auspicious only in the case of auspicious birds, such as eagles (garuḍādīnām), but it is inauspicious in the case of such inauspicious birds as vultures (gṛdhrādīnām). (garuḍādīnām eva pradakṣiṇaṃ śubhanimittam. gṛdhrādīnāṃ pradakṣiṇaṃ durnimittam—so Ck.)

Cg, however, proposes that we understand apasavya to mean apradakṣiṇa, "counterclockwise," thus simplifying the issue of auspiciousness and inauspiciousness. He justifies his reading by quoting Amarakośa 3.1.84 (apasavyaṃ tu dakṣiṇe). As an alternative, Cg acknowledges the normal lexical meaning of apasavaya in the sense of pradakṣiṇa, noting, however, in the case of raptors, etc. (garuḍānām) [here presumably including the carrion birds], it is the counterclockwise circling that is auspicious. This alternative, in the end, is similar to the position of Ct and Ck. (apasavyāny apradakṣiṇāni . . . yadvātra khagā garuḍāḥ. apasavyaṃ pradakṣiṇam. apasavyaṃ tu dakṣiṇam ity amaraḥ. garuḍānāṃ hy apradakṣiṇaṃ śobhanam.)

(1969, vol. 3, p. 1567) similarly, but more precisely, renders, "counterclockwise." Pagani (1999, p. 1001), on the other hand, follows Ck's and Ct's interpretation, translating, "de droite á gauche." She provides an explanatory note (p. 1663) in which she identifies the circling of the birds as corresponding to the "pradakṣiṇā," which, as she notes, is an auspicious direction in the case of men but ill omened in the case of birds of prey. Dutt (1893, p. 1269) has a somewhat different understanding, translating, "at the right hand of the car." See 6.94.4 and note. See, too, note to 6.4.4 and 6.26.8.

34. "Dreadful" ghorāḥ: D12,M3, and the printed editions of Cg read instead the adverb ghoram, "dreadfully." This is rendered by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 140) as "lugubriously."

"jackals" śivāḥ: This feminine noun can be used either for jackals in general or the female of the species. The animal and its howl are associated with inauspicious omens. See 6.26.24; 6.31.7; 6.45.32; 6.53.42; 6.83.33; 6.94.21; and notes. Cf. 6.41.32 and note.

35. "A blazing meteor" ulkā: Literally, "meteor." Compare 6.83.36a, where pāda a is repeated.

"occluding one another" anyonyam abhisaṃrabdhāḥ: Literally, "closely joined to one another." The idea, as we understand it, is that the planets are in close conjunction so that their light is occluded. Cr and Cg both understand that the heavenly bodies are at war with one another (tatkāle grahayuddham āsīd ity arthaḥ—so Cg). Translators differ widely in their interpretations. Some, including Dutt (1893, p. 1269), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 166), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 141), take the adjective in its more common lexical sense of "angered." Pagani (1999, p. 1001) takes the term in a related sense of "excited." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 140) translates, "being in combustion," while Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1567), whose translation is closest to ours, renders, "knitted against [one another]."

"were no longer visible" na cakāśire: Literally, "they did not shine."

926*–36. "And over the rākṣasa's chariot, harshly thundering clouds" meghāś ca kharanirghoṣā rathasyopari rakṣasaḥ: This line, constituting star passage 926* in the critical apparatus, is found in D5–7, 9–11,S, as well as the texts and all printed editions of the southern commentators. We have inserted it into our translation because, without it, 36ab lacks a subject for its two plural finite verbs other than the improbable grahāḥ, "heavenly bodies," of 35d. For 36ab, northern manuscripts read vavarṣa rudhiraṃ devaḥ prahastasya rathopari, "The god rained down blood over Prahasta's chariot." Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 299) translates deva as "il terribile Indra" but notes (p. 375) that his commentator (Cl) points out that, based on the Amarakośa, the term could be understood equally well to mean "a cloud." We believe that the restoration of 926* here is justified by the principles for editing (specifically points 2 and 4) laid out by the critical editors (Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv).

For blood raining down as an omen, see 6.26.22; 6.31.5; 6.41.33; 6.94.15; and notes. Cf. note to 6.76.2, inserted passage 1674*, lines 5–7.

"a vulture, facing to the south . . . on the top of his flagstaff" ketumūrdhani gṛdhraḥ . . . dakṣiṇāmukhaḥ: The south is the direction associated with Yama, the god of death.

Following verse 36, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [927*], which continues the description of the vulture: "Pecking[1] at itself on both sides, it stole away all his [Prahasta's] luster.[2]"

[1]"Pecking" tudan: Literally, "prodding, poking." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead nadan, "shrieking, uttering sounds."

[2]"luster" prabhām: Ct and Ck describe this as the "radiance of victory (jayaśrī)," whereas Cg understands that Prahasta's face grows pale at the sight of the vulture on his flagstaff (dhvajāgrārūḍhagṛdhradarśanena prahastamukhaṃ vivarṇam āsīd ity arthaḥ).

37. "his charioteer was of the sūta caste and was a skilled driver of horses" sāratheḥ . . . sūtasya hayasādinaḥ: Literally, "of that charioteer who was of the charioteer caste (sūta) and a driver of horses." The commentators are clearly disturbed by the seeming redundancy in this passage and evolve several strategies in their effort to minimize or eliminate it. One strategy adopted by all the commentators consulted is to take the term sūta not in its direct meaning as charioteer but rather as a name of a person of a mixed caste (that is, the son of a kshatriya man by a brahman woman—ManuSm 10.11) whose hereditary occupation is that of a charioteer. We have followed this line of reasoning in our translation. Cs, who, as he so often does, tries to find obscure etymological interpretations for words, proposes, as an alternative, that we break the word up into the components su + ūtaḥ, in the sense of "well guarded or protected (suṣṭhu ūtaḥ)," which then becomes an adjective modifying the charioteer's whip (pratodaḥ).

The second strategy is to read hayasādinaḥ, "driver or subduer of horses, charioteer," as a descriptive adjective with an agentive sense. Thus we have "horse trainer (aśvaśikṣakasya—Ct, Ck)"; "controller of horses (hayānāṃ niyantuḥ—Cr)"; "dispatcher or driver of horses (hayaprasthāpakasya—Cv, Cg)"; "skilled in teaching the gaits of horses (aśvagatiśikṣāvicakṣaṇasya—Cm)"; and "who makes horses go according to his will (hayān aśvān sādayati gamayati yatheṣṭam—Cs)." Cs adds a characteristically esoteric alternative explanation in which the term means "one who is accompanied by 'eaters,' i.e., rākṣasas (ādibhiḥ), who are themselves accompanying the horses (hayair evānubandhanimittair ādibhī rākṣasaiḥ sahitaḥ sa tathā—Cs)."

Only Cs has the temerity to deconstruct the word sārathi itself, offering the following rather far-fetched etymology: "he who comes into possession of food (tham annam asyāstīti matvartha ikāraḥ)." This, in turn, relies on the genuinely esoteric vedic etymology of the Chāndogya Upaniṣad (1.3.6) according to which the syllable tha of the word udgītha [the high chant of the Sāmaveda] represents "food" (annaṃ tham iti hi śrutiḥ). Cs then breaks down the word sāra into sa + ara, "that which possesses spokes," which thus becomes a kenning for "wheel." The term sārathi can then be read to mean "one who earns his bread by the spoked wheel. (sāreṇārasahitena cakreṇa thiḥ sārathiḥ. tasyeti vā.)"

"as he plunged into battle" saṃgrāmam avagāhataḥ: The texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead anivartinaḥ, "not turning back [from battle]."

38. "extraordinary and radiant" bhāsvarā ca sudurlabhā: Literally, "shining and hard to attain." Printed editions of the text of Cg read vasudurlabhā for ca sudurlabhā, "hard to obtain." Cg notes that this is an alternate reading but that it is the one he prefers. He glosses it as "difficult to attain even for the eight Vasus [a class of vedic divinity] (aṣṭavasudurlabhā)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 140), the only translator to follow this reading, takes vasu in its sense of "wealth," rendering, "which could not be bought by all the wealth in the world." See 6.21.28.

39. "strength" -bala-: V,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead -guṇa-, "virtues, qualities."

"for battle" yudhi: Literally, "in battle."

"armed with various weapons" nānāpraharaṇā: As Cg points out, the weapons would, of course, be "rocks, trees, etc." (śilāvṛkṣādinānāpraharaṇā). Pagani (1999, p. 1001), perhaps unwilling to see the monkeys armed with different kinds of weapons, resorts to the verb, pra $\sqrt{hṛ}$, "to strike," translating, "habile à toutes sortes de coups au combat."

40. Following verse 40, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [929*]: "[The two armies] of the roaring rākṣasas and the bellowing monkeys . . ." This half line construes with 41ab.

41. "in a frenzy of excitement" pramudite: Literally, "[both] delighted, excited."

42. "evil-minded" durmatiḥ: Cs understands the term in its sense of "foolish, stupid, slow-witted," on the grounds that Prahasta foolishly entertains the illusion of victory even though he has seen and heard for himself the inauspicious omens that surround him. (apaśakunair iva gatamṛtaiḥ svīyair dṛṣṭaiḥ śrutair api vijayabhramo 'syāstīti. durmatir iti mantavyam.) This interpretation is similar to that of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 140) as well as Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 166) and, after him, Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 141).

"fast-moving" vivṛddhavegām: D9–11,G1,3,M2,3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the nominative masculine singular vivṛddhavegaḥ, in which case the adjective applies to Prahasta rather than the monkey host.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Before verse 1, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of nine lines [931*]: "Then seeing Prahasta,[1] whose valor was fearsome,[2] marching forth, Rāma, tamer of his foes, said to Vibhīṣaṇa with a smile:[1–2] 'Who is this enormous creature, who comes so swiftly surrounded by a huge army? What are his strength and valor like?[3–4] Tell me, great-armed hero, about this mighty night-roaming rākṣasa.'[5] Upon hearing Rāghava's words, Vibhīṣaṇa said, 'This is the rākṣasa Prahasta, the general of the rākṣasa lord's army in Laṅkā. He is surrounded by an army of three divisions.[3] He is powerful, skillful with weapons, and renowned for his valor.'[6–9]"

[1]Cg raises an interesting question. Since Prahasta has exited the city through its eastern gate while Rāma is stationed at the northern gate, how, then, is it possible for the latter to see the former, who would be many leagues from his position? Cg's response is that the credible report Rāma would have had of the appearance of some huge warrior would be equivalent to direct observation. (nanu prahastaḥ pūrvadvārān nirgataḥ. rāmas tūttaradvāri tiṣṭhati sma. katham asyānekayojanasthasākṣātkāraḥ. ucyata āptavacanena pratyakṣatulyena mahākāyaḥ kaścana gacchatīti viditvaiṣa ity āha.) The question, however, highlights the spuriousness of the insertion.

[2]"whose valor was fearsome" bhīmaparākramam: D9–11,G3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead raṇakṛtodyamam, "girded for battle."

[3]"by an army of three divisions" tribhāgabala-: We read this is a bahuvrīhi compound. Ck and Ct explain: "The meaning is 'He was surrounded by one-third of the rākṣasa lord's army that was stationed in Laṅkā' (rākṣasendrasaṃbandhilaṅkāsthabalasya tṛtīyabhāgena saṃvṛta ity arthaḥ—so Ct)." Most of the translators consulted agree with this and understand the reference to be to a third of the army." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 140), however, translates, "three quarters of the total strength of the forces."

1–2. "infuriated" atisaṃjātaroṣāṇām: Literally, "in whom exceeding rage had arisen." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -ghoṣāṇām, "uproar," for -roṣāṇām, "rage."

3–4. "the swords . . . broadswords" khaḍga- . . . -ṛṣṭi-: The text of the critical edition omits the subscript for the vocalic ṛ. This typographical error is not noted in the errata. The two types of swords are most likely the single-edged saberlike weapon and the double-edged sword, or broadsword, respectively.

5. "Bounding toward them, the bulls among monkeys" vānararṣabhāḥ . . . plavaṅgamāḥ: Literally, "bulls among monkeys . . . leaping [monkeys]." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read tu girīṃs tathā, "as well as hills," for vānararṣabhāḥ, "bulls among monkeys." Cg, the only southern commentator to share the critical reading, is concerned by the apparent redundancy. He offers two possible resolutions. According to the first, the poet uses the term plavaṅgama, a kenning for monkey, in order to make clear in the second half of the verse that it is still the monkeys and not the rākṣasas who are being described (vānaraśreṣṭhatve 'py avānaratvavāraṇāya plavaṅgamā ity uktam). Cg's second alternative, which we have followed, is to read the term plavaṅgama simply as a descriptive adjective and not as a name or designation. His idea is that the monkeys are bounding along in their eagerness to fight (yadvā plavaṅgamā yuddhotsāhena plavagatyā gacchanto 'saṃjñāyāṃ khaśārṣaḥ).

6. "the two vast forces" teṣām . . . bahūnām: Literally, "of those many."

"clashed with each other" anyonyam āsādya: Literally, "having met each other."

"the one side raining . . . the other" varṣatām: Literally, "of them who were showering." We must, of course, in keeping with the unvarying tenor of the text, understand that the monkeys hurl stones, while the rākṣasas shoot arrows.

7. "leaders of the monkey troops" vānarayūthapān: B1,D9–11,T1,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read -puṃgavān, "bulls [among monkeys]" for -yūthapān, "leaders of the troops."

8. "Some of the monkeys" kecit: Literally, "some." Even though both monkeys and rākṣasas were being slaughtered in the preceding verse, it is evident from the nature of the weapons here, and in verses 9 and 10 below, that the slaughter of the monkeys alone is being described.

"discuses" paramāyudhaiḥ: Literally, "excellent or supreme weapons." We follow Cv, Cm, Cg, and Ct, who cite either the Nighaṇṭu or another, unspecified, lexicon to demonstrate that the term is synonymous with discus (cakraṃ tu paramāyudham). Cr glosses dīvyaśastraiḥ, "divine weapons." But, as Pagani (1999, p. 1664) points out in her note to the passage, the use of such weapons is not alluded to in the context of these mass battles but is reserved for the use of individual, specially skilled warriors. Translators differ in their renderings. Dutt (1893, p. 1271) gives a more or less literal translation, "(other) powerful weapons." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 168), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 142), understands "d'énormes traits." Pagani (1999, p. 1002), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1569), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 141) translate as we do.

9. "robbed of their life breaths" nirucchvāsāḥ: Literally, "without breath." This is, of course, a euphemism for "dead." Cr, however, understands that the monkeys have fallen, "breathless in the stupor induced by seeing the approaching rākṣasas (taddarśanajanitamūrcchāhetukapūrvavacchvāsarahitāḥ)."

"ensnared in the continuous volley of arrows" iṣusaṃtānasaṃditāḥ: Literally, "bound in the continuity of arrows." The textual evidence is scattered throughout the various recensions and printed editions, including the texts of the southern commentators. Printed editions of Ct read iṣusaṃdhānasādhitāḥ, "overcome by the conjunction of arrows." This reading, however, is not attested in the critical apparatus nor does it appear to be the text on which Ct or Ck comment. These commentaries read instead, as does the text of Gita Press (6.58.13), iṣusaṃdhānasāditāḥ, which Ct and Ck gloss as "cut to pieces by that proper release of arrows (iṣūṇāṃ saṃdhānaṃ samyagvisarjanaṃ tena sāditāḥ khaṇḍitāḥ)." Ct notes the variant iṣusaṃdhānasaṃdhitāḥ, "bound by bonds of arrows." Cg and Cm, on the one hand, and Cv, on the other, show minor variants of this: iṣusaṃdhānasaṃditāḥ (Cg, Cm) and iṣudāmasaṃditāḥ (Cv). Cv, Ct (glossing saṃdhitāḥ), Cg, and Cm, perhaps keeping in mind the incident in which Indrajit strikes down and binds Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa (sarga 35), understand, "bound, i.e., stitched, in the bonds of arrows (iṣava eva saṃdhānāni bandhanarajjavas taiḥ saṃdhitāḥ saṃsyūtāḥ—so Ct)." Crā reads iṣusaṃdānasāditāḥ, which he interprets similarly. Cr reads -sāditāḥ-, which he glosses as vihiṃsitāḥ, "wounded."

10. "with lances" śūlaiḥ: Ñ2,V1,3,B2,D1,3,6,9–11,T3,G3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead śūraiḥ, "by heroic [rākṣasas]."

12. "the force" -sparśa-: Literally, "the touch, contact."

"their teeth and eyes knocked out" viśīrṇadaśanekṣaṇāḥ: Literally, "whose teeth and eyes had dropped or were shattered." D6,7,10,11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read -vadana-, "face," for -daśana-, "teeth." In recognition of the wide variety of readings, the critical editors have marked the second syllable [-śī-] of the participle viśīrṇa- as doubtful.

13. "the cries of those screaming in their affliction and the lionlike roars of those who were bellowing" ārtasvaraṃ ca svanatāṃ siṃhanādaṃ ca nardatām: Literally, "the cries of distress of the crying and the lion-roar of the roaring."

"in battle" yudhi: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead api, "as well."

14. "Rolling their eyes in rage" kruddhāḥ . . . vivṛttanayanāḥ: Literally, "enraged . . . their eyes rolling." The rolling of one's eyes is a common sign of anger in the epic (see note to 6.27.2), and thus we have linked the two adjectives. V1,2,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vivṛttavadanāḥ, "their faces rolling about." Translators who follow the text of Ct have struggled with this awkward and inferior reading, rendering such translations as "with their faces moving about" (Dutt 1893, p. 1271), "their mouths distended" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1569), "les traits bouleversés" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p.168), "their features distorted" (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 142), and "le visage convulsé" (Pagani 1999, p. 1003). See notes to 6.27.2 and 6.50.11.

"following the path of heroes" vīramārgam anuvratāḥ: Literally, "devoted to the path of heroes." According to Ck and Ct, the vīramārga, "the path of heroes," is "characterized by not turning back [in battle] aparāṅmukhatvalakṣaṇaḥ)." Cg defines it as "skill in battle (yuddhakauśalam)." Included in this path are such prescribed behaviors as facing one's enemy, sparing the supplicant, sparing the unarmed, etc. See Hopkins 1889, pp. 227–33.

"great feats" karmāṇi: Literally, "deeds, actions."

16. "Narāntaka" narāntakam: Another rākṣasa of this name is killed by Aṅgada at 6.57.88 below.

17. "nimble-handed" kṣiprahastaḥ: D7,9–11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the accusative kṣiprahastam, thus making the adjective refer not to Durmukha but to Samunnata.

"ripped up . . . by the roots" utpāṭya: D6,7,9–11,T2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead utthāya, "rising or leaping up." This reading obligates one to construe the sequence sa vipuladrumam, "he [having uprooted] a huge tree," of pāda b as an avyayībhāva compound, savipuladrumam, "with a big tree," which would then adverbially modify the gerund utthāya, "leaping up."

19. "the . . . rākṣasa . . . was struck on the head with a tree and so died" vṛkṣeṇābhihato mūrdhni prāṇāṃs tatyāja rākṣasaḥ: Literally, "struck on the head with a tree, the rākṣasa abandoned life breaths." The line is subject to a number of variations. The texts and printed editions of the southern commentators are divided. The texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead vṛkṣeṇa mahatā sadyaḥ prāṇān saṃtyājayad raṇe, "by means of a huge tree [he] suddenly caused [his] life breaths to abandon [him] in battle." The texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read the critical edition's pāda c but the vulgate's pāda d (vṛkṣeṇābhihato mūrdhni prāṇān saṃtyājayad raṇe "struck on the head with a tree, he caused [his] life breaths to abandon [him] in battle"). Commentators and translators struggle somewhat with the awkward reading, especially the causative saṃtyājayat. Several of them propose detaching the second half of the verse from the first and supplying the name Tāra in the nominative as the subject of the causative.

20. "this deed" tat karma: As Ct and Ck explain, this refers to the virtually instantaneous killing of his four companions (kṣaṇād eva sacivacatuṣṭayamāraṇakarma).

21. "Then both armies swirled about like a maelstrom" āvarta iva saṃjajñe ubhayoḥ senayos tadā: Literally, "Then it was as if a maelstrom arose in the two armies." The syntax of this verse is problematic and appears to be elliptical. There is no clear upameya to stand with the upamāna, āvartaḥ, "maelstrom," unless one takes nisvanaḥ, "sound," from pāda d. This is highly problematic, however, and is made all the more unlikely by the presence of the second iva, marking nisvanaḥ as part of a second simile. Commentators propose two basic solutions. One, which Ct and Cm propose, is to understand that there appears to be a maelstrom in the two armies because of the whirling to and fro of the troops (itas tato bhramaṇenāvarta iva saṃjajñe). This is more or less how we understand the passage. Cg takes a completely different approach. He understands āvartaḥ to be synonymous with saṃvartaḥ, which is a term for the pralaya, or universal dissolution at the end of a cosmic cycle. He reads āvarta iva as the locative āvarte plus iva rather than as the nominative āvartaḥ, as Ct and others do. Cg (who, with the other southern commentators, reads the synonymous niḥsvanaḥ for the critical edition's nisvanaḥ) thus understands the verse to mean that the armies emitted a sound like that of the ocean when it is agitated at the time of universal dissolution (āvarte saṃvarte pralaya iva sthite tasmin yuddhe kṣubhitasya sāgarasya niḥsvana iva senāyā niḥsvanaḥ saṃjajñe). Ck interprets similarly. Note the absence of sandhi between saṃjajñe and ubhayoḥ, unnoted in the critical apparatus.

22. "Skilled in combat . . . Prahasta" prahasto yuddhakovidaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead rākṣaso raṇadurmadaḥ, "the rākṣasa, intoxicated or furious with battle." This variation is rendered by those translators who follow the texts and printed editions of Ct, most of whom understand durmadaḥ in the sense of "intoxicated." Gorresio's text (6.32.22) reads a slight variation on this, prahasto yudhi durmadaḥ, and he translates it as "Prahasta furente nella battaglia" (1856, vol. 9, p. 301).

23. "Heaped up . . . as if covered with fallen mountains, [the earth] looked ghastly" babhūva nicitā ghorā patitair iva parvataiḥ: Literally, "heaped up as if with fallen mountains, [the earth] was horrible." Manuscript evidence for pādas c and d is scattered. D9,10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead babhūvāticitā ghoraiḥ parvatair iva saṃvṛtā, "[the earth] piled very high with the ghastly [corpses] was as if covered with mountains," or "[the earth] piled very high [with corpses] was as if covered with ghastly mountains."

24. "palāśa trees" palāśaiḥ: This is the "flame-of-the-forest" (Butea monosperma), a tree that blooms at the beginning of the hot season (April–May) and has bright orange-red flowers. See note to 6.35.9.

"the month of Mādhava" mādhave māsi: Mādhava corresponds to the Gregorian calendar months of April–May; it is also called Vaiśākha and is the second month of the Hindu calendar. Cf. 6.4.46 and note.

25–28. "the battleground resembled a river" yuddhabhūmimayīṃ nadīm: Literally, "the river that consisted of the battlefield." The extended and elaborate metaphor expressed in the four verses consists almost entirely of a string of compounds in the accusative case. Syntactically these are to be governed by the verb teruḥ, "forded," in verse 29b below. Vālmīki, like Vyāsa, is fond of these elaborate metaphors. See, for example, 5.7.46–48; 6.42.23; and MBh 7.13.10–16. Cg and Cm identify the figure of speech as a sāvayavarūpaka, "a metaphor with [numerous] elements or parts." See Gerow 1971, p. 259. Compare 6.81.9, where a similar figure is employed.

"the ocean to which it flowed was Yama" yamasāgaragāminīm: Literally, "going to the ocean of Yama." Since, as far as we know, Yama is not associated in the mythology with the ocean, we agree with Ck and Ct in reading the compound yamasāgara- as an appositional karmadhāraya, that is, that Yama is, in fact, the ocean, or, in keeping with the tenor of the metaphor, Yama, the god of death, takes the place of the ocean. Cr believes that the word yama here stands for the tāpa[sic ma]salokaḥ, i.e., the dark hell, which then takes the place of the ocean. Cg notes that it is well known that Yama frequents battlefields so that he can take away the souls [of the slain], and that he, therefore, stands in place of the ocean. (yuddhabhūmau yamo jīvagrahaṇāya sannidhatta iti prasiddhiḥ. tadrūpasāgaragāminīm.)

"Severed heads and trunks made up its fish" bhinnakāyaśiromīnām: Cg notes that the equivalence is appropriate because of the twitching or flopping (sphuritavattvāt) of the severed body parts.

"pieces of limbs, its grass" aṅgāvayavaśāḍvalām: Cg, reading the slight variant -śādvalām, understands the reference to be to the digits of the hands and feet, that is, fingers and toes, which would stand in comparison to grass. (aṅgāvayavāḥ karacaraṇādy aṅgānām avyavā aṅgulaya ity arthaḥ. ta eva śādvalāni śādvalabhūjanyatṛṇāni yasyās tām.)

"It was crowded with vultures in place of flocks of haṃsas, and it was swarming with adjutant storks instead of sārasa cranes." gṛdhrahaṃsagaṇākīrṇāṃ kaṅkasārasasevitām: The compounds can be read literally, as some translators have done, to mean "crowded with flocks of vultures and haṃsas and swarming with adjutant storks and sārasa cranes." But this, we believe, goes against the spirit of the metaphor in which the hideous realities of the battlefield, here the carrion birds, i.e., vultures and adjutant storks, take the place of the charming denizens of a real river, i.e., haṃsas and sārasa cranes.

"adjutant storks" kaṅka-: The specific identification of this bird is difficult as the name is used to describe at least four common species: the brahminy kite (Haliastur indus), the adjutant stork (Leptoptilus dubius), Pallas's fish eagle (Haliaeetus leucoryphus), and, as elsewhere in the Rāmāyaṇa, the heron (see note to 6.35.12). In the present context, it seems most likely that the hideous carrion-feeding adjutant stork (Leptoptilus dubius) is the one intended, as this bird in its height and general configuration would be an appropriate parallel to the graceful sārasa crane. See Dave 1984, pp. 392–95. Cg identifies the bird as "a white eagle (dhavalavarṇaḥ śyenaḥ)," probably a reference to Pallas's fish eagle. See Grewal 2000, pp. 61, 79. See, too, Fitzgerald 1998.

"the cries of the wounded took the place of its gurgling" ārtastanitanisvanām: Literally, "having the roaring of the afflicted for its sound." Cg remarks that the cries of the afflicted would be the sounds produced by their stumbling over the high and low [places] (nimnonnatapatanajanitasvanaḥ). Cg goes on to note that, "although the rushing flow of blood would make a sound of its own, the poet uses this expression in order to extend his elaborate metaphor (yady api rudhirapravāhasyāpi svata eva ghoṣo 'sti tathāpi rūpakatvāyaivam uktam)." D9 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead āvartasvananiḥsvanām, "its sound was the sound of a maelstrom."

29. "as might the leaders of elephant herds, a lotus pond covered with lotus pollen" padmarajodhvastāṃ nalinīṃ gajayūthapāḥ: Although the main thrust of the figure is to suggest how easily the warriors accomplish the feat, Cg suggests that by the term -dhvastām, "covered," we are to understand that the color of the lotus pond has been changed [by the red pollen] so that, like elephants emerging with their bodies reddened from a lotus pond, the warriors, too, would now have their bodies reddened [with blood]. (padmarajobhir dhvastāṃ varṇāntaraṃ prāptāṃ nalinīṃ sarasīṃ yathā gajayūthapās taranti tīrtvā raktatanavo bhavantīti yāvat. tathāruṇaśarīrā utterur ity arthaḥ.)

30. "who . . . was rapidly slaughtering" tarasā . . . vinighnantam: The adverb tarasā, "swiftly," is juxtaposed most closely to the finite verb dadarśa, "he spied," with which it shares pāda c. Indeed, some translators, including Dutt (1893, p. 1272) and Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 301), construe it in this way. The remaining translators consulted construe the adverb with the participle vinighnantam (v.l. vidhamantam), translating it variously as "with vehemence" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1570), "avec vehémence" (Pagani 1999, p. 1004), "par sa vaillance" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 169), and "with might and main" (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 142). D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vidhamantam, "scattering, dispersing."

Following verse 30, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of eight lines [943*]: "When Prahasta, the general of the army, saw him [Nīla] racing toward him forcefully in battle, he charged at Nīla in his chariot, which had the color of the sun, just as a strong wind in the atmosphere might rush upon a bank of clouds.[1–3] Drawing his bow in that great battle, that foremost of bowmen Prahasta, the general of the army, loosed arrows at Nīla.[4–5] Striking Nīla all at once and piercing him through, those arrows entered the earth with tremendous speed, like angry serpents.[6–7] Struck with those sharp arrows that were like flames of fire, Nīla . . . [struck Prahasta (verse 31c)].[8]"

32. Following verse 32, D6,7,9–11,T,G2,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [944*]: "[Unable to evade] the dreadful swarms of that evil-minded rākṣasa's arrows . . ." Printed editions of the texts of the southern commentators show a number of variants. VSP (6.58.41ab) and KK (6.58.40ab), representing the text of Cg, Cv, and Cm, read instead tasya bāṇagaṇān ghorān rākṣasasya mahābalaḥ, "[Unable to evade] the rākṣasa's dreadful swarm of arrows, the immensely powerful [monkey]." GPP (6.58.41ab) and NSP (6.58.41ab) read tasya bāṇagaṇān eva rākṣasasya durātmanaḥ, "[Unable to evade] the evil-minded rākṣasa's swarm of arrows."

33–34. "a sudden autumnal squall" varṣaṃ śāradaṃ śīghram āgatam: Literally, "an autumnal shower that came quickly." Ct and Ck explain that the bull easily withstands a brief shower in autumn, which is after the season of the serious storms. The figure, they assert, thus suggests that Prahasta's hail of arrows presents no serious threat to Nīla. (govṛṣasya śaratkāle prābalyaṃ kālasvabhāvād varṣasya tv anyathā tata eva. tena nātikleśakaras tasya śaravarṣa iti sūcitam.)

"with fortitude" sahasā: Literally, "suddenly, forcefully." Most translators have construed the adverb with the noun śaravarṣam, "hail of arrows," in the sense of "sudden or quick," or with the adjectival compound "his eyes tightly closed (nimīlitākṣaḥ)," in the sense of "quickly closing his eyes." Both of these readings seem to us to be grammatically and contextually problematic. We agree with Pagani (1999, p. 1004), who translates, "[endura] avec une grande fermeté" and Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 302), who translates, "con gran fermezza sopportò" in reading the adverb in the sense of "with firmness, fortitude" and construing it with the finite verb sehe (v.l. asahata—Gorresio 6.32.30b), "he endured."

35. "swift as thought" manojavān: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahābalaḥ, "mighty," which would then modify Nīla.

Following verse 35, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [945*]: "Then, seizing Prahasta's bow, mighty[1] Nīla quickly broke it and roared again and again."

[1]"Then seizing Prahasta's bow, mighty" tatas taccāpam udgṛhya prahastasya mahābalaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct substitute tato roṣaparītātmā dhanus tasya durātmanaḥ, "Then, beside himself with rage, [he broke] the bow of that evil-minded one," for this line.

36. "Stripped of his bow by Nīla" vidhanus tu kṛtas tena: Literally, "rendered bowless by him." The textual transition from verse 35 in the critical edition is rather awkward, as no explanation for Prahasta's loss of his bow is given. In the south, as noted above, Nīla wrests the weapon from Prahasta's grasp and breaks it. In the northern variant [946*], Prahasta drops his bow and arrow of his own accord to seize instead the cudgel of pāda c. Here again the critical editors have created a textual sequence that is defective and unknown to any version (see Sutherland 1992).

37. "like two bull-elephants in rut" prabhinnāv iva kuñjarau: The basis for the simile, apart from the implicit size and ferocity of the combatants, is the often-described flow of rut fluid from the temples of bull-elephants. This fluid is supposed to be reddish in color. This would form the basis of the comparison for the blood gushing forth from the wounds of Prahasta and Nīla. See 6.59.81 and note.

38. "razor-sharp fangs" sutīkṣṇābhir daṃṣṭrābhiḥ: Ct and Ck note that rākṣasas (as well as monkeys) have powerful fangs (rākṣasānām apy asti daṃṣṭrāprābalyam).

"they looked like a lion and a tiger and, indeed, moved just like them" siṃhaśārdūlasadṛśau siṃhaśārdūlaceṣṭitau: Literally, "they were like a lion and a tiger and had the movements of a lion and a tiger." Cg understands the first compound to express the fact that the two opponents are equal in strength (siṃhaśārdūlasadṛśāv iti bale sāmyam).

39. "Seeing victory within their grasp" vikrāntavijayau: The compound is obscure and ambiguous, lending itself to a variety of analyses and interpretations. Cg and Ct both appear to read the first member, vikrānta-, as an adjective in the sense of "obtained." Thus, Cg explains, "obtaining victory everywhere (sarvatra prāptavijayau)," while Ct glosses, "having nearly obtained victory (prāptaprāyavijayau)." Cr, in a somewhat similar vein, glosses, "who had brought victory within their grasp, as it were (vaśīkṛtāv iva vijayau yābhyām)." We believe that this is the most appropriate rendering in this context and have extended it somewhat in keeping with our view that both warriors are confident of achieving victory. Translators have read the compound variously. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1572), apparently following Ct, renders, "well-nigh scored a victory." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 143), who translates, "who were victors in every fray," and Pagani (1999, p. 1004), who renders, "maintes fois victorieux," seem to follow Cg. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 169) takes vikrānta- in its nominal sense of "hero" and reads the compound as a tatpuruṣa, in the sense of "vainqueurs des braves." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 144), "vanquishers of other heroes." Dutt (1893, p. 1273) reads the compound as a bahuvrīhi based on an underlying paranipāta karmadhāraya compound, translating, "endowed with victorious vigor." Most northern manuscripts avoid this awkward compound either by eliminating it completely (e.g., Lahore 6.34.47) or breaking it up as in Gorresio's (6.32.34c) vikrāntau vijaye, "courageous in victory."

"were as eager to gain glory as were Vṛtra and Vāsava" kāṅkṣamāṇau yaśaḥ prāptuṃ vṛtravāsavayoḥ samau: Literally, "equal to Vṛtra and Vāsava, they desired to gain glory." The mythic heroic battle between Indra and the demon Vṛtra, dating from the earliest vedic texts, is a favorite object of comparison for single combats in the epic. See note to 6.75.31.

40. "making a supreme effort" paramāyastaḥ: V,B1,4,D2,3,5,9–11,S read instead paramāyattaḥ, "with a great effort." Even though the word has a similar meaning to that of the critical edition's reading, the choice of the northern variant over the southern is difficult to understand in light of the principles set forth in the Introduction to the Bālakāṇḍa (Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv).

42. "the mighty rākṣasa" balī: Literally, "the mighty one." V1,D5,7,9–11,T1,G1,2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead balāt, "violently, forcefully."

43. "Prahasta" tam: Literally, "him."

45. "by that . . . that" sā tena: Literally," that [boulder] . . . by that [foremost of monkeys]. D4,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead nīlena, "by Nīla."

46. "Prahasta" saḥ: Literally, "he."

49. "to hold their lines" samavasthātum: Literally, "to stand firm, hold one's ground."

50. "they stood silently, brooding" dhyānamūkatvam āgatāḥ: Literally, "they went to the muteness of brooding or meditation." Ck, Ct, and Cr liken the speechlessness of the vanquished rākṣasas to that of people meditating upon their divinities (dhyānena devatādhyānena ye mūkā mauninas teṣāṃ bhāvas tattvam—Ct). Ct explains the phrase to mean that the rākṣasas were unable to say a word because of their fear, sorrow, and confusion (bhayaduḥkhamohaiḥ kimapi vaktuṃ nāśaknuvann ity arthaḥ). Cg claims that they were devoid of the power of speech because of their brooding (dhyānena vāgvyāpāraśūnyatvam).

Following verse 50, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [947*]: "Immersed in a terrible ocean of grief, they seemed to be stripped of their senses."

51. The meter is vaṃśasthavila; pāda c is hypometric.

Cg and Cm note that the death of Prahasta takes place on the fifth lunar day [of the dark half of the lunar fortnight of Phālguna/Caitra] (pañcamyāṃ prahastavadhaḥ). Ct understands the reference to be to the fifth lunar day [of the bright half of Bhādrāśvina] (tatpañcamyāṃ prahastavadhaḥ). Cv understands that the death of Prahasta takes place on the fifth day [of the battle] (prahastavadhena pañcamam ahas samāptam). See 6.4.4.

Following sarga 46, KK inserts within brackets two sargas, designated as prakṣiptasarga 1 and prakṣiptasarga 2 (interpolated sargas 1 and 2) (= CE 948*; 6.47.4–6, 951*; and App. I, No. 30 [a passage of one hundred forty-eight lines]). These interpolated sargas describe Rāvaṇa's dejection over the death of his general Prahasta and his conversation with Mandodarī. Mandodarī rebukes Rāvaṇa for having abducted Sītā and advises him to return her to Rāma with gifts and gestures of submission. Rāvaṇa rejects her advice, vowing to destroy Rāma and the monkey army. He then dispatches additional warriors to the battlefront. These sargas correspond to Gorresio 6.33–34. See notes to 6.51.20 and 6.99.13.

The meter of verses 1–3, 7–25, 32–44, 50, 89–103, 122–123, and 127–135 is upajāti. The remaining verses are in śloka meter.

1. "Prahasta, the protector of the rākṣasa forces, was slain . . . by Nīla, bull among leaping monkeys" tasmin hate rākṣasasainyapāle plavaṅgamānām ṛṣabheṇa: Literally, "when the protector of the rākṣasa forces was slain by that bull among leaping monkeys."

2. "by Nīla, the son of Agni, the purifier" pāvakasūnu-: Literally, "the son of Pāvaka." Like all the monkeys, Nīla is the offspring of one of the vedic divinities. See 1.16.3,13. His affiliation with Agni is made clear at 4.40.2–5.

"No sooner had . . . heard their words than" tac cāpi teṣāṃ vacanaṃ niśamya: We understand the particle ca with the emphatic api in its sense of expressing simultaneity, as noted in Apte (s.v. ca). Cg offers two alternative explanations of the significance of the particles ca and api (cāpi). According to the first, they suggest that Rāvaṇa could never have imagined this turn of events [the death of Prahasta] even in his dreams (tac cāpīty anena rāvaṇena svapne 'pi na tac cintitam iti sūcyate). According to the second, the particle api suggests that, despite the political wisdom that enjoins one to seek clemency when one's enemy is ascendant and one's own power in decline, Rāvaṇa, impelled by his own impending doom, renounces the idea of seeking refuge [with Rāma] and instead gives way to inopportune anger. (yadvā śatror upacaye svasyāpacaye samāśrayaḥ kārya iti nītiḥ. tathāpi rāvaṇaḥ kālacoditatayā samāśrayaṇaṃ vihāyāsthāne krodhavaśaṃ gata ity apiśabdena sūcyate.)

3. "he was grief stricken, and his mind was suffused with rage" śokārditaḥ krodhaparītacetāḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct reverse the order of the words śoka-, "grief," and krodha-, "rage," yielding the sense "he was afflicted with rage, and his mind was suffused with sorrow."

"the principal warriors of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos" nairṛtayodhamukhyān: D10 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead rākṣasayūthamukhyān, "leaders of the rākṣasa troops."

"the immortal gods" amara-: Literally, "the immortals." D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read nirjara-, "ageless."

4. "One ought not underestimate" nāvajñā . . . kāryā: Literally, "disregard should not be made." Ct, Cr, and Cm understand the disregard to take the form of the thought, "What can these monkeys do? (avajñaite kapayaḥ kiṃ kariṣyantīty evaṃrūpā na kāryā—so Ct, Cm)" or "They are insignificant (ime tūcchā iti buddhyānādaro na kāryaḥ—so Cr)." Cg quotes the position taken by Ct and Cm in his alternate explanation of the singular/plural issue noted below.

"an enemy who has" ripave . . yaiḥ: The juxtaposition of the singular and plural, as well as of the dative and instrumental, is unusual and awkward. Ct and Cr simply see this as a grammatical irregularity, glossing the plural ripubhyaḥ and ripūṇām, respectively. Cg acknowledges the position of these commentators, ascribing it to some (kecit), but offers his own solution, according to which the dative singular ripave refers to Rāma, who is the indirect recipient of the action of disregard, while the instrumental plural yaiḥ, "by whom," refers to the monkeys, who are the actual cause of Prahasta's death. (ripave rāmāya nāvajñā kāryopekṣā na kartavyā kriyāgrahaṇaṃ kartavyam iti caturthī. yaiś ca vānarair hetubhir mama sainyapālaḥ prahastaḥ . . . sūditas tebhyo 'pi nāvajñā kāryety arthaḥ.)

5. "without further deliberation" avicārayan: Literally, "without reflecting or hesitating." Ck, Cm, and Ct gloss the participle as "regarding the enemy's army as insignificant (ripubalaṃ tṛṇīkurvan)," although why Rāvaṇa would so regard them after explicitly saying in the previous verse that they should not be taken lightly is unclear. Cr's gloss, ripūṃs tucchatayā gaṇayan, lends itself to ambiguity, as there are two possible readings of the sandhi. If read as it appears in GPP at 6.59.5, with the word breaks as indicated above, it would be a paraphrase of Ct and Ck, "reckoning the enemies as insignificant." One could, however, also read the sequence tucchatayāgaṇayan as tucchatayā + agaṇayan, giving the sense "not taking my enemies lightly." This appears to us to be more in keeping with the tenor of verse 4 above.

"that extraordinary battlefront" raṇaśīrṣaṃ tad adbhutam: Literally, "that wonderful forefront of battle." Ck, Cm, and Ct gloss raṇaśīrṣam as "head of the battle (raṇamūrdhānam)" and take it as a synonym for battlefield. Cg claims that the battle is extraordinary or miraculous because of the destruction of the strong by the weak (durbalaiḥ prabalavināśanād āścaryam).

6. "Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa included" rāmaṃ ca sahalakṣmaṇam: Literally, "and Rāma together with Lakṣmaṇa." Cm, perhaps in keeping with the profound Vaiṣṇava tenor his commentary frequently takes, argues: "Although the apparent meaning of the verse is clear, in reality, we should supply the indeclinable vinā, 'without, excluding,' yielding the sense 'I will consume the army of the monkeys, sparing Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa.' (adyety asya prātītikārthaḥ spaṣṭaḥ. vastutas tu sahalakṣmaṇaṃ rāmaṃ vineti śeṣaḥ . . . vānarānīkaṃ nirdahiṣyāmīti sambandhaḥ.)" See note to 6.27.4.

Following verse 6, many northern manuscripts and a handful of devanāgarī and southern manuscripts insert a passage of four lines [951*], in whole or in part. Of these four lines, the first two appear in brackets in KK (6.59.7) and in VSP (6.59 unnumbered, between verses 6 and 7). Of these two lines, the first appears in brackets as 6.59.6.ef in GPP, which notes in its apparatus that this half verse is additional in the text of Cg. Gita Press includes the line without brackets as 6.59.6ef and is the only translation of the southern text consulted that renders the line. The first two lines read: "This day, I shall gratify the earth with the blood of the monkeys.[1] And I shall send Rāma, together with Lakṣmaṇa, to the abode of Yama.[2]"

7. "a team of superb horses" turaṅgottamarāji-: Literally, "a row of superb horses." Ck and Ct understand the sense to be "many horses (anena bahvaśvayuktatvaṃ rathasyoktam)." B4,D5–7,9,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read instead -rāja-, "king," for -rāji-, "line, row." This yields the sense "[yoked to] kings among excellent horses." Cg and Cm understand, "the most excellent horses (turaṅgaśreṣṭhatamaiḥ—so Cg)." The only translators consulted who follow this reading, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 144) and Pagani (1999, p. 1005), understand the sense to be "royal horses."

"glowed, blazing with splendor" prakāśamānaṃ vapuṣā jvalantam: Literally, "shining [and] blazing with beauty." According to Ct, it is because the chariot blazes with beauty that it glows through its own luster (vapuṣā jvalantam ata eva svabhāsā prakāśamānam). Cr understands that the vehicle glows of its own accord because it is made of gold and blazes through the splendor of Rāvaṇa's body (prakāśamānaṃ svarṇamayatvena svataḥ prakāśitaṃ vapuṣā rāvaṇaśarīrakāntyā jvalantam). Cg feels that the chariot glows because of its ornamentation and blazes because of its own beauty. (prakāśamānam alaṃkārair bhāsamānam. vapuṣā jvalantaṃ svarūpata eva prakāśamānam.) Cm understands that the chariot is illuminated both by its splendid horses and its own luster (turaṅgottamabhāsā svabhāsā ca prakāśamānam ity arthaḥ).

8. "bherī and paṭaha drums" -bherīpaṭaha-: For bherī drums, see 6.17.31–33 and note. Paṭahas are a type of drum, commonly a war drum (Vyas 1967, p. 229). See 5.8.36 and note. D5,9–11,T1,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead -paṇava-, "a type of drum, a war drum." See 5.8.39 and note (Vyas 1967, p. 229).

"to the clapping of arms, war shouts, and lionlike roars" āsphoṭitakṣveḍitasiṃhanādaiḥ: The word āsphoṭita- refers to the traditional belligerent gesture of Indian warriors of loudly slapping the upper arms with the palms (Alter 1992). Ck, Ct, and Cr understand -kṣveḍita- to refer to the shouts of the soldiers, each proclaiming his own valor (sva[sva]śauryaprakāśikaśabdāḥ). Cg [v.l. -kṣvelita-] understands the term to refer to the sound produced by the clapping of the arms (kṣvelitaśabdaḥ śabdamātraparaḥ). In other words, Cg understands that there are only two sounds, the sound of the clapping of the arms and the lionlike roars (āsphoṭitajanitaśabdaiḥ siṃhanādaiś cety arthaḥ). Cr interprets -siṃhanādaiḥ, "[by] lionlike roars," to mean "loud laughter" (aṭṭāṭṭahāsāḥ). Ck understands the term similarly, glossing ahahāsāḥ. Cm understands the compound

-kṣvelitasiṃhanādaiḥ not as a dvandva but as a compound expressing similitude (upamitasamāsa), in the sense of "shouts that were similar to the sounds of the king of beasts (mṛgendradhvanisadṛśaiḥ kṣvelitaiḥ)." See notes to 6.4.23–24.

"auspicious hymns of praise" puṇyaiḥ stavaiḥ: Several of the translators consulted have taken the adjective puṇya in its common meaning of "sacred or holy." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 170), followed by Pagani (1999, p. 1006), renders, "hymnes de triomphe." Cg, perhaps unwilling to associate sacred or auspicious hymns with Rāvaṇa, glosses, "beautiful (cārubhiḥ)." This interpretation appears to have been followed by Gita Press, which renders, "agreeable" (1969, vol. 3, p. 1574). Shastri (1959, vol. 3, pp. 145–46) renders, "hymns of praise," which, if not literal, is textually apposite.

9. "the foremost of the rākṣasa lords" rākṣasarājamukhyaiḥ: Literally, "the principal rākṣasa kings." The expression is somewhat awkward in the plural here and is the subject of considerable textual variation among the different manuscripts. V1,2,D5,6,9–11,T1,2,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read the nominative singular -mukhyaḥ for the instrumental plural -mukhyaiḥ, thus repeating the epithet used for Rāvaṇa in the previous verse. There, in anticipation of this awkward reading, we have similarly rendered -rāja-, "king," as "lord." Many northern manuscripts, as well as the printed editions of Gorresio (6.35.3) and Lahore (6.37.3), retain the instrumental plural but provide a facilior by substituting -yodhamukhyaiḥ, "foremost of warriors," or -yodhavīraiḥ, "warrior-heroes," for -rājamukhyaiḥ, "foremost of kings," giving the sense "[surrounded] by the foremost rākṣasa warriors or warrior-heroes."

"whose bodies resembled mountains or clouds" śailajīmūtanikāśarūpaiḥ: Literally, "whose forms resembled mountains and/or clouds." Cg argues that the comparison to mountains is to establish the toughness or hardness of the rākṣasas, while the comparison to clouds is an allusion to their ability to contract and expand their bodies. (kāṭhinyasiddhaye śailaupamyam. saṃkocavikāsārhatvasiddhyai meghaupamyam.)

"lord of the immortal gods" amareśaḥ: M3 and the printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead asureśaḥ, "lord of the asuras." Cg explains this unexpected epithet for Rudra by alluding to the divinity's dark nature (tāmasaprakṛtitvāt). He supports this attribution by quoting a passage that he locates in the "Upaniṣad of the Maitrāyaṇīyas, 'He whose portion is darkness, he indeed is Rudra (yo ha vā asya tāmaso 'ṃśaḥ so 'sau rudra iti).' " The passage does not appear in the Maitrāyaṇīyopaniṣad. This variant is represented only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 145).

"he resembled Rudra . . . surrounded by his malignant spirits" bhūtair vṛto rudra iva: Bhūtas, frightening and malignant spirits or ghosts, form a regular part of the terrifying retinue of supernatural beings that surround Lord Śiva, who is, therefore sometimes known by epithets such as Bhūteśa and Bhūtanātha, "lord of ghosts." Notably, Vālmīki uses almost the same simile to describe Rāma when he is beset by the rākṣasas under Khara's command in the Araṇyakāṇḍa (3.24.10 and note). See verses 23–24 and notes below, where Rāvaṇa is again described in the same way. See 6.59.12; and 6.74.4 and notes. Cf. 6.4.16, where the term is used of Kubera's retinue.

10. "the immensely powerful rākṣasa" mahaujāḥ: Literally, "the immensely powerful one."

"armed with trees and boulders" pādapaśailahastam: Literally, "with trees and boulders in hand."

11. "Closely followed by his army" senānugataḥ: Literally, "followed by [his] army." We agree with Cm, Ct, and Ck in reading this as an instrumental tatpuruṣa, which places Rāma at the head of his forces. Cr, however, understands an accusative tatpuruṣa in the sense of "following his army." Cg explains, "surrounded by his troops, who had assembled on every side in order to protect their master (svāmisaṃrakṣaṇāya sarvataḥ samavetasenāparivṛtaḥ)."

"whose arms resembled serpent lords" bhujagendrabāhuḥ: The compound must be read as an implicit simile, since serpents, of course, conspicuously lack arms. Cg understands the figure to refer to Rāma's arms having swelled up in his eagerness for battle (yuddhautsukyena pravardhamānabāhur ity arthaḥ).

"whose majesty was immense" pṛthuśrīḥ: Literally, "of broad or extensive majesty or splendor." Cg explains that Rāma had acquired a certain splendor as a result of his excitement at the prospect of battle (yuddhaharṣeṇa saṃjātalakṣmīkaḥ).

"foremost among those who bear weapons" śastrabhṛtāṃ variṣṭham: This is a type of formulaic expression of which the epic poets are fond. Cg explains it here as meaning "cognizant of the relative qualities of the heroic soldiers (vīrabhaṭatāratamyajñam iti bhāvaḥ)."

12. "Who is in command of this . . . army" sainyam . . . kasyedam: Literally, "Whose is this army?"

"unassailable" akṣobhyam: Literally, "unshakeable."

"weapons" -śastra-: B2,D10–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead -chatra-, "umbrellas."

"bows" -āyudha-: Literally, "weapons." We agree with those commentators who have this reading in understanding -āyudha- here to mean "bow." We do so because the compound refers to specific weapons and also in order to avoid redundancy with the word śastra, "weapons," in pāda a.

"discuses" -cakra-: The reading is marked as uncertain by the critical editors. D5,6,10,11,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, Ck, Cg, and Cm read instead -śastra-, "weapon." Commentators who have this reading are distressed by the repetition, as the term also occurs in pāda a. They attempt to resolve the redundancy by taking the first occurrence as a generic term for weapons, and the second as a restrictive term for the types of cutting weapons mentioned in the compound in pāda b. Crā notes this reading as a variant and suggests that the term be understood to refer to weapons other than those mentioned in the verse (śastraśabdena paṭhitavyatiriktāny āyudhāny ucyante).

"its war-elephants as huge as Himalaya, lord of mountains" nagendropamanāga-: Literally, "elephants similar to the lord of mountains." D9–11,M1,2,4,5, and the commentaries of Ct, Cr, and Cm (as a variant) read instead mahendropamanāga-, "elephants as large as Mount Mahendra." The commentaries and printed editions represented by Cg and M3 read the inferior variant gajendropamanāga-, "elephants resembling the lords of elephants." No translators render this variant. See 6.53.24 and note.

13. "for him" rāmasya: Literally, "for Rāma." We have dropped the second term, "Rāma," to avoid the awkward repetition in the translation.

14. "that huge rākṣasa" mahātmā: Literally, "great one." Given the tenor of the verse, we agree with Ct, Ck, and Cg in taking the epithet here, which we normally translate simply as "great," to refer to physical size (mahādehaḥ—so Ct; mahākāyaḥ—so Cg).

"making its head tremble, is Akampana" prakampayan nāgaśiraḥ . . . akampanam: Literally, "[who] is making an elephant's head tremble [know him to be] Akampana." Ct, Cg, and Cm carry through the notion of the rākṣasa's great size by saying that it is the weight of his body that causes the elephant's head to shake (svaśarīrabhārāt svārūḍhanāgasya gajasya śiraḥ saṃkampayann eti—so Ct). The poet, as he does so often, plays etymologically with his characters' names. Akampana is the name of the great rākṣasa warrior who fights with, and is slain by, Hanumān in sarga 44 (6.44.29) above. Ct, Cr, and Cm all hasten to inform us that the rākṣasa slain here is different from the one killed earlier (ayam akampanaḥ pūrvahatād anya iti bodhyam—so Cm). Cg identifies the present Akampana as a son of Rāvaṇa (enam akampanaṃ rāvaṇaputram avehi). See note to verse 16 below. See, also, 6.43.2; 6.57.17; and notes.

15. "who brandishes a bow" dhūnvan dhanuḥ: Literally, "shaking or waving a bow." Cg feels that this phrase expresses the extraordinary strength of Indrajit's arms (anena bhujabalādhikyam ucyate).

"that resembles the bow of Śakra" śakradhanuḥprakāśam: This can also be interpreted, as some translators have done, as "shining like Śakra's bow, i.e., the rainbow." (Cf. Raghunathan's "gleaming like the rainbow" [1982, vol. 3, p. 145].)

"with his . . . protuberant fangs" -vivṛttadaṃṣṭraḥ: The sense of the participle vivṛtta- in this compound is somewhat obscure. Its normal meaning is "rolling about, turning," but this seems inappropriate in this context. The commentators are silent. Some translators extend the meaning to "round or curving," not an implausible choice (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 172; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 146; Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 310; and Dutt 1893, p. 1276). Others, with whom we align ourselves, read the participle as if it were vivṛta-, "manifest, displayed" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1575 and Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 145). Pagani (1999, p. 1006) oddly renders, "et montre . . . ses dants . . . étincelants." Compare 6.55.123 and note.

"who . . . resembles an elephant" karīva bhāti: Cg notes that this phrase expresses the power of Indrajit's body (anena kāyabalam).

"preeminent by virtue of a boon" varapradhānaḥ: Literally, "foremost by a boon." We agree with the majority of the commentators and translators in taking the compound as an instrumental tatpuruṣa. Cr offers an alternative, that is, to read the compound as a bahuvrīhi based on an underlying karmadhāraya meaning "for whom his boon is the foremost [thing]." The boon referred to, as several of the commentators note, is the boon of invisibility that Brahmā granted to Indrajit. See notes to 6.36.10 and 7.30.10–13.

16. "immensely powerful" ativīryaḥ: Cg (v.l. ativīraḥ) understands this term to indicate that, despite Atikāya's lack of powers of illusion, he is even more powerful than Indrajit (māyābalābhave 'pīndrajito 'tiśayitavīryaḥ).

"superb chariot-warrior" atirathaḥ: This is a term often used in the Mahābhārata to indicate elite chariot-warriors (cf. MBh 1.2.53; 1.2.150; 1.64.19; 1.108.15; 1.213.61; 3.48.5; 3.84.7; 3.225.26; 7.1–8.41, etc.). Cg claims that Atikāya is called atirathaḥ because he possesses an extraordinarily great chariot that is yoked to one thousand horses (sahasrāśvayuktatvenātiśayitarathaḥ). Cf. 6.19.18–21.

"the Vindhya mountain, Western mountain, or Mount Mahendra" vindhyāstamahendrakalpaḥ: Cg suggests that, by mentioning three separate mountains, the poet is expressing three separate qualities of Atikāya, namely, height, the ability to overcome the energy of his enemies, and immovability (vindhyāditrayaupamyenonnatatva- paratejobhibhāvakatvaniścalatvāny ucyante). Presumably these qualities belong, respectively, to the three mountains named. On the Western mountain (asta), see 6.39.15; 6.57.20; 6.78.43; and notes.

"with his gigantic body . . . Atikāya" atikāyo 'tivivṛddhakāyaḥ: Literally, "Atikāya [he of the gigantic body], whose body had grown extraordinarily." As elsewhere, the poet plays with and echoes the name of his character, repeating the prefix ati-, "very, excessive," three times in the verse in addition to its occurrence in the name of the rākṣasa. Devāntaka, Narāntaka, Triśiras, and Atikāya are all said to be the "paternal nephews" of Kumbhakarṇa, and so must also be sons of Rāvaṇa. See 6.56.3 and note. See also note to verse 14 above, where Cg says that Akampana is a son of Rāvaṇa.

17. "his eyes as red as the newly risen sun" navārkoditatāmracakṣuḥ: The sequence -arkodita- must be read, as Cg suggests, as a paranipāta compound whose normal order would be, as in the parallel compound of verse 14, -uditārka-.

"who bellows harshly" kharaṃ garjati: We read with Cg, Cm, and Ck, who take kharam to be an adverb modifying garjati, "he bellows" (kharam iti kriyāviśeṣaṇam—so Cg). Ct and Cr take kharam as an adjective in the sense of "fierce, savage (krūram—so Ct)," modifying gajam, "elephant." Ct's interpretation is rendered by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 172), who is, in turn, followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 146) and Pagani (1999, p. 1006).

"its bells clanging" ghaṇṭāninadapraṇādam: Literally, "resounding with the sound of bells." Cg, Cr, and Cm all read the upasarga pra in praṇāda in the sense of prakṛṣṭaḥ or prabhūtaḥ, "to a great extent" [here, "loudly"].

18. Several of the commentators are disturbed by the lack of an explicit finite verb in this verse, which undermines its parallelism with others in the passage. Cg proposes bringing down the verb garjati, "he [who] bellows" (garjatīti pūrvaślokād anuṣajyate). Cv supplies "he goes (gacchati)," while Cm supplies "he comes (āyāti)."

"which, with its trappings bright with gold, resembles a mountain shrouded in evening clouds" kāñcanacitrabhāṇḍam . . . saṃdhyābhragiriprakāśam: We agree with Cg in taking the description of the horse's bright trappings as the basis for the simile of the cloud-shrouded mountain. The idea would be that the huge battle-charger covered with gleaming ornaments resembles the dark mass of a mountain surrounded by a corona of clouds brightly illuminated by the setting [or rising] sun. This linkage, which is explicit in Cg, is implicit, we believe, in Cm, who, with Cg and Cv, shares the reading of the critical edition. Cg and Cm gloss the second compound as a madhyamapadalopī, whose meaning is "having a resemblance to a mountain shrouded in evening clouds (saṃdhyābhrayuktagiriprakāśam)." D4,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct substitute the nominative ending -aḥ for the critical edition's accusative -am, which makes the simile refer to Piśāca himself rather than to his horse. Unlike Cg and Cm, Cr reads the compound saṃdhyābhragiri- as a dvandva, which lends the larger compound the sense "who [Piśāca] resembles an evening [or morning] cloud and a mountain (saṃdhyābhragiribhyām iva prakāśate)."

"haloed with light" marīcinaddham: Literally, "bound with rays."

19. "a lordly and mountainous bull" vṛṣendram . . . giriprakāśam: Literally, "the lord of bulls, resembling a mountain." Ñ1,D1,3,4,6,7,9–11,13,T2,3,G1,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read śaśi-, "hare-marked [moon]," for giri-, "mountain."

"its power surpassing that of the thunderbolt" kiṃkaravajravegam: Literally, "having servant-thunderbolt-power." The compound is obscure and lends itself to a variety of interpretations. We agree basically with Cg, who interprets the compound to mean "that which has a servant in the form of the power of the thunderbolt, that is, which has power greater than even that of the thunderbolt. (kiṃkaro vajravego yasya tat kiṃkaravajravegam. vajravegād apy adhikavegam ity arthaḥ.)" Ck and Ct similarly gloss, "to which the power of the vajra had become subservient (kiṃkarabhūto vajravego yasmiṃs tam—Ct; kiṃkarabhūto 'nvagbhūto vajravego yasya tat—Ck)." Cm explains, "for whom the power of the vajra, like a servant, did as it was instructed, that is, equal in power to that (kiṃkaravad yathoktakārivajraṃ tatsamānavegam)." Cr understands the term kiṃkara to mean "doing nothing or having no effect (akiṃcitkaraḥ)." His idea seems to be that the vajra would have no effect upon the lance and that therefore it has the same force as the vajra. (kiṃkaro 'kiṃcitkara ity arthaḥ. vajravad vego yasmiṃs tat.)

"Triśiras" triśirāḥ: Ct and Cm point out that this is "a certain Triśiras (kaścit triśirāḥ)," by which they no doubt mean to differentiate the rākṣasa described here from the one Rāma killed at Araṇyakāṇḍa 26. See, too, note to 3.16.20. See also notes to verse 16 above.

20. "there we see" bhāti: Literally, "he appears." Ñ1,V2,3,B1,2,D9–11,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead yāti, "he goes."

"broad, muscular, and splendid" pṛthuvyūḍhasujāta-: Literally, "broad, firm, and beautiful." Cr and Cg gloss, "fleshy (pīnam)," "wide (viśālam)," and "beautiful (sundaram)."

"utterly intent" samāhitaḥ: We follow Cr in taking this term to describe a state of mental concentration. He glosses, "single-mindedly focused on battle (yuddha-ikamanāḥ)." Cg understands, "equipped for battle or dressed in armor (sannaddhaḥ)."

"brandishing . . . his bow" dhanur vidhūnvan: See note to verse 15 above.

21. "blazing, smoking" dīptaṃ sadhūmam: The commentators are in agreement that the weapon appears to blaze because of its gold and gemstones. Since nothing in the verse seems to provide a basis for the image of smoke, Ct, Cr, and Cm argue that it is the dark luster of sapphires that creates the illusion of smoke (nīlamaṇikāntyā sadhūmam iva—Ct). Cg, on the other hand, thinks that the mention of smoke has been added simply to complete the fiery imagery of the verse (abhedanirdeśaḥ sarvathā sādṛśyapratipattaye).

"jāmbūnada gold" jāmbūnada-: See note to 6.15.2.

"fearsome" -ghora-: Ñ2,B1,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -vīra- "valiant, heroic."

22. "huge warrior" udagraḥ: Literally, "the tall or large one."

"Narāntaka" narāntakaḥ: This is one of the four sons of Rāvaṇa mentioned at notes to verse 16 above. Narāntaka is slain by Aṅgada at Yuddhakāṇḍa 57.

"who can battle even mountain peaks" nagaśṛṅgayodhī: Literally, "mountain peak fighter." The compound is ambiguous; for, just as in the literal English translation, it is not clear whether Narāntaka fights against mountain peaks or uses them as weapons. Both interpretations are plausible and yet problematic in the context. Cg offers the second as his principal explanation, glossing, "he fights with mountain peaks as his instruments (nagaśṛṅgaiḥ sādhanaiḥ yudhyata iti)." Cm appears to follow this reading, breaking it down further by reading nagaśṛṅga- as a dvandva rather than as a tatpuruṣa. This gives the sense of "he fights with trees and [mountain] peaks (nagaiś ca śṛṅgaiś ca yudhyata iti)." This explanation is plausible in an epic, where the use of trees and mountains as weapons is a commonplace. It is problematic in this context, however, since these weapons are almost exclusively used by the monkeys, but the verse itself indicates that Narāntaka's chariot is crammed with all sorts of conventional weapons. Thus, we have followed the interpretation of Ct and Cr, which is also noted as an alternative explanation by Cg. According to this reading, Narāntaka actually fights against mountain peaks in the absence of any opposing warrior to equal him in order to alleviate the itching of his arms (pratiyoddhrabhāvād bhūjakaṇḍūnivṛttyartham iti bhāvaḥ—Ct). Ck has a variant of this interpretation according to which Narāntaka fights against these inanimate objects in his insatiable desire (lit., itching) for combat (nagaśṛṅgair yudhyata iti tathā raṇakaṇḍv iti śeṣaḥ). See verse 29 and note below.

23–24. "that . . . white umbrella" chatraṃ sitam: The white umbrella is an invariable insignia of royalty in traditional India. See 2.2.5 and 5.8.2 and notes. See 6.115.12–16 and note. See, too, 6.116.25–26 and notes, where these insignia of royalty surround Rāma.

"whose faces are those of tigers, camels, elephant lords, and the king of beasts" vyāghroṣṭranāgendramṛgendravaktraiḥ: The compound -nāgendra-, "elephant lords," could also be rendered "serpent lords." Ñ2,V1,2,B1,D1,4–6,9–11,13,T1,2,G1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read -mṛgāśva-, "deer and horses," for -mṛgendra-, "king of beasts." The theriomorphic faces or heads of the rākṣasas are a favorite theme of Vālmīki as well as of the later courtly painters. Compare the description of the rākṣasa women who guard Sītā at 5.15.9–17 and 5.20.31–33. See, too, 6.41.26–27.

"he resembles Rudra, surrounded by his malignant spirits" bhūtair vṛto rudra ivāvabhāti: See notes to verse 9 above.

25. "He wears a crown" kirīṭī: Cr takes the possessive suffix -in in the sense of "possessing something to an excellent degree." He thus glosses, "possessing an excellent crown (praśastakirīṭavān)." Given that Rāvaṇa is represented, especially in his battle guise, as possessing ten heads, one might also translate, "he wears crowns." None of the commentators explicitly suggests this possibility. However, as we see in the next note, it is evident that Cr has this understanding. On Rāvaṇa's variable number of heads, see 5.8.13,19; 5.20.24,26; 5.7.2–14; and notes.

"with his face adorned with swinging earrings" calakuṇḍalāsyaḥ: Literally, "having a face that has swinging earrings." As hinted in the previous note, Cr glosses, "of whom the faces are equipped with swinging earrings (calakuṇḍalair yuktāny āsyāni yasya)," evidently referring to the ten-headed form of Rāvaṇa.

"an elephant lord" nāgendra-: As in the previous verse, the term could equally well mean "serpent lord." Ñ2,D6,10,11,T2,3,G1,2,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead nagendra-, "lord of mountains." The commentators and the translators who follow them are divided as to whether to take the term nagendra- in apposition to -vindhya- or (so Cg) as a reference to Himalaya. Cg's interpretation seems plausible, as the Himalaya is often regarded as the king or overlord of mountains. Compare Kumārasambhava 1.1, where the Himalaya is called nagādhirājaḥ.

26. "subduer of his foes" ariṃdamam: Ñ2,V,B4,D1,3,4,6,7,9–11,13,G1,3,M1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the nominative ariṃdamaḥ, in which case the epithet applies to Rāma and not Vibhīṣaṇa.

27. "I can clearly make out" suvyaktaṃ lakṣaye: Ñ,D6,7,10,T2,G2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Gorresio (6.36.3) read instead na vyaktaṃ lakṣaye, "I cannot clearly make out."

28. "Not even . . . like that" naivaṃvidham: Literally, "not of such a type." Ñ,V1,2,B2–4,D1–4,11,13,M5, Gorresio's edition (6.36.3), and the commentary of Cr omit the negative particle na to read evaṃvidham, yielding the sense "of such a type." Among the translators consulted, only Dutt (1893, p. 1277) and Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 312) follow this reading in which the idea is that Rāvaṇa's appearance is like that of the divine and demonic heroes.

"the heroes among the gods and dānavas" devadānavavīrāṇām: We follow Cr, the only commentator to remark on the compound, in reading it as a tatpuruṣa with an introjected dvandva (devadānavayor vīrāṇām). The compound can also be read, less plausibly in our opinion, as a complete dvandva in the sense of "gods, demons, and heroes." Several of the translators consulted have read the compound in this latter sense.

29. "of that immensely powerful rākṣasa" mahaujasaḥ: Literally, "of that one of great power." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahātmanaḥ, "of that great one."

"they can all give battle even to mountains" sarve parvatayodhinaḥ: Literally, "all [are] mountain fighters." As in the case of the term nagaśṛṅgayodhī in verse 22 above, the expression is ambiguous. And, as with the previous expression, it can refer to those who use mountains as weapons or those who actually fight mountains. The commentators are silent here. See note to verse 22 above.

30. "by those blazing warriors" pradīptaiḥ: Literally, "by blazing ones."

"fearsome in their valor" bhīmavikramaiḥ: D9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bhīmadarśanaiḥ, "fearsome in their appearance."

"malignant spirits" bhūtaiḥ: Compare verses 9, 23–24 and notes above, where Rudra, similarly surrounded by bhūtas, is an object of comparison for Rāvaṇa.

"in bodily form" dehavadbhiḥ: Literally, "by those possessing bodies." Ct, Ck, Cg, and Cm appear to take the adjective with the rākṣasa warriors and gloss, "having large bodies (praśastadehaiḥ)." Cv similarly glosses, "having large bodies (mahādehaiḥ)." Cr, who does not gloss the term, clearly also construes it with the warriors surrounding Rāvaṇa.

Following verse 30, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [964*]: "Fortunately, I have caught sight of that evil creature. Now I shall unleash the wrath born of the abduction of Sītā."

32. "at the city gates and the gates of the buildings on the main thoroughfares" dvāreṣu caryāgṛhagopureṣu: Literally, "at the gates [and] at the road-house-gateways." Presumably the word caryā here refers to the two main roads that would link the four city gates. Commentators differ as to how to understand these references to architectural and defensive structures. They also differ in their analyses of the compound caryāgṛhagopureṣu. Cv does not comment on dvāreṣu but takes the compound to mean "strong houses [built] on the main roads (caryāgṛhayuktagopuravat caryāgṛhāṇi ca saṃcāravīthiviśaṅkaṭāni gṛhāṇi)." Ck understands the compound as follows: "caryā refers to main thoroughfares; gṛha refers to the [rākṣasas'] headquarters; and the gopuras are the terraces or structures at the outer gates (caryā mahāmargāḥ, gṛhaṃ mūlāyatanaṃ tasya gopurāṇi bahirdvāraprāsādāḥ)." Ct agrees with Ck but adds that dvāreṣu refers to the four principal gates of the city of Laṅkā (laṅkāyāś caturṣv api dvāreṣu). Cg understands dvāreṣu to refer to the inner gates (antardvāreṣu) and takes the caryāgṛhas to be strongly fortified structures built on either side of the gateways at the city gates, along the roads, to house the soldiers (caryāyuktāḥ puradvāreṣu gopuraparśvayoḥ bhaṭanivāsārthaṃ nirmitā viśaṅkaṭā gṛhāḥ caryāgṛhāḥ). Cm explains that the dvāras refer to the gates of the inner palisade (antarāprākāradvāreṣu). He then reads the compound as a dvandva consisting of caryāgṛhas and gopuras. The former he defines as "houses built at the crossroads" (presumably of the two main thoroughfares). The latter he defines as the main city gates. (caryāgṛhagopureṣu caryāgṛheṣu gopureṣu ca caryāgṛhāḥ catuṣpathanirmitā gṛhāḥ. gopurāṇi puradvārāṇi.) Cr understands dvāreṣu to refer to all of the gates leading out of Laṅkā. He takes the compound caryāgṛhagopureṣu to mean "the outer gates of the houses on the main roads (caryāṇāṃ mahāmārgāṇāṃ yāni gṛhāṇi teṣāṃ gopureṣu bahirdvāreṣu ca)." Given the ambiguity of the compound and the diversity of commentarial opinion, it is not surprising that translations vary in their rendering of this passage. See note to 6.48.8 below.

Following verse 32, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines in the upajāti meter [965*]: "For if the forest-dwelling monkeys should learn that I have come here with you gentlemen, they would take it for an opportunity. Then, all together, they might assault and destroy the empty city, difficult though it may be to conquer."

33. "summarily" sahasā: Literally, suddenly, rashly." This reading occurs only in a few, mostly southern, manuscripts (Ś,D5,9,T1,M4,5). With the exception of Ś, the entire north substitutes an entirely different reading for the first half of the verse [966*]. D6,7,10,11,T2,3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead sacivān, "his ministers or companions." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead sahitān, which Cg glosses as "all together (saṃmilitān)." This reading is rendered as "large bodies of them" in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 147). The critical editors have apparently chosen the slightly awkward reading sahasā, as it is the only one represented, however spottily, in both the north and south.

34. "Sugrīva, lord of the tawny monkeys" harīśaḥ: Literally, "lord of the tawny monkeys." See verse 37 below, where it is made explicit that the monkey in question is Sugrīva.

"the rākṣasa lord . . . he . . . charged at him" rākṣasendram . . . dudrāva rakṣodhipatim: Literally, "[he charged] the rākṣasa lord . . . the rākṣasa overlord."

35. "whose slopes were thick with trees" bahuvṛkṣasānum: Literally, "whose slopes had many trees." Alternatively, the compound could be interpreted to mean "with many trees and peaks or ridges."

"the latter": The verse provides no pronoun or any other clue to indicate the change of subject. The context, however, makes this clear. Cr tells us that we are "to provide the name 'Rāvaṇa' (rāvaṇa iti śeṣaḥ)."

37. "whose force was equal to that of the wind or great Indra's thunderbolt" anilatulyavegam . . . mahendrāśanitulyavegam: Literally, "whose force was equal to the wind . . . whose force was equal to the thunderbolt of Mahendra." Cg thinks that Indra is mentioned in order to differentiate his weapon, the vajra, from a bolt of portentious [natural] lightning (autpātikāśanivyāvṛtaye mahendrapadam). Alternatively, he suggests that the mention of the connection with great Indra, whose long practice enables him to loose the vajra with great force, is made in order to illuminate the tremendous impact of Ravaṇa's weapon (yadvā mahendrasaṃbandhoktir abhyāsavatā muktatvenāti-vegadyotanāya). See note to 6.55.43.

38. "sharp-tipped . . . appearance" -prakhyavapuḥ śitāgraḥ: D9–11 and the printed editions of Ct read instead -sparśavapuḥ prakāśam. The meaning of the reading thus presented is somewhat unclear. The first compound, meaning "whose body or form had the touch or feel [of Indra's thunderbolt]," is clear enough. The word prakāśam is, however, problematic. Translators who follow the text of Ct seem to struggle to construe the term. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 148) and Dutt (1893, p. 1278) ignore it entirely. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 174) reads it adverbially in the sense of "á découvert." Pagani (1999, p. 1008) translates the term as an adjective in the sense of "resplendissant," modifying sāyakaḥ, "arrow," which, of course, involves a significant gender disagreement. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, pp. 1577–78) has -prakhyavapuḥpra-kāśam, a reading shared, apparently, with V2, and translates the entire compound as an adjective modifying Sugrīva, "who shone with his body, which resembled the thunderbolt of Indra."

"just as the fearsome javelin hurled by Guha once pierced Mount Krauñca" guheritā krauñcam ivograśaktiḥ: Literally, "like the fierce javelin impelled by Guha [did] Krauñca." As Cg points out, the term "Guha" is an epithet of the divinity Skanda, who, according to legend, pierced Mount Krauñca in order to release a demon of the same name who had been imprisoned there by the ṛṣi Agastya. See below 6.51.19; 6.55.12; and notes.

39. "his mind reeling" viparītacetāḥ: Literally, "having a perverted or contrary mind." We follow Cg, who glosses, "his thoughts whirling (bhrāntacittaḥ)." Ct and Cm gloss, "unconscious (acetāḥ)."

"yātudhānas" yātudhānāḥ: Vālmīki uses this term, though not frequently, as a synonym for rākṣasas. On a few occasions, he appears to regard yātudhānas as a separate class of rākṣasa. See 5.3.26 and note. See, too, 6.3.27 and note.

40. "Sudaṃṣṭra" sudaṃṣṭraḥ: D6,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead suṣeṇaḥ, "Suṣeṇa."

"Jyotimukha" jyotimukhaḥ: This unusual name is apparently a version of the name Jyotirmukha lightened for metrical reasons. Cg, apparently in an effort to correct the name, glosses, jyotirmukhaḥ. Although this spelling does not appear in the printed editions of Cg, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 147) translates, "Jyotirmukha." This "correct form" appears only in the printed text of Gorresio (6.36.16), who translates accordingly (1856, vol. 9, p. 313).

"Nala" nalaḥ: As elsewhere in the poem, the list of names varies among recensions and manuscripts. M3 and the texts and printed texts of Cg read instead nabhaḥ, "Nabha." This reading appears only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 147), where, however, it is mistakenly rendered as Nābha.

"took up" samudyamya: Ñ2,V1,2,B1–3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead samutpāṭya, "uprooting or ripping up."

41. "warded off their blows" teṣāṃ prahārān sa cakāra moghān: Literally, "he rendered their blows vain."

"with swarms" -gaṇaiḥ: Literally, "with groups, hosts." Ñ,V,B,D1–3,9–11,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead -śataiḥ "with hundreds."

"jāmbūnada gold" jāmbūnada-: See note to 6.15.2.

42. "fearsome" bhīmarūpāḥ: Literally, "of fearsome form." V3,D10,11,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead bhīmakāyāḥ, "of fearsome bodies."

43. "their heroic leaders fallen" patitāgryavīrāḥ: Literally, "whose principal heroes had fallen." The reading here shows considerable variation among the manuscripts. D7,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead patitāś ca vīrāḥ (patitāḥ pravīrāḥ—so Cg, Cm), "those heroes fallen." Unlike the critical reading, these variants do not form a bahuvrīhi compound and so function independently in the verse. This leaves open the possibility of taking "heroes" in apposition to śākhāmṛgāḥ, "monkeys," in pāda c, or as an entirely separate reference, thus distinguishing, as in the critical reading, between the monkey officers and the rank-and-file soldiers. This distinction seems to reflect the situation as described in verse 42 above.

"the dart of fear" bhayaśalya-: We follow Ct, Cg, and Cm in reading the compound metaphorically (bhayam eva śalyaṃ tena viddhāḥ—so Ct). Cr proposes reading the term bhaya-, "fear," adjectivally, thus making the compound mean "by a fearsome arrow (bhayañkaraśareṇa)."

"the tree-dwelling monkeys" śākhāmṛgāḥ: Literally, "branch [dwelling] animals." Cg believes that this particular kenning for the monkeys is used here in connection with the expression "dart of fear," noted above. His argument is that, because the monkeys have dwelt only in the forest, they are unfamiliar with this kind of fear [i.e., the kind presented by Rāvaṇa's weapons] (vanacāritvenaitādṛśabhayānabhijñāḥ). See note to 6.15.15.

"the refuge of all" śaraṇyam: Literally, "the refuge, the protector." Given the tenor of the epic, which refers to Rāma, from time to time, as the universal savior (5.36.26–29 and notes; 6.13.4 and note), we are inclined to follow Cg's more Śrīvaiṣṇava gloss, "capable of providing refuge to all the world (sarvalokaśaraṇārham)." Cg contends that this expression is used here to demonstrate that affliction alone impels one to seek refuge [with the Lord] and not the practice of religious observances, which are authorized for particular times and places with the aim of securing some specific goal (etenārtir eva śaraṇāgatiprayojikā na tu deśakālādhikāriphalaniyamā ity uktam). See, too, 6.13.4 and 6.59.8. Cf. 6.31.56; 6.81.14; and notes.

44. "At once" tataḥ: Literally, "then." Ct thinks that the adverb is used here to illuminate the instantaneous response on the part of the Lord to those who take refuge with him in affliction. (atra prapatter ārtaprapattirūpatayā tasyāḥ sadyaḥ phaladyotanāya tata ity uktam. prapattyuttarakṣaṇa ity arthaḥ.)

"the mighty bowman" dhanuṣmān: Literally, "possessing a bow." Ct, Cg, Cm, and Cr all bring out the intensifying character of the possessive suffix -mant, glossing, "possessing [or master of] a mighty bow (praśastadhanuṣkaḥ [or praśastadhanuḥsvāmī—so Cr])." Cg notes that the term signifies that Rāma is "skilled at fighting with the bow (dhanuryuddhasamarthaḥ)."

"came running" sahasā jagāma: Literally, "he went suddenly." Cg understands that, by the adverb sahasā, "suddenly," we are to understand that Rāma came speedily, bow in hand, in urgent haste to protect those who had come to him for refuge. This haste, Cg continues, proceeds from Rāma's understanding that Lakṣmaṇa would want to go himself. Thus Rāma wants to intervene before that happens (sahasety anena lakṣmaṇaḥ svayaṃ gamiṣyāmīti tatpūrvam evāśritatrāṇatvarayā sadhanuḥ san jagāmety uktam).

"him" tam: Cg notes that the reference is to Rāma, who is moving swiftly in order to rescue the afflicted [monkeys]. Lakṣmaṇa, he continues, not wishing to transgress against his lord, shields him [nigalayati?]. Cg seems to view Lakṣmaṇa's intervention as an example of the maxim of "dawn at the toll station (ghaṭṭakuṭīprabhātanyāya)." This maxim, according to Apte (Appendix E, p. 60), is used to illustrate the failure to accomplish a desired object (uddeśyāsiddhiḥ). Here, presumably, the object is Lakṣmaṇa's attempt to prevent Rāma himself from going into battle. (tathaiva ghaṭṭakuṭyāṃ prabhātam ity āha tam iti. tam ārtatrāṇatvarayā vrajantam. lakṣmaṇaḥ . . . anatikramaṇāya nāthaṃ nigalayati.)

"accosted" abhyupetya: Literally, "having approached." Cg glosses, "having approached on all sides (abhitaḥ upetya)." He argues, "We are to understand that Rāma moves about variously on all sides, as if he did not realize that Lakṣmaṇa had come (anena lakṣmaṇāgamanam ajānann iva nānāpārśveṣu rāmo 'nekadhā jagāmety avagamyate)."

"these deeply significant words" vākyaṃ paramārthayuktam: Cg offers two explanations of this term. In the first, he takes it to mean "truthful," as opposed to "merely polite." In the second, he sees it as meaning "connected to the highest goal," because of its being the instrument of activating the secondary agent [śeṣabhūta, i.e., Lakṣmaṇa] in his service to the principal agent [śeṣiviṣaya, i.e., Rāma]. (paramārthayuktaṃ na tūpacārayuktam. yadvā paramārthayuktaṃ paramaprayojanayuktam. śeṣiviṣaye kaiṅkaryasya śeṣabhūtaṃ prati paramaprayojanatvāt.)" Cg's choice of terminology, contrasting the śeṣin (the principal subject) with the śeṣa (the subordinate object), also resonates with the well-known Vaiṣṇava mythological and iconographical representation of Lakṣmaṇa as an incarnation of the thousand-headed serpent Śeṣa upon whom Viṣṇu, as Śeṣaśayana or Śeṣaśāyin, rests. D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the repetitive rāmaṃ, "Rāma." Commentators who share this reading are obliged to add or understand the word vacanam, "speech."

*45. "Granted . . . Nonetheless" kāmam: Literally, "granted." We agree with Cr and Cg that the word must be read adverbially here.

*"my noble lord" āryaḥ: The nominative of the critical reading appears to be supported by only four manuscripts collated for the critical edition (D4,5,M3,4). All remaining manuscripts, both northern and southern, as well as all printed editions consulted, read instead the contextually superior vocative ārya. We have emended accordingly.

"you are perfectly capable" suparyāptaḥ: Literally, "perfectly capable." We follow Cg, who glosses, "you are perfectly able (suśakto 'si)." Ct and Cr, however, think that the missing word should be aham, "I," thus lending the following interpretation to the first half of the verse: "Surely, my noble lord, I am perfectly capable of killing this evil-minded rākṣasa." Cg allows this as an alternative interpretation. Most northern manuscripts, as well as the printed editions of Lahore (6.37.40) and Gorresio (6.36.21), read aham, "I," in place of kāmam, "granted." All translations consulted understand Lakṣmaṇa to be referring to himself.

"this evil-minded rākṣasa" durātmanaḥ: Literally, "of the evil-minded one."

"this despicable creature" nīcam: Cg's idea here is that, although Rāma is certainly capable of killing Rāvaṇa, the latter is too lowly a creature to be worthy of engaging in combat with him. (tathāpi nīcaṃ bhavatā yoddhum anarham ahaṃ vadhiṣyāmi. mahābalena bhavatā nīco 'yaṃ na yoddhum arha iti bhāvaḥ.)

"Just grant me permission, my lord." anujānīhi māṃ vibho: Cg understands that Lakṣmaṇa, as the fragment, or the secondary agent, is requesting permission of the Lord, or the principal agent. He notes that Lakṣmaṇa is suggesting that, without Rāma's permission, his own actions would undermine his true nature. (prabho śeṣin tvaṃ māṃ śeṣabhūtam anujānīhi. bhavadanujñām antareṇa me kāryakaraṇaṃ svarūpahānikaram iti bhāvaḥ.)

46. "of true valor" satyaparākramaḥ: Cg breaks this common epithet of Rāma into the words sati and aparākramaḥ. He takes the first word, sati, as part of an elliptical absolutive construction, supplying the word vidheye. This would mean "a servant being at hand." The second term, aparākramaḥ, means "lacking valor." Cg's idea here is that Rāma, having been filled with the fury of battle, now abandons it, seeing that a functionary in the form of Lakṣmaṇa is available. (sati kasmiṃścid vidheye sati. aparākramo nivṛttaparākramaḥ.)

"tremendous power" mahātejāḥ: Cg glosses, "endowed with the characteristic of tremendous radiance, which bespeaks the extraordinary nature of his excitement on this occasion (tādātvikaharṣaprakarṣāvedakasuṣamāviśeṣaśālī)."

47. "astonishingly valorous" adbhutaparākramaḥ: Cg understands this to mean that Rāvaṇa appears to be able to draw one missile, fit a second to his bow, and fire a third all at once (ekam astram ādadāna ivāparaṃ saṃdhatte tatsaṃdadhāna ivāparaṃ mokṣayatīty arthaḥ).

"for all the three worlds together" trailokyena: Literally, "by the triple world." As the various commentators explain, the reference is to the collectivity of the inhabitants of the three worlds, viz., the gods, etc. (tadvartidevādisamūhair ity arthaḥ—so Ct).

48. "his weak points and . . . your own" tasya chidrāṇi . . . svacchidrāṇi ca: Literally, "his openings and your own openings." Ct, Ck, Cm, and Cr understand the term to mean "openings or opportunities for striking (prahārāvasarān [-samayān—Ct, Ck])." Cg understands Rāvaṇa's weak points to be such things as "carelessness, etc. (anavadhānādīni)." He understands [Lakṣmaṇa's] own weak points to be an upalakṣaṇa, or a metonymic reference, to any possible weaknesses, just as one might urge someone "to look out for crows." This appears to be an allusion to the maxim of the crow as a destroyer of curds (kākadadhighātakanyāya), according to which the warning, "protect the curds from crows (dadhi kākebhyo rakṣyatām)," is a metonymic injuction to be aware of all possible threats to the yogurt (svacchidrāṇi lakṣaya kākān paśyetivat)." Professor R. K. Sharma reminds us that crows themselves are traditionally regarded as paragons of vigilance, and so the expression might also be read as an instruction to observe (and so emulate) the behavior of these birds. See R. K. Sharma 1964, p. 152.

"defend" gopaya: D6,10–11,T3,G1, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead lakṣaya, "observe."

"strive to protect yourself" yatnād rakṣātmānam: Literally, "protect yourself with effort." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead [ā]tmānaṃ gopāyasva, "protect yourself."

49. "those words of Rāma Rāghava . . . embraced him" rāghavasya vacaḥ . . . saṃpariṣvajya . . . rāmam: Literally, "words of Rāghava . . . embraced Rāma."

"doing him honor" pūjya: Cg, who reads the grammatically correct abhipūjya, glosses, "respectfully having circled [to the right] (pradakṣiṇīkṛtya)."

50. "whose arms resembled the trunks of elephants" vāraṇahastabāhuḥ: Literally, "having elephant-trunk arms." Ś1,V3,B1,4,D2,10,11,T3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the accusative -bāhum for the critical edition's nominative -bāhuḥ, thus making the description apply to Rāvaṇa rather than to Lakṣmaṇa.

"gazed upon" dadarśa: Literally, "he saw." Our translation tries to express the fact that, rather than engage Rāvaṇa in battle at this point, Lakṣmaṇa seems merely to stand and watch him attack the monkeys. The sequence of the battle is somewhat odd here, although it is well attested in all recensions. Lakṣmaṇa has rushed off to engage Rāvaṇa in battle, but suddenly, without any introduction, Hanumān intervenes in verse 51. Rāvaṇa then engages in battle with Hanumān and other monkeys for the next thirty-six verses, only turning his attention to Lakṣmaṇa at verse 88, after having first dealt with the monkey warriors.

52. "his right arm" bhujam . . . dakṣiṇam: For some reason, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 148) translates, "left arm." No manuscript evidence supports this reading.

53. "Because of your invulnerability, you vanquished the gods, dānavas, gandharvas, and yakṣas, along with the rākṣasas." devadānavagandharvā yakṣāś ca saha rākṣasaiḥ / avadhyatvāt tvayā bhagnāḥ: The syntax is somewhat ambiguous in that the phrase saha rākṣasaiḥ, "along with the rākṣasas," can be understood to mean either that Rāvaṇa defeated his own race as well as the others mentioned or that, in concert with the rākṣasas, he defeated the others. D6,9–11,T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead devadānavagandharvair yakṣaiś ca saha rākṣasaiḥ / avadhyatvaṃ tvayā prāptam, "you have obtained invulnerability with respect to gods, dānavas, gandharvas, and yakṣas, along with the rākṣasas." This variant avoids the ambiguity of the critical edition.

"But you should fear the monkeys." vānarebhyas tu te bhayam: Literally, "but there is fear or danger for you from monkeys." Some of the commentators seem disturbed that humans, the other major category excluded from Rāvaṇa's boon, are not mentioned here. Cr takes the term vānara to refer to extraordinary people (e.g., Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa) who may resemble ordinary mortals (vānarebhyaḥ prākṛtanarasadṛśebhyaḥ prākṛtavilakṣaṇajanebhya ity arthaḥ). Cs argues that humans are to be included because of their similarity to monkeys and that Hanumān naturally mentions his own species first. He also suggests that one could break up the word vānarebhyaḥ into two parts, vā and narebhyaḥ, thus referring more directly to humans (nara). (vānarebhyaḥ kapibhyaḥ. tebhyo 'vṛtatvād varasyeti bhāvaḥ. narebhya ity api kapisāmyād vaktavyam. tathāpi svasyaiva puraḥsthiteḥ svajāter grahaṇam ity avagantavyam. vānarebhya ity atrāvṛttyā tatrāpi padacchedena vānarebhyo vā tebhya iva narebhyo 'pi bhayam iti.)

54. "This . . . hand" bāhuḥ: Literally, "arm, forearm, paw."

"with its five fingers" pañcaśākhaḥ: Literally, "with its five branches."

"the living spirit" bhūtātmānam: The term normally refers to the individual soul and is thus glossed as jīvātmānam by Ck and Cm. Cr and Cs gloss, "life breaths (prāṇān)" and "life (prāṇam)," respectively. See 6.81.20 and note below, where the term is used again but where the context lends it a somewhat different connotation.

"from your body" dehāt: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead dehe, "in your body," which then construes with ciroṣitam, "where it has long dwelt," to yield the sense "in your body, where it has long dwelt."

56. "acquire eternal fame" sthirāṃ kīrtim avāpnuhi: Cg and Cm take the expression to be contemptuous on Rāvaṇa's part (sopālambhoktiḥ). Cg understands: "The meaning is that you will acquire the kind of fame [implicit in the phrase], 'Hanumān crept up on Rāvaṇa and struck him' (hanumān rāvaṇam upasṛtya prahṛtavān ity etādṛśīṃ kīrtim avāpsyasīty arthaḥ)."

57. The commentators understand Hanumān's comment in this verse to be a response to Rāvaṇa's taunting remarks. In reminding Rāvaṇa of the death of Akṣa, Ck, Cm, and Ct think that he is demonstrating his valor and therefore that he need not demonstrate it again (pūrvam eva jñātatvād idānīṃ kimapi madvikramaviṣaye jñātavyaṃ nāstīti bhāvaḥ—so Ct). Cr understands him to be making a veiled suggestion that he will kill Rāvaṇa (etena tvām api haniṣyāmīti sūcitam). Crā argues that Hanumān, recognizing the ironic nature of Rāvaṇa's comments, gives him a fitting reply (jñātavikrāntam iti vacanaṃ solluṇṭhanaṃ jñātvā taducitam uttaram āha). See note to verse 56 above.

"struck down" prahṛtam: Literally, "struck." Ñ2,V1,2,B4,D2,4–7,9–11,T, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead prahataṃ, "slain."

"on an earlier occasion . . . Akṣa" pūrvam akṣam: Hanumān slays Akṣa at Sundarakāṇḍa 45.

58. "Addressed in this fashion" evam uktaḥ: Cg adds that Rāvaṇa is provoked to rage by Hanumān's revelation of his weak spot (i.e., grief over the loss of his son) (marmodghāṭanena saṃjātaroṣa ity arthaḥ).

59. "staggered back and forth" cacāla . . . muhur muhuḥ: Literally, "he moved again and again."

Following 59 ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [973*]: "Standing still for a moment, the wise and powerful [monkey] steadied himself . . ."

60. "with the palm of his hand" talena: D5,6,9–11,T2,3,G3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sa tena, "he, by that (monkey)," thus eliminating the reference to the palm of the hand.

"like a mountain during an earthquake" bhūmicale 'calaḥ: The poet plays on the kenning acala, "immovable one," for mountain.

61. "slapped down" talatāḍitam: Literally, "struck with the palm of the hand."

"the . . . gods, and asuras" devāḥ sahāsurāḥ: Literally, "the gods together with the demons." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead devāḥ surāsuraiḥ. This reading is redundant in that the terms deva and sura are, for all practical purposes, fully synonymous. Cr is the only commentator to remark on this reading. He negotiates the difficulty by defining the devas as the three great divinities of the Hindu pantheon, the so-called trimūrti, Brahmā, etc., thus leaving the term sura to refer to the lesser vedic divinities (devā brahmāditrayaḥ). On the asuras' cheering the discomfiture of Rāvaṇa, see note to verse 110 below.

"cheered" neduḥ: We normally translate the verb $\sqrt{nad}$ as "to roar or bellow." However, in the context, as Ct, Cr, and Ck point out, we must understand that the divinities are cheering and applauding Hanumān's feat. Cr says, "They cried, 'Bravo! Bravo!' (sādhu sādhv ity ūcuḥ—Cr)." Cf. verse 110 and note below.

64. "why bother praising me?" kiṃ vikatthase: Literally, "why are you praising?" The verb vi $\sqrt{katth}$ commonly means "to boast," and most translators take it in this sense. We, however, are inclined to follow Cg, who, citing Dhātupāṭha 2.36, takes it in its sense of "[false or ironic] praise." (kiṃ kimarthaṃ vikatthase ślāghase. katthaślāghāyām iti dhātuḥ.) This fits the context established in verse 62 above, and, thus far, Rāvaṇa has indulged in no braggadocio.

"Now strike once again" sakṛt . . . praharedānīm: Hanumān appears to have in mind some chivalrous notion of the code duello in which the opponents take turns striking at each other. Since he has most recently slapped Rāvaṇa, it is, in his estimation, Rāvaṇa's turn to strike rather than to go on chattering. This appears to be the argument of Cg, who says, " 'When struck by an enemy, strike once again, then again one's own blow leads to or provides the means [to demonstrate] valor,' this is Hanumān's intention. By the word 'now,' he means to say, 'Previously, because of my own carelessness, you are still alive,' that is the idea. (sakṛt tu prahara śatruṇā prahṛte punar ātmanaḥ prahāro vikramaparipāṭīm āṭīkata iti hanumato hṛdayam. idānīm iti pūrvaṃ madanavadhānāj jīvasīti bhāvaḥ.)"

"fool" durbuddhe: This term, of course, can equally mean "evil- or perverse-minded one" and is so interpreted by most translators. We, however, along with Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 149), follow Cg, who glosses, "ignorant of the relative significance of blows (prahāratāratamyānabhijña)."

"Rāvaṇa's anger" krodhas tasya: Literally, "his anger."

65. "the mighty rākṣasa" vīryavān: Literally, "the mighty one."

"energetically raised" yatnāt . . . udyamya: Literally, "having raised zealously or effortfully." D6,9–11,T2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read āvṛtya, "having turned," for udyamya, "having raised."

"Struck once again" hataḥ punaḥ: D9–11,M3, and the printed editions of Ct read instead punaḥ punaḥ, "again and again," which must then be construed with the verb saṃcacāla, "he staggered." Since the line is elliptical without the participle hataḥ, "struck," even the commentators and translators who follow the vulgate text tend to add or understand the participle.

66. "stunned" vihvalam: Literally, "agitated, perturbed, alarmed." We follow the interpretation of Cg, who glosses, "dazed, stupefied, bewildered (mūrcchitaḥ)."

"mighty" mahābalam: Cg, evidently disturbed by the fact that Hanumān has been put out of action, uses this epithet to demonstrate that even now he is unconquerable by his enemies (tadānīm api parair anabhibhavanīyam).

Following verse 66, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [978*]: "Ten-necked Rāvaṇa, the valorous overlord of the rākṣasas . . ."

67. "he tormented" ādīpayāmāsa: Literally, "he burned or inflamed."

68. "with one hand" kareṇaikena: Cr, perhaps in an effort to exaggerate the monkey's strength, suggests adding the gerund utpāṭya so that we understand, "having ripped up with one hand and hurled." Cg thinks that the mention of throwing the mountain with one hand would have us understand that Nīla is using the other to ward off Rāvaṇa's arrows (anenetareṇa śaravāraṇaṃ gamyate).

69–70. "saw that Rāvaṇa . . . was engaged in battle . . . he said" viprekṣamāṇaḥ . . . abravīt . . . saṃyuktaṃ rāvaṇam: The syntax of verses 69 and 70 is somewhat unclear. It is not entirely certain whether the poet intends the accusative rāvaṇam of 70b to be the object of the participle viprekṣamāṇaḥ, "seeing," in 69c, the verb abravīt, "he spoke," of 69d, or both. Cm, like us, understands that Rāvaṇa is the object only of the participle, "seeing." Ct understands it to be the object of both verbal elements, whereas Cg connects it only with abravīt. Our understanding is as follows: Hanumān, having been dazed by Rāvaṇa's blow, has now recovered and, in the normal course of things, would renew his combat with him. Rāvaṇa, however, thinking that Hanumān has been put out of action, turns his attention to a new opponent, Nīla. Seeing this, Hanumān is angered that he cannot resume the fight because, as he notes, to do so would violate the warrior code of conduct. This interpretation is more or less followed in the translations of Dutt (1893, p. 1281) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 149).

Pagani (1999, p. 1010) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 150) understand that Hanumān is addressing Rāvaṇa. They believe that he is rebuking Rāvaṇa for engaging in combat with another. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1581) shares the view that the remarks are addressed to Rāvaṇa but understands the comment, as we do, i.e., that Hanumān is refraining from continuing his battle with Rāvaṇa because it is not proper to do so under the circumstances. The translation of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 175), like the text itself, is ambiguous in this regard. The notion that Hanumān is angrily rebuking Rāvaṇa for his conduct is supported explicitly only in the northern variant [982* = Gorresio 6.36.51–52].

See 4.17.13, where Vālin rebukes Rāma for attacking him while he was engaged in battle with another. See also ManuSm 7.92, where a prohibition on such behavior is given.

72. "Nīla, the lord of the army of tawny monkeys" haricamūpatiḥ: Literally, "the lord of the army of tawny monkeys."

"slayer of enemy heroes" paravīrahā: The critical apparatus notes a variant found only in GPP (6.59.74d), varavīrahā, "slayer of eminent heroes" or "eminent slayer of heroes." We believe that this reading is probably a typographical error, as NSP, an edition of Ct's text, reads with the critical edition, and the editors of GPP have not noted the variant "para-." Among the translators consulted, only Pagani (1999, p. 1010) renders this inferior reading, translating, "éminent destructeur de ces ennemis."

"like the fire at the end of time" kālāgnir iva: Literally, "like the fire of Kāla." Cf. note to 6.56.8.

73. "dhavas" dhavān: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead drumān, "[aśvakarṇa] trees."

"in full bloom" supuṣpitān: The adjective seems to relate most closely to the mango trees, although it can also be construed with the entire list of trees mentioned. Pagani (1999, p. 1010) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 150) take the adjective to modify the other, unnamed trees mentioned in pāda c.

"various" vividhān: Oddly, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 176) translates, "de toute essence," which Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 151), following Roussel, renders as "of varying fragrance."

74. "as they came toward him" tān . . . samāsādya: Literally, "as he approached them." Cg glosses, "having come into [their] proximity (samīpaṃ prāpya)."

75. "a great mountain" mahācalaḥ: Ñ1,B2,D2–4,6–8,10,11,T2,3,M3,5, the printed editions of Ct (NSP, GPP = 6.59.77), and Gorresio's edition (6.36.56) read instead mahābalaḥ, "mighty one," which modifies "he," i.e., Nīla. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 176) renders, "le colosse." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 151).

"shrunk his body" hrasvaṃ kṛtvā . . . rūpam: Literally, "having made his form short or small." As Hanumān has copiously illustrated in the Sundarakāṇḍa, the vānaras have a virtually unlimited power to change their size. Nīla appears, however, to be the only monkey other than Hanumān to demonstrate this ability. See 5.1.9,10,144–151; 5.2.43–46; 5.51.7; etc. See Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 44–47.

77. "first on the tip of Rāvaṇa's flagstaff, next on the point of his bow, and then on the top of his crown" dhvajāgre dhanuṣaś cāgre kirīṭāgre ca: Literally, "on the top of the flagstaff, on the top of the bow, and on the top of the crown." Although the text does not state it, we are to assume that Nīla is swiftly leaping from point to point, as, presumably, Rāvaṇa tries to strike him.

"they were amazed" vismitāḥ: Ck, Ct, and Cm indicate that heroes are astonished because of the impossibility of anyone standing on Rāvaṇa's crown in battle (rāvaṇa-kirīṭe sthiter yuddhe kenāpi duṣkaratvāl lakṣmaṇādayas trayo 'pi vismitāḥ). Crā notes that Hanumān's astonishment is particularly remarkable, since he is famed for the swiftness of his movements (na māruter asti gatipramāṇam iti prasiddhagatilāghavo hanumān api saṃjātavismayo 'bhūd ity arthaḥ).

78. "He . . . invoked . . . the divine weapon-spell of Agni" astram āhārayāmāsa . . . āgneyam: Literally, "he invoked the Āgneya astra." See note 81 below. See, also, 6.59.83 and note. See, too, note to 6.36.26.

79. "as they watched intently" labdhalakṣyāḥ: Literally, "having obtained an object." The term, whose normal sense is "having hit the target," is somewhat obscure here. The commentators generally take it to mean that the monkeys have found an occasion for joy in Nīla having Rāvaṇa humiliated and therefore are delighted. (labdhaharṣa-viṣayāḥ. ata eva hṛṣṭāḥ—so Ct.) Cg and Cm, although they share this interpretation, offer, as an alternative, that the monkeys are gazing fixedly at Nīla (nīlam eva paśyanta iti vārthaḥ). We believe that this latter interpretation makes more sense in the context and also avoids the redundancy of the previous reading. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 150) follows this interpretation. Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 316) renders the compound as "rinfrancati e baldanzosi." Only Ś,D3,12,T2,3 read with the critical edition. Most other manuscripts and editions read labdhalakṣāḥ. The reading should probably be emended, although such an emendation would not alter the meaning of the compound.

81. "charged with the divine weapon-spell of Agni" āgneyena . . . saṃyuktam: Literally, "conjoined with the Āgneya." We agree with Cg and Cr in understanding the term āgneya (literally, "that which belongs to Agni") as an elliptical reference to the Āgneya-mantra, or spell for invoking the power of the fire god to charge a weapon. Cf. note to 6.35.5. See 6.55.115; 6.59.83; and notes.

82. "Your swiftness derives from this extraordinary trickery of yours" lāghavayukto 'si māyayā parayānayā: Literally, "through this great power of illusion, you are endowed with swiftness." We follow Ct, Ck, Cm, and Cr in taking the word māyā, "power of illusion or magical power," in the sense of "trickery (vañcanayā)." See S. Goldman 2006a.

83–84. "Now try to save your life" jīvitaṃ khalu rakṣasva: Literally, "now save your life."

"monkey" vānara: Cg, who reads 82cd with 83ab and thus has the synonymous vocatives kape and vānara in the same verse, tries to spare the poet the accusation of redundancy by taking the former as a kind of adjective in the sense of "having a fickle nature (cañcalaprakṛte)."

"You seem to appear in many different forms." tāni tāny ātmarūpāṇi sṛjase tvam anekaśaḥ: Literally, "You create many different forms of yourself." Commentators and translators are divided as to how to interpret this phrase. Ct, Ck, Cr, and Cm take the reference to be to the [treacherous] actions, which conform to his nature, that Nīla is performing in self-defense (ātmayogyāni svaparākramocitāni tāni karmāṇi yady api sṛjasi). This interpretation has been followed in the translations of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1582), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 176), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 151), and, based on a slight variant (Gorresio's edition, 6.36.64), Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 317). Dutt (1893, p. 1282) and Pagani (1999, p. 1011) understand Nīla to be changing himself into many different forms. None of the commentators consulted supports this interpretation. Cg is aware of it, however, and refutes it on the grounds that it contradicts Rāvaṇa's statement in verse 82 above, stressing once again Nīla's extraordinary swiftness. Cg's understanding, and the one we believe is correct, is that, in dashing around Rāvaṇa so swiftly from place to place (as in verse 77 above), Nīla is creating the illusion of multiplying himself. (lāghavātiśayena sṛjasīva dṛśyasa ity arthaḥ. nanu tāni tānīty anena rāvaṇo nīlaṃ nānātanuparigrahayuktaṃ manyata ity avagamyata iti cen na. kapeḥ lāghavayukto 'sīti pūrvoktivirodhāt.) Crā makes this argument even more explicit in his comments to verse 77.

"loosed" muktaḥ: Printed editions of the text of Cg, as well as the apparatus of GPP and Cg's commentary, show the variant yuktaḥ, which Cg glosses as prayuktaḥ, "employed, deployed." This variant is not recorded in the critical apparatus.

"charged with a divine weapon-spell" astraprayojitaḥ: Literally, "employed with an astra." We follow Cg, who glosses, "charged with the mantra that governs a divine missile (astramantreṇābhimantritaḥ)." See note to 6.35.5.

"will rob you of your life, even as you seek to save it" tvām . . . jīvitaṃ parirakṣantaṃ jīvitād bhraṃśayiṣyati: Literally, " it will cause you to lapse from your life, [even] as you are guarding your life."

85. "nocked the arrow and, with that divinely charged weapon, struck" saṃdhāya bāṇam astreṇa . . . atāḍayat: Cr, the only commentator to discuss this verse, reads the phrase somewhat differently, taking the instrumental astreṇa elliptically with bāṇam rather than as the karaṇa, or instrument, of the finite verb. He glosses, "nocking that arrow, which was charged with the astra, that is, the divine weapon-spell (astreṇāstramantreṇābhimantritaṃ bāṇaṃ saṃdhāya)." This interpretation is followed by Pagani (1999, p. 1011). Several translators additionally appear to read the gerund saṃdhāya, "having nocked," in the sense of "having charged [the arrow with the divine spell]" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1582; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 150; and Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 176). See note to 6.35.2.

87. "because he was endowed with his father's divine power" pitṛmāhātmyasaṃyogāt: Nīla's father is Agni, who will, of course, not permit his son to die as a result of being struck by his own fiery weapon. As Ct puts it, an arrow invested with the divine spell of Agni cannot burn fire itself (pitur agner māhātmyasaṃyogān na hy agnyastrābhimantrito bāṇo 'gniṃ dagdhum arhati). Cg comments that this demonstrates Agni's tenderness for his son (pitṛmāhātmyam agneḥ putratayā dayālutvavaibhavam). The power of the god of fire to spare certain individuals from the effects of burning is a recurrent theme in Vālmīki. Compare 5.51.8–33 and notes, where fire fails to injure Hanumān when his tail is set alight; and 5.53.18–26, where Sītā is unharmed by the conflagration in Laṅkā. This theme will reemerge most famously later in the Yuddhakāṇḍa during the agniparīkṣā, or fire ordeal, of Sītā (6.104).

88. Following verse 88, D5–7,9–11,T,G2,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of two lines [987*]: "Confronting him in the midst of battle and warding the others off,[1] the valorous lord of the rākṣasas, blazing, took his stand and twanged his bow."

[1]"Confronting him . . . and warding the others off" āsādya . . . vārayitvā: Literally, "having met . . . having warded off." Neither gerund has an explicit object. The commentators, with whom we agree, supply Lakṣmaṇa as the object of the first. They differ, however, regarding the second. Ck and Ct understand that the entire monkey army is the object (sarvaṃ kapibalam iti śeṣaḥ). Cr believes that the gerund vārayitvā refers to Rāvaṇa's blocking of Lakṣmaṇa's further passage through the battlefield (taduttaragamanaṃ nivārya). Cm and Cg, whom we follow, understand the object to be Sugrīva and the other monkey warriors (sugrīvādīn).

89. "addressed Rāvaṇa" tam āha: Literally, "he addressed him."

"Come after me" anvehi mām: D5,6,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read avehi for anvehi. This verb normally has the sense of "to know or to understand," and the commentators who share this reading attempt to interpret it in that vein. Ct glosses, "look at (paśya)." Cr suggests, "know that I have come (mām . . . prāptaṃ jānīhi)." Printed editions of Cg read instead abhyehi, which has much the same sense as the critical reading. Among the translators consulted, Pagani (1999, p. 1011) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1582) follow the interpretation of Ct. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 176) translates, "Apprends à me connaître maintenant."

Pāda d of this upajāti verse is hypermetric.

90. "fearsome resonant twanging of his bowstring" paripūrṇaghoṣaṃ jyāśabdam ugram: It is unclear whether the adjective paripūrṇaghoṣam, literally, "having a full sound," is to be construed with the sound of the bowstring, as we have done, or with Lakṣmaṇa's words (vākyam) in pāda a. Cr, the only commentator to remark on this adjective, is equally nonspecific. Dutt (1893, p. 1282) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 151) construe the adjective with Lakṣmaṇa's speech, rendering, "uttered in a full voice" and "full-throated," respectively. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1583) translates as do we. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 177), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 152), and Pagani (1999, p. 1011) appear to read the sequence jyāśabdam ugram as if it were a compound (jyāśabdogram). They thus understand the verse to contain a simile in which the resonant words of Lakṣmaṇa are said to be "as fearsome as the sound of a bowstring." Another ambiguity here is that the verse does not make it clear as to whose bowstring is resounding. In the previous verse, Rāvaṇa was described as twanging his bow, and no such action is described in Lakṣmaṇa's case. On the other hand, it is perfectly reasonable to assume that, in the stereotypical manner of ancient Indian warriors, Lakṣmaṇa would be twanging his own bow in response to Rāvaṇa's challenge. Indeed, it is more likely that the sounds of his rival's voice and bowstring would serve to fuel the anger of Rāvaṇa's words.

91. "How fortunate for me" diṣṭyā: Cm, acknowledging that the surface meaning of verses 90–93 is clear, lends it an inner, theologically tinged sense in which Rāvaṇa, as a great sinner, feels fortunate to have encountered Lakṣmaṇa (me pāpiṣṭhasyāpi mama diṣṭyā bhāgyavaśena dṛṣṭimārgaṃ prāpto 'sīti).

"headed for destruction" antagāmī: Literally, "going to [one's] end." Ct glosses, "you will attain destruction (antaṃ nāśaṃ prāpsyasi)." Cr offers, "whose characteristic is departure for the next world (paralokagamanaśīlaḥ). Cg glosses, "desiring destruction (vināśecchuḥ)."

"your wits disordered" viparītabuddhiḥ: Ck and Ct gloss, "stupid, foolish (durbuddhiḥ)," explaining that this description applies to Lakṣmaṇa because he has come to fight with Rāvaṇa for his own destruction (mayā saha yuddhāya prāṇanāśārtham āgamanād viparītabuddhir durbuddhiḥ). Cr explains the term here to mean a person whose mind is perverse in that it is fixed on fighting with someone with whom one ought not do battle (viparītāyoddhavye yodhanaviṣayā buddhir yasya saḥ).

"the land of death" mṛtyudeśam: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,8–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mṛtyulokam, "the world of Mṛtyu."

92. "As Rāvaṇa was bellowing in this fashion . . . replied" tam āha . . . garjantam: Literally, "he [Lakṣmaṇa] said to him [Rāvaṇa] who was bellowing."

"exposing the white tips of his fangs" udvṛttasitāgradaṃṣṭram: Literally, "whose white-tipped fangs were prominent." D5–7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read -śitāgra-, "sharp tips," for -sitāgra-, "white tips."

93. "your courage . . . your strength, your valor, and your prowess" vīryam . . . balaṃ pratāpaṃ ca parākramaṃ ca: The four terms are closely synonymous and often interchangeable. Cg attempts to restrict the meanings of two of the terms, glossing pratāpa as "the ability to intimidate one's enemies (śatrubhīṣaṇatvam)" and parākrama as "heroism (śauryam)." Cg understands, moreover, that here Lakṣmaṇa uses all the terms ironically (sopahāsoktiḥ—literally, "mocking speech"). He notes that these are the "heroic" qualities of someone who has taken the guise of an ascetic to abduct Sītā when no one was around (tava vijane yativeṣeṇa sītām apahṛtavataḥ). See note to 6.2.14.

96. "released from his bow a . . . shower of arrows" bāṇavarṣam . . . vavarṣa . . . kārmukasaṃprayuktam: Literally, "he showered an arrow-shower, which was impelled by his bow." The syntax is somewhat awkward, and the usage of saṃprayuktam, "impelled," is unusual. Cr glosses, "released (tyaktam)," which is probably the intended sense. Cg, on the other hand, glosses, "fixed to or placed on the bow (saṃhitam)." Cr, alone among the commentators, attempts to justify the syntax. He argues that the word saṃprayuktam, "released," is governed by both the subject, "Rāma's younger brother (rāmānujaḥ)," and the apparent instrument, "the bow (kārmuka-)," in order to express the identity of the action and the subject (kriyākriyāvator abhedavivakṣayā saṃprayuktam ity asya viśeṣye 'nvayān nāsaṃbhavaḥ). Thus, he argues that the syntax is not impossible.

"With these arrows—razor-tipped, half-moon-headed, finely barbed, and crescent-headed" kṣurārdhacandrottamakarṇibhallaiḥ: Literally, "with razors, half-moons, excellent barbed ones, and crescent-headed arrows." We share Cg's view that this is a list of four different types of arrows. Cg defines the types as follows: kṣuras are those in the form of a barber's cutting tool (i.e., razor) (nāpitaśastrākāraiḥ); ardhacandras are those whose heads are in the form of the half-moon (ardhacandrākāramukhaiḥ); karṇis are barbed—literally, "eared"—arrows (karṇiśaraiḥ); and bhallas are double-edged (ubhayapārśvadhāraiḥ) arrows. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 151), however, understands that only two types of weapons are described here. He renders, "with razor-sharp half-moon karnis and double-edged darts."

"calmly" na cukṣubhe ca: Literally, "and he did not tremble." Ct and Ck understand that Lakṣmaṇa did not move from his position (na svasthānataś cacāla). Cg says that his heart did not become disturbed (na kaluṣitahṛdayo 'bhūt).

"Rāvaṇa's arrows" śarān: Literally, "arrows."

Following verse 96, D5–7,9–11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators and Gorresio's edition insert a passage of four lines in the upajāti meter [989*]: "Seeing his volleys of arrows rendered ineffectual, one after another, the king of the foes of the thirty gods was astonished at Lakṣmaṇa's dexterity. Once more he loosed sharp arrows."

97. "Then, swiftly" cāśu: D1,3,7,10,11,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead cāpi, "and then."

"sharp-tipped arrows" śarāñ śitāgrān: D9,11, and the printed editions of Ct (including Gita Press) read instead śitāñ śitāgrān, "sharp with sharp tips." Translators who follow this reading must add a word such as "arrows, shaft."

"whose impact was equal to that of great Indra's vajra or the thunderbolt" mahendravajrāśanitulyavegān: V3,D9–11, and the printed editions of Ct read instead mahendratulyo 'śanibhīmavegān, "[Lakṣmaṇa], who was the equal of great Indra, [fitting arrows], whose impact was as dreadful as that of the thunderbolt." This variant avoids the seeming redundancy of the critical edition's juxtaposition of vajra and aśani, which are often synonymous. Cf. verse 128 below.

98. "Then, when he had done so" chittvā ca tān: Literally, "and having cut them [to pieces]." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead śitāñ śarān, which then construes with tān pracicchedа of pāda a to read, "he cut those sharp arrows to pieces."

"self-existent Brahmā" svayambhu-: Literally, "self-existant one."

99. "slackened his grip on his bow" cāpaṃ śithilaṃ pragṛhya: Literally, "loosely grasping his bow." We follow the commentators in reading śithilam adverbially. One could also take the term adjectivally with cāpam, "bow," yielding the sense "grasping his slackened bow." Among the translators, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 151) so renders the term.

"Indra, lord of the thirty gods" tridaśendra-: Literally, "the lord of the thirty."

101. "his limbs bathed in sweat" svedārdragātraḥ: Ś1,V2,3,D5–7,9–11,T1,2,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of all southern commentators read instead medārdragātraḥ, "his limbs moist with fat." The commentators note the irregularity of this form, understanding either that the sandhi is irregular (Ct, Ck, Cm) or that the use of the "a" stem ending for medaḥ is irregular (Cg).

"the immensely powerful . . . seized a javelin" jagrāha śaktiṃ samudagraśaktiḥ: The poet plays on the echoing sounds of śaktim, "javelin," and -śaktiḥ, "power." Ct and Ck understand that Rāvaṇa, facing death, takes up Brahmā's infallible javelin as he sees no other means of saving his life (atha rāvaṇaḥ prāṇāntāpadaṃ prāptaḥ prakārāntareṇa jīvananirvāham asaṃbhāvya brahmadattām amoghāṃ śaktiṃ jagrāha).

D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read svayam ugraśaktiḥ, "himself of fierce power," for samudagraśaktiḥ, "the immensely powerful one." Translators who follow the text of Ct have either placed the awkward "himself" where they deem it appropriate or have ignored it completely.

"in that battle . . . he had been given by self-existent Brahmā" svayaṃbhudattāṃ yudhi: Literally, "in battle . . . [a javelin] given by the self-existent [one]." Some translators construe "in battle (yudhi)" with the phrase "given by self-existent Brahmā."

102. "the monkey armies" vānaravāhinīnām: Only a few manuscripts (M1–4) read with the critical edition. The textually strongest reading, shared by Ś,B4,D1–6,8,9,

12,13,T,G1,M5, is vānararākṣasānām, "[terrifying] the monkeys and the rākṣasas." V3,D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead saṃyati vānarāṇām, "[terrifying] the monkeys in the battle."

"a smokeless fire" vidhūmānala-: Ś,V3,B4,D1,3,5–13,T,G,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead sadhūmānala-, "a smoky fire."

103. "Nonetheless" tathāpi: Ct and Ck note that [despite being struck by Lakṣmaṇa's arrows] the javelin hits its mark, since, having been infused with the power of Brahmā, it is infallible (brāhmatvenāmoghatvāt).

"the younger brother of Bharata . . . with divinely charged weapons" bharatānujo 'straiḥ: M3 and the printed editions of Cg read instead bharatānujograiḥ. Although the printed editions and printed apparatus fail to show an avagraha between bharatānujo and [a]graiḥ, we believe that the only plausible way to make sense of this variant is to understand it as bharatānujo 'graiḥ, taking the adjective agraiḥ in the sense of "excellent" to modify bāṇaiḥ, "arrows," in pāda b. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 152), the only translator to render this reading, translates, "with arrows fierce as [the fire into which oblations have been made]," thus apparently reading the adjective as ugra, "fierce." Such a reading, however, would leave bharatānuja in the vocative, which would be entirely inappropriate contextually.

"blazed like sacrificial fires" hutāgnikalpaiḥ: Literally, "with [arrows] resembling sacrificial fires." The image derives its force from the fact that the sacrificial fires blaze up brightly when the oblations of ghee, etc., are offered into them.

Following verse 103, D5–7,9–11,S, and all printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of four lines in the upajāti meter [991*]: "Struck by that javelin, the powerful hero of the Raghus lay burning on the ground. The king swiftly approached him as he lay dazed and seized him with both arms."

104. D5–7,10,11,T,G (G3 after 992*),M, and all printed editions consulted of the southern recension read 6.47.106 before this verse. In this version, Rāvaṇa first attempts and fails to lift Lakṣmaṇa before Lakṣmaṇa calls to mind his Vaiṣṇava nature. Since, according to the principles laid out by the critical editors (Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv, no. 2), preference should be given to the southern reading, one might question the choice of the northern order here.

"recalled that he himself was an inconceivable portion of Viṣṇu" viṣṇor acintyaṃ svaṃ bhāgam ātmānaṃ pratyanusmarat: Literally, "he remembered his own self [as] an unthinkable portion of Viṣṇu." See verse 115 below. The commentators, naturally enough, are deeply concerned about the theological significance of this passage and its implications for the epic's conception of the avatāra as, of necessity, not fully cognizant of his own divinity. One must keep in mind here that, in the text of the southern commentators, this verse follows 6.47.106 of the critical edition in which Rāvaṇa is represented as incapable of lifting Lakṣmaṇa's body. Thus, the commentators see the present verse as providing an explanation for Lakṣmaṇa's sudden increase in weight.

The interpretations of the commentators fall into four basic categories. Cv and Cm understand that Lakṣmaṇa is recalling not that he himself is a fragment of Viṣṇu but rather is recalling Lord Viṣṇu himself, who is the root cause of all. For otherwise, they argue [i.e., if Lakṣmaṇa were to remember that he himself is a fragment of Viṣṇu], that would nullify his conception of himself as mere man, which is necessary in order to accomplish the avatāra's purpose, namely, the destruction of Rāvaṇa. Cs takes the same position, understanding ātman to refer to the entire root or source [of the universe] (ātmānaṃ mūlarūpam). He further argues that, "because of the sufficiency of self-recollection alone for the purpose [of the avatāra], one should ignore other interpretations, which have no textual basis (iti svasmaraṇamātrasyeyatkāryaparyāptatvād itaravyākhyānam amūlatvād upekṣyam)." In support of this position, Cs cites a verse to the effect that Lakṣmaṇa recalled his own inherent form (sasmāra rūpaṃ nijam eva lakṣmaṇaḥ).

Ct and Ck argue essentially that Lakṣmaṇa is recalling that he is a portion of Brahmā in order to save himself from being destroyed by Brahmā's javelin with which he has been struck. This, they argue, illustrates the maxim that one does not injure one's own (na hi svīyaṃ svaṃ hinasti). Ck illustrates this by pointing out that the sage Vasiṣṭha, who is himself grounded [as a son] in Brahmā, is not harmed by Brahmā's divinely charged weapon when it is wielded by his arch rival, Viśvāmitra (see 1.55.14–15). Ck further asserts that Lakṣmaṇa's identity with Brahmā can be determined both from his having been rescued by Garuḍa (Yuddhakāṇḍa 40) and his having been honored by Agastya and other great ṛṣis (Araṇyakāṇḍa 11–12). (One must recall here that Ck appears to be a special devotee of Brahmā and elsewhere upholds the supremacy of this divinity over even that of Viṣṇu. See note to 5.1.177.) Ct and Ck, cognizant of the issue of whether the avatāras in this epic can know of their divinity, add that Lakṣmaṇa recognizes himself as a portion of the lord's divine energy only momentarily for the purpose of saving himself from destruction by Brahmā's javelin. Ct extends this argument by stating that, in order to maintain the belief of others in the humanity he has adopted in the manner of an actor, Lakṣmaṇa does not sustain the conception of himself as divine at all times. See note below to verse 113.

Cr's position is similar to that of Cv and Cm, in that he understands ātmānam, "self," to refer to the controller of the entire universe, that is, Rāma (sarvaniyantāraṃ rāmam). He then argues that it is the very recollection of Rāma that brings about the increase in weight that makes it impossible for Rāvaṇa to lift Lakṣmaṇa.

Cg refutes each of these positions, arguing that there is no perceptible logical or causal connection between calling anyone to mind and an increase in bodily weight. He further argues that Lakṣmaṇa cannot be calling Viṣṇu to mind as he himself is essentially the inherent form of Viṣṇu. He also dismisses the argument concerning the necessity of the avatāra's regarding himself as a human, as this has no significant bearing on the question of Lakṣmaṇa's weight. Cg concludes his remarks by stressing the term acintyam, "inconceivable," indicating that the mysterious nature of what is transpiring here is beyond rational explanation.

For a discussion of the terms of Rāvaṇa's boon, which require Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa to be, in effect, generally ignorant of their own divinity, see Pollock (1991, pp. 33–43). Pagani (1999, p. 1664) remarks in a note to this passage that, because of the restrictions on Rāma's knowledge of his divine nature, this partial revelation affects only Lakṣmaṇa. See notes to 6.26.31 and 6.28.28–29.

105. "although he grasped" pīḍayitvā: Literally, "having pressed or crushed."

"unable to budge him" aprabhur lañghane 'bhavat: Literally, "he was not powerful [enough] to jump over or get the better of [him]." The term lañghana, normally

"leaping or passing over," is an odd term in this context, and the commentators differ somewhat as to how to interpret it. We follow Ck and Ct, who gloss, "moving (cālane)," noting that Rāvaṇa was unable to budge Lakṣmaṇa, much less lift him (laṅghane cālane 'pi na prabhur abhavan na samartho 'bhavat kiṃ punar uddharaṇa iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct). Cr takes the term in its sense of "assaulting, capturing," glossing, "defeating (parābhave)." Cv glosses, "weighing (tolane)," while Cg understands, "lifting (uddharaṇe)." Cm offers, optionally, "lifting (uddharaṇe)" or "weighing (tolane)."

Cg takes this opportunity to continue his theological discussion, arguing that it is precisely because Lakṣmaṇa is essentially a portion of Viṣṇu that he cannot be lifted. Cg also raises and refutes an objection that would argue against the whole concept that Viṣṇu could possess portions, since the essential nature of Viṣṇu is unitary and has no parts. Cg acknowledges the truth of this proposition but argues that the indivisible quality of the Lord refers only to his essential nature and not, as here, to the varying manifestations of his qualities. (svarūpeṇa nāṃśatvam ucyate. kiṃtu guṇāvirbhāvatāratamyāt.)

Cg concludes by remarking that Lakṣmaṇa's human form consists in his having a similar appearance to a human. The issue of the unbearable weight of the divinity resurfaces elsewhere in the Vaiṣṇava literature. Compare BhāgP 10.7.26–27, where the child Kṛṣṇa allows himself to be picked up by the whirlwind demon Tṛṇāvarta only to reassume his natural or divine weight to drag the demon down to destruction. See, too, Bhāsa's Bālacaritam 1.11. Cf. MBh 3.147.15–20.59, where Bhīma is unable to lift Hanumān's tail.

106. "With his two arms" bhujābhyām: Cg argues that, by using the dual, the poet, whom he views in any case as mocking Rāvaṇa in this verse, is showing that, although the rākṣasa lord could lift the Himalayas, etc., with merely two of his arms, he is unable to budge Lakṣmaṇa, even with all twenty. (bhujābhyām ity anena himavadādayo dvābhyām evoddhartuṃ śakyam. ayaṃ tu viṃśatibhujair api na śakyata iti sūcyate.) Cs takes the dual to refer to Rāvaṇa's two sets of ten arms (one on each side). For, Cs argues, if we were to take this simply as a reference to two arms, it would raise the question of why Rāvaṇa, having failed with two, did not use all his arms. (bhujābhyām ekaikapārśvavṛttidaśakaikatvavivakṣayā bhujābhyām iti uktiḥ. anyathā dvābhyām uddharaṇāśaktas tanuyād eva samagrair bhujair yatnam iti te 'pi vaktavyā bhaveyuḥ.) On Rāvaṇa's variable number of heads [and arms], see 6.50.11; 6.90.31; 6.92.20; 6.96.20; and notes. See, too, 5.8.13,19; 5.20.24,26; 5.47.2–14; and notes.

"the Himalayas, Mount Mandara, Mount Meru, or even the three worlds along with the immortal gods" himavān mandaro merus trailokyaṃ vā sahāmaraiḥ: Only Cg among the commentators feels impelled to specify the significance of each of the mountains mentioned and to document their mobility. Thus, he notes that the Himalaya is the universal standard for steadfastness, citing 1.1.16, where Rāma himself is said to be as unyielding as the Himalayas. Still, he notes that a part of the Himalayan chain, i.e., Mount Kailāsa, was once moved [by Rāvaṇa] (see Uttarakāṇḍa 16). Mount Mandara, Cg continues, which was capable of agitating even the incomparably deep ocean of milk, foremost among all oceans, was worn out (jarjharitatvāt?) at the time of the churning for the nectar of immortality by the ageless gods, whom he himself [Rāvaṇa] had vanquished (see 1.44.14–17 and notes). As for Meru, the crest-jewel in the circlet of the world's principal mountains, its peak was once hurled into the depths of the ocean off Laṅkā by Vāyu. As for the three worlds themselves, they, too, have had their ups and downs, since they were plunged into the depths of the sea by the demon Hiraṇyākṣa (BhāgP 3.17–18; ŚivaP [Rudrasaṃhitā] 5.42). See 6.18.32–34; 6.48.50; and notes.

"in that battle" saṃkhye: Cg believes that this term is included here as a reference to the fact that hostile or evil-hearted creatures, like Rāvaṇa, are unable to lift Lakṣmaṇa, while friendly or devoted ones, like Hanumān (as he is described in verse 112), are able to do so. Thus, he understands that the body of Lakṣmaṇa, when fallen in battle, is heavier than even the Himalayas, etc. (ripūṇām aprakampyo 'pīty anuvādāt saparikareṇāpi rāvaṇena na śakyam ity api siddham. kathaṃ tarhi hanumatoddhṛta ity atrāha saṃkhya iti. durhṛdayair noddhartuṃ śakya ity arthaḥ. ata eva vakṣyati vāyusūnoḥ suhṛtveneti. anena himavadādibhyo 'pi saṃkhye patitasya lakṣmaṇaśarīrasya garīyastoktā.)

107. This verse, both in its construction and location, is highly suspect from a text-critical standpoint. According to the critical apparatus, only three manuscripts collated (G1,M4,5) exhibit line cd (When Rāvaṇa saw that Lakṣmaṇa . . . was unconscious, he was astonished [visaṃjñaṃ lakṣmaṇaṃ dṛṣṭvā rāvaṇo vismito 'bhavat]). On this basis alone pādas cd should have been relegated to the apparatus. A majority of southern manuscripts (D5,7,T,G2,3,M1–3) and several printed editions (KK and VSP) read pādas ab following 105, whereas most northern manuscripts (Ñ,V1,2,B1–3) and printed editions (Gorresio and Lahore) read this line (pādas ab) or its variant after 105ab. In either case, the half verse would extend the list of adjectives attributed to Lakṣmaṇa as he is being grasped in Rāvaṇa's arms. The translation would yield, "Then grasping Saumitri, humbler of the dānavas' pride, who was a portion of Viṣṇu in a human body . . ." The verse is omitted entirely from D6,10,11, and the printed editions of Ct. Because of its textual distribution, the line is rendered in translation only in Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 319) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 152). The critical reading lends itself to an anomalous and improbable scenario in which Rāvaṇa, seeing Lakṣmaṇa unconscious, recognizes him as a portion of Viṣṇu. Even so, the textual evidence once again strongly supports the identification of Lakṣmaṇa and, by extension, Rāma as avatāras of Viṣṇu. See verse 104 above.

108. "enraged . . . In his rage" kruddhaḥ . . . kruddhaḥ: Ct and Ck note that Hanumān is enraged by the suffering of Lakṣmaṇa (saumitrikleśanāt kruddhaḥ). Among the commentators, only Cs remarks on the redundancy, claiming that Hanumān, although angry from his earlier encounter, now becomes exceedingly angry because of the [attempt] to carry off Lakṣmaṇa. (tataḥ kruddho lakṣmaṇākarṣaṇato 'tikruddhaḥ. kruddhaḥ pūrvam ārabhya kopī.)

109. "on the floor of his chariot" bhūmau: Literally, "on the ground, earth." We follow the suggestion of Cg, who glosses, "on the surface or floor of the chariot (rathabhūmau)," taking bhūmi in its sense of "floor [of a building]." Ct and Ck offer, "the surface that has the form of the back portion of the chariot (rathapṛṣṭharūpāyāṃ bhūmau)." We do so against the reading of several of the translators, who understand Rāvaṇa to have been knocked to the ground (Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 319; Dutt 1893, p. 1284; and Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 178), because the following text offers no evidence that Rāvaṇa has ever left his vehicle (see verse 118 below). Other translators understand that Rāvaṇa falls or falls down, but they do not specify where (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 153; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 152; and Pagani 1999, pp. 1012–13). Only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1585) translates as we do.

"swayed for a moment and collapsed" cacāla ca papāta: Literally, "he moved and fell."

Following verse 109, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of three lines [1001*]: "He hemorrhaged blood copiously[1] from his mouths, his eyes, and his ears. After rolling about, he sank down, motionless, on the floor of his chariot. Dazed and half-conscious, he was unable to stand up."

[1]"He hemorrhaged blood copiously" vavāma rudhiraṃ bahu: D10,11, and the printed editions of Ct read instead papāta rudhiraṃ bahu, "much blood fell [from his mouths] or blood fell copiously [from his mouths]."

110. "together with Vāsava" savāsavāḥ: Ś,Ñ1,B1,4,D1–4,6,8,10–13,T2,3,G1,3, M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead ca sāsurāḥ, "and along with the asuras." Ct, Ck, and Cm, who notes this as a variant reading, explain that, by harassing the asuras, Rāvaṇa has aroused their enmity, just as he has that of the gods (rāvaṇasya devavad asureṣv api kleśakaratvena teṣām api vairitvāt).

"cheered" neduḥ: Literally, "they roared, shouted." We follow Cg, who adds the words "with joy (harṣeṇa)." Ct, Ck, and Cm similarly indicate that the seers, etc., cry out with satisfaction or delight (saṃtoṣāt). Cr has them crying out, "Excellent! Excellent!" See verse 64 and note above.

111. "to Rāghava" rāghavābhyāśam: Literally, "to the vicinity of Rāghava."

112. "on account of the affection and supreme devotion" suhṛttvena bhaktyā paramayā ca: Ct understands suhṛttva to refer to Hanumān's companionship with Lakṣmaṇa (sakhitvena). Ck extends this definition by referring to the similar companionship of Garuḍa (garuḍavatsusakhitvena). See 6.40.46 and note. Cg takes the term in its literal sense of "good-heartedness (śobhanahṛdayatvam)," which he takes here to mean a sympathetic or compassionate nature. Cg further insists that this tender or loving nature is all one really needs to exhibit to the Lord and that the particle ca here is used in the sense of anvācaye, that is, to indicate that bhakti, or devotion, is merely a secondary quality in this context. Cs understands the affection, which he glosses as "disinterested assistance (animittopakartṛtva)," to be Hanumān's. But he understands the devotion to have Hanumān as its object (hanumadviṣayiṇyā paramayā bhaktyā ca).

"Lakṣmaṇa became light" laghutvam agamat: Literally, "he went to lightness." According to Ck and Ct, this verse expresses the easy access devotees have to the Lord and his incarnations as a result of the innate nature [of the divine] (svabhāvasiddham eva—so Ck). Therefore, this access is not produced by Lakṣmaṇa (nedaṃ lakṣmaṇena kṛtam). Ct adds that there is no obstacle to the acquisition of lightness or heaviness on the part of the Lord. On the contrary, Cg feels that Lakṣmaṇa's making himself light for Hanumān alone demonstrates that his lightness is intentional. (hanumata ekasya laghutvam agamal laghutvam akarot. anena laghutvasya buddhipūrvakatvam uktam.) Ct and Cm understand the thrust of this verse to be that the evidence of weakness (aśaktiḥ) and ignorance (ajñānam) on the part of Lakṣmaṇa in this passage is merely for the sake of maintaining his disguise as a mortal (mūrcchitasyāpi saumitrer jñānaśaktipratipādanena tatra tatra rāmalakṣmaṇayor ajñānāśaktipratyāyakāni vacanāni mānuṣaveṣanirvahaṇaparāṇīti mantavyāni—so Cm). In support of this contention, both commentators cite BhāgP 5.19.5 in which it is stated that the Lord takes on human birth [as Rāma] not merely to kill a rākṣasa [Rāvaṇa] but to serve as an object of instruction for mankind. For, otherwise, why, when the Lord could be enjoying his own inherent nature, would he have subjected himself to the tribulations caused by Sītā. (tatra śriśuko marttyāvatāras tv iha marttyaśikṣaṇaṃ rakṣovadhāyaiva na kevalaṃ vibhoḥ / kuto 'nyathā syū ramataḥ sva ātman[i—?]aḥ sītākṛtāni vyasanānīśvarasya //—so Cm.)

"by his enemies" śatrūṇām: Cm and Ct understand the plural here to indicate that when Rāvaṇa attempted to lift Lakṣmaṇa, he had the assistance of his followers (śatrūṇām iti bahuvacanena lakṣmaṇoddharaṇasamaye rāvaṇasyānucarais sahāyyaṃ kṛtam iti gamyate).

113. "extracted itself" samutsṛjya: Literally, "having abandoned or been expelled." Ct and Cm think that this is accomplished because of [Lakṣmaṇa's] meditation on his own nature as Brahmā (brahmatvena dhyānāt tatsamutsargaḥ). See note to verse 104 above.

"unconquerable" durjayam: Cg understands that Lakṣmaṇa's invincibility is the reason for the javelin's departure (tasya durjayasvarūpatvāc chaktis taṃ tyaktvā gatety bhāvaḥ). This is reflected in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 153). D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead nirjitam, "vanquished, defeated." Cr, disturbed at the thought that Lakṣmaṇa could actually be defeated, glosses, "nearly defeated (nirjitaprāyam)." Cf. note to 6.47.126 and Introduction, pp. 100–104.

114. Cg believes that verse 115 should precede this verse. This makes good narrative sense, in that verse 115 continues the discussion of Lakṣmaṇa's recovery upon the removal of Rāvaṇa's weapon, whereas the order of the verses in the critical edition breaks up that sequence with the reference to Rāvaṇa's action. (etac chlokānantaram āśvasta iti ślokaḥ. tato rāvaṇo 'pīti ślokaḥ paṭhanīyaḥ.) On the other hand, this order is found nowhere other than in the texts of Cg and Cm (D6,M3) and the printed editions of Cg (VSP 6.5.9.122–123; and KK 6.59.120–121). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 153) is the only translator to follow this sequence of verses.

"regaining consciousness" prāpya saṃjñām: Cr understands the reference to be to a higher consciousness whose object is the great power of Lakṣmaṇa (lakṣmaṇaprabhāvaviṣayakātibodham).

115. "recalling that he himself was an inconceivable portion of Viṣṇu" viṣṇor bhāgam amīmāṃsyam ātmānaṃ pratyanusmaran: See verse 104 and notes above.

"freed of that dart" viśalyaḥ: We follow Cr, who glosses, "free of darts (śalyarahitaḥ)." Ct and Ck understand, "his every limb free from injury (nīruksarvagātraḥ—so Ct), while Cg renders, "the openings of his wounds healed over (prarūḍhavraṇamukhaḥ)."

"restored to health" āśvastaḥ: Ck and Ct gloss, "whose collectivity of senses was restored (prāptāśvāsendriyagrāmaḥ—so Ct)," while Cg understands, "having regained consciousness (labdhasaṃjñaḥ)."

116. "that the great heroes of that vast host of monkeys had been struck down" nipātitamahāvīrāṃ vānarāṇāṃ mahācamūm: Literally, "that great army of monkeys of which the heroes had been felled." M3 and the printed editions of Cg and Cm read dravantīṃ vānarīṃ camūm, "the monkey army fleeing," for pāda b, vānarāṇāṃ mahācamūm, "that great army of monkeys." This reading is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 153). Cg notes that the monkeys flee at the sight of Rāvaṇa fixing arrows to his bow (rāvaṇasya bāṇasaṃdhānadarśanād iti bhāvaḥ).

117. Following verse 117, D6,7,9–11,T2,3,G1,2,M3,5, (G3,M1,2 insert after 118cd), and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [1011*]: "Just as did Viṣṇu with concentration [mount the back of] mighty Garutmān." D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr substitute for the second pāda of this insert āruhyāmaravairiṇam, which yields the sense "as did Viṣṇu upon Garutmān [to punish] the [demon] foe of the immortal gods."

118. "Hanumān, son of Vāyu" vāyuputreṇa . . . hanūmantam: Literally, "[words uttered] by the son of Vāyu . . . [climbed up on] Hanumān." D5,7,T1,3,G2,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm substitute the adjective balavantam, "mighty," for the proper noun. Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 153) renders this variant.

"that hero immediately climbed up" arohat sahasā śūrah: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead athāruroha sahasā, "he suddenly climbed up." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read āruroha mahāśūraḥ, "the great hero climbed up."

119. "Keeping him in sight" tam ālokya: Literally, "having seen him." The phrase is repetitive of dadarśa, "gazed upon," in the previous verse (118). Cg notes this and explains that the repetition serves to demonstrate that no interval of time has elapsed [between the actions of the two verses] (tam ālokyety anuvādo 'vyavahitapūrvakāladyotanārthaḥ).

"raced " pradudrāva: Literally, "he ran." Ct glosses, "he went quickly (śīghram agamat)," keeping in mind, no doubt, that Rāma is no longer running but is now riding on Hanumān.

"as did . . . Viṣṇu . . . Vairocana" vairocanam iva . . . viṣṇuḥ: According to Cg, the reference is to the asura king Bali Vairocana. The patronymic is, however, somewhat ambiguous, as several of the successive asura kings are descendants of Virocana. Moreover, Bali is the one demon rival of the gods whom Viṣṇu does not physically attack, instead famously tricking him out of his sovereignty by adopting the vāmanāvatāra, or dwarf incarnation. Cg remarks that the example is chosen simply to indicate how determined or forceful Rāma's approach is (sāgrahagamanamātre dṛṣṭāntaḥ). See 6.40.43; 6.49.1–2; 6.53.25; 6.59.7; 6.105.24; and notes. See, too, 1.28.2 and note. Cf. 6.30.22 and note.

120. "with a sound like the crash of a thunderbolt" vajraniṣpeṣanisvanam: D4,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead -niṣṭhuram for-nisvanam, giving the sense "[he made a bowstring sound] as harsh as the crash of a thunderbolt."

121. "Stay where you are!" tiṣṭha tiṣṭha: Literally, "Stand! Stand!"

"such an injury" vipriyam īdṛśam: Cg understands that the injury in question is either the wounding of Lakṣmaṇa or the abduction of Sītā (lakṣmaṇaprahārarūpaṃ sītāharaṇarūpaṃ vā).

"where can you go to escape me" kva nu . . . gato mokṣam avāpsyasi: Literally, "once gone, where will you obtain freedom?" We follow Cg, who supplies "from me (mattaḥ)."

122. "If you were to fly for refuge" gamiṣyasi: Literally, "you will go." We follow Ct and Ck, who understand, "you will take refuge with (śaraṇaṃ gamiṣyasi)."

"Agni Vaiśvānara" -vaiśvānara-: This is a common vedic epithet for Agni. Cr, however, takes it in a general sense, believing that it refers here to Viṣṇu (atra vaiśvānaraśabdena viṣṇuḥ pūrvottarasāhacaryāt tathā hi sūtraṃ vaiśvānaraḥ sādhāraṇaśabdaviśeṣāt).

"Śiva, bringer of auspiciousness" -śaṃkaram: Literally, "the maker of auspiciousness."

"even . . . to the ten directions" daśa vā diśo vā: Literally, "or, to the ten directions, or." The ten directions are the four cardinal compass points, the four intermediate points, the zenith, and the nadir. The expression is a common one in the epics to indicate all directions or anywhere in the world. B3,4,D1–3,5,9–11,13,T1,G2,3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read daśadhā, "tenfold," in place of daśa vā. Ct and Ck read the adverb with the directions in the sense of the tenfold directions. Cr, as an alternative, breaks the sandhi between daśadhā and diśaḥ to read daśadhā + ādiśaḥ. He then understands, "through the splitting up of your heads, you, in ten forms, will proceed to the directions (ādiśaḥ), that is, to Indra, etc., who are the indicators of the directions (kiṃca daśadhā śirobhedena daśaprakāras tvam ādiśa upadeśakartṝn indrādīn gamīn gamiṣyasi). Among the translators consulted, only Dutt (1893, p. 1285) follows this reading, rendering, "or go to the ten cardinal points in ten portions."

"still no matter where you might go, you would not escape me now" tathāpi me nādya gato vimokṣyase: Literally, "even so, gone, you will not escape me this day." Cr, however, reads the phrase differently, glossing, "even so, having gone to me, that is, having come within my sight, you will not escape from me, that is, from my arrows (tathāpi me gato maddṛṣṭipathaṃ prāptas tvaṃ me madbāṇān na vimokṣyase)." Among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 153) interprets similarly, rendering, "having come under my eye to-day." For a similar idea, see 6.67.41, where Rāma makes a comparable statement regarding Indrajit.

Pāda d is hypermetric.

123. "will soon return" sahasābhyupetaḥ: Literally, "he has suddenly drawn near." We follow the interpretation of Cg, who takes the phrase to mean "having nearly arrived (abhyupāgataḥ prāyaḥ)," which he claims should be understood to mean "he will soon come (ācirād āgamiṣyatīty arthaḥ)." Cg, as an alternative, offers the interesting interpretation that Rāma here makes no distinction between Lakṣmaṇa and himself (abhedenocyate). According to this interpretation, Rāma is saying, "He whom you struck with your javelin was, in fact, I, who have now come. So do not feel so proud, thinking, 'I have struck down Lakṣmaṇa.' (yaḥ śaktyābhihataḥ sa evāham āgatavān asmi. lakṣmaṇaṃ prāharam iti mā gā garvam iti bhāvaḥ.)" This reading is in keeping with the notion that both brothers are portions of the same divine personality, and it reflects the poet's description of Lakṣmaṇa "as a second life breath outside Rāma's body" (1.17.17 and 3.32.12). See notes to 6.19.24; 6.40.46; and 6.89.6 (2026*).

D5,9–11,T1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the gerund abhyupetya, which Ct glosses as "having vowed (pratijñāya)." He then supplies the vow: "I myself, in order to alleviate this pain, will be the death of you, along with your sons and grandsons (wives—Ck), in battle (sa eṣo 'haṃ tadduḥkhaśāntaye saputrapautrasya te saṃkhye mṛtyur bhaviṣyāmīti śeṣaḥ)." Ck also quotes this vow. Ck and Ct then read the adverb sahasā with viṣādam (gataḥ), "having suddenly collapsed."

"in his desire to cause you sorrow" icchan viṣādam: Literally, "desiring dejection." D7,9–11,T3,G,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read gacchan, "going," for icchan, "desiring." This gives an entirely different sense to the pāda. In this reading, rather than wishing to bring about the sorrow or despondency of Rāvaṇa, it is Lakṣmaṇa himself who has "gone to despondency," i.e., been knocked temporarily out of combat. This variant is rendered as "swooning, stupefied," etc., in those translations that follow the text of Ct. Ck and Ct read the participle gacchan with the word yuddham, "battle," which they supply, and then add the participle gataḥ, "gone," to construe with viṣādam. Thus, they understand, "Lakṣmaṇa, who was going to battle, was reduced to a state of weakness or collapse."

"he whom . . . he" yaś caiṣaḥ . . . sa eṣaḥ: Literally, "he, who . . . he, this one." Cs sees the pronouns as having three different referents: Lakṣmaṇa, the abduction of Sītā, and the collapse of Lakṣmaṇa. All of these, he argues, will bring about Rāvaṇa's death. (eṣa lakṣmaṇaḥ. saḥ sītāpahāraḥ. eṣa lakṣmaṇaviṣādaḥ. he rakṣogaṇarāja saputrapautrasya tavādya mṛtyur bhaviṣyati.)

"to your sons and wives as well" saputradārasya tava: Literally, "of you, along with sons and wives." D5,10,11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read -pautrasya for -dārasya, yielding the sense "to your sons and grandsons as well."

Following verse 123, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines [1015*]: "And with my arrows, I[1] slaughtered fourteen thousand well-armed and extraordinary-looking rākṣasas, who had made their home in Janasthāna."

[1]"I" etena: Literally, "by this one." We follow the commentators in taking this as an example of the usage such as, eṣo 'ham, "he, that is I," or ayaṃ janaḥ, "this person," for the first person. Cg, however, offers two additional alternatives. According to one, the pronoun refers to death (mṛtyuḥ), mentioned in the closing pāda of the preceding verse, while, according to the second, the reference is to Lakṣmaṇa, between whom and himself Rāma makes no distinction as noted above.

124. "the great monkey" mahākapim: D9–11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the nominative epithet mahābalaḥ, "mighty," which would then refer to Rāvaṇa.

"with sharp arrows" śarais tīkṣṇaiḥ: Ś1,B1,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read dīptaiḥ, "blazing," for tīkṣṇaiḥ, "sharp."

Following 124ab, D5–7,9–11,S, and Gorresio's edition insert a passage of one line [1016*, line 1]: "[Rāvaṇa struck] the immensely powerful[1] son of Vāyu, who was carrying Rāghava into battle."

[1]"the immensely powerful" mahāvīryam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahāvegam, "very swift or very powerful."

D6,7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr, as well as Gorresio's edition, insert one additional line [1016*, line 2]: "Filled with tremendous rage and remembering their earlier enmity, [Rāvaṇa struck]." Printed editions of Cg include this line in brackets following line 1016*, line 1 (= VSP 6.59.135cd; KK 6.59.132cd).

125. "since he was endowed with innate blazing energy" svabhāvatejoyuktasya: As Cg notes, we must read the noun svabhāva-, "inherent nature," adjectivally as svābhāvika-, "innate, inherent." Cr also takes svabhāva- adjectivally but glosses it as "protected by the innate blazing energy of Rāma (svābhāvikarāmatejasābhirakṣitasya)." Cs feels that this term suggests the popular notion that Hanumān derives his energy from the boons [he received from the gods] (4.65.25 and note; Uttarakāṇḍa 36). Ct and Ck gloss tejaḥ, "blazing energy," as "valor (śauryam)."

"in battle" āhave: D9,10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the awkward āhate. This reading, which is rendered by only a few of the translators who follow the text of Ct (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 179; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 154; and Dutt 1893, p. 1286), is best taken as part of a defective locative absolute construction, "when he was struck by the rākṣasa."

126. "wounded" kṛtavraṇam: Literally, "him on whom a wound was inflicted." Cr apparently dislikes the idea that Hanumān has actually been wounded. He understands the compound to mean "upon whom an attempt was made to inflict a wound (vraṇāya kṛtaḥ prayatno yasmiṃs tam)." Cr undoubtedly is thinking of the boons of invulnerability, etc., that Hanumān received from the gods and of his consequent characterization in Indian tradition as vajrāṅga, "he of adamantine body." See notes to verse 125 above. Cf. note to verse 113 above. See, too, Introduction, pp. 63–64; and Goldman and Goldman 1996, p. 55.

"was overwhelmed with rage" krodhasya vaśam eyivān: Literally, "he went to the power of anger." Here, as elsewhere, Cr appears to stress the līlā, or "play," interpretation of the avatāra's actions, reading the phrase to mean that Rāma merely takes on the appearance of someone who is angry (ācārakvibantaprakṛtikakartṛkvibantaḥ kiṃca krodhasya krodhavato vaśaṃ kāntiṃ eyivān kopavatsadṛśakāntimān abhavad ity arthaḥ). Cf. 6.35.19 and note on the similar use of the kvibanta.

127. "Advancing toward" abhisaṃkramya: The texts and printed editions of Cg (D6,M3) read instead abhicaṅkramya, the gerund of the intensive stem of abhi √kram. Cg glosses it as "approaching repeatedly (paunaḥ punyena samīpaṃ gatvā)." This reading is rendered only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 154), who translates, "with repeated attacks."

"Rāvaṇa's chariot" tasya . . . ratham: Literally, "his chariot."

"well-fletched arrows" śaraiḥ supuṅkhaiḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead śitaiḥ śarāgraiḥ, "with sharp arrowheads." Cf. notes to 6.35.12.

"missiles" -aśani-: This term, which is commonly used in the epic to denote the thunderbolt or the thunderboltlike weapon of Indra, must be taken here in the generic sense of weapons that are hurled. Pagani (1999, p. 1664), who translates "foudre," in a note on this word says that it refers not to Indra's thunderbolt but to a huge bludgeon that is used as a weapon by certain superhuman characters in the epic. She offers no lexical, textual, or other source in support of this identification, however. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1587) takes the term to mean a specific type of missile, "the Aśani". Dutt (1893, p. 1286) understands the term in its primary sense, "thunderbolt." Other translators render it as we do. See note to verse 128 below. See, too, note to 6.55.43.

128. "that resembled Indra's vajra or a thunderbolt" vajrāśanisaṃnibhena: Literally, "like the vajra or the lightning bolt." The terms vajra and aśani are often synonymous in the sense of "thunderbolt or bolt of lightning." Here we take the former to refer to the legendary weapon peculiar to the god Indra. See note to verse 127 above. Cf. verse 97 above. See, too, note to 6.55.43.

"Lord" bhagavān: This term is frequently used to describe divinities and great spiritual adepts. Here Cg, citing Amarakośa 3.2.26, in which vīryam, "strength, heroism," is listed as a synonym of bhaga, glosses, "mighty (vīryavān)."

"just as . . . Indra himself might strike Mount Meru with his vajra" vajreṇa merum . . . ivendraḥ: Cf. 5.1.108–110, where Indra is said to have cut off the wings of the mountains with his vajra.

129. "That . . . king" rājā: Cg believes that the term in this context signifies that Rāvaṇa's royal majesty was undiminished [at the time of being struck by Indra's thunderbolt] (anyūnarājabhāvaś ca sthitaḥ).

"the blows of Indra's vajra or of thunderbolts" vajrapātāśanisaṃnipātāt: Literally, "from the falling of the vajra and the fall of the thunderbolt." Ct, Cr, and Ck read the compound as samāhāradvandva, or collective dual with a singular ending, meaning "the fall of the vajra and the strike of a thunderbolt." Cg understands the compound as a madhyamapadalopī compound for which the missing term would be -yukta-, i.e., vajrapātayuktāśanisaṃnipātāt. This gives the sense of "a lightning strike linked to a blow from the vajra."

"dropped his bow" cāpaṃ ca mumoca: Cg thinks that Rāvaṇa, even though he is a heroic warrior (vīraḥ), drops his bow of his own accord in order to demonstrate that Rāma alone affords protection (vīro 'pi cāpaṃ mumoca svasya svarakṣyatvāt svayaṃ tyaktavān rāmaikarakṣyatvadyotanāya).

130. "magnanimous" mahātmā: We normally render this as "great." We believe, however, that the context, in which Rāma, seeing that his enemy is incapacitated, refrains from killing him, justifies Cg's gloss: "mahātmā means great-minded, that is, compassionate (mahātmā mahāmanā dayālur ity arthaḥ)."

"cut off his crown" kirīṭaṃ ciccheda: Cg suggests that this was done to humble Rāvaṇa's pride (mānabhañgam akarod ity arthaḥ).

"which shone like the sun" arkavarṇam: Literally, "having the color or appearance of the sun."

131. "with the top of his crown severed" kṛttakirīṭakūṭam: The commentators understand -kūṭa in another of its many senses, viz., "mass (samūham)." The idea is that Rāvaṇa, with his ten heads, would have worn multiple crowns.

"resembled a serpent robbed of its venom" nirviṣāśīviṣasaṃnikāśam: Cg notes that the simile refers to Rāvaṇa's having lost his bow (verse 129 above) (taṃ tyaktacāpam ata eva nirviṣāśīviṣasaṃnikāśam).

132. Cg believes that this verse and the one preceding it express the idea that when it comes to obtaining the Lord's protection, one must cease one's own efforts (ābhyāṃ ślokābhyāṃ bhagavadrakṣaṇe nimittaṃ svayatnanivṛttir evety uktam). This idea represents the Tengali school of Śrīvaiṣṇavism, which preaches the total self-surrender (prapatti) of the devotee to the Lord. This is sometimes called,"the Cat Doctrine (mārjāravāda)." Cs understands that Rāma is suggesting to Rāvaṇa that, by cutting off his crown, the latter should understand that he, Rāma, is quite capable of cutting off his head (kirīṭatroṭanena tvayāpi [tavāpi?] śiraḥkartanasāmārthyaṃ mamāstīti jñātam eveti bhāvaḥ).

"You have . . . struck down my heroic warriors" hatapravīraś ca kṛtas tvayāham: Literally, "By you . . . I have been rendered one whose heroes are slain or struck down." Cs offers, as an alternative reading, "on your account, I have slaughtered your heroic warriors (yadvā tvayā nimittabhūtenāhaṃ hatāḥ pravīrās tāvakā yena sa tathā kṛta iti vā)."

"I shall not bring you under the sway of death" na tvāṃ . . . mṛtyuvaśaṃ nayāmi: Cg argues that Rāma spares Rāvaṇa here in order to avoid the infamy that would be associated with killing an opponent who was exhausted from a lengthy battle (ciraraṇapariśrāntakṛntanakṛtāpavādāpanodāya saṃprati bhavataḥ prāṇāpaharaṇakarmaṇo viramāmīty arthaḥ).

Following verse 132, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines in the upajāti meter [1019*] in which Rāma's address to Rāvaṇa continues: "Go! Since you are worn out from the battle, you have my leave. Go back to Laṅkā, king of the night-roaming rākṣasas, and, when you have recovered, come forth with your chariot and bow. Then, mounted in your chariot, you shall witness my power."

133. "his great crown cut off" kṛttamahākirīṭaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read bhagna-, "broken," for the critical edition's kṛtta-, "cut off."

134. "had returned to Laṅkā" praviṣṭe: Literally, "had entered." We follow Cg and Cr, who supply the word "Laṅkā."

"along with Lakṣmaṇa" saha lakṣmaṇena: There is an ambiguity here as to whether we are to understand that Lakṣmaṇa assists Rāma in removing the darts from the monkeys or whether Rāma alone relieves Lakṣmaṇa of his darts at the same time as he relieves the monkeys of theirs. We have chosen the former interpretation, because, at verse 115 above, Lakṣmaṇa has freed himself of Rāvaṇa's weapons through recalling that he was a portion of Viṣṇu. Cg acknowledges this earlier event but understands that Rāma is going through the motions of healing Lakṣmaṇa once again as a token of respect (saha lakṣmaṇeneti lakṣmaṇasya pūrvam eva viśalyatve 'py ādarāt punaḥkaraṇam).

"removed those darts" viśalyān . . . cakāra: Literally, "he made them free from darts." The idea is that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa remove Rāvaṇa's arrows from the monkeys' bodies. Ck claims that they accomplish this through the use of curative herbs, mantras, and meditation (mantrauṣadhadhyānaiḥ).

"in the forefront of the great battle" paramāhavāgre: Cg claims that Rāma does this right on the battlefield because of the impossibility of conducting the monkeys anywhere else without first removing the arrows (paramāhavāgra ity anena viśalyakaraṇaṃ vinā sugrīvādīnāṃ harīṇām anyatrānayanāsambhavaḥ sūcyate).

135. "Indra, lord of the thirty gods" tridaśendra-: Literally, "the lord of the thirty."

"the hosts of creatures" bhūtagaṇāḥ: The term bhūta is highly polysemic. Depending on its context, it may refer to malignant spirits (as at verse 9 above), to the spirits of the departed, i.e., ghosts, or, most generally, to any kind of being whatsoever. Given the breadth implied by the context here, we have taken it in this last, most general sense. Translators have handled the term variously. Some, such as Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 155) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1588), appear to omit the term, while others, including Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 180), Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 322), and Pagani (1999, p. 1015), leave the term untranslated. Dutt (1893, p. 1287) renders, "ghosts," while Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 155), apparently referring to the use of the term in its sense of "element," translates, "the hosts of elementals."

"the guardians of the directions, and the denizens of the deep" diśaś ca / sasāgarāḥ: Literally, "the directions together with the oceans." Since we do not believe that the poet means us to understand that inanimate objects are rejoicing, we take the terms, as does Cg, to stand, respectively, for the eight dikpālas, or divinities that guard the cardinal and intermediary compass points, and the inhabitants of the ocean (sāgaravāsinaḥ). Some translators understand that it is the compass points and the oceans themselves that rejoice.

"along with the seers" sarṣi-: Ś1,Ñ2,B1,2, D1,5,9–11,M2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead sarva-, "all." This yields the sense of "all the great serpents."

"the creatures of land and water" bhūmyambucarāś ca: Literally, "those who roam the land and the water." Cg, who, as noted above, interprets the term sāgarāḥ by lakṣaṇā, "metonymy," to stand for sea creatures, makes a distinction here between marine animals and those that inhabit other bodies of [presumably fresh] water (sāgarabhinnāmbucarāḥ).

According to Cv, the breaking of Rāvaṇa's crown concludes the sixth day [of the battle] (mukuṭabhaṅgena ṣaṣṭham ahaḥ samāptam). According to Cm and Cg, this first defeat of Rāvaṇa, including the destruction of his crown, takes place on the sixth day [of the dark half of the month of Phālguna/Caitra] (ṣaṣṭhyāṃ rāvaṇamukutabhaṅgaḥ—Cg; ṣaṣṭhyāṃ rāvaṇasya prathamaparājayaḥ—Cm). Ct understands that Rāvaṇa's defeat occurs on the evening of the sixth day of the bright half of that same month [of Bhādrāśvina] (ayaṃ rāvaṇaparābhavas tanmāsīyaśuklaṣaṣṭhyāṃ śāyaṃkāle). See note to 6.4.4.

1. "insensible with agitation" vyathitendriyaḥ: Literally, "his senses agitated." Cg understands, "his mind filled with misery (duḥkhitamanaskaḥ)."

3. "the staff of Brahmā" brahmadaṇḍa-: The creator divinity Brahmā is not normally represented as wielding a staff or rod per se. Therefore, the commentators struggle somewhat to precisely identify the object of comparison here. Ct, Cr, and Cm offer as their first, or, in the case of Cr, only, interpretation that the reference is to a particular comet of a fiery color that appears at the end of a yuga, or cosmic age (yugāntasamutthito 'gnivarṇo dhūmaketuḥ—so Ct). Cg notes that "others (eke)" make this identification, although he himself, as we shall see, prefers other interpretations. Cm offers, as his second choice, that the reference is to the brahmāstra, or universally destructive divine weapon-spell of Brahmā. Ct also gives this as an alternative, explaining that the basis for the comparison is the infallibility of the brahmāstra. Cg offers this as his third alternative. Cg's first choice is "Brahmā's curse (brahmaśāpaḥ)." His second is the brahmanical staff (daṇḍa) of Vasiṣṭha, which is able to swallow up and neutralize all divine weapons (including the brahmāstra, as described at 1.55.15–23 and notes) (sarvāstranigaraṇakṣamo vasiṣṭhadaṇḍo vā). One of Rāma's arrows has earlier been compared to the staff of Brahmā (see Araṇyakāṇḍa 29.24 and note). The identification of the brahmadaṇḍa with the comet presaging universal destruction is followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1287) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1588). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 155) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 156) translate similarly to us. Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 322) renders, "scettro di Brahma." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 181) and Pagani (1999, p. 1015) leave the term untranslated. See note to 6.55.120.

"with the brilliance of lightning" vidyutsadṛśavarcasām: Literally,"having a luster similar to lightning." D7,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead -calita-, "trembling, flashing," for -sadṛśa-, "like," giving the compound the sense of "whose darting splendor was like that of lightning."

5. "by a mere human" mānuṣeṇa: Literally, "by a human."

"it is clear" khalu: Literally, "certainly, surely."

6. "those frightening words of Brahmā" tad brahmaṇo ghoraṃ vākyam: Although Rāvaṇa famously excludes men and other lesser creatures from the list of those who are powerless to harm him (1.15.4–6 and 7.10.17–18), at no point in those passages do we see Brahmā explicitly warning him about men. Ct and Ck are aware of this problem but argue that the warning is implicit in that, as indicated in verse 7 below, Rāvaṇa neglects to request immunity from humans. (nanu bhagavatā tathā bhayopadeśaḥ kutas tatrāha. devetyādi. yasmān manuṣebhyo na yācitaṃ tasmāt tebhyo bhayaṃ jānīhīty utkam ity anvayaḥ.)

"Know that you still must fear humans" mānuṣebhyo vijānīhi bhayaṃ tvam iti: Literally, "you must know fear or danger from men."

"have now come back to haunt me" mām abhyupasthitam: Literally, "has come to me."

"for they have proven true" tat tathā: Literally, "that [has come about] thus." We follow Ct and Ck in supplying "will come about (saṃpatsyate—Ct; saṃpadyate—Ck). Cm and Cg understand, "that will not be in vain (na tu mogham bhaviṣyati—Cg; tathā amogham—Cm)."

7. Ct and Ck use this verse to explain the ascription to Brahmā of the warning in verse 6. See note above.

Following verse 7, D3,5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of nine lines [1026*] in which Rāvaṇa recalls various curses he has incurred that foretell his doom: "I think that Rāma, the son of Daśaratha, is the human of whom long ago Anaraṇya,[1] scion of the Ikṣvāku lineage, had foreknowledge [when he said], 'Most wretched of rākṣasas, a man shall be born in my royal lineage who, you evil-minded disgrace to your family, shall destroy you in battle, along with your sons, your ministers, your army, your horses, and your charioteers.'[1–5] And then, too, I was cursed byVedavatī[2] as well, when, long ago, I raped her. She must have been reborn as the fortunate Sītā, delight of Janaka.[6–7] And I am now experiencing what was foretold by Umā, Nandīśvara, Rambhā, and Varuṇa's daughter[3]—for the words of seers never prove false. [8–9]"

[1]"Anaraṇya" anaraṇyena: Literally, "by Anaraṇya." Anaraṇya, a king of Ayodhyā (see 1.69.20 and 2.102.8), cursed Rāvaṇa, who in turn killed him (Uttarakāṇḍa 19).

[2]"Vedavatī" vedavatyā: The story is narrated at Uttarakāṇḍa 17.

[3]"Umā, Nandīśvara, Rambhā, and Varuṇa's daughter" umā nandīṣvaraś cāpi rambhā varuṇakanyakā: According to Cg, this list names four distinct individuals who either curse Rāvaṇa or foretell his doom (umādayaś catvāraḥ). According to Cm, Varuṇa's daughter is Puñjikasthalā, and her mention alludes to a curse Brahmā pronounced on her behalf, a curse that, like some of the others, was intended to bring about Rāvaṇa's death because of his sexual assault on a woman. (varuṇakanyakā puñjikasthalā. tena ca tannibandhanabrahmaśāpo vivakṣitaḥ. so 'pi strīdharṣaṇanimittavadharūpaḥ.) Rāvaṇa was cursed once more by Vedavatī, whom he had tried to rape and who immolated herself only to be reborn as Sītā (7.17.23). Rāvaṇa was also cursed by his own daughter-in-law Rambhā, whom he had also raped (7.26.37). However, according to the actual text, it was not Rambhā but Rāvaṇa's nephew Nalakūbara who cursed Rāvaṇa to die if he ever approached another woman who was not his wife (7.26.44). Rāvaṇa had insulted Nandīśvara, who cursed him that he would perish at the hands of monkeys who would be emanations of himself, i.e., of Nandīśvara (7.16.14–16). Dutt (1893) explains the circumstances of the various curses in a footnote on page 1288, although he provides no sources for the episodes. Pagani (1999, pp. 1664–65), too, discusses these incidents in general terms but also gives no sources for the episodes. Puñjikasthalā is mentioned at App. I, No. 3, line 250; see note 4, following 6.9.22. Here Rāvaṇa tells of how, long ago, he spied the woman Puñjikasthalā, who was on her way to Brahmā's abode. Rāvaṇa strips and rapes her, and she arrives at Brahmā's abode in a disheveled state. An apsaras named Puñjikasthalā is also identified with Hanumān's mother at 4.65.8. See 4.65.8–9 and S. Goldman 1999. Rambhā is mentioned in the same episode. According to Cm, Rāvaṇa was given a similar curse by the goddess Umā on the occasion of his shaking Mount Kailāsa (umāśāpas tu kailāsagiricālanavelāyāṃ rāvaṇa te strīnimittaṃ vadha ity evaṃrūpa iti jñeyam). The shaking of Mount Kailāsa is described at Uttarakāṇḍa 16, although no mention of Umā's curse is made there.

8. "Bearing this in mind" etad evābhyupāgamya: Literally, "having approached, having understood." Ct, Ck, and Cr, who read etad eva samāgamya, "having approached this, having understood this," as well as Cg and Cm, who read with the critical edition, all gloss, "having known, having understood (jñātvā)." Ct, Ck, and Cr understand that what the rākṣasas are to keep in mind are Rāvaṇa's words, especially regarding his cause for fear (so Ct) (madbhayaṃ nimittam). Cg and Cm take the reference to be to the various curses enumerated by Rāvaṇa in 1026* (see note to verse 7 above).

"on top of the gateways at the main thoroughfares" caryāgopuramūrdhasu: See note to 6.47.32 above.

9. "incomparably profound" apratimagambhīraḥ: The commentators, some of whom read the variant compound apratimagāmbhīryaḥ, which has the same meaning, offer no suggestions as to the sense in which we are to understand Kumbhakarṇa's profundity. The translators consulted offer a variety of interpretations, including "gravity" (Dutt 1893, p. 1288), "grandeur" (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 156), "intrépidité" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 181), "bravoure" (Pagani 1999, p. 1015), "prowess" (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 156), and "unparalleled in profundity" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1589). Gorresio's edition avoids the phrase, reading instead apratimasattvaḥ, "of incomparable strength" (6.37.14). This, in turn, may be a kind of gloss on the southern reading.

"who has been overcome by Brahmā's curse" brahmaśāpābhibhūtaḥ: Cr and Cg understand this phrase to mean that Kumbhakarṇa is asleep. They are referring to the episode related at 6.49.22–27 in which, as narrated by Vibhīṣaṇa to Rāma, Brahmā, responding to Indra's frightened pleas, curses Kumbhakarṇa to sleep perpetually like the dead (6.49.23). On Rāvaṇa's plea that he set some limit to this curse, Brahmā modifies it so that Kumbhakarṇa is to sleep for six months at a time, waking only for a single day at the end of each six-month period. This story appears to be at variance with the well-known version at Uttarakāṇḍa 10 in which, at the behest of the gods, Kumbhakarṇa is tricked by the god Brahmā and the goddess Sarasvatī into wasting the boon earned through his penances (7.10.2–8) on a request that he sleep for many years (7.10.31–41). Cs gives this matter some attention. With reference to the episode in the Uttarakāṇḍa, he concludes that the false boon is, in effect, a curse visited upon Kumbhakarṇa for his continued affliction of creatures. See verse 42 and note below. See 6.49.22–27 and notes.

10. "he . . . defeated" sa parājitam: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,6,8–13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead samare jitam, "conquered in battle."

"a fearsome army of rākṣasas" rakṣobalaṃ bhīmam: Ś,Ñ1,D10,11,T3,G2 read -bhīmabalam (so the critical apparatus), "of fearsome strength or a fearsome army," for -balaṃ bhīmam. Printed editions of the text of Ct (= GPP and NSP 6.60.15) in addition show a space between the words rakṣaḥ and bhīma-. The commentators who follow this reading (Ct, Ck, and Cr) understand rakṣaḥ to be an accusative referring to Kumbhakarṇa and a third object of the gerund jñātvā, "realizing." They thus understand, "realizing that the rākṣasa [Kumbhakarṇa] was of fearsome strength." Ct and Ck additionally think that the compound bhīmabalam can also be taken in the sense of "fearsome army" as the object of the verb ādideśa, "he dispatched, he commanded." They argue that this is possible through the rhetorical technique of āvṛtti (repetition). This interpretation has perhaps inspired the translation of Pagani (1999, p. 1016), who renders, "le très puissant Rāvaṇa recourait au rākṣasa à la force redoutable."

11. Following verse 11, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [1028*]: "[Kumbhakarṇa], who is sleeping comfortably without a care, his mind overcome by his fate.[1]"

[1]"his mind overcome by his fate" kālo'pahatacetanaḥ: This is apparently a typographical error for kālopahatacetanaḥ. Literally, "his consciousness stricken by Kāla." Although we have normally left the term kāla untranslated when it serves as a synonym for Yama, the god of death, we take it here in its sense of "time, destiny, fate."

D6,7,10,11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read kāma-, "desire, lust," for kāla, "time, fate."

12. "for six, seven, eight, even nine months at a time" nava ṣaṭ sapta cāṣṭau ca māsān: Literally, "for nine, six, seven, and eight months." The duration of Kumbhakarṇa's periods of sleep is difficult to determine with precision because the periods are stated quite differently, seemingly irreconcilably so, at different points in the poem. This provokes the commentators to seek explanations of this passage or its variants that will reconcile the different formulations. In addition to this passage, the statements on this matter are as follows:

1) At 6.49.26, Brahmā, in a modification of his original curse of perpetual sleep, declares that Kumbhakarṇa "will sleep for periods of six months [in between which] he will wake for but a single day (śayitā hy eṣa ṣaṇmāsān ekāhaṃ jāgariṣyati)."
2) At 7.10.39, at the urging of Brahmā, Sarasvatī tricks Kumbhakarṇa into requesting a boon "to sleep for many years (svaptuṃ varṣāṇy anekāni devadeva mamepsitam)."
3) At 7.13.7, Agastya tells Rāma that Kumbhakarṇa "sleeps without waking for many thousands of years (bahūny abdasahasrāṇi śayāno nāvabudhyate)."

Cg is the only commentator to discuss the critical reading. He understands, as we do, that Kumbhakarṇa on different occasions may sleep for nine months or seven months, etc. He relates this to Kumbhakarṇa's nonspecific boon request at 7.10.39. He then refers to the other two formulations, suggesting that the request to sleep for six months at 6.49.26 is either a reference through synecdoche (upalakṣaṇa) to the other, longer periods of sleep or represents the minimum time during which Kumbhakarṇa is asleep (anyūnābhiprāyaṃ vā) (so, too, Cs). Cg then provides a lengthy quotation from the Taittirīyasaṃhitā (7.5.6.1), where, in connection with the gavāmayana rite, it is stated that the sacrificial officiants reckon as a month (māsa) a period of six days (ṣaḍahaḥ). If, Cg argues, we then add up the number of such "months" indicated in the verse, we get a total of thirty "months" (i.e., $6 + 7 + 8 + 9 = 30$) of 6 days each, or 180 days. This calculation then conforms with the passage at 6.49.26, at which the rākṣasa sleeps for six months (based on a thirty-day lunar month).

Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2,3,D2,4,8,10–12, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck, as well as the printed editions of Lahore and Gorresio, read instead nava sapta daśāṣṭau ca māsān, "for nine, seven, ten, and eight months." Cg mentions this reading as a variant and comments upon it. Ct attempts to reconcile the three different passages by arguing that the verse does not specify a precise period of time for Kumbhakarṇa to sleep but simply indicates that the period has no upper limit. He further states that the reference at 6.49.26 indicates only that six months is the minimum period for which he must sleep but that, after this, his period of waking is restricted to a single day. In other words, Ct claims "the boon" of Brahmā determines only how long Kumbhakarṇa can be awake, not how long he sleeps. This, he argues, is confirmed by the other two passages mentioned above, where Kumbhakarṇa is said to sleep for many years or for many thousands of years. Cr extends this argument by claiming that, although Brahmā's boon compels Kumbhakarṇa to sleep for six months, nothing prevents him from sleeping naturally beyond that time (taduttaraṃ svābhāvikanidrāyā niṣedhābhāvāc ca). Ct then quotes another line of interpretation, which he attributes to others. According to this, the word aṣṭau is not to be understood in the sense of the number eight but as the locative of a noun aṣṭi, whose meaning here is extended to the sense of "to leave aside (tyāge)." According to this reckoning, the compound daśāṣṭau has the sense of "leaving out ten." If, then, as Ct suggests, we add up the nine and seven months mentioned in the verse, we arrive at a period of sixteen months, which, with ten months subtracted, leaves the six months of sleep referred to in 6.49.26. Although Ct does not specify his sources, this ingenious interpretation is found in a variety of other commentaries, which differ only in their derivation and lexical identification of aṣṭau. Thus Cg, who notes this variant, derives the word from the root √aś, in the sense of "eating (aśanam)," the meaning of which he extends to "loss or destruction (nāśaḥ)." Similarly, Cr glosses, "swallowing (nigaraṇa)" in the sense of "casting out (niḥsāraṇe)" and takes the word in the sense of "eating" (bhakṣaṇārthakāśadhātuprakṛtikaktinnantaḥ). Cl, quoted by Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, 377), perhaps deriving the word from the root √as, "to throw, toss," glosses, "casting out ten (daśaprakṣepe sati)."

Among the translators consulted, only Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 324) is sufficiently persuaded by this line of reasoning to translate the phrase as "da sei mesi," arguing his case for doing so on the basis of Cl's interpretation in his explanatory note mentioned above. Other translators consulted understand the duration of the periods of sleep variously. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 156), who shares the critical reading, translates as we do. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 182), followed by Pagani (1999, p. 1016), mistakenly understanding daśāṣṭau to mean "eighteen," translates, "neuf, sept et dix-huit mois." Dutt (1893, p. 1288) renders the vulgate reading literally as "nine, seven, ten, or eight months away." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1590) omits the word "seven (sapta)," rendering, "nine, ten or eight months." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 157) inexplicably renders, "for periods of two or three or nine days and sometimes for six, seven, or eight months." See note to 6.49.26 below.

Following 12ab, D5–7,10,11,T,G1,2,M, and the texts and printed editions of all southern commentators insert a passage of one line [1029*]: "For, having given his counsel, he fell asleep on the ninth day from now."

This half verse is ambiguous and somewhat controversial in that it raises once again the complex issue of how long Kumbhakarṇa has been asleep, as discussed in the preceding note. Commentators and translators differ considerably over the point from which to count the nine days, over whether one should count backward or forward in time, or about whether the term "day (ahani)" here refers, by metonymy (lakṣaṇā), to months. Ct quotes the opinion, stated elsewhere by Cg, that Kumbhakarṇa falls asleep on the ninth day before the day on which the battle starts but claims that this is not consistent with the text, since it appears to contradict Rāvaṇa's statement at 6.50.12 that Kumbhakarṇa has been asleep "for a very long time (sumahān kālaḥ)." For since, according to the commentators (see note to 6.47.135), we are now at the sixth day of battle, this would mean that Kumbhakarṇa would have only been sleeping for some fifteen days, hardly a very long time by his standards. Moreover, such a reading, one would think, raises the problem of how Kumbhakarṇa, who, through the power of Brahmā's curse, appears to be forced to sleep for a minimum of six months, could be awakened after such a brief span of time. Ct proposes, as an alternative, that we understand the word ahan, "day," by lakṣaṇā, or secondary meaning, to stand for māsa, "month." Thus, according to this interpretation, Kumbhakarṇa would have been asleep for nine months and thus could be awakened. Ct concludes by stating that this will all be made clear later on. Among the translators consulted, only Dutt (1893, p. 1288) follows this line of reasoning, translating, "he hath slept for nine months." This interpretation is, however, difficult to accept, since the counsel to which Rāvaṇa alludes must be the frank advice given to Rāvaṇa in the assembly described in lines 195–229 of App. I, No. 3 (=GPP 6.12.28–40), which follows sarga 9 in the critical edition. (See note to 6.9.22.) According to Cg, this assembly would have taken place eleven days before the start of the battle, or seventeen days before the present moment.

Cr takes a completely different approach, claiming that we should understand that, having given his counsel, Kumbhakarṇa fell asleep but will awaken on the ninth day and that he will have reached the limit for the time set for his sleeping on this very day (jāgariteti śeṣaḥ).

Cs quotes Ct in full on this point but disagrees with him, finding his argument to be contradicted by the text and claiming that his recourse to lakṣaṇā is pointless. As an alternative, Cs proposes that, in stating later on that Kumbhakarṇa has slept for a very long time (6.50.12), Rāvaṇa is merely giving an example of the way in which people who are in misery consider a short period of time as very long (duḥkhasamayatvenālpakālasyāpi bāhulyoktiḥ). As another example of this he cites Bhāgavatapurāṇa 1.14.7, where Yudhiṣṭhira, in his anxiety over Arjuna's failure to return, claims that he has been gone for seven months. Cs also provides a lexical source for this from the Nāmamahodadhi (ahas tu māsaśabdoktaṃ yatra cintāyutaṃ vrajet / evaṃ saṃvatsarādyaṃ ca viparīte viparyayaḥ //).

Cs, Cm, and, to a very elaborate extent, Cg take this line as the starting point for a day-by-day chronology of the campaign in Laṅkā. Starting from the day of Rāvaṇa's consultation with his ministers and Vibhīṣaṇa's defection (sargas 6–10 including App. I, No. 3, lines 192–229), they attempt to fit the various events and battles into the framework of nine days posited by Rāvaṇa. They justify this chronology by quoting specific verses from the earlier portions of the Yuddhakāṇḍa that indicate the passage of time. Cg takes this task particularly seriously, dating the epic's events by the lunar calendar retrospectively from the abduction of Sītā and prospectively until the death of Rāvaṇa. Cg is also concerned with reconciling his chronology (in which the events from Hanumān's meeting with Sītā in Laṅkā and the death of Rāvaṇa span only a little more than a fortnight) with Sītā's statement to Hanumān and Rāvaṇa's to Sītā, in the Sundarakāṇḍa, concerning the amount of time that remains of Sītā's year of captivity (= the fourteenth year of Rāma's exile). See note at 5.20.8. See also note to 6.4.4. See, too, 6.80.55; 6.96.30; and 6.97.33.

Translators treat the verse variously. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 182) understands that Kumbhakarṇa fell asleep on "le neuvième jour." Pagani (1999, p. 1016) says that he fell asleep "il y a huit jours." Both of these translators avoid the problematic reference to Kumbhakarṇa's counsel by either leaving the word mantra untranslated (Roussel) or rendering it as "incantation" (Pagani). Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 157) renders, "having met in consultation with me nine days ago, he has since fallen asleep." The translations of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3. p. 1590) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 156) are similar to ours.

D4,6,7,10,11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct omit 12cd ("Nonetheless, you must awaken mighty Kumbhakarṇa immediately").

13. "that great-armed warrior" mahābāhuḥ: Literally, "the great-armed one."

"will . . . slaughter the monkeys and the two princes" vānarān rājaputrau ca . . . vadhiṣyati: Cm, evidently disturbed at the notion that Rāvaṇa could be anticipating the deaths of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, insists that we add the adverb vinā, "without," so that the phrase would mean "will slaughter just the monkeys but not Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. This argument evidently derives from Cm's theological reading of the poem. For other examples of this, see notes to 5.18.6,14,16,17, etc. See, too, 6.23.1–3 and notes.

Following verse 13, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1030*]: "Indeed, he is the greatest standard-bearer in battle and the foremost among all the rākṣasas."

14. "Addicted to this vulgar pleasure" grāmyasukhe rataḥ: According to Cr, the phrase means that Kumbhakarṇa delights in sleep itself (śayane rataḥ prītimān).

"my grief at being humiliated . . . will be banished" abhinirastasya . . . bhaviṣyati na me śokaḥ: Literally, "the grief of me—who has been defeated—will not exist."

15. "For of what use to me is that hero, whose strength is equal to that of Śakra, if he can be of no assistance to me when I am in such trouble?" kiṃ kariṣyāmy ahaṃ tena śakratulyabalena hi / īdṛśe vyasane prāpte yo na sāhyāya kalpate //: Literally, "What will I do with him whose strength is equal to that of Śakra and who is not fit for assistance when such a calamity has arisen?" Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,8–13,G1,3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr substitute ghore, "dreadful," for the critical edition's prāpte, "arisen."

16. "in great agitation" paramasaṃbhrāntāḥ: Cg understands that the rākṣasas' agitation derives from their concern as to how they will be able to awaken Kumbhakarṇa at the wrong time (katham enam akāle prabodhayiṣyāma iti vyākulāḥ).

17. "those eaters of flesh and blood" māṃsaśoṇitabhojanāḥ: Although this appears to be simply a general kenning for the carnivorous rākṣasas, Cg understands the compound to indicate specifically that the rākṣasas fortify themselves for the difficult task of awakening Kumbhakarṇa by first consuming flesh, etc. (prabodhaśaktivivṛddhyarthaṃ māṃsādikaṃ bhuktvā).

"and food" tathā bhakṣyān: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahad bhakṣyam, "abundant food." Cg notes that the rākṣasas bring garlands, food, etc., in order to appease the pangs of hunger Kumbhakarṇa will experience upon being awakened (kumbhakarṇasya prabodhakālikakṣuttāpādiśāntaye gandhamālyādikaṃ gṛhītvā yayur ity arthaḥ).

18–19. "As they passed through the huge gates into . . . cavern" tāṃ praviśya mahādvārām . . . -guhām: Literally, "having entered that cavern with its huge gates." According to Ct and Ck, Kumbhakarṇa's residence is a cavity in the ground that was fashioned by the gods and resembled the paradisiacal underworld of Pātāla (pātālavad devanirmitaṃ bhūbilam ity arthaḥ). See 7.13.2–6, where Kumbhakarṇa's residence is fashioned by rākṣasa architects, who are said to be like Viśvakarman, the architect of the gods.

"which extended a league on every side" sarvato yojanāyatām: Literally, "extending one yojana all around." Those commentators who note this term understand that the cavern extends for one yojana in each of the four cardinal directions. Whether this means that the space is one yojana on a side or [measuring from a central point] two yojanas on a side is not completely clear. But compare 7.13.4, where Kumbhakarṇa's residence is said to be one yojana wide and two long. See notes to 6.18.18–19.

"redolent with every fragrance" sarvagandhapravāhinīm: Literally, "streaming forth every fragrance." D7,9–11,M1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read puṣpa-, "flowers," for sarva-, "every," yielding the sense "redolent with the fragrance of flowers." Cg, who reads with the critical edition, understands the scent to arise from such things as the sandalpaste smeared on Kumbhakarṇa's body (kumbhakarṇānuliptacandanādigandhapravāhavatīm).

"driven back by the force of his breath" kumbhakarṇasya niśvāsād avadhūtāḥ: Literally, "[they were] shaken by Kumbhakarṇa's breathing."

"Nonetheless, retaining their footing with difficulty, they managed to enter . . . with effort" pratiṣṭhamānāḥ kṛcchreṇa yatnāt praviviśuḥ: Literally, "standing with difficulty, they entered with effort."

20. "splendid" śubhām: D9–11,G2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ratna-, "jewels." In this variant, the floors are inlaid with gems as well as gold.

"He was fearsome to behold" bhīmadarśanam: Ś,Ñ1,V2,B1,3,4,D1–4,6–12, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read -vikramam, "valor," for -darśanam, "appearance," yielding the sense "of fearsome valor."

21. "they began to rouse" pratyabodhayan: Literally, "they wakened or aroused." The context requires that we read the verb as inceptive.

"grotesque" vikṛtam: This word, which can mean "strange, extraordinary, deformed, mutilated, etc.," has been interpreted variously. Cg, the only commentator to remark upon it, understands the term to refer to the transformation of [a person's] appearance during sleep (nidrākālikavikārayuktam). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 182), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 157), understands, "le monstre ('that monster'—Shastri)." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1590) offers, "in an unnatural state." Pagani (1999, p. 1016), evidently following Cg, renders, "[ils tentèrent de le tirer du profond sommeil] qui lui déformait les traits." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, pp. 156–57) and Dutt (1893, p. 1289) appear to ignore the term, while Gorresio's text (6.37.30) reads vipulam, "vast," instead.

"in the midst of his long sleep" mahānidram: Literally, "[him] whose sleep was great."

"like some crumbled mountain" vikīrṇam iva parvatam: Cg glosses the adjective as "slackened (śithilam)." The idea, evidently, is that the immensely tall Kumbhakarṇa sprawled in slumber resembles a mountain that has collapsed.

22–23. "immensely powerful" mahābalam: D5,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead arindamam, "subduer of foes."

"terrifying them" trāsayantam: Literally, "terrifying." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bhrāmayantam, "causing to spin or whirl."

Ct suggests adding the word "people (janān)" as the object of the participle. The idea is that, as in verse 19 above, the exhalations of the giant Kumbhakarṇa are powerful enough to knock people off their feet. This reading has provoked Dutt (1893, p. 1289) to compose the following curious note: "An instance of the material sublime unsurpassed in all literature. Kumbhakarṇa himself is the emblem of the material as contrasted with the spiritual typified by Rāma."

"and his huge mouth as wide as the underworld Pātāla: pātālaviplulānanam: Literally, "having a mouth as wide as Pātāla." Compare verse 50 below and 6.55.28.

"fearsome to behold" bhīmadarśanam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -vikramam, "valor," for -darśanam, "appearance," yielding the sense "of fearsome valor."

Following 23ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1041*], extending the description of Kumbhakarṇa: "Every limb of that subduer of his foes was sprawled on the bed, and he reeked of blood and marrow. His limbs were clad in golden armlets, and he wore a diadem.[1]"

[1]"that subduer of his foes . . . he wore a diadem" kirīṭinam ariṃdamam" D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead kirīṭenārkavarcasam, "his diadem lent him the brilliance of the sun."

24. "mighty" mahātmānaḥ: Literally, "great or great-minded." Given the context, we tend to take the term as a physical description, somewhat in the manner of Cr, who glosses, "making a great effort (atiprayatnāḥ)." Compare verse 32 below.

"of meats" māṃsānām: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bhūtānām, "of creatures."

"as huge as Mount Meru" merusaṃkāśam: Literally, "resembling Meru."

25. "set down" cakruḥ: Literally, "they did or made." Cg adds the word "before [him] (agrataḥ)," carrying forward the expression from the previous verse.

"deer, buffalo, and boar" mṛgāṇāṃ mahīṣāṇāṃ ca varāhāṇāṃ ca: According to Cr, this list constitutes a specification of the creatures (bhūtānām) of the vulgate verse above. See note to verse 24 above.

"an astonishing heap of food" rāśim annasya cādbhutam: The phrase could equally well be translated, as some translators have done, as "and an astounding heap of rice" (Dutt 1893, p. 1289). Owing, however, to the text's emphasis on the carnivorousness of the rākṣasas, we see the phrase as summing up the list of meats rather than supplementing it.

26. "those foes of the thirty gods" tridaśaśatravaḥ: Literally, "the foes of the thirty." Cs, who reads a variant, tridivaśatravaḥ (= D11), "the foes of the triple heavens," offers two possible interpretations. The first is that the reference is simply to sinners or evildoers, that is, those who are inimical to heaven and are therefore destined for the darkness of hell, etc. (tridivaśatravaḥ svargadviṣaḥ narakatamaādigāminaḥ pāpina iti yāvat). Cs's second interpretation is: "The foes of the gods who were present there (tatsthadevadveṣiṇa iti vā)."

"strong drink" madyāni: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead māṃsāni, "meats."

27. "they . . . covered him" ācchādayāmāsuḥ: Literally, "they covered." D9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead āśvāsayāmāsuḥ, "they refreshed or revived," which Ct glosses as "they caused to smell or inhale (ghrāpayāmāsuḥ)." Cr, whose reading is unattested in the critical apparatus, reads āvāsayāmāsuḥ, "they perfumed."

28. "yātudhānas" yātudhānāḥ: See 6.3.27 and note.

"in their thousands" sahasraśaḥ: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–3,5–13,T,M3, and the texts and printed editions of all southern commentators read instead tatas tataḥ, normally, "next" but which Cg glosses as punaḥ punaḥ, "again and again." The choice of the critical editors seems questionable here.

29. "tumultuously" tumulam: Cg understands, "uninterruptedly (nirantaraṃ yathā tathā)."

"in their impatience" amarṣitāḥ: Literally, "intolerant, angry, impatient." Cg understands that the rākṣasas roar in their anger at Kumbhakarṇa's failure to awaken despite their tremendous efforts (mahatā prayatenāpy anutthānāj jātakrodhāḥ santo neduḥ). Cr thinks similarly that they cannot tolerate the delay (vilambāsahanāḥ).

30. "Those night-roaming rākṣasas" niśācarāḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming ones." Unlike the other commentators who, like us, understand that the entire party of rākṣasas engages sequentially in the actions listed in the verse, Cr believes that different groups engage in the various actions simultaneously (kecin niśācarā neduḥ . . . kecid āsphoṭayāmāsuḥ . . . kecic cikṣipuḥ . . . kecid vipulaṃ svaraṃ cakruḥ).

"roared" neduḥ: Cr understands that the rākṣasas are summoning Kumbhakarṇa (āhvānaṃ cakruḥ).

"clapped their upper arms" āsphoṭayāmāsuḥ: The verb ā √sphuṭ, "to slap or strike," normally refers in the epic to the loud clapping of one's upper arms with the palms of the hands as a sign of delight or as a challenge to battle. Cf. 5.8.50. See, too, 6.40.62; 6.47.8; 6.65.16; and notes. Cr defines it here as "striking the arms, etc. (bāhvādīnāṃ tāḍanam)," while Cg appears to understand that the rākṣasas are actually striking Kumbhakarṇa (tāḍayāmāsuḥ).

"shook him" cikṣipuḥ: Literally, "they tossed." We follow Cg, who glosses, "they shook [his] body (śarīraṃ kampayāmāsuḥ)." Ck and Ct understand, "they pushed or prodded his body with their hands (hastais taccharīrasya praṇodanaṃ cakruḥ—so Ct)." Cr thinks that the rākṣasas are lifting Kumbhakarṇa's feet and throwing them to the ground [in an effort to get him to stand?] (tatpādāv utthāpya bhūmau nicikṣipuḥ).

31. "Upon hearing that din" śrutvā: Literally, "having heard."

"bherī and paṭaha drums" -bherīpaṭaha-: For bherīs, see 6.17.31–33 and note. B3,4, D6,9–11,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read -paṇava- for -paṭaha-. According to Apte (s.v.), the paṭaha is a small kettledrum. See note to 6.34.12.

"the clapping of the upper arms" āsphoṭita-: See note above. Cg, who takes the term in the previous verse to refer to the striking of Kumbhakarṇa, here understands the term as do the other commentators on that verse, glossing, "the sound produced by clapping the [upper] arms (bāhutāḍanajanyaśabdaḥ). See notes to 6.4.23–24 and 6.17.13–15.

"the shouting, and the lionlike roars" -kṣveḍitasiṃhanādam: The two terms can be synonymous since one of the principal meanings of the root √kṣveḍ is "to roar like a lion." (See notes to 5.55.29 and 5.60.12.) The term can also refer to shouting or a war whoop, and we have taken it in this sense to avoid redundancy. Cg argues that we are to take the term kṣveḍita here in the general sense of "roaring" and the term siṃhanāda in a more specific sense. (kṣveḍitaśabdena garjitamātram ucyate. siṃhanādam ity ekavadbhāvaḥ.) See note to 6.4.23–24.

"the birds . . . came crashing down" vihaṅgāḥ . . . nipetuḥ: Literally, "sky-goers fell." The idea that a loud sound, particularly that of bellowing or shouting, can cause birds to fall from the sky is expressed elsewhere by the poet. Compare 1.16 .16 and 4.14.20.

"flying" dravantaḥ: Literally, "running or rushing."

"soaring" kirantaḥ: Literally, "scattering or dispersing." Ct, Ck, and Cr understand, "going or flying up (udgacchantaḥ—so Ct, Ck; utpatantaḥ—so Cr)." Cg simply glosses, "entering (viśantaḥ)," while Cm prefers, "filling, pervading (vyāpnuvantaḥ)."

The meter is upajāti.

32. "huge" mahātmā: We follow Cg, who glosses, "having an immense body (mahāśarīraḥ)." See note to verse 24 above.

"cacophonous" bhṛśam: Literally, "extremely, excessively."

"bludgeons" musuṇḍī-: The critical apparatus lists numerous variants for this term. The most popular reading, that is, bhuśuṇḍīḥ, is found in Ś1,Ñ2,V1,2,B1–3,D2,4,6,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr. T1 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read musuṇṭhīḥ. Crā and Ck read musuṇṭhī-. According to MW (s.v.) and Apte (s.v.), all are synonymous and appear under the heading of bhuśuṇḍī, which is some type of weapon. Ct, Ck, Cr, Cg, and Cm all define their respective variants as types of mudgaras, or war hammers. Compare note to 6.60.11, 1336*, n. 1; and 6.78.20, 1726*, n. 3.

The meter is upajāti.

33. "with . . . trees . . . and their palms" vṛkṣais talaiḥ: V3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vakṣasthale, "on his chest."

The meter is upajāti.

34. "although powerful, were unable to remain standing before him" balavanto 'pi sthātuṃ nāśaknuvan puraḥ: Literally, "although powerful, they were unable to stand before." D6,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead kumbhakarṇasya sthātuṃ śekur na cāgrataḥ, "they were unable to stand before Kumbhakarṇa."

35. The syntax is awkward and causes considerable discomfort to the southern commentators, whose readings, although different, present similar syntactic difficulties. Cv, Cg, and Cm, supported by the printed editions of KK and VSP, argue that pādas ab constitute, in fact, a separate elliptical verse whose syntax is to be fleshed out by supplying an appropriate copula (either babhūvuḥ, "they were"—Cv, Cm; or āsan, "they were"—Cg). This line corresponds to 6.60.42 in KK and VSP. Otherwise, according to Cm and Cv, the three lines (=KK and VSP 6.40.42–43) must still be read as a single sentence, which makes the second occurrence of the word rākṣasa in pāda e redundant. Ct and Cr, who read the variants paryavārayat (so Ct) and paryavārayan (so Cr), respectively (=GPP 6.60.43b), "he or they surrounded, encircled," for the critical edition's (and Cg's, Cv's, and Cm's) paryavādayan, "they sounded," attempt a different resolution. They propose supplying the verb vādayāmāsuḥ, "they sounded," after pāda d to make a separate syntactic unit out of pādas a–d. This unit is equivalent to GPP and NSP 6.60.42, where our pādas ef constitute GPP and NSP 6.60.43ab. In our reading, it is necessary, although still somewhat awkward, to read the plural rākṣasāḥ of pāda b and the singular daśarākṣasasāhasram, literally, "ten-rākṣasa-thousands," more or less in apposition. We translate, "those rākṣasas . . . ten thousand strong."

"loudly sounded . . . right in front of him" asya purato gāḍham . . . paryavādayan: Given the syntactic difficulties mentioned above, we believe that the adverb gāḍham, "intensely," of pāda a is best construed with the only finite verb in the sequence, paryavādayan, of pāda f. Ś,V1,2,B1,D1,3,6–8,10–12,T2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read parihitāḥ, "girt, clothed," for [a]sya puratah, "right in front of him." This yields the sense "[the rākṣasas,] who had girded up their loins [literally, 'tightly wrapped or clad']." As Cg explains this, it means that the rākṣasas were girding themselves for the coming task [of awakening Kumbhakarṇa]. (parihitā dṛḍhīkṛtaparidhānā āsan. vakṣyamāṇakārye sāvadhānā āsann ity arthaḥ.) Several southern manuscripts and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the singular paryavārayat for the critical edition's plural paryavādayan, which then construes with the singular daśarākṣasasāhasram (see below). Translations that follow the text of Ct offer variants of the following: "Then rākṣasas of fearsome valor, having girded up their loins, sounded the mṛdaṅgas, etc., and all at once ten thousand of them surrounded [Kumbhakarṇa]." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, pp. 157–58), the only translator to follow the text of Cg, renders, "Then ten thousand Rākshasas, who . . . were men of formidable valour, girding their loins, sounded simultaneously numberless mṛdangas . . ."

Additionally, Ct argues that the authentic (pāṅktāḥ) reading of pāda a is tataḥ prapūritā gāḍhaṃ rākṣasair bhīmavikramaiḥ. To this he adds the word guhā, yielding the sense "the cave was densely filled with rākṣasas of fearsome valor."

"those rākṣasas . . . ten thousand strong" rākṣasāḥ . . . daśarākṣasasāhasram: Literally, "rākṣasas . . . ten-rākṣasa-thousands." The collocation of the two distantly separated words is awkward. First, it is redundant; and, second, there is no singular verb with which to construe the second term. Cv and Cm, whose reading of the first pāda differs from ours, as noted above, propose adding the verb babhūvuḥ, "they were," at the end of pāda b in an effort to separate the two into different syntactic units. Otherwise, Cm continues, the [second] occurrence of the word rākṣasa is otiose (anyathā rākṣasaśabdo 'pi ricyeta).

"many conches and jugs" śaṅkhakumbhagaṇān: Literally, "hosts of conches and pots." The exact nature of the kumbha, "pot or jug," as a musical instrument is unclear. It is difficult to determine whether it is a percussion or wind instrument; however, because of its grouping in composition with śaṅkha, "conch," we are inclined to understand it as the latter.

36. "they tried to rouse" pratyabodhayan: Literally, "they awakened." Given the context, we have followed Cs, who glosses, "they made an effort to awaken (pratibodhayituṃ kṛtavantaḥ)."

"as he lay there, like a mass of collyrium" nīlāñjanacayākāram: Literally, "who had the form of a heap of collyrium." Ś,Ñ1,V,B,D1–4,8,12,13,G1,M3, the commentaries of Cg and Cm, and the printed editions of KK and VSP (6.60.44) read instead the nominative plural -ākārāḥ, in which case the adjective refers to the rākṣasas attempting to awaken Kumbhakarṇa. Cg understands this reading to illustrate the fact that the rākṣasas form a dark mass around Kumbhakarṇa. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 157), the only translator to render this reading, translates, "[then ten thousand Rākshasas] who looked like huge hills of collyrium . . ."

"But he was oblivious to it all." naiva saṃvivide tu saḥ: Literally, "But he was not at all aware." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead na ca saṃbubudhe tadā, which can mean either "and he was not then aware [of it]" or "and he did not wake up then."

37. "they resorted to more drastic and more violent efforts" gurutaraṃ yatnaṃ dāruṇaṃ samupākraman: Literally, "they commenced an effort that was more weighty and fierce."

38. "drove . . . over him" jaghnuḥ: Literally, "they beat, struck." We follow the majority of commentators, who understand that the rākṣasas beat the animals so as to make them trample Kumbhakarṇa as a means of awakening him (tasyopari dhāvanāya—so Cg). Cs, evidently concerned by the use of the bare root √han, which usually means "to kill or injure," argues that one should take the root √han here in the sense of "to go" and read the simplex as a causative, yielding the sense "they caused them to go, drove them." Cs further understands that Kumbhakarṇa is also an implicit object of the verb. (antarṇītaṇyarthaḥ. etān kumbhakarṇopari gamayāmāsuḥ.) It is also possible, given the context of the verse, whose second half focuses on noisemaking, that we are to understand that the animals are beaten or prodded in order to make them emit loud noises. This may be further supported by the fact that it is not until verse 47 below that the actual trampling of elephants finally succeeds in awakening Kumbhakarṇa. See notes to 6.27.9; 6.80.29; and 6.81.4.

"with all their might" sarvaprāṇaiḥ: Literally, "with all their breaths or with all their vital forces."

39. "with great bundles of sticks" mahākāṣṭhakaṭañkaraiḥ: We can discover no lexical citation for the term kaṭañkara, which literally would mean "mat maker." Ck, Ct, and Cr, whom we tentatively follow, gloss, "masses or bunches (samūhaiḥ)." Cv understands, "with twigs located (at the end) of large branches (mahākāṣṭhasthastambhaiḥ)." Cg glosses, "with the sticks at the ends of large branches (mahākāṣṭhāgrastambhaiḥ)," which he takes to mean "whips mounted at the end of branches (kāṣṭhāgrasthakāśābhir ity arthaḥ)." Cm understands the term to refer to a particular type of post (stambhabhedaḥ). His interpretation is mentioned by Ct, who ascribes it to him, while Cv (who reads stambabhedaḥ, "a type of sheaf of grass,") and Cg ascribe it simply to "some [commentators] (kecit)."

"wielded" -samudyataiḥ: Literally, "upraised."

40. "filled all of Laṅkā" laṅkā samabhipūritā . . . sarvā: Literally, "all Laṅkā was filled." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead sarvā prapūritā, "all was filled," for samabhipūritā. This weak reading creates an undesirable redundancy through the repetition of the adjective sarva, "all," in pādas b and c. Cr attempts to eliminate this problem by reading the sequence sarvā saḥ, "all of . . . he," as a bahuvrīhi compound sarvāsaḥ, modifying Kumbhakarṇa and meaning "through whom all [the rākṣasas] had the hope of victory (sarveṣāṃ rākṣasānām āsā vijayavañchā yena)." This interpretation is rather dubious, especially since it is difficult to find any lexical support for a noun āsā (as opposed to the normal āśā) in the sense of "hope, wish (vañchā)."

41. "incessantly" asaktānām: Literally, "not obstructed." This adjective, which modifies the bherī drums, is best read here as if it were adverbial. Ś,D3,4,6–9,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Crā, Cm, Cg, and Cs (KK 6.60.49; VSP 6.60.49), as well as the commentary of Cr, read instead āsaktānām, "attached," which the commentators explain variously. Cr glosses, "suitably placed (yathāyogyaṃ saṃsthāpitānām)." Cg explains, "crowded together (saṃhatānām)," while Cm understands, "held by rākṣasas (rākṣasagṛhītānām)." Cs, who reads āsaktānām, glosses the term as if it were asaktānām, offering, "not connected by anything whatsoever (kenāpi padārthenāsaṃbaddhānām)." Cs further adds that if this is the case, then the drums provide a particular type of sound (tathā ced eva nādaviśeṣaḥ).

"with drumsticks of refined gold" mṛṣṭakāñcanakoṇānām: The compound actually forms an adjective qualifying the drums. We must in any case assume, however, that these are the instruments with which they are being beaten.

42. "in that profound slumber brought about by the power of the curse" atinidraḥ . . . śāpasya vaśam āpannaḥ: Literally, "he who possessed excessive sleep and was under the power of a curse." See verse 9 above and note for a discussion of Brahmā's cursing Kumbhakarṇa to perpetual slumber.

"became furious" kruddhāḥ: Cr believes that the real meaning here is that the rākṣasas temporarily desist from their efforts in frustrated rage (krodhena nivṛttā iti tātparyam). Cg, reading ahead to the next verse, understands that, although they are already worked up [by the failure of their efforts], they now become seized with a towering rage. (kruddhāḥ pūrvam eva kupitāḥ. punar api mahākrodhasamāviṣṭā abhavan.)

43. "in a towering rage" mahākrodhasamāviṣṭāḥ: V3,D6,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read tataḥ kopa-, "then . . . in anger," for mahākrodha-. See note to previous verse.

"Some of them, in their effort to awaken the rākṣasa, actually assaulted him." tad rakṣo bodhayiṣyantaś cakrur anye parākramam: Literally, "Some, about to awaken that rākṣasa, demonstrated [lit., made] their valor." According to Cg and Cr, whom we follow, the word parākrama-, "valor," refers to blows [of the fists, etc.] (muṣṭiprahārādikam—so Cg). Other translators tend to read the phrase parākramaṃ cakruḥ to mean "they exerted or redoubled their efforts or energies."

44. Following 44cd, Ñ2,B2,D5–7,9–11,T,G1 (after 1048*),2,3,M insert a passage of one line [1049*]: "Still others poured hundreds of pots of water into his ears." The reference in this line to pouring pots (kumbha) into the rākṣasa's ears (karṇa) is an obvious play on his name.

45. "powerful rākṣasas" balinaḥ: Literally, "the powerful ones."

"armed with mallets and war hammers . . . brought them down." kūṭamudgarapāṇayaḥ . . . pātayan kūṭamudgarān: Literally, "having mallets and war hammers in their hands . . . brought down mallets and war hammers."

46. "with hundred-slayers" śataghnībhiḥ: The exact nature of this weapon is unclear, as both defensive and offensive weapons of this name are mentioned in the epics and other texts. In this case, since the weapons appear to be slung by ropes, one has the impression that something like the medieval European flail or chain-mace is intended. Cg, the only commentator to attempt to identify this weapon, says it is a type of mace (gadāviśeṣaiḥ). See 6.3.12 and note.

"ropes and straps" rajjubandhana-: Literally, "ropes and bindings." Cr understands, "bindings in the form of rope (rajjurūpabandhanaiḥ)." Cg, however, whom we follow, reads the compound as a dvandva in the sense of "ropes and bindings of leather, etc. (bandhanāni carmādīni rajjavaś ca bandhanāni ca)."

47. "they made a thousand elephants trample" vāraṇānāṃ sahasram . . . pradhāvitam: Literally, "a thousand of elephants was made to run." Compare verse 38 and note above. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 159) inexplicably renders, "titans," for vāraṇa, "elephants." The variant vānarāṇām, "of monkeys," is cited in the critical apparatus as a metathesis of vāraṇānām, "of elephants," in G1 and G2. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 184) appears to have independently made the same error, translating, "un millier de Vānaras."

"aware of a slight sensation" buddhaḥ sparśaṃ param: Literally, "cognizing a mere touch." We follow Cg and Cr, who gloss param, normally, "last, final, other," in its adverbial sense of "only (kevalam)." Cr understands that Kumbhakarṇa was conscious merely of the touch of the elephants but not of the elephants themselves (buddhvā paraṃ kevalaṃ sparśam abudhyata gajān nābudhyatety arthaḥ). Cg has a similar idea, claiming that Kumbhakarṇa woke up (buddhaḥ viratanidraḥ) thinking that the trampling of the elephants was merely some insects crawling across his body (vāraṇapradhāvanaṃ kevalaṃ sparśam abudhyata kīṭādisparśo 'yam iti manyate sma). Translators vary in their treatment of the word param, rendered here as "slight." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1593) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 158) translate more or less as we do. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 184) and Pagani (1999, p. 1018) understand the term in the sense of "last or final (dernière—Roussel; ultime—Pagani). Dutt (1893, p. 1291) ignores the term. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 159) appears to render the term as "at last."

48. "Ignoring the tremendous blows of mountaintops and trees that were being hurled down upon him" sa pātyamānair giriśṛṅgavṛkṣair acintayaṃs tān vipulān prahārān: Cg understands that, even though Kumbhakarṇa has awakened, the rākṣasas continue to rain blows upon him to make him get up (pātyamānaiḥ prabodhe 'py utthānāya punaḥ kṣipyamāṇaiḥ). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 184), Pagani (1999, p. 1018), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 159), interpreting the present participle acintayan, "ignoring," in a past sense, understand the reference to be to Kumbhakarṇa's heedlessness of the earlier blows.

"at the violent interruption of his sleep" nidrākṣayāt: Literally, "from the destruction of sleep."

"yawning" vijṛmbhamāṇaḥ: Cg understands the term to refer to stretching the limbs (gātrabhaṅgaṃ kurvāṇaḥ).

"oppressed by fear and hunger" kṣudbhayapīḍitaḥ: The compound is somewhat ambiguous, since it can be read, as we have, as a dvandva or as a tatpuruṣa with the sense of "oppressed by the fear of hunger." Cg mentions both alternatives. In the first, he notes that Kumbhakarṇa's fear is the result of his untimely awakening (bhayam atrākālabodhanakṛtam). All translators consulted read the compound as a tatpuruṣa, taking it to mean "pangs of hunger" (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 158; and Dutt 1893, p. 1291); "severe hunger" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 184; Pagani 1999, p. 1018; and Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 159); or "bugbear of hunger" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1593). Gorresio omits this verse.

The meter is upajāti.

49. "which were as strong as mountain peaks" giriśṛṅgasārau: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead jitavajrasārau, which can be understood variously. Cr, the only commentator to explain the compound, takes it to mean "[the two arms] by which many warriors, whose strength was, that is, whose bodies were like adamant, had been defeated (jitā vajrasārā vajrāṅgā bahuyoddhāro yābhyāṃ tau bāhū). Among the translators consulted, only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1593) follows this interpretation. Dutt (1893, p. 1291) renders, "superior in force to the thunder-bolt itself." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 184) offers, "durs comme des diamants taillés." Pagani (1999, p. 1018) translates, "solides comme des pointes de diamant." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 159) understands, "hard as cut diamonds."

"resembled two mountain peaks or great serpents" nāgabhogācalaśṛṅgakalpau: Literally, "similar to snake coils and mountain peaks." Cg explains the former simile to refer to the length of Kumbhakarṇa's arms and the second to their hardness. (dairghye nāgabhogadṛṣṭāntaḥ. kāṭhinye 'calaśṛṅgadṛṣṭāntaḥ). Alternatively, Cg suggests that the second upamāna refers to the thickness or muscularity (pīnatve) of the arms.

"grotesquely" vikṛtam: We follow Cg in reading the term adverbially (bhayaṃkaraṃ yathā bhavati tathā), as does Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 158), "hideously" and Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 327), "sformatamente." The term can also be read as an adjective in the sense of "hideous, monstrous, etc.," modifying mukham, "mouth," as has been done by Dutt (1893, p. 1291), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 184), Pagani (1999, p. 1018), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 159), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1593).

"was like the gaping mare's head fire that lies beneath the sea" vaḍavāmukhābham: Literally, "like the mouth of the mare." The reference, as Cg notes, is to the mythical submarine mare (samudramadhyavartiny aśvastrī). According to Hindu mythology, the mare's mouth, which contains a vast insatiable fire that swallows up the waters of the ocean and is situated at the South Pole, constitutes a gaping portal into the underworld. See O'Flaherty 1971, pp. 9–27. According to MBh 1.171.17–22, this fire was formed from the undischarged cataclysmic rage of the sage Aurva. See R. Goldman 1977. Translators have treated the term variously. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1593) takes it to refer specifically to the fire. Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 327) renders, "pari alla bocca del Pâtâla," while Pagani (1999, p. 1018) translates, "comme la porte des enfers." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 158) offers, "the abyss of the Vadavā fire in the bowels of the sea." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 184), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 159), leaves the term untranslated. See, too, 6.55.118; and 6.61.42 and notes.

The meter is upajāti.

50. "as he yawned prodigiously" jājṛmbhamāṇasya: Ck, Ct, and Cm read the intensive in the sense of "yawned repeatedly (punaḥ punar jṛmbhamāṇasya—so Cm)." This sense has been adopted by those translators who give any force at all to the secondary form.

"his mouth as wide as the underworld Pātāla" vaktraṃ pātālasaṃnibham: Literally, "a mouth resembling Pātāla." See verse 23 and note above, as well as 6.55.28 and note.

"the sun, maker of day, risen over the summit of Mount Meru" meruśṛṅgāgre divākara ivoditaḥ: Literally, "the maker of day risen on the tip of the summit of Meru." Cg and Ck note the astronomical anomaly of this simile and propose different strategies to resolve it. The issue is that, according to purāṇic cosmology, the great axial mountain Mahāmeru is the central point around which the sun orbits. Therefore, the notion of the sun rising over the summit of Meru becomes impossible. Cg's explanation is that the poet is referring not to the axial Mount Meru but rather to a lesser mountain, which Cg calls Sāvarṇimeru. (merur atra sāvarṇimeruḥ. tadagrasyaiva sūryasaṃbandhasambhavāt. atra divākarasyoditatvaṃ mahāmeror uttarabhāgasthapuryapekṣayā.) We are unable to find any other reference to a mountain of this name in the primary or secondary literature. However, a mountain called Sumeru is mentioned at BrahmāṇḍP 1.15.42 and BrahmP 176.7. Cf., too, MatsyaP 9.36, where Merusāvarṇi is named as a son of Brahmā and one of the Manus; and also 11.38, where Manu Sāvarṇya lives on the peak of Meru and performs austerities (cf. BrahmāṇḍP 1.1.104). Cg, however, provides another explanation, namely, that one should take the participle udita, "risen," in the sense of dṛṣṭa, "seen, visible," since one can take a verb of motion (here udita) in the sense of awakened. (yadvodito dṛṣṭa ity arthaḥ. gatyarthānāṃ buddhyarthatvāt.) Thus, he understands that Kumbhakarṇa awoke just as the sun would awake on Mount Meru. Ck simply identifies the simile as an abhūtopamā, i.e., one in which the upamāna, or standard of comparison, is not, in fact, real. Ct notes that the basis for the simile is that Kumbhakarṇa's mouth is situated on [the top of] so huge a body (mahāśarīrasthatvāt). See 6.18.32–34; 6.47.106; and notes.

51. "was at last fully awake" pratibuddhaḥ: We follow Cg, who suggests that what is intended is a full and final awakening (samyakprabodho 'tra vivakṣitaḥ).

"like a gale from the mountains" parvatād iva mārutaḥ: Literally, "like wind from a mountain."

52. "was like that of a drenching storm cloud crossed by cranes at summer's end" tapānte sabalākasya meghasyeva vivarṣataḥ: Literally, "was like that of a showering cloud accompanied by cranes at the end of the hot season." The image of lines of white cranes outlined against black storm clouds is a popular one in Indian literature and painting. Compare, for example, Kālidāsa's Meghadūta 1.9. Cg, the only commentator to share this reading, thinks that the simile is based on the appearance of Kumbhakarṇa's bright ornaments against his dark body (tasya sābharaṇasyety arthaḥ). This interpretation is supported by, and perhaps derived from, such passages as RaghuVa 11.15 and KumāSaṃ 7.39, where the poet Kālidāsa describes, respectively, the rākṣasī Tāḍakā and the dark goddess Mahākālī with the same simile based upon their wearing white skull ornaments on their dark bodies. Compare the similar description of Kumbhakarṇa at 6.49.3. See, too, Bhāsa's description of Ghaṭotkaca in Madhyamavyāyoga, verses 4 and 5. Compare also the similar description of Rāvaṇa at 5.47.2–14 (specifically, verse 8); see notes ad loc.

D6,7,10,11,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr substitute, for pādas cd, a line with a much more terrifying upamāna, "[his appearance] was like that of Kāla, eager to consume all beings at the end of the cosmic age (yugānte sarvabhūtāni kālasyeva didhakṣataḥ)."

53. "which resembled blazing fires and whose luster was like that of lightning, looked like two great blazing planets" dīptāgnisadṛśe vidyutsadṛśavarcasī / dadṛśāte . . . dīptāv iva mahāgrahau: Cg attempts to explain the rationale behind each of these fiery images. According to him, the image of lightning is used to express the darting, rolling motions of the demon's eyes when his slumber is interrupted. The image of the planets, which Cg takes to be the baleful Saturn and Mars, shows how oppressive Kumbhakarṇa's gaze would be to others. The image of blazing fire, Cg concludes, expresses Kumbhakarṇa's high degree of cruelty. (vidyutsaḍṛśavarcasīti nidrāvirāmakālikacāñcalyoktiḥ. mahāgrahau śanyaṅgārakāv iti parapīḍakatvoktiḥ. dīptāgnisadṛśa iti krauryātiśayoktiḥ.) Cf. Bhāsa's description of Ghaṭotkaca in his Madhyamavyāyoga, verse 5. See, too, 6.49.3 and note.

Following verse 53, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1063*]: "Then they showed him all the many different kinds of food, and that immensely powerful rākṣasa consumed the boars and buffaloes."

54. "drank wine and a pot of marrow" medaḥkumbhaṃ ca madyaṃ ca papau: According to Cg, the meat and blood consumed in pādas ab were taken to satisfy Kumbhakarṇa's hunger and thirst. (bubhukṣāśāntyarthaṃ māṃsam adann ity arthaḥ . . . tṛṣṇāśāntyarthaṃ śoṇitaṃ pibann ity arthaḥ.) Cg adds that the additional food and drink mentioned in pādas cd is to fatten or strengthen him further (punar āpyāyanārthaṃ medaḥkumbhān madyaṃ ca papau).

55. "they approached" samutpetuḥ: Normally, the verb has the sense of "to rise or spring up." Here, however, we agree with Ct that it has the sense of "coming face to face (saṃmukham ājagmuḥ)." Cg explains that up until this point the rākṣasas have kept themselves hidden in fear of Kumbhakarṇa. But now, since he is sated and his anger has abated, they dare to approach him openly. (pūrvaṃ kumbhakarṇabhayād antardhāya sthitāḥ. idānīṃ tṛptatvena śāntakrodhatvāt prakāśam ājagmur ity arthaḥ.)

Following verse 55, B3,D5–7,9–11,S insert, while Ñ,V,B2,D2,4,13 insert following verse 52, a passage of two lines [1067*]: "His eyes half-closed with sleep, his vision clouded, he cast his glance all around him and addressed[1] those night-roaming rākṣasas."

[1]"addresssed" uvāca: M1–3 and the printed editions of Cg read instead "he looked at (dadarśa)."

56. "astonished at having been awakened" bodhanād vismitaḥ: Ct and Cr note that Kumbhakarṇa, whose sleep has no natural termination, is astonished at having been awakened in an untimely fashion (svabhāvato nidrāpagamābhāvenākālabodhanād iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct). For "awakening (bodhanāt)," Cg glosses, "the awakening of one who is not to be awakened (aprabodhyabodhanāt)."

*57. "Why have you gentlemen put so much effort into waking me?" kim artham aham ādṛtya bhavadbhiḥ pratibodhitaḥ: Literally, "For what purpose have I been awakened assiduously by you?" The critical edition, evidently as a result of an unnoted typographical error, reads the unattested āhatya, "having beaten [me]," instead of ādṛtya, which we believe to be correct. The critical apparatus shows Ś,B1,4,D1–3,8,12,13 reading āgamya, "having approached [me]," while D5,M5 read āvṛtya, "concealing [yourselves]." The critical apparatus shows no other variations. All printed editions of the southern text and all commentators read ādṛtya. We have emended accordingly. Commentators understand the verb $\bar{a}\sqrt{dṛ}$ in its sense of "to be attentive, effortful, or persevering." This interpretation is followed by all translators who have this reading, with the exception of Dutt (1893, p. 1292), who takes the root in its other common sense of "to honor, respect." Compare 6.5010ab and note below, where the same construction is used with the gerund ādṛtya.

"and that no danger of any kind presents itself" bhayaṃ vā neha kiṃcana: Literally, "or that there is no danger whatever here." M3, as well as the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cv, and Cm, read instead bhayavān eṣa vā na kim, "and that he [the king] is not any danger." Among the translators, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 159) renders this variant.

58. "from enemies" anyebhyaḥ: Literally, "from others." We agree with Ct, who glosses, "from enemies (śatrubhyaḥ)."

"you gentlemen have so urgently awakened me" tvaritair bhavadbhiḥ pratibodhitaḥ: Literally, "[I] have been awakened by you hurrying gentlemen."

59. "I shall cast down great Indra or smash Anala, god of fire." pātayiṣye mahendraṃ vā śātayiṣye tathānalam: Literally, "I shall cause Mahendra to fall or shatter Anala." B1,3,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read dārayiṣye, "I shall shatter or tear to pieces," for pātayiṣye, "I shall cast down," while B1,3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read śītayiṣye, "I shall cool, quench, or freeze," for śātayiṣe, "I shall smash."

60. "For no one would have awakened me so violently from my slumber" na hi . . . suptaṃ bodhayiṣyati māṃ bhṛśam: Literally, "For he will not violently awaken me who am asleep." One could also plausibly read the adverb bhṛśam, "violently," with the adjective suptam, "asleep," in the sense of "profoundly," thus yielding "me who was so soundly asleep." Manuscripts show substantial variation in the final two words of pāda b, māṃ bhṛśam. V3,B2,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, Ck, and Gorresio read instead mādṛśam, "someone like me." D4–6,T,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cv, and Cm read instead māṃ (D6,T3 me) guruḥ, "[my] elder (i.e., Rāvaṇa) [would not have awakened] me."

61. "Yūpākṣa" yūpākṣaḥ: Hanumān kills another rākṣasa of this name in the Sundarakāṇḍa (5.44.27–30). See Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 23–26. See, too, notes to 6.65.1; 6.83.5; and 6.111.7.

"tamer of his foes" ariṃdamam: Ñ1,V,B2,4,D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead mahābalam, "of great strength."

62. "any . . . such" hi tādṛśam: Literally, "indeed such." B3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead na naḥ kvacit, "nowhere for us."

"your highness" rājan: Literally, "O king." The title used here for Kumbhakarṇa is somewhat unusual, and we understand it in the sense of "prince."

Following 62ab, Ñ1,V,B2,3,D5–7,9–11,13,S insert a passage of one line [1070*]: "A catastrophic danger from a man oppresses us, your highness."

63. "a catastrophic danger . . . confronts us" nas tumulaṃ bhayam: Literally, "of us there is a fierce danger."

64. The events mentioned here are among the exploits of Hanumān recounted at Sundarakāṇḍa 45. This verse is yet another example of the inaccuracy of Jacobi's argument that the events of the so-called Hanumān episode are not referred to elsewhere in the epic. See Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 23–26.

"along with his troops" sānuyātraḥ: Literally, "together with his followers or retinue."

65. "Rāvaṇa Paulastya" paulastyaḥ: Literally, "Paulastya [descendant of Pulastya]."

"was dismissed" muktaḥ: Literally, "released." The critical edition's reading muktā is evidently a typographical error, which is not noted in the list of errata.

"with the words, 'You are as good as dead.' " mṛteti: Given the sandhi, the sequence here would normally be interpreted as mṛta + iti, that is, the vocative, "O dead man." We are inclined, however, to accept the explanation of Cv, Cg, Cm, and Ck, who understand mṛta to stand for the nominative mṛtaḥ. According to Cg, who reads the adjective initially as a vocative, what we have here, in fact, is a [nominative] designation missing its case ending (avibhaktikanirdeśaḥ), although it may well be only a case of double sandhi. These commentators understand the expression to mean that Rāma, regarding Rāvaṇa as practically dead (mṛtaprāyaḥ—Cg, Cm) or dead though living (jīvan mṛtaḥ—Ck, Ct), let him go. D6,7,9–11,T3,G1,M5, and printed editions of Ct read instead vrajeti, "with the words, 'Go!' " Cr, the only commentator to explicitly address this reading, understands that Rāma dismissed Rāvaṇa telling him to go because the latter was already defeated (parābhūtatvād gaccheti rāmeṇoktvā muktaḥ). It is somewhat confusing that, although Ct's text reads vrajeti, he appears to comment on the critical edition's reading, mṛteti.

66. "released him, sparing his life" vimuktaḥ prāṇasaṃśayāt: Literally, "released from danger to his life." Cg offers two explanations of the phrase. In the first, he reads the ablative compound prāṇasaṃśayāt as if it were a gerund that had lost its characteristic marker (lyablope pañcamī), giving the sense "Rāvaṇa was released after having been brought into peril of his life by Rāma (sa rāvaṇo rāmeṇa prāṇasaṃśayaṃ nītvādya vimuktaḥ kṛta ity arthaḥ)." Cm offers this interpretation as well. Cg's second alternative, which is similar to Ct's and Cr's, is the one we have followed.

67. "of Yūpākṣa . . . to him" yūpākṣa- . . . yūpākṣam: Literally, "of Yūpākṣa . . . to Yūpākṣa."

68. "I shall . . . slaughter" hatvā: Literally, "having slaughtered." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead jitvā, "having conquered."

70. "those . . . words of which the defects were magnified by anger" tat . . . vākyam . . . roṣavivṛddhadoṣam: We follow Cr in understanding the adjective to refer to Kumbhakarṇa's words. According to Cr, the defect referred to here is the improper policy (nītivirodhaḥ) [implicit in Kumbhakarṇa's plan to take action without consulting with his elders]. Ct, Cm, Cg, and Cs all understand the adjective to be the masculine accusative, modifying an implicit "Kumbhakarṇa." The first three of these commentators understand the defect to refer to bad policy, as does Cr, whereas Cs understands the defect to refer to Kumbhakarṇa's boastful self-praise that has been increased by his anger born of [his learning of Rāvaṇa's] defeat at Rāma's hands (rāmāt parājayajanyakopena vivṛddho doṣa ātmaślāghanarūpo yasya tam). Translators vary considerably in what they see as being magnified by Kumbhakarṇa's anger. Thus Dutt (1893, p. 1293) offers, "his spirit of insolence." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 185), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 160), renders, "la férocité." Pagani (1999, p. 1019) translates, "la collere." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1595) renders, "his violence," and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 160), "whose judgment was vitiated by anger." Gorresio's text (6.37.98) reads -ghoṣam, "sound," for -doṣam, "fault," in which case the adjective refers unambiguously to Kumbhakarṇa's speech in the sense of "the volume of which was increased by anger."

The meter is upajāti.

71. "Only after you have heard . . . and carefully considered . . . should you attempt to conquer" śrutvā . . . vimṛśya ca / paścād api . . . vijeṣyasi: Literally, "having heard . . . and having considered . . . you shall afterward conquer."

"the advantages and disadvantages of any action" guṇadoṣau: Literally, "virtue and defect."

72. "prepared to set forth" saṃpratasthe: Literally, "he set forth." As Cg notes, we must read this verb proleptically since it is only at verse 79 below that Kumbhakarṇa, having received permission from Rāvaṇa, actually leaves his bed. (sampratasthe prasthātum upacakrame. śayanād utpapāta hety uttaratra vakṣyamāṇatvāt.) Cm understands similarly.

73. "Once they had awakened Kumbhakarṇa" taṃ samutthāpya: Literally, "having made him arise." V3,B3,D6,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead suptam utthāpya, "having made that sleeping one arise."

"fearsome in eye, form, and valor" bhīmākṣaṃ bhīmarūpaparākramam: Literally, "of fearsome eyes and fearsome in form and valor."

74. "When they arrived there" tato gatvā: Literally, "then, having gone." Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B,D1–4,7–13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead te 'bhigamya, "they, having approached." This reading more or less constrains one to take daśagrīvam, "ten-necked [Rāvaṇa]," as the object of the gerund, whereas, in the critical reading, one may either take Rāvaṇa as the object or simply, as we have done, understand that the palace mentioned in the previous verse is the destination of the rākṣasas.

75. "bull among rākṣasas" rākṣasarṣabha: The final word of the compound, -ṛṣabha, is marked as uncertain in the critical edition. The majority of northern and southern manuscripts collated for the critical edition and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead -īśvara [rākṣaseśvara], "lord of the rākṣasas."

"How should he proceed?" katham: Literally, "How?" We interpret the interrogative adverb as do Cv, Cm, and Cg, who take it as part of an elliptical question, "How should he act (kathaṃ karotu)?" Ck and Ct understand it to express the sense of āhosvit . . . vā, a phrase that expresses doubt as to which of a number of options to choose. Cr takes it simply in the sense of the particle vā, "or."

"Should he sally forth directly" tatraiva niryātu: Literally, "Should he go forth right there?" We follow the commentators, who understand the phrase to mean "Should he proceed straight to the battle [from] where he stands (tatraiva sthito yuddhāya niryātu—so Ct)?"

"or will you first see him here" drakṣyase tam ihāgatam: Literally, "will you see him when he has come here?"

76. "honored" pūjitam: The critical edition marks the participial ending as doubtful. A wide variety of northern and southern manuscripts (B3,4,D6,7,9–11,T1, 2,G1,3,M3) and the texts and printed editons of the southern commentators read instead the imperative pūjyatām, "let him be honored."

80. "he rinsed his mouth" prakṣālya vadanam: The phrase is ambiguous. It can be rendered equally well as "having washed his face," and, indeed, all translators consulted have done so with the exception of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 160), who translates, "he gargled." We believe that Raghunathan is correct, since rinsing the mouth would be part of a normal morning toilet, whereas washing the face could be easily included in Kumbhakarṇa's bath.

"adorned himself splendidly" paramabhūṣitaḥ: Literally, "supremely adorned." V3,B3,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the redundant -harṣitaḥ, "delighted," for -bhūṣitaḥ, "adorned."

"he urgently sent for" tvarayāmāsa: Literally, "he caused to be hastened." See verse 58 above.

"invigorating drink" pānaṃ balasamīraṇam: Literally, "a drink that rouses strength." The commentators agree that this is a strengthening or stimulating drink but offer no hints as to its identity (balavardhanam—Cg). See, however, verse 81 below.

81. "on his account" tasya: The exact reference of the genitive pronoun is not clear. We have taken it elliptically in the sense of "for his sake, on his account." V3,B1,3,4,D2,7,9–11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead tatra, "there," which presumably makes reference to the rākṣasas racing back to Kumbhakarṇa's cave.

"intoxicating drink and . . . food" madyaṃ bhakṣyāṃś ca: D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed texts of Cg dispense with the food, reading madyakumbhāṃś ca, "jars of intoxicating drink."

82. "a thousand jars, he" ghaṭasahasraṃ sa: D5–7,9–11,S read instead ghaṭasahasre dve, "two thousand jars."

83. "exhilarated, and slightly intoxicated" īṣatsamutkaṭo mattaḥ: Literally, "somewhat elevated, intoxicated or excited." The terms samutkaṭa and matta form one of those common pairs of near synonyms, which the commentators often try to distinguish in meaning from each other. Here only Cg attempts to differentiate the two terms. He understands samutkaṭaḥ to refer to Kumbhakarṇa's inebriation as a result of the drinking in which he has just indulged, while taking mattaḥ to refer to Kumbhakarṇa's innate violence or high spirits. (īṣatsamutkaṭaḥ pāneneṣanmadotkaṭaḥ. mattaḥ svabhāvenonmattaś cety arthaḥ.) Ct, Cr, and Cm offer no explicit glosses to distinguish between the two terms but appear to suggest a distinction by linking the term utkaṭaḥ specifically to the drinking and taking mattaḥ separately. See note to 6.2.14.

"in his frenzy" hṛṣṭaḥ: Literally, "agitated, excited." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ruṣṭaḥ, "angry, furious."

"resembled Yama, who brings time itself to an end" kālāntakayamopamaḥ: The compound lends itself to a variety of analyses. Cg understands the first element of the compound, kāla-, "time," to mean "at the time of universal destruction (pralayakāle)." See note to 6.21.26.

84. "his footsteps shook the very earth" padanyāsair akampayata medinīm: Literally, "he caused the earth to shake with his footsteps."

85. "flooded . . . with light" prakāśayan: Literally, "illuminating."

"bodily radiance" vapuṣā: Literally, "with his body." We follow Ct and Ck who gloss, "with bodily splendor (dehakāntyā)."

"the thousand-rayed sun" sahasraraśmiḥ: Literally, "the thousand-rayed one."

"with a garland of hands cupped in reverence" añjalimālayā: Literally, "with a garland of añjalis." Cr explains that this refers to the people who are making the reverential gesture (kṛtāñjalijanair ity arthaḥ), while Cg further specifies that these would be the townsfolk (añjalimālayā paurajanakṛtayeti śeṣaḥ).

"Indra of the hundred sacrifices on his way to the abode of self-existent Brahmā" śatakratur geham iva svayaṃbhuvaḥ: Literally, "like Śatakratu [on his way to] Svayaṃbhū's house." The image is no doubt chosen to suggest the grandeur of Kumbhakarṇa in procession as well as the reverence accorded him as he passes. It is not clear that the poet has any specific mythological incident in mind. Nonetheless, we do see Indra proceeding to Brahmā's abode in connection with the case of Kumbhakarṇa in the very next sarga (6.49.19).

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Following verse 85, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines [1078*]: "When the forest-dwelling monkeys and the guardians of the troops of tawny monkeys,[1] who were stationed outside, suddenly caught sight of that immeasurable slayer of his enemies, who looked like a mountain peak there on the royal highway, they were terrified."

[1]"the guardians of the troops of tawny monkeys" hariyūthapālāḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead saha yūthapālaiḥ, "together with the guardians of the troops."

The meter of lines 1–2 is vaṃśasthavila; that of lines 3–4 is upajāti.

86–87. The sequence of these two verses in the critical edition is extremely awkward, since we are told of the panic of the monkeys in verse 86 ("Some ran for refuge . . . on the ground") before we learn that they have even seen Kumbhakarṇa in verse 87 ("Seeing him . . . fled in all directions"). This situation is not duplicated in either the northern or southern recension of the text. The south avoids the problem by inserting verse 1078* (see note to 6.48.85 above), which anticipates the substance of verse 87 in which the monkeys first catch sight of the giant rākṣasa. The vast majority of northern manuscripts and editions reverse the order of the two verses, yielding a more logical narrative sequence, and we have followed this in our translation. The printed text of Gorresio avoids the problem by omitting verses 85–86 entirely.

"as if matching the sun itself with his innate splendor" spṛśantam ādityam ivātmatejasā: Literally, "touching Āditya, as it were, with his own splendor." We follow Ct, who understands that Kumbhakarṇa was like the sun. This also suggests, according to Ct, that, like the sun, Kumbhakarṇa is not awake for more than one day at time. (tatsadṛśam iti yāvat. prāyo dinadvaye nāsya jāgaraḥ.)

"refuge to Rāma, the refuge of all" śaraṇyaṃ śaranam . . . rāmaṃ: Literally, "refuge to Rāma, who is a refuge." The phrase is a common one in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. In some occurrences, Rāma's role as the universal refuge is made more explicit. Compare, for example, 6.12.11 and note. See also 6.13.4; 6.47.43; 6.31.56; 6.59.8; 6.81.14; and notes.

The meter of verse 86 is indravajrā, while that of verse 87 is vaṃśasthavila.

1–2. The syntax of verses 1–3 is not clearly defined, and commentators and translators alike differ as to where and how to break the sequence into sentences. Translators also disagree as to whether it is Rāma or the monkey army that forms the subject of the gerund dṛṣṭvā, "having seen," in 2a. Cg wants to read the first two and a half verses (1–3ab) as a single sentence (tata ityādi sārdhaślokadvayam ekānvayam), in which case all the adjectives and figures of speech qualifying Kumbhakarṇa in the first three verses would apply to him as Rāma alone sees him. Cm, whose analysis we follow, suggests as his first alternative that we read verses 1 and 2 as a single sentence (tato rāma ityādi ślokadvayam ekaṃ vākyam), in which case the adjectives describing Kumbhakarṇa in 3ab represent him as the monkey army sees him. Cm offers a second alternative, that we read verse 2 as a separate sentence (yadvā taṃ dṛṣṭveti śloko bhinnaṃ vākyam). This proposal, however, is weakened by the fact that verse 2 lacks a finite verb. Ct and Cr, however, propose remedying this defect by supplying the words "He [i.e., Rāma] became alert (yatto babhūveti śeṣaḥ)." Cv, the earliest of our commentators, offers a more detailed syntactic analysis of the passage. He argues, like Cm, that verse 2 must be syntactically connected with verse 1. The sequence for him is that Rāma, having seen Kumbhakarṇa, took up his bow and watched him. If we do not construe the sequence in this way, Cv continues, and try to link verses 2 and 3, we are confronted with the undesirable repetition of the gerund dṛṣṭvā in a single sentence. Or, he argues, we may simply accept the repetition of the action of seeing because of the multitude of visual adjectives in the passage (dṛśyaviśeṣaṇabāhulyād darśanakriyāvṛttir iti vā parihāraḥ). Most translators consulted have, against the commentators, read verses 2 and 3 as a single unit. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1597), which follows the interpretation of Ct and Cr, is the sole exception, supplying the words "he became alert."

"striding along as did Lord Nārāyaṇa long ago through the heavens" kramamāṇam ivākāśaṃ purā nārāyaṇaṃ prabhum: The reference is no doubt to Viṣṇu's vāmanāvatāra, or dwarf incarnation, as Cr notes. This popular story is repeated throughout the literature. See, for example, ŚatBr 1.2.5.1–9; VāyuP 2.36.74–86; and MBh 3.270, 3.313, 12.343; etc. See O'Flaherty 1975, pp. 328–29. See 6.40.43; 6.47.119; 6.53.25; 6.59.7; 6.105.24; and notes. See, too, 1.28.2 and note.

3. For a discussion on the syntax, see note to verses 1–2 above.

"who, adorned with his golden armlets, looked like a storm cloud charged with rain" satoyāmbudasaṃkāśaṃ kāñcanāṅgadabhūṣaṇam: The simile is no doubt based on the fact that, with the streaks of gold on his huge, dark body, Kumbhakarṇa resembles a thundercloud crossed by streaks of lightning. The image is a common one in the Rāmāyaṇa. See verse 5 below. See, too, 6.48.52–53 and notes.

4. "looming above him" vardhamānam: Literally, "growing." Cg understands that Kumbhakarṇa is literally increasing in size because of his power of being able to change his shape at will (kāmarūpatvāt). Translators consulted either indicate that Kumbhakarṇa is actually growing or that he simply appears to be. Because he is already of gigantic dimensions, we believe that, at this point, he simply appears to grow larger as he draws nearer. Compare, however, 6.53.33–34 and notes, where Kumbhakarṇa does dramatically increase his stature.

"in his amazement" savismayam: Cr, referring to the theological notion of Rāma's omniscience, believes that his expression of astonishment, and, indeed, his entire question, is for the purpose eliciting the wonder of his audience (śrotṛvismayakārakam uvāca sarvajñarāmapraśnena jñātṝṇāṃ vismayo bhavatīti tātparyam). Pagani (1999, p. 1021), idiosyncratically, takes the term as a reference to Kumbhakarṇa's astonishing characteristic (of being able to grow).

5. "tawny-eyed" harilocanaḥ: Most of the commentators gloss, "having tawny or reddish eyes (kapilanetraḥ)." Cr, who shares this gloss with the other commentators, also evidently derives the term hari, "tawny," from the root $\sqrt{hṛ}$, "to take away," and additionally glosses, "characterized by eyes that rob an enemy of his well-being (ripusvāsthyāpahārakanetraviśiṣṭaḥ)." Translators take the term to indicate a variety of colors, including tawny, yellow, and brown. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 161) alone takes hari in the sense of the noun "monkey," rendering, "with eyes like an ape's." This is not persuasive. Cf. 6.22.33 and 6.39.30 and notes.

"looms over Laṅkā" laṅkāyāṃ dṛśyate: Literally, "appears or is visible in Laṅkā."

"like a storm cloud laced with lightning" savidyud iva toyadaḥ: See note to verse 3 above.

6. "From here he looks like some great and solitary banner raised high above the earth." pṛthivyāḥ ketubhūto 'sau mahān eko 'tra dṛśyate: The basis for the figure and thus the identity of the object of comparison are not entirely clear. The critical term here, ketu, has two meanings that are relevant in this context. One, which we have hesitantly used, is "flag or banner." We have chosen this because it seems as though it is Kumbhakarṇa's enormous height that suggests the image to Rāma. On the other hand, a second meaning of the term, "comet or meteor," is also plausible, since Kumbhakarṇa has been described elsewhere as fierce and blazing in appearance, and the epic poet frequently mentions these celestial bodies as terrifying or inauspicious omens. The commentators are surprisingly silent on this point, while the translators are divided. Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 1), Dutt (1893, p. 1295), and Raghunathan

(1982, vol. 3, p. 161) have chosen the former meaning, while Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1597) and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 187), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 161) and Pagani (1999, p. 1021), have chosen the latter. On omens, see 6.4.6 and note.

8."by Prince Rāma Kākutstha . . . to him" rājaputreṇa rāmeṇa . . . kākutstham: Literally, "by the king's son Rāma . . . [said this] to Kākutstha."

9. "Vāsava" vāsavaḥ: Kumbhakarṇa's battle with and defeat of Indra is described below in verses 15–18.

Following verse 9, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1081*]: "There is no other rākṣasa to compare with him in size."

10. "flesh-eating demons" piśitāśanāḥ: Literally, "flesh-eaters." This class of carnivorous demon is alluded to occasionally in the literature, where the term may also serve as a kenning for "rākṣasa." Here, however, the poet presumably means to refer to creatures other than rākṣasas, since Kumbhakarṇa would not normally be expected to do battle with his own kind. According to Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 280), the term piśitāśana is synonymous with piśāca, a class of demons whose origin he traces in purāṇic mythology to the sage Kaśyapa and his consort Piśāca [sic], one of the many daughters of Dakṣa.

"kinnaras" -kiṃnarāḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the redundant -pannagāḥ, "great serpents," which is synonymous with bhujaṃgāḥ in pāda b.

The meter is upajāti.

11. "mistakenly thinking that . . . [Kumbhakarṇa] . . . was . . . Kāla himself" kālo 'yam iti mohitāḥ: Literally, "deluded [they thought], 'He is Kāla.' " As Cs notes, one might also take kālaḥ to refer to Rudra (Śiva), the dark (kāla) god, who is frequently represented as armed with a śūla, or "lance," and having fearsome eyes.

12. "power . . . derives from the gift of boons" varadānakṛtaṃ balam: The "boon" of Kumbhakarṇa is not to enhance his power but rather to prevent the exercise of his grotesque native strength and appetite. For Rāvaṇa's and Indrajit's boons of invulnerability, see 1.14.12–15 and notes; and Uttarakāṇḍa 10. On the motif of Rāvaṇa's boon, see Pollock 1991, pp. 15–54. See note to 6.28.28–29.

13. "this" etena: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read bālena, "as an infant or child."

"this huge rākṣasa" mahātmanā: Literally, "by the great one." See 6.48.32 and note.

15. "the wielder of the sharp vajra . . . with it" vajreṇa śitena vajrī: Literally, "with the sharp vajra, the one possessed of the vajra."

"the huge rākṣasa" mahātmā: Literally, "the great one." See 6.48.32 and note.

The meter is upendravajrā.

16. "wise" dhīmataḥ: Ñ2,D6,7,9–11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead rakṣasaḥ, "of the rākṣasa."

"the earth, already terrified, became still more so" vitrastā bhūyo bhūmir vitatrase: Literally, "the frightened earth became more frightened." Ś,Ñ,B,V,D1–4,8–13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vitrastāḥ prajā bhūyo vitatrasuḥ (or minor variants), "the frightened creatures became more frightened." This northern reading seems contextually more apposite than that of the south with its abrupt introduction of the earth.

17. "tore out one of Airāvata's tusks and, with it, struck Vāsava" vikṛṣyairāvatād dantaṃ jaghāna . . . vāsavam: Literally, "having extracted a tusk from Airāvata, he struck Vāsava."

18. "Vāsava staggered" vicacāla sa vāsavaḥ: D5–7,9–11,T,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead vijajvāla, "he shone or glowed," for vicacāla, "he staggered." The commentators struggle somewhat to make sense of this reading. Ct explains, "he seemed to be pervaded by flames on account of the streams of blood (rudhirapravāhair jvālavyāpta iva babhūva)." Cr suggests, "he was exceedingly afflicted (atisaṃtāpaṃ prāpa)." Cg glosses, "he was infuriated (cukopeti yāvat)."

19. "lord of creatures . . . they told him . . . and his assaulting the gods" śaśaṃsus te prajāpateḥ . . . devānāṃ cāpi dharṣaṇam: Literally, "they told the lord of creatures about . . . and also his assaulting of the gods." The text of Ct, as rendered in GPP (6.61.19) and NSP (6.61.19), reads śaśaṃsus te divaukasām, "they reported to the inhabitants of heaven [i.e., the gods]," for devānāṃ cāpi dharṣaṇam, "and his assaulting the gods." According to this reading, Indra and the creatures report only the vicious nature of Kumbhakarṇa to the lord of creatures (Prajāpati) and then separately report his devouring of the creatures (but not the assault on the gods) to the gods. This reading has been rendered by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 188), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 162), and by Dutt (1893, p. 1296). Pagani (1999, p. 1022) appears to read divaukasām not as an objective genitive governed by śaśaṃsuḥ but as an objective genitive construing with bhakṣaṇam, "devouring," to yield the dubious translation, "ils racontèrent aussi qu'il dévorait les créatures et les dieux."

Following verse 19, Ñ,B2–4,D2,4–7,9–11,13,S insert a passage of one line [1085*]: ". . . his destruction of hermitages, and his brutal[1] abduction of other men's wives."

[1]"brutal" bhṛśam: Literally, "intense." D5,9–11,G1,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead tathā, "as well."

20. The transition from indirect discourse to the direct speech of Indra passes uncharacteristically without explicit notice. See note to verse 21 below.

"within no time" acireṇaiva kālena: Literally, "in time that is not long."

21. "those words of Vāsava" vāsavasya vacaḥ: As noted above, the transition from verse 19 to 20 is awkward. In verse 19, it is Indra, along with the creatures, who all report to Brahmā, and there the poet uses the plural verb form. Here, according to Cg, Indra alone is mentioned because he is the principal member of the delegation (prādhānyād vāsavagrahaṇam).

"he sent for" āvāhayāmāsa: Ct understands the verb in its religious or ritual sense of "invoking or summoning a being through the use of a mantra." Here he claims Brahmā invokes or summons the rākṣasas by a mantra having the characteristics of the Gāyatrī-mantra (gāyatrīlakṣaṇena mantreṇājuhāva). See note to 6.1.1. Cr simply notes that Brahmā summons the rākṣasas into his presence by means of his own power (svaśaktyā).

22. "Fixing him with his glance . . . took a deep breath and [said] this" dṛṣṭvā niśvasya caivedam: Literally, "having looked and having sighed, [he said] this." This pāda (c) shows considerable variation in the manuscripts. D7,10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead kumbhakarṇam athāśvastaḥ, "regaining his composure, he then [said] to Kumbhakarṇa." Dutt (1893, p. 1296), uniquely, understands the participle āśvastaḥ, "composed," in a transitive sense, rendering, "pac-ifying Kumbhakarṇa." G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cv, Cg, and Cm read viśvāsya, "having inspired confidence," for the critical text's niśvasya. Cg understands by this that Brahmā is deceptively putting Kumbhakarṇa off his guard. He glosses, "seducing (pralobhya)."

23. See 6.48.9 and note. Compare, too, the well-known variant of the story at Uttarakāṇḍa 10, where, at the behest of the gods, Kumbhakarṇa is tricked by the god Brahmā and the goddess Sarasvatī into wasting his boon earned through his penances (7.10.2–8) on a request that he sleep for many years (7.10.31–41).

"That very instant" atha: Literally, "then."

"of the Lord" prabhoḥ: Our assumption is that the term refers to Lord Brahmā. Cg, however, sees it as a reference to Rāvaṇa. Among the translators consulted, only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1599) explicitly shares Cg's understanding.

24. "You are cutting down" nikṛtyate: Literally, "[a tree] is being cut down."

"a . . . golden tree, just as it is about to bear fruit" kāñcano vṛkṣaḥ phalakāle: Literally, "a golden tree at the time of fruit." Commentators are divided as to how to understand this particular metaphor. Ck, Ct, and Cr understand it to refer to "a tree that bears golden fruit (kāñcanaphalakaḥ—Ck, Ct)." Cg and Cm take the term "golden (kāñcanaḥ)" figuratively, glossing, "as desirable as gold (kāñcanavat spṛhaṇīyaḥ)." Cg, however, offers as an alternative that the term "golden tree (kāñcano vṛkṣaḥ)" is a kenning for the ornamental campaka tree (campakavṛkṣo vā) (Michelia campaka). Cg further glosses phalakāle, "at the time of fruit," as "at the time of blossoming (puṣpakāle)," which would be apposite for the campaka, a tree noted for its fragrant blossoms but not its fruit. Cs cites a verse from the Viśvakośa, according to which the term kāñcana, "golden," can refer to a number of trees, including the kāñcanāra (kovidāra), campaka, nāgakesara (Mesua ferrea [iron wood tree]), uḍumbara (Ficus glomerata [cluster fig]), or the puṃnāga (Calophyllum Inophyllum or Rottlera tinctoria) (kāñcanaḥ kāñcanāre syāc campake nāgakesare / uḍumbare ca puṃnāge). Cs's point is that even such trees, which may not produce edible fruit, ought not to be cut down, if they have been nurtured. In support of this, he cites a verse to the effect that one should not cut down even a poisonous tree if one has nurtured it (viṣavṛkṣo 'pi saṃvardhya svayaṃ chettum asāmpratam). Cs further suggests that the reference may actually be to a tree made of gold, in the sense that at the time of bearing fruit it produces gold through its fruit. Elsewhere in the epic the sight or vision of golden trees is a sign that the death of the one who sees them is imminent. Compare 3.45.33; 3.51.17; and 3.64.11; and note to 3.45.33. See also MBh 6.94.12.

25. "grandson" naptāram: Kumbhakarṇa, like Rāvaṇa, is actually the great-grandson of Brahmā as he is the son of Viśravas, who in turn is the son of Pulastya, the mind-born son of Brahmā (7.9.20–27). See, too, ManuSm 1.35.

"you should set some time limit to his sleeping and waking" kālas tu kriyatām asya śayane jāgare tathā: Literally, "let a time be fixed with respect to his sleeping and waking." We follow the commentators in understanding kālaḥ, "time," in the sense of "restriction of time (kālaniyamaḥ—so Ct, Cg)."

26. "for six months" ṣaṇmāsān: Several of the commentators, including Ct, Cg, and Cs, note that this constitutes merely the minimum period for Kumbhakarṇa to sleep. Cg explicitly notes that, were this not the case, this verse would contradict verse 6.48.12, where Kumbhakarṇa is said to sleep nine, six, seven, or eight months at a stretch. (ṣaṇmāsān ity etad arvāṅniṣedhaparam. anyathā nava ṣaṭ sapta cāṣṭau ca māsān iti pūrvoktavirodhāt.) For a fuller discussion on the duration of Kumbhakarṇa's sleep, see note to 6.48.12. Cs breaks up the words differently, reading ṣaṇmāsānekāham as a compound. He proposes that we read ṣaṇmāsa- as the prior member of a modifying compound (viśeṣaṇasamāsa), understanding it as a descriptive adjective modifying anekāham, in the sense of "six months plus many days." During this period Kumbhakarṇa would not awaken. The extension of sleep by some days is not undesirable, according to Cs, who adds that one should consider that this expansion was already provided for. (ṣaṇmāsān viśeṣaṇasamāsaḥ. tan madhye na jāgaraṇam. nidrāyāṃ dinādhikyaṃ tu nāniṣṭam. vistaraḥ prāgupapādito 'nusaṃdheyaḥ.) Cs's second option is to take ṣaṇmāsān as a separate word. See, too, notes to 6.9.22 (App. I, No. 3, lines 162–163, and notes). See R. Goldman 2003b and 2006b.

27. "all creatures" lokān: Literally, "people or worlds."

"raging" saṃkruddhaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead saṃvṛddhaḥ, "vast."

29. "from his lair" śibirāt: Literally, "from the royal camp or residence." We follow Ct, who glosses, "from his lair (nilayāt)." Ct glosses, "from his own house (svagṛhāt)."

"Soon . . . he will race about, devouring" bhakṣayan paridhāvati: Literally, "he is running, while devouring." The commentators, reflecting on the fact that Kumbhakarṇa will actually sally forth against the monkeys at the very end of sarga 53 below (6.53.45), note that we are to read the participle bhakṣayan in the sense of "for the purpose of eating. (bhakṣayan. hetau śatā. bhakṣārtham ity arthaḥ—Ct, Cr.)" Cg, quoting Pā 3.2.126, takes the participle in the sense of "for the purpose of" and the present in the sense of the future. (bhakṣaṇahetoḥ paridhāvisyati. lakṣaṇahetvoḥ kriyāyā iti śatṛpratyayaḥ. vartamānasāmīpyādinā bhaviṣyadarthe laṭ.)

30. Ck and Ct believe that Rāma has interjected this question into the midst of Vibhīṣaṇa's speech and that Vibhīṣaṇa responds to it in the following verse. (punā rāmaḥ pṛcchati. katham enam iti—so Ct.) It is most unusual, however, for Vālmīki to introduce a new speaker without explicitly indicating this, and we, like other translators consulted, understand the question to show Vibhīṣaṇa thinking out loud, and then, in the following verses, coming up with a solution.

31. Ct and Ck understand this verse to be spoken by Vibhīṣaṇa in response to what they take to be Rāma's question in verse 30 above (vibhīṣaṇa uttaram āhocyatām iti—so Ct).

"just some giant mechanical man" yantram . . . samucchritam: Literally, "lofty machine or mechanism." The idea seems to be that Vibhīṣaṇa wants to falsely represent the gargantuan Kumbhakarṇa as an animated mannequin, designed merely to frighten the monkeys. Ck and Ct explain that the monkeys are to be told that this was some mere mechanical device created through the power of illusion and erected by Rāvaṇa merely to cause fright. Therefore, Ck and Ct continue, it is really nothing at all. (samucchritaṃ rāvaṇena. māyayā vibhīṣikārthaṃ nirmitaṃ kiṃcid yantramātram. ato na kiṃcid etad iti.) Cr understands that Vibhīṣaṇa wants the monkeys to believe that it is a large mechanical rākṣasa that loses its power when it comes into his vicinity (samucchritam atipravṛddham etat pradṛśyamāṇaṃ rakṣoyantraṃ matsamīpe saṃkucitatejo bhaviṣyatīti śeṣaḥ). Cg glosses, "a large, that is, tall, device that is a scarecrow. (yantraṃ bibhīṣikā. samucchritam unnatam.)" See verse 6.54.5 and note.

32. "encouraging" sumukhodgatam: We follow Ct, Ck, and Cr in understanding that Vibhīṣaṇa's words are intended to generate cheerfulness or encouragement on the part of the frightened monkeys (vānaralokasya saumukhyasaṃpādanāyodgatam upadiṣṭaṃ vacaḥ—so Ct). D6,T3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead sumukheritam, "uttered cheerfully."

33. According to Ct, Rāma's order to Nīla and the monkeys to [once again] blockade the city gates suggests that there has been a brief cessation of hostilities following Rāvaṇa's flight. (yathāpūrvaṃ dvāranirodhe niyuṅkte gaccheti. anena rāvaṇapalāyanottaraṃ madhye 'vahāraḥ sūcitaḥ.) See notes to 6.33.2–3; 6.41.8; and 6.62.2.

"Nīla Pāvaki" pāvake: Literally, "O Pāvaki." The epithet is a patronymic indicating that Nīla is the son of Pāvaka, or Agni, the purifier.

"seize control" ādāya: Literally, "having taken." We understand the gerund here in much the same sense of the English verb "to take," i.e., "to seize a military objective." Cr glosses, "having brought under your own control (svavaśaṃ prāpayya)."

"the . . . thoroughfares, and bridges" caryāś cāpy atha saṃkramān: The word caryā refers to the two main intersecting roads that link the four city gates. See 6.47.32; 6.48.8; and notes. We have taken saṃkrama in its sense of "bridge or causeway" and understand it to refer to the bridges or drawbridges that span the moats outside the city walls. See 6.3.15,16 and notes. The term could also be taken in the sense of "a narrow or difficult passage," and thus be paired with caryā to yield the sense "highways and byways." In any case, the idea is that Nīla is to occupy and guard all the exits from the citadel.

34. "Let all the monkeys collect" upasaṃharan /. . . vānarāḥ sarve: We follow Ct in taking the singular participle as an irregular plural (upasaṃharantaḥ saṃcinvantaḥ). Cr construes the singular with Nīla, who is therefore to collect the trees, etc., to serve as weapons for his troops (upasaṃharan san tvaṃ tiṣṭhasva). The printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead the singular imperative (upasaṃhara, "you collect"), presumably also with reference to Nīla. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"Let . . . take up their posts" tiṣṭhantu: Literally, "let them stay or stand." Ñ2, V1,B2,3,D1,9–11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the polite second person pronoun bhavantaḥ, "you gentlemen." According to this reading, Rāma directs his remarks to the monkey troops themselves. Ct suggests that we then supply the verb tiṣṭhantu ("let all you monkeys stay . . ."). This reading is followed most literally by Dutt (1893, p. 1297) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1600).

"well armed" sāyudhāḥ: Literally, "with weapons." Despite the immediate context and the text's uniform assignment of only naturally occurring weapons to the monkeys, Cg understands the adjective to mean "possessing such weapons as swords, etc. (khaḍgādyāyudhavantaḥ)."

36. "Nala" nalaḥ: D5–7,9–11,T,M3–5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead tathā, "as well," thus removing Nala from the group.

"approached" abhyayuḥ: Cr glosses, "they blockaded (rurudhuḥ)."

Following verse 36, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1094*]: "When they had heard Rāma's words, the heroic tawny monkeys,[1] with a victorious air, assailed the enemy army with trees."

37. "With boulders held aloft and trees in their hands" śailodyatavṛkṣahastam: Literally, "with mountain-raised-tree-hands." The compound is somewhat awkward. We follow Ct in reading it as essentially a dvandva consisting of two bahuvrīhis: udyataśailam, "with upraised boulders," and vṛkṣahastam, "with trees in hand." Cr sees a slightly different dvandva, analyzing the compound as "in the hands of which there were boulders and upraised trees (śailā udyatavṛkṣāś ca hasteṣu yasya tat)." Ck reads yet another dvandva, this time with paranipāta, to yield "with [upraised] boulder, tree, and hand (śailaṃ vṛkṣaṃ hastaś ca)." D6,T2,3,G1,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read -dīpta-, "glowing, glittering," for -vṛkṣa-, and the latter is marked as uncertain in the critical edition. This reading can be interpreted to mean "with raised boulders and glittering hands," "their hands glittering with raised boulders," or "with raised boulders in their glittering hands." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 163), the only translator to share this reading, renders, "with rocks held aloft in their strong hands."

"resembled a . . . mass of . . . clouds, looming up against a mountain" rarāja . . . / gireḥ samīpānugataṃ yathaiva . . . -ambhodharajālam: Literally, "shone just like a mass of clouds that had come near a mountain." Ck and Ct claim that the propriety of the simile lies in the fact that Laṅkā is situated on a mountain (parvatāgravartilaṅkāyāḥ parito vartamānatvāt tattvam). This comment is echoed in a footnote by Dutt (1893, p. 1297).

1. "groggy with sleep and drink" nidrāmadasamākulaḥ: We follow Cg, the only commentator to analyze this compound, in taking nidrāmada-, literally, "sleep intoxication," as a dvandva, referring to the effects of Kumbhakarṇa's untimely awakening and indulgence in strong drink immediately afterward (6.48.47–54, 80–83). The compound can also be read as a tatpuruṣa in the sense of "the intoxication of sleep." Translators are divided on this issue. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1601), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 164), and Pagani (1999, p. 1023) translate as we do. Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 4), Dutt (1893, p. 1298), and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 190), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 164), choose the latter interpretation.

2. "that supremely invincible warrior" paramadurjayaḥ: Literally, "the supremely invincible one."

"As . . . continued on his way" yayau: Literally, "he went."

"showers of blossoms raining from the houses along his route" gṛhebhyaḥ puṣpavarṣeṇa: Literally, "with a shower of flowers from the houses." The commentators suggest adding a participle, either nirgatena, "issuing from," (Ct) or utkṣiptena, "thrown," (Ck) to modify the compound puṣpavarṣeṇa, "shower of flowers." Ck, Ct, and Cs note that the flowers are coming from the hands of the women living in the houses (tadgṛhavartistrīhastebhyaḥ—so Ct). Cs offers, as an alternative, that we take the term gṛha, "house," metonymically to stand for "housewife." He explains, "Or, 'from the houses' means 'from the wives of other men' according to the saying, 'The housewife is called the house' (yad vā gṛhebhyaḥ parabhāryābhyo gṛhiṇī gṛham ucyata iti vacanāt)." As a third alternative, Cs understands the term simply to refer to the houses of the rākṣasas (rākṣasānāṃ gṛhebhyaḥ).

3. "At length he spied" saḥ . . . dadarśa: Literally, " he saw."

"covered with a fretwork of gold" hemajālavitatam: Cg understands, "covered with louvered windows of gold (svarṇamayagavākṣavitatam)," taking jāla in the sense of window. Compare note to 5.7.14–15. Among the translators, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 164) follows this interpretation, rendering, "with its golden casements." See 6.45.6 and note. Cf. 6.87.26; and 6.109.1 and note.

"blazed with the radiance of the sun" bhānubhāsvaradarśanam: Literally, "with an appearance of sunlight." Ct explains the extraordinary radiance of the palace as deriving from the sun's rays [being reflected] in its jewels (ratneṣu sūryakīraṇasaṃbandhād adhikatejovattvaṃ gṛhasyeti bhāvaḥ).

4. "as might the sun a mass of clouds" sūrya ivābhrajālam: The expected contrast of light and dark here, that is, the dark rākṣasa entering a mansion, which in the previous verse was said to shine with the radiance of the sun, seems to be inverted here. Among the commentators, only Cs takes note of this. He offers two possible explanations. In the first, we are to understand that the palace has a dark watery (i.e., cloudlike) appearance because of its encrustation with dark sapphires. However, in those places where there are no sapphires but diamonds instead, the glittering of the palace justifies the use of this figure (nidarśanā), which then does not contradict the solar imagery of verse 3 (abhrajālaṃ jalasattādaśāyām indranīlakhacanāt tadabhāvadaśāyāṃ vajraiś ca tannidarśanatociteti na bhānubhāsvareti virodhaḥ). In the second, he proposes wrenching the syntax a bit so as to make the upamāna, "mass of clouds (abhrajālam)," correspond not to the palace but to the dark rākṣasa lord Rāvaṇa (athavāgrajaṃ rāvaṇam abhrajālam iva dadarśety anvayaḥ).

"seated on his throne . . . seated on his" āsanastham . . . āsanastham: Literally, "situated on his seat . . . situated on his seat."

"from afar" dūre: The adverb probably suggests the great depth of Rāvaṇa's hall as he is seen from afar in his inner throne room. Cg, however, relates it to the great height of the Puṣpaka flying palace in which Rāvaṇa is seated (unnatapuṣpakavattvād iti bhāvaḥ).

The meter is upajāti with a hypermetric pāda b.

Following verse 4, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1095*]: "As Kumbhakarṇa made his way toward his brother's palace, accompanied by hosts of rākṣasas,[1] his footsteps shook the very earth." This verse is a repetition, substituting only -gaṇa-, "hosts," for -bala-, "army," of 6.48.84. Here it seems to be poorly contextualized, as Kumbhakarṇa has already entered the palace in verse 4.

[1]"accompanied by hosts of rākṣasas" rakṣogaṇasamanvitaḥ: D5,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead the neuter accusative rakṣogaṇasamanvitam, which must then modify bhavanam, "palace."

5. "the flying palace Puṣpaka" vimāne puṣpake: See note to 6.7.5.

6. "he quickly sat up" tūrṇam utthāya: Literally, "having stood up." Because of the context of this passage, we do not believe that Rāvaṇa actually leaves his seat at this point. Northern manuscripts substitute kiṃcit, "somewhat," for the critical edition's tūrṇam, "quickly." See note to verse 7 below.

7. "upon his throne" paryaṅke: Literally, "on a couch or bed."

"What task must I perform?" kiṃ kṛtyam iti: Literally, "What is to be done?"

"Then, springing up . . . him" utpatya cainam: Given the critical reading and the expected protocol of the encounter, we believe this is the first time that Rāvaṇa rises from his throne, and we have therefore rendered utthāya in verse 6 above as "sitting up." The idea is that the dejected king was slumped in his seat and sits upright at the sight of his brother. D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read punaḥ sa muditotpatya [irregular sandhi—so Ct], "springing up once more, in great delight, he." Among the translators consulted, only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1601) explicitly reads this to mean that Rāvaṇa stands up a second time. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 190), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 165), reads the adverb punaḥ, "again," with the adjective muditaḥ, "in great delight." Dutt (1893, p. 1298) reads utthāya in verse 6 as a causal, "raised him [Kumbhakarṇa] up," and then takes punaḥ with the verb pariṣasvaje, "he embraced." Pagani (1999, p. 1024) interprets as we do (see verse 6 above). Northern manuscripts avoid this issue by reading kiṃcid utthāya, "partly rising or sitting up," at verse 6 above. This yields a sequence similar to the one we find in the critical text.

9. "his eyes red with rage" saṃraktanayanaḥ kopāt: Literally, "with reddened eyes out of anger." One could also construe the ablative kopāt with the finite verb abravīt, yielding the sense "his eyes reddened, he spoke in anger." Ck and Ct understand that Kumbhakarṇa is angry at having been awakened too early (akāla udbodhanakopāt). See note to 6.31.72.

10. "Why have you put such effort into waking me" kim artham aham ādṛtya tvayā . . . prabodhitaḥ: Compare 6.48.57ab, where the same construction occurs. See note to 6.48.57.

"a ghost" pretaḥ: Literally, "a departed one." The term is commonly used in India even today to refer to the malevolent spirits of the dead.

All northern manuscripts insert here a passage of fourteen lines [1097*]. Southern manuscripts insert, in whole or in part, the same passage following 6.51.45. See note to 6.51.45 for the translation and a discussion of the critical edition's decision not to include this passage.

11. "His eyes rolling slightly" īṣat tu parivṛttābhyāṃ netrābhyām: Literally, "with eyes slightly rolling." The rolling of the eyes is a common indicator of anger in the epic. See 5.20.23; 6.27.2; 6.46.14; etc. Cg notes that the slight rolling of the eyes thus indicates only mild anger (anenaiṣat kopo lakṣyate). D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read roṣeṇa, "in anger," for īṣat tu, "slightly." Commentators and translators differ as to whether it is Rāvaṇa's or Kumbhakarṇa's eyes that are rolling. Ck and Ct believe that the reference is to Kumbhakarṇa, and in this they are followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 164), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 190), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 165), and Pagani (1999, p. 1024). Cr believes that the rolling eyes are Rāvaṇa's, and in this he is followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1298), Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 5), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1602), and us. Cs quotes Ct on this point but appears to prefer the alternative. Cs argues that, in Ct's interpretation, the word kruddham, "angry," that modifies Kumbhakarṇa would be redundant with roṣeṇa, "in anger." Cs further notes that the use of the dual number for eyes in the case of the [twenty-eyed] Rāvaṇa is correct, in reference to the two sets of eyes, right and left, on his ten heads. Cs cites a similar use of the dual to refer to Rāvaṇa's arms elsewhere in the text. (roṣeṇa parivṛttābhyāṃ netrābhyām upalakṣitaṃ kruddhaṃ bhrātaraṃ kumbhakarṇaṃ rāvaṇo 'bravīd iti nāgojibhaṭṭaḥ. roṣeṇa parivṛttābhyāṃ netrābhyāṃ pārśvadvayavartinetratvena dvivacanaṃ pūrvaṃ bhujābhyām itivat. tadupalakṣito rāvaṇo [vānaro [sic]—so KK] vākyam uvācety anvayo vā. asmin pakṣe kruddhapadaṃ nādhikam.) See 6.47.106 and note. See, too, 5.8.13,19; 5.20.24,26; 5.47.2–14; and notes. Compare 3.30.8, where Rāvaṇa is said to have twenty arms.

12. "As of today, you have been asleep for a very long time" adya te sumahān kālaḥ śayānasya: Literally, "today, a very long time [has passed] while you were sleeping." The phrase sumahān kālaḥ galvanizes Ct to revisit the vexed question of the duration of Kumbhakarṇa's slumber, which we have commented upon in detail above in the note to 6.48.12. The problem here, also raised in that earlier context, is that, aside from the various formulations of Kumbhakarṇa's boon/curse, some versions of the text have Kumbhakarṇa participating in Rāvaṇa's recent council of war, which can only have been a few days before Kumbhakarṇa was awakened. Ct reasserts his earlier position that the period specified here must be greater than the six months mandated in Brahmā's curse at 6.49.26. With this in mind, he continues, the vulgate verse [1029* following 6.48.12ab] that indicates that Kumbhakarṇa fell asleep nine days after giving counsel to Rāvaṇa must either be a spurious interpolation or must be using the word "day (ahan)" to mean "month." Because of this, Ct goes on, we must understand that the period referred to in this verse must be eight or nine months, from which it follows that the war has been going on for more than six months (anenāpi yuddhasya ṣaṇmāsādhika-kālavyāpitā sūcitā bhavatīti jñāyate). Cs contests Ct's position. He arues that the battle could not possibly have gone on for six months or more, citing a Padmapurāṇa passage that claims that Rāvaṇa was killed on the forty-eighth day of the battle, thus bringing in a new stricture on the duration of Kumbhakarṇa's sleep. See 6.34.2 and note. On the chronology of the Yuddhakāṇḍa, see note to 6.4.4.

"resting comfortably" sukhitaḥ: Literally, "happy, comfortable." Ś1,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead suṣuptaḥ, "sleeping soundly."

"you do not know of the danger" na jānīṣe . . . bhayam: This statement further confirms the spuriousness of verse 1028* mentioned above and the lengthy southern passage that follows sarga 9 in the critical edition (App. I, No. 3 = GPP, VSP, KK, Gita Press, NSP 6.10–15), where Kumbhakarṇa is represented as discussing Rāvaṇa's conflict with Rāma (see especially lines 142–229 = sarga 12 in GPP, NSP, VSP, Gita Press, and KK). Here the critical edition seems to render moot the energetic debate among the southern commentators to reconcile Kumbhakarṇa's long sleep with his supposed participation in Rāvaṇa's council of war. But see 6.51.2 and note, where the critical edition's evidence appears to support Kumbhakarṇa's participation in the council.

13. "Rāma" rāmaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead śrīmān, "majestic, glorious."

"is cutting us off at the roots" mūlaṃ naḥ parikṛntati: Literally, "he is cutting our root." Cg glosses, "afflicting our core forces (mūlabalam . . . bādhate)." D9–11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read kulam, "race, family, lineage," for mūlam. This yields the sense "he is exterminating our race." Compare note to verse 16 below.

14. "Just look . . . of Laṅkā" hanta paśyasva laṅkāyāḥ: We take the particle hanta here in its inceptive or asseverative sense, unlike the other translators who render, "Alas," etc. Ñ1,V3,B1,3,D1,2,4,6,7,9–11,13,G,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read the locative laṅkāyām, "in Laṅkā," for the genitive laṅkāyāḥ, "of Laṅkā." Commentators differ as to how to break up the sequence paśyasvalaṅkāyāḥ [v.l. -ām]. Ct, Cm, Crā, and Cg (second alternative) read the regular parasmaipada second person imperative paśya, "see, look at," followed by svalaṅkāyāḥ [-ām], "of [in] my very own Laṅkā," which they gloss as "my own island of Laṅkā (ātmīyalaṅkādvīpe—so Cg, Cm, Crā)." Among the translators consulted, only Dutt (1893, p. 1299) clearly follows this reading. Cg (first alternative), whom we follow, reads the irregular ātmanepada imperative paśyasva, "see, look at," noting the irregularity, plus laṅkāyāḥ [-ām].

"He has turned them all into one big sea of monkeys after . . . coming" āgamya vānaraikārṇavaṃ kṛtam: Literally, "having come, has made [it] a single sea of monkeys." The syntax of the second half of the verse is awkward and elliptical, lacking both a clear subject and a clear object. The commentators are silent. Our assumption is that the poet intends Rāma, the subject of the previous verse, to be the agent of the gerund āgamya, "having come," and the passive participle kṛtam, "has been made, has been turned into," while the collectivity of the woods and parklands mentioned in pāda b constitutes the object of the latter. The north attempts to remedy the difficulty by explicitly making the monkeys the subject of the transformation of the woods, etc. (See Pollock 1984a, pp. 85–86.)

15. "never do I see" na paśyāmi kadācana: D6,9–11,G2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read kathaṃcana for kadācana. This would lend the passage the sense "in no way can I foresee."

Following verse 15, D5–7,9–11,S (as well as a number of northern manuscripts), in whole or in part and at various points in the sarga, insert a passage of three lines [1102*]: "Nor have these monkeys ever been defeated in battle. That is the danger that has arisen. You must save us, mighty warrior.[1] You must destroy them this very day. It is for this purpose, sir, that you have been awakened."

16. "You must understand that I have exhausted all my resources." sarvakṣapita-kośaṃ ca sa tvam abhyavapadya mām: Literally, "you should know me as one whose resources or treasury are all exhausted." The commentators differ somewhat as to the meaning of the word -kośa-, "resources." Cg, Cm, Ck, and Ct gloss aiśvaryāṇi, a rather comprehensive term encompassing the notions of wealth, power, and resources in general. Cr suggests, "treasure rooms (dhanāgārāṇi)."

"in which only the children and the aged remain" bālavṛddhāvaśeṣitām: Cg observes that Rāvaṇa is exaggerating considerably here but that he does so on the basis of the destruction of his core forces (mūlabala), which will be discussed later. (ity atiśayoktiḥ. mūlabalādyutsādanasya vakṣyamāṇatvāt.) See note to verse 13 above.

17. "Great-armed warrior" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed one."

"I have never before spoken in this fashion to anyone . . . my brother" mayaivaṃ noktapūrvo hi kaścid bhrātaḥ: B1,2,D1,7–13,T3,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the nominative bhrātā, "brother," for the critical edition's vocative bhrātaḥ, "O brother." This reading yields the sense "No brother has ever been addressed by me in this fashion." B4,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read kaccit for the critical edition's kaścit. Cg understands the particle as a question marker and thus interprets the phrase to mean "Have I ever spoken to you

"and my fullest confidence" parā saṃbhāvanā ca me: The term saṃbhāvanā has a variety of more or less textually appropriate meanings and has been rendered variously by commentators and translators. Ck and Ct, with whom we tend to agree, gloss, "hope (āśā)," understanding, "And there is the hope that this one will accomplish the deed (ayaṃ kāryaṃ sādhayiṣyatīty āśā cāsti—so Ct; kāryasiddhiḥ pratyāśā—so Ck)." Cg glosses, "respect (ādaraḥ)," while Cm offers, "the greatest respect (atyādaraḥ)." Dutt (1893, p. 1299) renders, "great is the probability of thy succeeding." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 191) understands, "ma suprême espérance." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 166), who translates "my supreme hopes." Similarly, Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1602) renders, "my supreme hope." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 165) translates, "my supreme confidence in your ability," while Pagani (1999, p. 1024) understands, "la plus haute estime."

18. "in our wars with the gods and asuras" devāsuravimardeṣu: Despite the poet's use of this stereotyped name for the ancient and recurrent war between the gods and asuras, that conflict cannot logically be intended here. For, if it were, from what position would the rākṣasa Kumbhakārṇa be fighting with both parties to the conflict? Several translators have unreflectingly seen a reference to the devāsurayuddha here rather than to the various conflicts between the rākṣasas and gods, on the one hand, and between the former and other supernatural beings, on the other. Thus, for example, aside from his numerous conflicts with the devas, we see Rāvaṇa, earlier in his career, engaged in battle with the Nivātakavaca asuras (Uttarakāṇḍa 23) and with the gandharvas, yakṣas, etc. (Uttarakāṇḍa 13–15). This confusion on the part of translators who follow the text of Ct may be a result of the variant reading found in most southern manuscripts. D5,7,9–11,T2,3,G,M5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead devāsureṣu yuddheṣu, "in the wars of the gods and asuras," which is the most conventional terminology for the classic war between the gods and the asuras. See note below on the gods and the asuras. See, too, 6.7.7 and note.

"you faced off against" prativyūhya: Literally, "having arrayed [an army against an enemy]." This presumably refers to Kumbhakarṇa's generalship of the rākṣasa forces in previous battles. Ck and Ct gloss, "having made an opposing force (prātibhaṭyaṃ kṛtvā)." Cg offers, "having separated or isolated [them] (vibhajya)," which Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 165) renders as "taking them on by turns." Cr understands, "sowing fear (bhayam utpādya)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 191), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 166) and Pagani (1999, p. 1024), construes the gerund somewhat irregularly with the gods and asuras, whom he understands to be ranged in battle against Kumbhakarṇa. This also seems to be the interpretation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1602).

"and defeated them" devāḥ . . . nirjitāś cāsurāḥ: Literally, "the gods and the asuras were defeated." Ś1,V2,3,D4,8–12,T2,3,G3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read amarāḥ, "immortals," for asurāḥ, "asuras." This reading, in which Kumbhakarṇa fights and defeats only the immortal gods and not the asuras, renders more plausible the understanding that the battle of the gods and asuras mentioned earlier in the verse refers to the classic conflict between those two classes of supernatural beings. In this case, Kumbhakarṇa could be seen as fighting on the side of the asuras. This reading has been rendered by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 191), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 166), and Dutt (1893, p. 1299).

Following 18cd, Ñ,V,B2–4,D4–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1104*]: "[. . . defeated them in battle.] So, have recourse to all of your might, warrior of fearsome valor. [For there is . . .]."

19. "you . . . must . . . scatter" vidhama: Literally, "you must blow away."

The meter is rucirā.

1. "he laughed and then said these words" babhāṣe 'tha vacanaṃ prajahāsa ca: Literally, "he spoke this speech and laughed." Why is Kumbhakarṇa laughing at his brother's misfortune? According to Ck, Ct, and Cs, he does so at the thought that evil-minded Rāvaṇa is now reaping the fruits of his failure to heed the wise counsel of Vibhīṣaṇa, etc. [to release Sītā] (vibhīṣaṇavaco 'naṅgīkāraphalaṃ prāptaṃ durātmaneti hāsaḥ—so Ct). We follow Cg, who sensibly proposes that we should invert the order of the actions of speaking and laughing (atra vyatyayaḥ kāryaḥ). Ś,V3,B1,D1–3,8–13,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read babhāṣedam, "he said this," for the critical edition's babhāṣe 'tha, "he then said." This requires either a highly irregular sandhi or the citation of the all but invariably ātmanepada root √bhāṣ, "to speak," in the parasmaipada. Only Cs takes note of this issue, proposing either that we break the sequence up into babhāṣe + dam, "he said to that magnanimous one," or accept the variant found in the critical edition. (daṃ dātāraṃ rāvaṇaṃ praty babhāṣe. babhāṣe 'thety api kvacit pāṭhaḥ.)

2. "you paid no heed to those who had your welfare at heart" hiteṣv anabhiyuktena . . . tvayā: Literally, "by you who were inattentive to those beneficial [things]." We follow the commentators who understand hiteṣu elliptically to refer either to those for whom Rāvaṇa's welfare was paramount (hitapareṣu—so Cg) or to those who offered beneficial advice (hitavādiṣu—so Ct, Ck). B4,D1,4,6,13,T2,3,G1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read anabhiraktena, "detached from."

"that very calamity" doṣo hi yaḥ: Literally, "which flaw or which fault." We agree with Cr, who glosses, "the fruits of the evil policy in which you have engaged (bhavatkṛta-durnayaphalam)."

"we" asmābhiḥ: Literally, "by us." Kumbhakarṇa is probably using the formal first person plural for the singular, but, as Ck and Ct point out, he could also be referring to Vibhīṣaṇa (mayā vibhīṣaṇena ca).

"earlier, at the council of ministers" purā mantravinirṇaye: Literally, "formerly at the [time of the] determination of counsel." The reference is to the council of Rāvaṇa's ministers at which Vibhīṣaṇa, Kumbhakarṇa, and others offer Rāvaṇa the beneficial advice of returning Sītā. This reference, however, presents textual difficulties. As noted above (see notes to 6.50.12,13 above), the passage in which Kumbhakarṇa and the ministers engage in this debate belongs in its entirety only to the southern text and has been excised from the critical edition and relegated to App. I. No. 3 (see especially lines 200–229), summarized in the notes to sarga 9 above. A variety of northern manuscripts include sections of this appendix at various points, but none of them, according to the critical apparatus, includes the section in which Kumbhakarṇa appears (lines 160–163, 200–229). There is also an apparent narrative contradiction in that, at verse 6.50.12 above, Rāvaṇa states that, until the present meeting, Kumbhakaṛna has had no knowledge of Rāma's invasion of Laṅkā. Perhaps the poet has nodded.

3. "You are suffering the immediate consequences of your wicked deed, just as evildoers suffer an instant descent into their respective hells." śīghraṃ khalv abhyupetaṃ tvāṃ phalaṃ pāpasya karmaṇaḥ / nirayeṣv eva patanaṃ yathā duṣkṛtakarmaṇaḥ: Literally, "The fruit of wicked action has come to you swiftly indeed, just as the fall into hells [comes] to evildoers." The specific evil deed referred to is, as several of the commentators note, the abduction of Sītā. According to Ck, Ct, and Cg, the immediacy of retribution is in accordance with the maxim, "Through the performance of extreme actions, whether good or evil, one experiences the fruits in this very world (atyutkaṭaiḥ puṇyapāpair ihaiva phalam aśnute)."

As Cg points out, the form duṣkṛtakarmaṇaḥ, "evildoers," should be read as an accusative plural to maintain the grammatical parallelism of the proposition and the example. This reading, we believe, is further supported by the use of the plural nirayeṣu, "into [various] hells." Ct and Cr read the term as a genitive singular, and in this they have been followed by all translators who share this reading.

4. "the consequences" anubandhaḥ: Cg, Cm, and Ct all cite Amarakośa 3.3.98 in which "the production of evil consequences (doṣotpādaḥ)" is given as a meaning of the term. Cr breaks the word anubandhaḥ into the adverb anu, "in consequence," and the noun bandhaḥ, "bond or tie," taking the latter term to refer to the bond of love between Rāma and Sītā (anu bandhaḥ sītārāmayoḥ parasparaṃ prītir na vicāritaḥ).

5. "what ought to be done first . . . what ought to be done later" pūrvakāryāṇi . . . uttarakāryāṇi: As Ct, Cg, and Cm note, what should have been done first was reflection (vicāraḥ—so Ct) or taking counsel, etc. (mantraṇādīni), and only then should the subsequent action itself, i.e., the abduction of Sītā (sītāharaṇam—so Ct), have been done. Cg and Cm indicate that Kumbhakarṇa is accusing Rāvaṇa of having proceeded in the reverse order (viparītaṃ kṛtam).

"has no comprehension of the distinction between sound and unsound policy" na sa veda nayānayau: Literally, "he does not know policy and non-policy."

6. "without reference to the proper time and place" deśakālavihīnāni: Literally, "lacking [proper] place and time."

"just as are offerings of food to impious persons" havīṃṣy aprayateṣv iva: The precise sense of this illustration is hard to determine because of the multiplicity of meanings of the first term havīṃṣi and the elliptical nature of the second, aprayateṣu, "unsanctified, impious, unholy." The commentators offer three possible modificands for the adjective aprayata. The first, suggested by Ck and Ct, is "fires (agniṣu)." Taking havīṃṣi in its common sense of "sacrificial oblation," they understand the simile to mean "like oblations offered into unsanctified fires." This interpretation has been followed by all translators of the southern recension. To our mind, however, it is questionable, as the adjective aprayata, whose underlying form, prayata, refers basically to "pious individuals who have restrained or subdued their senses," seems to poorly describe fire. Cr, Cg, and Cm understand the adjective to refer to unworthy people or recipients who are lowly (atinīceṣu—so Cr), unfit, or disqualified as recipients (apātreṣu—so Cg), or who are heedless, that is, devoid of discrimination (asāvadhānajaneṣu . . . arucijaneṣv iti yāvat—so Cm). This interpretation implies the taking of the noun haviḥ in its sense of "a gift," particularly a gift of food to brahmans, and evokes the question of how a brahman becomes an unworthy recipient (apātra) as treated in Manusmṛti 11.69. This understanding of the figure is adopted and further supported by Ctr (1964, p. 186) in his commentary on the passage, bolstered by Manu's discourse on the futility of gifts to evil or unworthy brahmans at Manusmṛti 3.97, 3.142, and 4.192–195. In what is perhaps a glossing of this elliptical phrase, a number of northern manuscripts (Ñ,V1,2,B2,3,D1) and the printed edition of Gorresio (6.40.6) read the instrumental aprayatair iva, which yields the sense "[like oblations offered] by impious or impure persons." This is rendered by Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 7) as "[siccome il sacro burro] offerto da gente impura."

7. This is one of those enigmatic epic verses in which groups or categories drawn from various śāstras are alluded to only by their numbers, leaving commentators and audiences to determine to the best of their abilities exactly what is being referred to (see 5.33.17–19 and notes). In this case, the subject is clearly nītiśāstra, or the science of statecraft. The issue, the propriety of a king's deliberating with his ministers before taking any action, generally parallels some of the discussion in Kauṭilya's Arthaśāstra. The reference in the verse is apparently to the issue raised at Arthaśāstra 1.4–5 and 1.11 concerning the problem of a king's consultations with his ministers. Kumbhakarṇa seems to decide in favor of a king consulting with several counselors (ArthŚā 1.15.34–39) before taking action. See also the discussion of this passage by Friedrich Wilhelm (1960, pp. 11ff.).

Commentators and translators differ considerably in their understanding of what precisely the three types of action and their fivefold application are.

"A king who perceives" yaḥ prapaśyati: Literally, "one who perceives." Ñ2,D7,9–11,G1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead yaḥ prapadyate, "whoever resorts to."

"the fivefold application" pañcadhā yogam: According to Ck, Ct, Cr, Cg, and Cm (second alternative), the application of action is fivefold in reference to the following five categories: 1) the means of undertaking actions (karmaṇām ārambhopāyaḥ); 2) the provision of men and material resources (puruṣadravyasampat); 3) the divisions of place and time (deśakālavibhāgaḥ); 4) the means of avoiding failure (vipattipratīkāraḥ); and 5) the success of one's undertaking (kāryasiddhiḥ). This list is repeated in the footnotes of Dutt (1893, p. 1300), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1603), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 166), and by Pagani (1999, p. 1665) in her endnote. Cv and Cm (first alternative), however, have a somewhat different list, arguing that the actions are taken with respect to the following five considerations: place, time, self, material resources, and purpose (deśataḥ kālataś cātmanaś ca dravyataś ca prayojanataś ca—so Cv). According to Cl, however, as quoted by Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 281) in his endnote to the translation of the passage, the reference is to the five principal modes of royal interaction with neighboring kings, viz., conciliation, gifts or bribery, sowing dissension, punishment, assassination, etc. (sāmadānabhedadaṇḍavadhādiprayogarūpam). See 6.9.8; 6.51.11–13; 6.59.28; 6.71.12; and notes. Cf. notes to 6.31.48–49.

"the three types of action" trayāṇām . . . karmaṇām: Literally, "of three actions." There is even less unanimity among commentators and translators here than in regard to the fivefold application. According to Ct, Cr, and Ck, the three types of action are conciliation, etc. (sāmādīnām), characterized by the three conditions of diminution, increase, and stasis (kṣayavṛddhisthānalakṣaṇānām). These terms are used by Kauṭilya at Arthaśāstra 7.1.28. See, too, the very similar list of sthāna, vṛddhi, and hāni mentioned by Mahodara at 6.52.4 below. This interpretation is followed in Dutt's (1893, p. 1300) footnote to the passage, where he states, "The three kinds of action are treaty, war, etc." Dutt then remarks, "All this is nebulous; and the commentator [Ct] is sadly reticent over this extremely important passage."

Cv, Cg, and Cm understand the three types of action to be classifiable according to a continuum of highest, middlemost, and lowest (uttamamadhyamādhamakarmaṇām). The first, and best, of these is applied in situations where a king's own power is in the ascendant and his rival's is on the wane, and consists of invasion and the application of coercive force. The middlemost type of action occurs when one's own and one's rival's power are equal and consists of alliance or conciliation. The third, and lowest, form of action is the seeking of protection or a tributary relationship accompanied by gifts or bribes and is resorted to when the power of one's rival is ascendant over that of one's self. (tatrātmodayaparajyānisaṃbhavasamaye kriyamāṇaṃ daṇḍopayogi yānam uttamaṃ karma. ātmaparayor balasāmye kriyamāṇaṃ saṃdhānaṃ madhyamaṃ karma. parodayātmajyānisamaye kriyamāṇaṃ dānapūrvasamāśrayaṇam adhamaṃ karma—so Cg.) This interpretation is followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1603) in its note to the passage. Compare Arthaśāstra 7.1.13–18, where four actions are noted: marching, settling down, compromise, and asylum.

Cl, as quoted in Gorresio's note (1858, vol. 10, pp. 281–82), takes the word trayāṇām, "of the three," separately from karmaṇām, "of the actions," and sees the former as a reference to the three different types of people to whom action is directed, namely, an enemy (ripuḥ), a neutral, that is, someone who offers helpful advice to two disputants, and an object of enmity (dveṣaviṣayaḥ—rendered by Gorresio [p. 282] as "colui che nutre odio"). (trayāṇāṃ ripumadhyasthadveṣāṇām. ripur abhighātako madhyastho dvayor vivadamānayor hitāśaṃsī dveṣyo dveṣaviṣayaḥ.)

Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 166), in his footnote to the passage, specifies the three kinds of action as 1) trivial; 2) common or ordinary; and 3) important and urgent. In this he appears to have been followed by Pagani (1999, p. 1664) in her endnote to the passage, where she describes the three types as "l'action ordinaire, l'action importante et l'action urgente." Neither translator offers any source or rationale for this classification.

"after coming to a decision" samayaṃ kṛtvā: Literally, "having made a pact or agreement." We generally agree with the commentators, who understand samayam to mean "reflection on the means for effective application (prayogasādhanavicāram—so Ct, Cr; prayogasādhanasaṃpattivicāram—so Ck)" or "a correct conclusion in the form of a decision (niścayarūpaṃ siddhāntam—so Cg; niścayam—so Cv, Cm)."

"remains on the proper path" sabhye vartate pathi: Literally, "he is on the refined or civilized path." Commentators define the path as the path of proper policy (nītimārge—Ct, Ck, Cg) or the path of kings (*rājamārg*e—Cr). Cg, citing the Ratnamālā (sabhyaḥ sāmājike sādhau), and Cv gloss sabhye as "good or proper (sādhau)." Cg further notes that the phrase means that one obtains the fruit of proper policy (samyaññītiphalaṃ prāpnotīty arthaḥ). Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,7,8,10–13,G2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read samyak, "proper," instead of sabhye. Ct and Ck advise that we should read the term adverbially, i.e., in the sense of "properly."

8. This verse is obscure and elliptical, and the commentators struggle somewhat to put it all together meaningfully. The vagueness of the allusions provokes Dutt (1893, p. 1300) to make the following remark in a footnote: "One is at sea in the midst of these formless generalities. The tantalized intellect makes a desperate attempt to grasp the body of the shadow seeming substance, but the empty air mocks his pains. A translator, however, is fast bound to the oar and must pull on, will be, nil be [sic]."

"So does" ca: Literally, "and." As noted above, the verse is rather elliptical. We agree with Cv, Cg, and Cm in construing this verse also with the phrase, "he remains on the proper path," of verse 7 above.

"who desires to reach a decision" samayaṃ vicikīrṣati: Literally, "he desires to make an agreement." We follow Ck, Ct, and Cr in understanding samaya here to refer to a decision taken in accordance with the various actions and conditions alluded to in verse 7 above (kṣayādikālocitasāmādikarmavicāram uktapañcaprakāratatprayogasādhanasaṃpattivicāraṃ ca kartum icchati—so Ck, Ct). Cv, Cm, and Cg similarly offer, "a decision as to what is to be done (kāryanirṇayam)."

"in conformance with the texts on polity" yathāgamam: Literally, "in accordance with the āgamas (scientific texts)." The reference here, as the commentators point out, is specifically to the science of governance or polity, nītiśāstra.

"who pays heed to his ministers" budhyate sacivān: D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the instrumental sacivaiḥ for the critical text's accusative sacivān. Ck, Ct and Cr add the postposition saha, "together with," although these commentators tend to differ as to the verb with which the postpositional phrase should be construed. Thus, Ck and Ct read it with cikīrṣati (v.l. vicikīrṣati), yielding the sense "he desires to reach a decision together with his ministers." Cr, however, reads the phrase with anupaśyati, "he recognizes," in pāda d, yielding the sense "together with his ministers, he recognizes his true friends." Cg and Cm, who read with the critical edition, nonetheless gloss the instrumental, construing the phrase with budhyate, for which they gloss ālocayati, yielding the sense "he considers [a resolution as to what is to be done] together with his ministers." Cv is the only commentator to retain the accusative sense in this reading, glossing sacivāṃś ca buddhyā saṃdhatte, construing the phrase with the instrumental buddhyā, "with his thoughts or intelligence," yielding a meaning something like "he reconciles his ministers with his [own] thoughts."

"who recognizes his true friends by virtue of his own intelligence" buddhyā suhṛdaś cānupaśyati: Literally, "he sees his friends with his intellect." We tentatively follow the interpretation of Ct and Ck, who understand that the king is making a distinction between a true friend, i.e., one who gives him beneficial advice (hitavaktā), and one who offers advice merely to please him (prabhoḥ sukhamātrajananecchayā vadati—so Ct; sukhecchamātrā[a?]vādī—so Ck). Cr, somewhat similarly, glosses, "he knows on the basis of various types of investigation that 'these are my [true] friends' (ime me suhṛda ity anekavidhasvakṛtaparīkṣayā jānāti)." Cm and Cv, in the same vein, gloss, "he investigates or supervises his friends (suhṛdaś cāvekṣate—so Cm)." Cm offers as an alternative a rather different gloss: "he deliberates together with his friends (yadvā suhṛdbhiḥ saha vicārayati)." The latter is the sole gloss offered by Cg.

9. "A man should pursue" bhajate puruṣaḥ: Literally, "a man has recourse to." T2,3, the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm (VSP 6.63.9 and KK 6.63.9), and the text of Gita Press (6.63.9) read instead the optative bhajeta, "one should have recourse to," for the critical edition's bhajate. Among the translators consulted, only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1604) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 166), who read this variant, translate it as an injunctive. Although this is a minor variant, we, too, have done so, given the didactic nature of the passage.

"all three human ends—righteousness, profit, and pleasure" dharmam arthaṃ ca kāmaṃ ca sarvān: Literally, "righteousness, profit, and pleasure—all of them." These constitute the well-known set of the puruṣārthas, the three "ends or goals of man," that form the armature around which the structure of the social, religious, and political life of traditional India is erected. See 6.52.6; 6.105.13; and notes.

"at their proper times" kāle: Literally, "at the time." The commentators and some translators adduce the traditional assignment of each of these modes or spheres of activity to particular portions of the day, viz., dharma is chiefly practiced in the morning, artha in the afternoon, and kāma in the evening or at night. Some of the commentators, including Cg and Cm, elaborate on this idea by stating which combinations of the three are appropriate during the three specified periods. According to Cg, certain of these may be practiced at times other than those strictly prescribed for them in combination with the ones belonging to that particular time. Thus, for example, in the morning artha may be pursued along with the prescribed dharma, while dharma may similarly be practiced with artha in the afternoon. Artha may be practiced along with kāma in the evening, and dharma may be practiced together with both at that time. Cg cautions, however, that a person who devotes himself to kāma, or pleasure, alone at all three of these times is considered to be the lowest of men (kevalakāmaṃ sarvakāleṣv api sevāmānaḥ puruṣādhama evety abhisaṃdhiḥ).

"all at once or two at a time" trīṇi dvandvāni vā: Literally, "the three or the pairs or or the three pairs." Cv and Cg understand the neuter term trīṇi to refer either generically to the three puruṣārthas taken individually or to three pairs or combinations (dvandvāni) of them. For Cg, the appropriate pairings would be dharma and artha, artha and dharma, and kāma and artha. (dharmam arthaṃ kāmaṃ ca pratyekaṃ vā. trīṇi dvandvāni vā dharmārthāv arthadharmau kāmārthau vā sarvān vā.) Cv, on the other hand, lists dharma and artha, artha and kāma, and dharma and kāma (trīṇi dvandvāni dharmārthāv arthakāmau dharmakāmau vā). Ck and Ct seem to understand that the number of goals men pursue increases as their status rises. Both of them state that yuvarājas, "heirs apparent or princes regent" (see note to verse 10 below), and also ministers (sacivas—so Ck), practice only the pair consisting of dharma and kāma, presumably leaving the exercise of the third element, artha, statecraft or profit, to the king alone (yuvarājādis tu dvandvāni vā dvandvāny eva dharmakāmadvikāny eva bhajate—so Ct).

10. "one exercising royal power" rājamātraḥ: Literally, "someone of the measure of a king." Ck, Ct, and Cr gloss, "heir apparent or prince regent (yuvarājaḥ)." It is worth noting that the term yuvarāja, literally, "young king," is used by Vālmīki to identify two rather different political posts. One is the designated heir or successor to a reigning king. It is in this sense that Aṅgada is made the yuvarāja in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa (4.25.11,35). The term is also used to designate a prince regent who reigns upon the full or partial retirement of the ruling monarch. This is the position into which Rāma was to have been consecrated prior to his banishment in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa (see 2.1.34 and notes). Cf. 6.17.15 and notes; and notes to 6.11.30 and 6.111.14. See, too, 6.116.78–79 and notes, where the term yuvarāja appears to be used of someone exercising shared or joint sovereignty. Cg and Cm, however, whom we are inclined to follow, gloss, "one like a king (rājasadṛśaḥ)," which we understand to refer to a person in a position to govern. Most northern manuscripts, interpreting with Ck, Ct, and Cr, read instead "a king's son or prince (rājaputraḥ)," which in itself may be a gloss on this ambiguous term (see Pollock 1984a, pp. 85–86).

"And . . . among these three is foremost" triṣu caiteṣu yac chreṣṭham: All the commentators understand, as one of their explanations of this elliptical expression, the reference to be to the three puruṣārthas mentioned in verse 9 (eteṣu triṣu dharmādiṣu sarvamūlatvāt—so Ct; dharmārthakāmeṣu—so Cg). They further argue that it is dharma, "righteousness," that is the foremost among them (yac chreṣṭhaṃ dharmarūpaṃ vastu—Ct, Cm). Given the context, we believe this is the most plausible interpretation. Cg and Cm, however, offer as an alternative the notion that the "three" refers to the three types of action mentioned in verse 7 above (eteṣu pūrvokteṣu triṣu bhajaneṣu dharmārthakāmeṣu vā—so Cg).

"who . . . does not take it to heart" nāvabudhyate: Literally, "he does not understand." We follow Cg and Cm, who gloss, "he does not know [how] to put into practice (ācarituṃ na jānāti)."

"finds all his great learning to be in vain" vyarthaṃ tasya bahuśrutam: Literally, "his great learning has no purpose." Cg understands the verse to be an example of aprastutapraśaṃsā, the rhetorical figure of praising that which is not mentioned. What the verse is saying, according to Cg, is that the study of the śāstras by a person who abandons dharma, the foremost among the puruṣārthas, and resorts instead to the least among them, kāma, is as meaningless as the roaring of the ocean. By this, Cg indicates, we are to understand that Rāvaṇa's education has been in vain. (evaṃ sāmānyarūpayāprastutapraśaṃsayā trivargeṣu śreṣṭhaṃ dharmaṃ parityajya jaghanyaṃ kāmam evāśritasya te śāstraśravaṇaṃ samudraghoṣamātram āsīd iti prastuto 'rtho 'vagamyate.)

11–12. The two verses constitute one very long complex sentence. We have broken it up for the sake of readability.

"self-possessed monarch" ātmavān: Literally, "self-possessed one or self-controlled one."

"bribery, conciliation, sowing dissension, coercive force" upapradānaṃ sāntvaṃ vā bhedam . . . ca vikramam: These are variant names for the standard nītiśāstra list of the four modes of interacting with one's rival. They are usually called sāma, dāna, bheda, and daṇḍa. See 6.9.8; 6.59.28; 6.71.12; and notes.

"any combination of these means" yogam: Literally, "conjunction." The term is somewhat ambiguous here, and commentators and translators differ in the ways in which they understand it. Cv(?), Cg, and Cm, as well as Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 166) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1604), understand it to refer to the conjunction or combination of the strategies listed in padas 11ab (teṣāṃ yogaṃ samavāyaṃ ca—so Cg). We follow this interpretation. Ct and Ck, on the other hand, take the term in the sense in which it is used in verse 7 above to refer to the fivefold application, yoga, of the four strategic means (uktapañcavidhaprayogasādhanasaṃpādanam—so Ct). Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 8) as well as Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 192), who is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 167), take yoga as a fifth strategic means in the sense of "union [with a rival]." Pagani (1999, p. 1025) renders, "[celui qui délibère . . . sur les préparatifs] *d'un*e entreprise," apparently taking the term in the sense of udyoga, "undertaking."

"the proper and improper ways of applying them" nayānayau: Literally, "proper and improper polity."

13. "together with ministers who understand the true nature of things and have his interests at heart" sahārthatattvajñaiḥ sacivaiḥ saha: The compound sahārthatattvajñaiḥ is ambiguous both because of the polysemy of the term -artha- and the different possible ways of analyzing the compound. We understand the compound to be a dvandva, according to which the ministers are both sahārtha-, that is, "possessing a common goal [with the king]" and -tattvajña, that is, "familiar with the true nature of things." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 166), the only translator to follow the text accepted by the critical edition (=the text of Cg, Cm), takes artha in its sense of "polity or statecraft," rendering, "well versed in polity." His rendering, however, ignores the term saha- at the beginning of the compound. The compound could perhaps also be read as a karmadhāraya (having a prior member composed of the bahuvrīhi compound sahārtha-) in the sense of "knowing the true nature of things along with the consequences thereof." Ś,Ñ1,V3,B1,2,D1–3,7–13,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read buddhi- in place of the postpositional saha, "together with," in pāda d. This allows Ct, Ck, and Cr and the translators who follow them to read the saha- at the beginning of the compound in pāda c as a prepositional adverb in the same sense, thus leaving the less complex compound arthatattvajñaiḥ, "knowing the essence of polity," to stand on its own.

"over what he ought and ought not do" kāryākāryam: Ś,Ñ,D10,11,G2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead kuryāt kāryam, "he should perform his duty." Cm notes this reading as a variant. With this and the variants noted above, the text of Ct yields a rather different meaning from that found in Cg and the critical edition. Commentators who share this variant reading propose two ways of rendering the verse. Ct and Ck interpret, "whoever, having consulted with ministers who were endowed with the stated virtues and having considered the future auspicious results, performs his own duty, he is a king (ya ucyamānaguṇaiḥ sacivaiḥ saha hitānubandhaṃ śubham udarkaphalam ālokya vicāryātmanaḥ kāryaṃ kuryāt sa rājā bhavatīty anvayaḥ—so Ct)." In this they are followed by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 193) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 167). For Cr's interpretation, see below.

"thrives" jīvati: Literally, "he lives." Ñ1,B2,D7,9–11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read [buddhi] jīvibhiḥ (Ñ1,B2,— [buddhi] jīvanaiḥ) for the critical edition's [saha] jīvati. This creates an adjective with the sense "who live by their intelligence or wits," which then modifies sacivaiḥ, "ministers." Cr thus renders the whole verse as "A king should perform his duty after deliberating over the beneficial consequences for him with ministers who understand the nature of reality and make their living by their intelligence (buddhir eva jīvo jīvanaṃ tadbuddhir ata evārthatattvajñaiḥ sacivair ātmano hitānubandhaṃ hitapravṛddhim ālokya vicārya rājā kāryaṃ kuryāt)." This reading is followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1301), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1604), and Pagani (1999, p. 1025).

14. The point of the verse, as suggested by Ct and, more elaborately, by Ck, is that a king, e.g., Rāvaṇa, who rejects the salutary advice of good counselors, such as Vibhīṣaṇa (Malyavān—Ck), etc. [who urged the return of Sītā and propitiation of Rāma], in favor of the disastrous advice of bad counselors, such as Prahasta (Ck), etc. [who urged intransigence and belligerence], suffers every calamity (athottamamantrivibhīṣaṇādimatam apahāya durmantribhir mantraṇamūlaḥ sarvānartha ity āha—so Ct).

"dumb brutes, in fact" paśubuddhayaḥ: Literally, "who have the intelligence of beasts." According to Cg, these are people "who think only about such things as eating and sleeping (āhāranidrādimātrābhijñāḥ)."

"the śāstras" śāstra-: As the commentators point out, the reference is to the treatises on statecraft (arthaśāstra, nītiśāstra). Several translators (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 167; Dutt 1893, p. 1301; Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1604) render, "scriptures," which we believe is misleading.

"brought into discussions of policy" mantreṣv abhyantarīkṛtāḥ: Literally, "made interior to counsel." We follow Cg, who explains, "who have been chosen by a deluded king as counselors in deliberations concerning royal duty (bhrāntena rājñā mantreṣu rājakāryavicāreṣv abhyantarīkṛtā mantrayitṛtvena vṛtāḥ santaḥ)." V3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read mantriṣu, "among counselors," for the critical text's mantreṣu. This gives the phrase the sense "included among [his] counselors."

"out of sheer arrogance" prāgalbhyāt: Cg explains, "they desire to speak out of insolence alone without any consideration for the pros and cons. (ūhāpohau vinā kevaladhārṣṭyāt. vaktum icchanti.)"

15. "One should not follow the pernicious advice" na kāryam ahitaṃ vacaḥ: Literally, "the non-beneficial words should not be acted upon." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead kāryaṃ nābhihitaṃ vacaḥ, literally, "the words uttered should not be acted upon."

"simply eager to enhance their own positions" vipulāṃ śriyam icchatām: Literally, "of those desiring great glory." This can be interpreted, as we have done, to mean "who desire high position or state," or, as most other translators have done, to mean "who desire great wealth." We believe that the former is more appropriate, as Kumbhakarṇa seems to be referring to sycophantic ministers who seek to enhance their status at court by offering the king advice that pleases him rather than sound counsel. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 166) idiosyncratically understands this phrase, and, indeed, the entire second line of the verse [including "unfamiliar with the treatises on statecraft (arthaśāstrānabhijñānām)"], to refer not to counselors but to ignorant and rapacious kings, rendering, "kings who are unacquainted with the teachings of polity but wish for abundant prosperity should not follow the harmful advice of these ignorant men." This rendering strains both the grammar and one's credulity.

16. "And those men who . . . by foolishly uttering . . . pernicious advice that only seems beneficial" ahitaṃ ca hitākāram . . . jalpanti ye narāḥ: Literally, "men who prattle what is unbeneficial but has the appearance of benefit."

"undermine all undertakings" kṛtyadūṣaṇāḥ: Literally, "spoilers of undertakings." Cm explains, "those who spoil the accomplishment of [any] aim (siddhārthadūṣakāḥ)."

"discussions of policy" mantra-: See note to verse 14 above.

17. "in this world" iha: Literally, "here." Although Kumbhakarṇa speaks quite generally, the commentators often attempt to make his remarks refer more specifically to the situation at hand. Thus, Ck glosses, "at the present moment (idānīm)." Cr suggests, "here in Laṅkā (iha laṅkāyām)," while Cg offers, "with respect to the matter at hand (prayojanaviṣaye)."

"some counselors" mantriṇaḥ: Literally, "counselors." Ck and Ct understand the verse to refer, in fact, to two different groups of counselors: the bad ones (durmantriṇaḥ) and the good ones (sumantriṇaḥ). The bad ones, they argue, are the counselors who directly bring about their master's (i.e., Rāvaṇa's) ruin by counseling improper actions. The good ones, perceiving the destruction of their master brought about by the evil counsel of the former group, ally themselves with clever enemies of the king for their own protection. (kecana durmantriṇo bhartāraṃ tvāṃ nāśayanto hetau śatā tava nāśanimittaṃ viparītāni kṛtyāni kārayanti. kecid sumantriṇo durmantraphalaṃ tava nāśaṃ paśyanto budhaiḥ sarvajñais tava śatrubhiḥ sahitāḥ. svarakṣaṇaṃ kurvantīti śeṣaḥ.) Cs quotes this position of Ct, ridiculing it as utterly out of keeping with the tenor of the passage and as appealing only to children (prakaraṇānanukūlatā ca bālānām api bhāsata ity anādaraṇīyaṃ tad iti dik).

"acting in concert" sahitāḥ: Literally, " together with." Cg glosses, "incited by (preritāḥ)."

"cunning" budhaiḥ: Literally, "wise." Ct and Ck gloss, "omniscient (sarvajñaiḥ)"; Cg and Cm gloss, "knowing stratagems (upāyajñaiḥ)"; and Cs suggests, "those enemies, that is, those who are inimical to their own king, who know that he has ignorant counselors (avijñamantrikatvajñānaiḥ śatrubhiḥ svarājavidveṣibhiḥ)."

"persuade . . . to engage in self-destructive actions" viparītāni kṛtyāni kārayanti: Literally, "[they] cause [him] to perform perverse actions." Cg glosses viparītāni as "having perverse results (viparītaphalakāni)."

18. "When it comes to evaluating counsel" mantranirṇaye: Literally, "in the determination of counsel." Ck and Ct understand that the reference is to the discrimination between good and bad counsel (Ck) or counselors (Ct) (sumantritvadurmantritvanirṇayaḥ—so Ct).

"through a full investigation" vyavahāreṇa: We take the term in its technical sense of a judicial investigation or legal process. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, pp. 166–67), in the same vein, renders, "by skillful questioning." All other translators consulted who share this reading take the term in another of its common senses, "behavior or activity." This is more or less the understanding of Cr, who interprets it to refer to the actions of the various ministers (tadācaraṇena). Cg thinks the term refers to "equivocal or dubious speech (vyāmiśrabhāṣaṇena)," which might presumably betray disloyal ministers. Professor R. K. Sharma, in keeping with his interpretation of the term upasaṃhitān (see below), suggests that this may refer instead to the devious words of the king's agents who may be seeking to test the ministers' loyalty. (Cf., however, the use of vyāmiśreṇa at BhagGī 3.6.) Ck and Ct offer, "behavior characterized by the actions and meanings arising from various types of counsel (tattanmantrajārthakriyālakṣaṇavyavahāreṇa)," that is, that the quality of counsel [and counselors] is to be judged by the results.

"are, in fact, enemies who are posing as friends" mitrasaṃkāśān amitrā: Literally, "enemies who resemble friends."

"although they have actually been suborned" sacivān upasaṃhitān: The range of meanings for terms derived from the verb upa + sam $\sqrt{dhā}$ normally includes such senses as "connected with, endowed with, accompanied by, referring to, and attached or devoted to," none of which seems appropriate in the context. Ck attempts to use the standard lexical sense, glossing, "endowed with the state of being ministers (sacivatvena upasaṃhitān)." This is far from persuasive. We have followed Cv, Ct, Cm, Cr, and Cg, all of whom understand the term to mean "brought under the influence of one's enemies through the use of bribes, etc. (utkocādinā śatruvaśīkṛtān—so Ck)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 193), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 167) and Pagani (1999, p. 1026), understands the term to mean "lorsqu'ils sont réunis." Professor R. K. Sharma offers the interesting suggestion that we disregard, in effect, the upasarga sam and take the verb upa $\sqrt{dhā}$ in the technical sense in which it is used at Arthasāśtra 1.10 and elsewhere in the literature to refer to the series of tests through which a king and his agents seek to ascertain the loyalty or disloyalty of ministers. With this interpretation, we could translate, "once they have been subjected to various tests." Compare, for example, ArthŚā 1.10–20, Amarakośa 2.8.121, and Hemacandra's Abhidhānacintāmaṇi 7.40. See PW, MW, and Apte (s.v. upadhā). This reading also determines Professor Sharma's understanding of Cg's gloss on vyavahāra as noted above.

19. "his enemies" anye: Literally, "others." We follow the commentators, who gloss, "enemies (śatravaḥ—so Ct, Cm, Cg)."

"just as birds plunge into the gap in the Krauñca mountain" krauñcasya kham iva dvijāḥ: Literally, "as twice-born ones [find] Krauñca's cavity." The Himalayan peak known as Krauñca, or "Crane Mountain," is the subject of two related legends in which it is pierced through by powerful figures, once by the god Skanda and a second time, in rivalry of that piercing, by the legendary brahman warrior Rāma Jāmadagnya (Paraśurāma). These stories are described at MBh 3.186.112ff.; 13.166.30ff. (Guha); and MBh 9.45.70–73 (Paraśurāma). Cf. Meghdū 60; DevīBhāP 13.2–36; etc. See 6.47.38 and 6.55.12 below; and 4.42.24–28 and notes. The image of birds flying through one or another of these gaps is fostered not only by the mountain's name but also by the belief that haṃsas use this passage in their annual migration from the Indian plains to the Mānasa lake in the Himalayas (cf. MBh 7.114.82, where the haṃsas are said to fly through the gap on their way to Mount Meru). Compare Meghdū 60, where the gap in Mount Krauñca is described as "the gateway of the haṃsas (haṃsadvāram)," and Mallinātha's commentary ad loc. Interestingly, all commentators who remark on this phrase refer to the fact of the mountain's having been pierced by Skanda's javelin, while none refers to the second piercing by Paraśurāma's arrow. Pagani (1999, p. 1026), who is evidently unfamiliar with the legends of the piercing of the Krauñca mountain, takes the proper name in its ornithological sense of a saras crane (grue cendrée). She then translates the phrase as "comme les oiseaux dans un nid de grue cendrée." It is not clear what she understands to be the basis of the simile. She has perhaps misunderstood Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 193), who renders, "comme les oiseaux dans une cavité du Kraunca." See note following 6.9.22 (App. I, No. 3; lines 209–210, n. 3).

20. "a king who underestimates" yaḥ . . . avajñāya: Literally, "one who having ignored or disregarded." We agree with Cr, who glosses, "having not taken into account (aparigaṇayya)."

"and falls from his lofty state" sthānāc ca vyavaropyate: Literally, "he is caused to descend from [his] position." The commentators agree that this means that such a king is deposed (rājāsanāt . . . pracyāvyate—so Cg).

Following verse 20, D5,7,10,11,T1,3,G2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of two lines [1114*]: "We ought to do[1] what was recommended before by my younger brother.[2] That alone is the beneficial course of action for us.[3] But please do as you wish." The critical edition's reconstruction of this verse (= Cg's) is rendered only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 167).

[1]"We ought to do" kriyatām: D6,7,9–11,T3,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead priyayā, "by [your] beloved." Ct and Cr explain that this is a reference to Mandodarī. Mandodarī's sage advice to Rāvaṇa is known only to a prakṣipta, or interpolated, passage found following sarga 46 (App. I, No. 30, lines

1–98 = KK prakṣiptasarga 1, following sarga 6.48). See, too, 6.99.13 and note, where, in her lament for her slain husband, Mandodarī alludes to the earlier advice she gave him to avoid conflict with Rāma.

[2]"my younger brother" me 'nujena: The reference is to Vibhiṣaṇa.

[3]"the . . . course of action" kāryam: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vākyam, "speech, advice."

21. "he knit his brows in anger" bhrukuṭiṃ caiva saṃcakre: Literally, "and he made a curving of [his] brows." The knitting of the brows is a conventional sign of anger in Sanskrit literature. See Nāṭyaśāstra 7.16,18. Cg understands that Rāvaṇa "raised his eyebrows (ūrdhvīkṛtabhruvaṃ cakre)."

22. "How dare you lecture me" kiṃ māṃ tvam anuśāsasi: Literally, "Why do you instruct me?" Since the point of Rāvaṇa's remarks is to put Kumbhakarṇa in his place as a junior, and so subordinate, relation, we have tried to capture his implicit rebuke in our rendering.

"like some venerable elder or preceptor" mānyo gurur ivācāryaḥ: Commentators and the translators who follow them are divided as how exactly to understand this phrase. We follow the interpretation of Cg, who clearly sees the verse as comparing Kumbhakarṇa to these venerable figures. (tvaṃ mānyo bahumānarhaḥ. ācārya ācārapravartako gurur iva.) This interpretation is also followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1605) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 167). Ct understands that Rāvaṇa is comparing himself to an elder and preceptor. Ck, Ct, and Cr explain the former term as the biological father (niṣekakartā—so Ck, Ct; janakaḥ—so Cr) and the latter as the one who bestows a second birth (i.e., in the form of the upanayana ceremony) or bestows knowledge (dvitīyajanmadaḥ—so Ck, Ct; vidyāpradaḥ—so Cr). Only the translation of Dutt (1893, p. 1302) follows this interpretation literally. Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 9), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 193), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 168), and Pagani (1999, p. 1026) understand the phrase in a general sense to mean that an elder is to be respected as one's preceptor. This interpretation is in keeping with the reading of Cr.

"Why waste your effort on words like this?" kim evaṃ vākśramaṃ kṛtvā: Literally, "Why having made exhaustion through speech in this fashion?" Cg explains the phrase as follows: "Having uttered words whose only result is exhaustion, what fruit can come of it? The meaning is 'It has no purpose.' This is because the time for [discussions of] statecraft has passed. (prayāsaikaphalāṃ vācam uktvety arthaḥ. kiṃ phalam. kim api prayojanaṃ nāstīty arthaḥ. nītikālasyātītatvād iti bhāvaḥ.)"

"You must do what suits the present situation." kāle yuktaṃ vidhīyatām: Literally, "What is suitable is to be done in [this] time." Cg explains that at the present time, when the opportunity for diplomacy has passed, one must resort to martial valor, which is now appropriate (kāle nayamārgātītakāle yad yuktaṃ parākramarūpaṃ tad vidhīyatāṃ kriyatām). D11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read yad yuktaṃ tat, "that which is appropriate," for kāle yuktam, "in time . . . [what is] suitable." Since this variant is rather elliptical, commentators who share this reading (Ck, Ct, Cr), in any case, supply the words atra kāle, "at this time."

Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 193) appears to read the form vidhīyatām, the passive imperative of vi √dhā, "to do, make, or bring about," as if it were formed from the verb vi √dhyai, "to think, consider, or contemplate," rendering, "Ce qui sied (présentement), qu'on l'examine." Of course, such a derivation is not possible. Nonetheless, Roussel appears to have been followed in this by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 168), who renders, "consider what is fitting at the moment," and Pagani (1999, p. 1026), who translates, "Ce qu'il faut considérer maintenant." Compare pādas 24ab below, where there is a slight paraphrase of this clause.

23. "It is useless now to keep on repeating what I failed to do then" nābhipannam idānīṃ yad vyarthās tasya punaḥ kathāḥ: Literally, "repeated narrations of that which was not accepted are now purposeless."

"error, mental confusion" vibhramāc cittamohāt: The commentators differ somewhat in their interpretation of these terms. Cm, Ct, and Cr understand the former term to mean "erroneous or perverse knowledge (viparītajñānam [viparyayajñānam—Cr])." Cg is more specific, taking the term to mean "the consideration of bad policy as good policy (anītau nītibuddhyā)." Ct and Cm take the second term to mean "ignorance (ajñānam)." Cr understands, "lack of discrimination (avivekāt)," while Cg glosses, "the non-arising of knowledge (jñānānudayāt)." See note to verse 31 below.

24–25. "if you truly understand what it means to be a brother" yadi . . . bhrātṛtvaṃ vāvagacchasi: Literally, "or, if you understand the state of being a brother." D5–7,10,11,T,G2,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read vikramam, "valor," for bhrātṛtvam, "state of being a brother." In addition, D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read adhigacchasi, "you acquire, possess," for avagacchasi. These variants yield "if you truly possess valor." The texts and printed editions of Cg read avagacchasi with the critical edition, yielding the sense, as rendered by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 167), "If . . . you really know your own strength."

"then you must immediately do what suits the present situation" asmin kāle tu yad yuktaṃ tad idānīṃ vidhīyatām: Compare pādas cd of verse 22 above, where a slight variant of this phrase occurs. D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read vicintyatām, "you must consider," for vidhīyatām, "you must do." See notes to verse 22 above.

"this catastrophic result" doṣam: Cg makes explicit that the calamity is the attack on the part of Rāvaṇa's enemies. (doṣaṃ vaiṣamyam. śatrubhir ākramaṇam iti yāvat.) B3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead duḥkham, "sorrow, pain, misery."

Following 24ab, D5–7,T,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm, as well as the text of Gita Press, insert a passage of one line [1115*]: "They do not grieve over[1] what is gone; for what is gone is truly gone."

[1]"They do not grieve over" nānuśocanti: There is no expressed subject of the plural verb. One presumes, as does the author of the Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1605), that the implicit subject is "the wise." Cg and Cm, the only commentators to read this passage, fail to comment on it.

26. "A true friend . . . A true kinsman" sa suhṛt . . . sa bandhuḥ: Literally, "He is a friend . . . He is a kinsman." The term bandhu, "kinsman," can also mean "friend" and has been rendered in this fashion by some translators. However, given the context and the fact that Rāvaṇa is calling upon Kumbhakarṇa as his brother, we have interpreted the term in the former sense.

"stands by a poor wretch who has lost everything" vipannārthaṃ dīnam abhyavapadyate: Literally, "he protects a dejected person whose affairs have failed."

"to those who have gone astray" apanīteṣu: Literally, "among those deviating from sound policy." We agree with Ct, who glosses, "[among those who have] set out upon the path of unsound policy (anītimārgastheṣu)." Cr offers, "among those who are suffering the miseries arising from unsound policy (apanītijanitaprāptaduḥkheṣu)," while Cg glosses, "among men who practice unfavorable policy (viṣamitanītiṣu puruṣeṣu)." Cm understands, "among those practicing unsound policy (apanītimatsu)."

27. "Rāvaṇa . . . Kumbhakarṇa . . . addressed him" tam . . . uvāca: Literally, "[he] addressed him."

"firm and harsh words" vacanaṃ dhīradāruṇam: Ct, Cr, and Cg understand, as do we, that the compound is a dvandva. Each of these commentators picks out a different pair of statements from Rāvaṇa's speech, one of which is firm (dhīra) and the other harsh (dāruṇa). Thus, Cg takes Rāvaṇa's words at 25cd ("if . . . this mission is . . . [yadi vā kāryam . . .]") to serve as an example of a "firm (dhīraṃ)" speech, while the remarks at 26ab ("A true friend is one . . . [sa suhṛt . . .]") serve as an example of "harsh (dāruṇa)" speech. Cs takes the compound to modify not Rāvaṇa's words but Rāvaṇa himself, in the sense that "He remains resolute even now, although he is harsh, that is, cruel, in his words and demeanor. (dhīram adhunāpi. dāruṇaṃ vacanākaraṇe krūram.)" This reading would yield the sense "as the firm, but harsh Rāvaṇa was speaking in this fashion . . ." Cs also acknowledges that the compound can be applied to Rāvaṇa's speech or that it can be read as a locative tatpuruṣa referring to Rāvaṇa, in the sense of "harsh in respect to those who are restrained (dhīreṣu dāruṇam)."

"thinking, 'He is angry!' " ruṣṭo 'yam iti vijñāya: Literally, "having realized, 'He is angry.' " Cg notes that Kumbhakarṇa makes this inference from the fact of Rāvaṇa's having knitted his brows [in verse 21 above] (bhrukuṭibandhanenānumāyety arthaḥ).

28. "agitated" kṣubhitendriyam: Literally, "of agitated senses."

Ś,Ñ2,V,B2,3,D1–4,8–13,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr insert a passage of one line [1117*], either following verse 28 or elsewhere: "Listen attentively to my words, your majesty, subduer of your foes."

29. "Enough of this agonizing" alam . . . saṃtāpam upapadya te: Literally, "enough of you having recourse to agony." See note to verse 37 below.

30. "You need not give way to despondency" naitan manasi kartavyam: Literally, "this should not be done in [your] mind." The phrase is elliptical, and we agree with Ct and Cr, who, respectively, take the pronoun etat, "this," to refer to "despondency (dainyam)" and "suffering (duḥkham)." Cg takes the reference to be to Rāvaṇa's remarks in verse 23 concerning his error and mental confusion (see verse 23 above) (vibhramāc cittamohād vety uktaṃ manasi na kartavyam ity arthaḥ). We find this less persuasive, however, since, in that passage, he is not so much regretting his own failures as impatiently chiding his brother.

"as long as I am alive" mayi jīvati: Cg believes that the phrase is subject to an additional contradictory meaning in which Kumbhakarṇa, in saying that Rāvaṇa should not despair so long as he, Kumbhakarṇa, lives, is really suggesting that he, Kumbhakarṇa, is not going to live very long. Thus, Rāvaṇa should indeed be concerned. (arthāntaraṃ tu . . . yady ahaṃ jīviṣyāmi tadaivaṃ na kartavyam. aham eva na jīviṣyāmīty arthaḥ.)

"I will destroy him on whose account you are so anguished." tam ahaṃ nāśayiṣyāmi yatkṛte paritapyase: In keeping with his interpretation of the above phrase mayi jīvati, Cg continues to provide an alternative reading of the verse to refer covertly to Kumbhakarṇa's premonition of his own destruction. He therefore interprets this phrase as follows: "On whose account, that is, on my account, you suffer. In other words, you are pained by the thought, 'since he [Kumbhakarṇa] is living so comfortably, he won't carry out the mission for me.' I [Kumbhakarṇa] will cause Rāma to destroy him, that is, me. (yatkṛte yasya mama kṛte paritapyase 'yaṃ sukhena jīvan matkaryaṃ na karotīti paritapto 'si. taṃ māṃ rāmeṇa nāśayiṣyāmīti.)" See notes to verse 32 below.

31. "Regardless of your mood" sarvāvastham: Literally, "pertaining to all conditions." The compound is somewhat ambiguous, and it is not entirely clear whether one should read it adverbially, as we have done, or adjectivally with "advice (vācyam—lit., speech)," in the sense of "advice suitable to all occasions." Cg and Cm, the only commentators to share the critical reading, take the compound adverbially and understand the underlying noun avasthā, "condition, state," to refer to Rāvaṇa's emotional states. Cm glosses, "the meaning is 'in all states, such as anger, joy, etc.' (roṣaharṣādisarvāvasthāsv ity arthaḥ)." Cg similarly, although somewhat more ambiguously, offers, "[so as to be] situated in all states, such as anger, joy, etc. (roṣaharṣādisarvāvasthāvasthitam ity arthaḥ)." The reading is subject to a certain amount of variation in the texts and printed editions of the epic. The texts of Cr and Gorresio read the unambiguous sarvāvasthāsu, "under all conditions." Note that this is the gloss Cm suggests. D10 and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read sarvāvasthāṃ (-stha- —Ck) gataṃ mayā for the critical edition's sarvāvasthaṃ mayā tava. This then becomes an adjectival phrase modifying an implicit tvām, "you [Rāvaṇa]." As Ck and Ct explain it, the expression means "to you who are experiencing every emotional state, such as joy, sorrow, etc. (sarvāvasthāṃ sukhaduḥkhādisarvāvasthāṃ gataṃ prāptam. tvāṃ pratīti śeṣaḥ.)" Ct, however, notes that others, whom he does not specify, quote here the passage: "So it is sung, 'The universal condition is the condition of the absence of devotion to Viṣṇu' (viṣṇor abhaktikāvasthā sarvāvastheti gīyate)." Presumably this is a theological allusion to Rāvaṇa's lack of devotion to Rāma.

"my bond of kinship and brotherly affection forced me to offer" avaśyaṃ tu . . . mayā . . . bandhubhāvād abhihitaṃ bhrātṛsnehāc ca: Literally, "because of the bond of kinship and brotherly affection, by me, of necessity . . . was uttered."

32. "in the present circumstances" kale 'smin: Literally, "at this time." Cg adds, "at this calamitous time (āpatkāle)."

"to slaughter your enemies. Now watch, as I do just that in battle." śatrūṇāṃ kadanaṃ paśya kriyamāṇaṃ mayā raṇe: Literally, "See the slaughter of enemies being effected in battle by me." Cg, carrying further his alternative inverted reading of Kumbhakarṇa's words begun in verse 30 above, remarks that "the alternative meaning here is the slaughter effected by your enemies (atra śatrukartṛkaṃ kadanam ity arthāntaram)." In other words, Cg once more sees Kumbhakarṇa as prophesying his own death.

33. "great-armed warrior" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed one."

"you shall see" paśya: Literally, "see!"

"the hosts of tawny monkeys fleeing, once I have slain Rāma and his brother in the forefront of battle" mayā samaramūrdhani / hate rāme saha bhrātrā dravantīṃ harivāhinīm: M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg (VSP and KK 6.63.34) read para-, "enemy," for the critical edition's hari-, "tawny monkeys." This is rendered as "the enemy's army" by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 168), the only translator to render this reading. This variant, however, enables Cg to continue his alternative interpretation of Kumbhakarṇa's words. In this case, the meaning is "O senior one, that is, O elder brother, this very day you shall see the [rākṣasa] army returning on account of Rāma once the front rank of battle has been crushed together with me. (arthāntaram. he para jyeṣṭha mayā saha samaramūrdhani hate bhagne sati rāme rāmanimittaṃ dravantīm āgacchantīṃ vāhinīṃ paśyeti.)" Cg does not comment on the word bhrātrā, "with the brother," but one would assume that, in this reading, it would have to construe with mayā, in the sense of "along with me, your brother."

34. Cg continues his alternative explanation. In this vein, he notes that the alternate meaning of this verse is "You will be happy once you see me and my head tossed far away for the sake of battle, because you will then have given up your anger toward me. Sītā will be desolate [at my death] because she is the mother of the whole world. (arthāntaram. mayā saha rāmasya raṇād dhetor ānītaṃ dūre kṣiptam. śiro macchiraḥ. dṛṣṭvā sukhī bhava. tadānīṃ mayi roṣatyāgād iti bhāvaḥ. sītā duḥkhitā bhavatu. sarvalokamātṛtvād iti bhāvaḥ.)"

35. Cg's alternate reading is that we should understand the form rāmasya, "of Rāma," as an agentive genitive. This enables us to understand the death to be Kumbhakarṇa's own at the hands of Rāma. The rākṣasas whose kinsmen have already been slain will presumably not experience this [Kumbhakarṇa's death] as terribly grievous since, by the maxim, "along with five others, one does not experience misery," they and Kumbhakarṇa will be joining their slain loved ones. (arthāntaram. rāmasyeti kartari ṣaṣṭhī. rāmakartṛkaṃ mannidhanaṃ ye nihatabāndhavās te rākṣasāḥ paśyantu. na duḥkhaṃ pañcabhiḥ saheti nyāyād iti bhāvaḥ.) The idea here appears to be similar to that expressed by the English proverb "Misery loves company."

36. "on account of the slaughter of their kinsmen" svabandhuvadhakāraṇāt: Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B1,2,4,D1–3,8–12,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read -śocinām, "grieving," for -kāraṇāt, "on account of." This yields the sense of "grieving for their own kinsmen," which is somewhat redundant in light of the preceding compound, "afflicted with grief (śokaparītānām)."

37. "the lord of the leaping monkeys" plavageśvaram: D5,T1,G3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg (VSP and KK 6.63.38) read instead plavagottamam, "best of leaping monkeys."

"like a storm cloud when the sun breaks through" sasūryam iva toyadam: Literally, "like a water-giver [rain cloud] together with the sun." The image intended by the poet is not unambiguously clear. In light of the adjective vikīrṇam, "torn apart, scattered," we believe that the basis for the simile is the sight of clouds at the end of the rain when shafts of sunlight pierce through them. Cr and Cg, however, understand that the basis for the simile is that Sugrīva's body would be drenched in blood and so would resemble a cloud tinged with red by the [setting?] sun (rudhirāktatayā sasūryaprakāśaṃ megham iva sthitam ity arthaḥ—so Cg). Among the translators consulted, the majority simply understand, "lit up by the sun." Only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1606) appears to follow the idea expressed by Cg and Cr, rendering, "like a cloud illumined by the (evening) sun." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 169) idiosyncratically reads the simile to refer to the compound simile parvatasaṃkāśam, "resembling a mountain," of pāda a and completely omits the reference to the cloud. He renders, "who resembles a mountain illumined by the sun." The association of Sugrīva and the sun may perhaps be conditioned by the fact that Sugrīva is the son of the solar divinity Sūrya. Indeed, a few northern manuscripts (Ñ2,V1,2,B2–4), as well as the printed edition of Gorresio, read sūryaputram, "son of the sun," for sasūryam i[va].

All northern manuscripts (except Ś,D1–3,5,8,12) and all southern manuscripts insert a passage of five lines [1122*]. The majority of manuscripts have the insert following verse 37, but some northern manuscripts locate the passage elsewhere in the sarga: "How can you, blameless one, possibly be afraid, when you are constantly under my protection and that of these rākṣasas who are eager to kill Rāma Dāśarathi? Rāghava will kill you this day only if he kills me first.[1] And I for one, overlord of the rākṣasas, will never give way to agonizing.[2] Please command me now as you wish, scorcher of your foes."

[1]"only if he kills me first" pūrvaṃ hate tena mayi: Literally, "when I have been killed by him before." We agree with Cg in understanding this seemingly grim prediction to be, in fact, a form of reassurance for Rāvaṇa. What Kumbhakarṇa is saying, according to Cg, is that, since he himself cannot be killed by anyone and that impossibility would have to occur before Rāvaṇa could be slain, the latter need have no fear. (mayi hate sati hi paścāt tvāṃ rāmo hanti hanisyati. ahaṃ cātmani svasmin saṃtāpaṃ śatruparibhavajaṃ na kadācid apı gaccheyaṃ na kenacid dhantuṃ śakya ity arthaḥ. ataḥ kutas te bhayam iti bhāvaḥ.) D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead māṃ nihatya kila tvāṃ hi [nihanisyati rāghavaḥ], "Indeed, only having slain me [will Rāghava kill] you."

[2]"I . . . will never give way to agonizing" nāham ātmani saṃtāpaṃ gaccheyam: Literally, "I would not go to [experience] pain in my mind or self." We take the term saṃtāpa in the same sense in which we read it in verse 29 above. We thus understand that Kumbhakarṇa, unlike Rāvaṇa, would never permit his mental agonizing to dominate his emotions and prevent him from taking effective military action. According to Cg, what Kumbhakarṇa is suggesting is that he would never experience any concern within himself arising from [the fear of] being overcome by an enemy since no one is capable of defeating him (similarly Ck, Ct, Cm, and Cr). (See note 1 above.) Cg, however, in keeping with his exegetical project in this sarga, also proposes yet another arthāntara, or alternate reading. According to this, Kumbhakarṇa experiences no concern for himself, that is, he does not grieve for his own impending death but grieves only at the thought that, once he himself is slain, Rāma will kill Rāvaṇa. (aham ātmani viṣaye samtāpaṃ na gaccheyaṃ na gacchāmi . . . mannidhanaṃ nānuśocāmīty arthaḥ. kiṃtu mayi hate sati. atha rāgahavas tvāṃ hanti hanisyatīti saṃtāpaṃ gacchāmīti.)

38. "You should not send out anyone else" na paraḥ preṣaṇīyas te: Ñ2,V,D4,5, 10,11,T,G1,3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read prekṣaṇīyaḥ, "to be looked at," for the critical edition's preṣaṇīyaḥ, "to be sent." The idea of this variant is that Rāvaṇa should not look for any other warrior to go in Kumbhakarṇa's stead. Cr understands that Rāvaṇa should not seek out anyone to assist Kumbhakarṇa (matsāhāyyārthaṃ nānveṣaṇīyaḥ).

"warrior of unequaled valor" atulavikrama: Literally, "O one of unequaled valor."

"mighty king" mahābala: Literally, "O mighty one." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the accusative plural mahābalān, yielding the sense "[slaughter your] mighty [enemies]."

40. "Indra himself, the smasher of citadels" puraṃdaraḥ: Literally, "the smasher of citadels."

41. "cast my weapon aside" tyaktaśastrasya . . . me: Literally, "of me, who had abandoned his weapon." The idea, as we understand it, is that, in his contempt for his puny enemies, Kumbhakarṇa will dispense with his lance and rely on his immense size to trample them like so many insects. This interpretation is in keeping with the following verse. Cr, however, believes that Kumbhakarṇa will be forced to fight in this fashion after Rāma and the others have destroyed his weapons (nanu rāmādibhiḥ śastrāṇi chidyanta iti taiḥ saha kathaṃ tava yuddhaṃ bhaviṣyatīty ata āha).

"if he valued his life" jijīviṣuḥ: Literally, "one wishing to live."

42. "even Indra himself, the wielder of the vajra" api vajriṇam: Literally, "even the possessor of the vajra." D6,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead savajriṇam, "along with the wielder of the vajra," for [a]pi vajriṇam. Cr supplies the word ripum, "enemy," as a modificand for this otherwise elliptical adjective.

43. "a hail of arrows . . . his blood" bāṇaughā rudhiram . . . te: Literally, "those hails of arrows . . . blood." The pronoun te is subject to considerable variation throughout the recensions and should probably have been marked as an uncertain reading by the critical editors. Ct, Crā, Cm, and Cr read instead me, "my." The enclitic me is ambiguous here, in that it may refer either to Kumbhakarṇa's blood (rudhiram) or to the hail of arrows (bāṇaughāḥ). Ct reads it with blood (rudhiram) and understands that only if Rāma is able to survive the blow of Kumbhakarṇa's fist would Rāma's arrows then drink Kumbhakarṇa's blood. But, in Kumbhakarṇa's opinion, this would be impossible. (me muṣṭivegaṃ rāghavo yadi sahiṣyati tadā rāghavasya bāṇaughā me rudhiraṃ pāsyanti. tatsahanam eva tasyāśakyam iti bhāvaḥ.) Crā and Cm understand similarly. Cr, on the other hand, understands that, in the event that Rāma should survive the blow of Kumbhakarṇa's fist, then Kumbhakarṇa's arrows will drink his blood (sa rāghavo yadi me muṣṭivegaṃ sahiṣyati . . . tarhi me bāṇaughā rāghavasya rudhiraṃ pāsyanti). Cg avoids the issue, reading the pleonastic particle tu for te. Cg reframes the verse as a rhetorical question, "Rāma will not withstand the initial blow of my fist. How then will he be able to strike me? (rāmaḥ prathamaṃ me muṣṭiprahāram eva na sahiṣyate. kuto māṃ praharisyatīti bhāvaḥ.)"

"his" rāghavasya: Literally, "of Rāghava,"

44. "are you oppressed" bādhyase: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead tapyase, "are you burned or tormented."

45. "your majesty" rājan: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ghoram, "terrible," an adjective modifying bhayam, "fear."

Following 45cd, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1127*]: "as well as Hanumān, the rākṣasa-slayer, who burned Laṅkā. And I shall slaughter those tawny monkeys who stand fast in battle.[1]"

[1]"I shall slaughter . . . who stand fast in battle" haniṣyāmi saṃyuge samavasthitān: The printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bhakṣayiṣyāmi saṃyuge samupasthite, "And when the battle is at hand, I shall devour."

Following verse 45, D5–7,9–11,S insert lines 1–9 of 1097* (found following 6.50.10 in the critical edition). The entire star passage is inserted by all northern manuscripts; most place it following 6.50.10. It is unclear why the critical edition omits this passage as it is known to all manuscripts. Lines 12–14 of 1097* are inserted in all southern manuscripts following line 7 of 1141*, which follows 6.53.11. See note to 6.53.11 for a translation of these lines. There are numerous variants in the text and in the sequence of this passage. The version that appears in the critical edition is found in no major recension or other printed edition. Moreover, the logical sequence of its verses seems confused. Therefore, we render instead the southern version as it appears in printed editions of the southern recension. This corresponds to the following passages in the printed editions: GPP and NSP 6.63.51–54; VSP 6.63.51–55; KK 6.63.52–56; and Gita Press 6.63.52–56. "If you are afraid of Indra, your majesty, or of self-existent Brahmā [GPP 51ab; CE 1097*, line 1],[1] then, once I am roused to fury, even the gods will lie sprawled upon the earth [GPP 51cd; CE 1097(B)]. I shall slay Yama and devour Agni, the purifier [GPP 52ab; CE 1097, line 2]. I shall cast Āditya down to earth together with all the heavenly bodies [GPP 52cd; CE 1097*, line 4]. I shall slay Indra of the hundred sacrifices and drink up the ocean, Varuṇa's abode [GPP 53ab; CE 1097*, line 5]. I shall pulverize the mountains and shatter the earth [GPP 53cd; CE 1097*, line 6]. And let all creatures, even as they are being devoured, witness the valor of Kumbhakarṇa, who has slept for so long a time. Not even the triple heavens themselves will make a meal enough to fill me up [GPP 54; CE 1098*, lines 7–9]."

[1]Following line 1, D7,G2,3, and GPP (in brackets following 6.63.51ab) insert a passage of one line [1097(A)*]: "Then I shall destroy [them], as does the many-rayed sun, the darkness of night."

46. "pleasure, the greatest of all pleasures" sukhāvahaṃ sukham: Literally, "pleasure that brings pleasure." We follow Ct, who glosses the adjective sukhāvaham as "pleasure producing great and ever increasing pleasure (uttarottaram adhikasukhajanakaṃ sukham)." Ś,N1,D5,6,8,12,T1,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read sukhārham for sukhāvaham, "that brings pleasure." The compound sukhārham would normally mean "worthy or deserving of pleasure." This meaning in the accusative seems impossible in the context, and, in fact, the critical apparatus marks the reading with the notation sic. Cg, however, glosses the term with sukhāvaham, the same term found in the critical edition and in the text of Ct. It should be noted that since the verse is an upajāti, the critical reading creates a hypermetric pāda a. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 169), the only translator to follow the text of Cg, translates, "[I go forth] to make you happy, who deserve it," despite the syntactical problem that such a reading creates. In keeping with his interpretation of the passage, Cg provides another alternative reading (arthāntara), suggesting, "Through your death, Dāśarathi will experience tremendous pleasure (te vadhena dāśaratheḥ sukhāvaham ity arthāntaram)."

"through the slaughter of Dāśarathi" vadhena…dāśaratheḥ: Cm, in keeping with his larger theological hermeneutic, offers an alternative reading of the passage. He suggests breaking vadhena, "through the slaughter," into the locative vadhe and the negative particle na. This allows him to read as follows: " 'If Rāma Dāśarathi were to be killed, you would not be happy. I, however, am going forth to bring you great happiness.' The poet now says how he will do this, with the passage beginning with the words 'Once I have slain.' 'Once I have slain all the leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys excluding Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, I will eat them.' That is the syntax. The real meaning is 'Since I am unable to kill Rāma, I will bring you a joy born from the destruction of the leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys.' (atra vadha iti saptamī. dāśarathe rāmasya vadhe sati tava sukhaṃ na. kiṃtv ahaṃ sukhārhaṃ samāhartuṃ vrajāmi. tat kim ata āha nihatyeti. lakṣmaṇena saha vartamānaṃ rāmaṃ vineti śeṣaḥ. hariyūthamukhyān nihatya sarvān khādāmīti sambandhaḥ. rāmahananasyāśakyatvād dhariyūthamukhyasaṃhārajanitasukhaṃ tava saṃpādayiṣyāmīti bhāvaḥ.)"

The meter is upajāti with a hypermetric pāda a.

47. "to your heart's content" kāmam: Literally, "according to [your] desire." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead rājan, "O king or your majesty."

"fine wines" agryavāruṇīm: Literally, "fine liquor." Ñ,V1,2,B,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead adya-, "this day," for agrya-, "fine, excellent."

"banish all cares" vinīyatāṃ jvaraḥ: Literally, "Let fear or anguish be removed." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vinīya duḥkham, "having banished sorrow." This makes pāda b hypometric.

"at long last" cirāya: The adverb is ambiguous. In the present context it can mean either "after a long time or for a long time." The various translators consulted opt for one or the other of these. We believe the former is more plausible in light of Rāvaṇa's frustration at his inability to break Sītā's will.

"Once I have, this very day, sent Rāma to the abode of Yama, Sītā will at long last submit to your will." mayādya rāme gamite yamakṣayaṃ cirāya sītā vaśagā bhaviṣyati: In keeping with their devotional reading of the epic, Cg and Cm propose alternative ways to read this verse. Cg begins by taking the first half of the verse, with its instructions to Rāvaṇa to devote himself to sybaritic pleasures, to be an ironic utterance on the part of Kumbhakarṇa, which would be indicated in speech by tone of voice, etc. (kākuḥ). He then proposes breaking gamite yamakṣayam, "sent . . . to the abode of Yama," into gamitā iyam akṣayam. This yields the alternative meaning (arthāntara) "Once Sītā has been sent to her proper lord, Rāma (rāme viṣaye), then she will be under his control forever. (iyam akṣayam iti cchedaḥ. rāme viṣaye gamiteyaṃ sītā cirāya vaśagā bhaviṣyatīty arthāntaram.)" In a similar fashion, Cm proposes breaking up the sequence gamite yamakṣayam into gamite 'yam akṣayam. He then argues that Kumbhakarṇa is really saying the following: "Once I have sent Rāma permanently back under the control of Sītā, then, having become a friend, he will, this very day, come to our house. (rāme gamiteyamakṣayam ity atra gamite 'yam akṣayam iti cchedaḥ. mayā rāme 'kṣayaṃ yathā tathā cirāya sītāvaśaṃ gamite saty ayaṃ rāmo 'dyāgamiṣyati bandhubhūtaḥ sann asmadgṛhaṃ pratīti śeṣaḥ.)"

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

1. "with his immense arms" bāhuśālinaḥ: Literally, "endowed or resplendent with arms." Cg remarks that this and the other descriptions of Kumbhakarṇa's size and physical prowess highlight [in Mahodara's opinion] his unfitness to offer his advice (prativacanānarhatvadyotanāya viśeśaṇāni).

2. "presumptuous" dhṛṣṭaḥ: The term can also mean "bold, courageous," and some translators have rendered it in this way. Given the harsh tenor of Mahodara's words, however, this seems less plausible to us.

"you . . . have a vulgar mind" prākṛtadarśanaḥ: Literally, "have a common view."

"in any situation" sarvatra: Literally, "in all [things]." Some translators have understood this to mean "in every situation" or "in all aspects of a situation." Cm takes the adverb in the sense of "always (sarvadā)" and construes it specifically with the adjective "arrogant (avaliptaḥ)."

3. "It is not the case that the king does not understand" na hi rājā na jānīte: Literally, "For the king does not not know." Cm takes the particle hi, "for," to indicate that the statement is an example of kāku (hiśabdaḥ kākvarthaḥ), which in this case refers to a negative statement used in the sense of affirmation. See note to 6.37.10 for additional examples of double negatives.

"to prattle" vaktum: Literally, "to speak."

4. "He is quite familiar with the distinctions of place and time" deśakālavibhāgavit: Mahodara is refuting Kumbhakarṇa's implicit charge at 6.51.6 above that Rāvaṇa is ignorant of such distinctions. D10,11,T2,G1,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read -vidhāna-, "rules, precepts," for the critical reading, -vibhāga-, "distinctions." Commentators who follow this reading understand, "knowing the proper actions to be undertaken at various places and times (deśakālayor ucitakartavyavit—Ct, Ck)."

"stasis, increase, and diminution" sthānaṃ vṛddhiṃ ca hāniṃ ca: See 6.51.7, where the commentators understand the three types of action (trayāṇām . . . karmaṇām) to be conciliation, etc. (sāmādīnām), as characterized by these three conditions of diminution, increase, and stasis (kṣayavṛddhisthānalakṣaṇānām). We follow the majority of the commentators in applying the three states equally to Rāvaṇa and his enemies. Ct alone understands "increase (vṛddhi)" to refer only to Rāvaṇa and "diminution (hāni)" only to his enemies (ātmano vṛddhiṃ pareṣāṃ hāniṃ ca).

"bull among rākṣasas" rākṣasarṣabha: Ñ1,V1,2,B3,D1,4–6,9–11,13,T1,G3,M2,3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead the nominative rākṣasarṣabhaḥ, which would then refer to Rāvaṇa rather than Kumbhakarṇa, as in the critical edition.

5. The verse is quite ambiguous in its meaning, and this is only heightened by the variant readings noted in the critical apparatus and by the commentators. The general sense of the verse, as articulated by Cg, who shares the critical reading, is that a discriminating person, such as Rāvaṇa, would not be capable of engaging in the kind of unworthy actions that only a vulgar or inferior person might undertake. For Cg, as for Ct, Ck, Cm, and Cr, this is a rhetorical question, which in asking "What wise man would engage in such actions?" intends to say "None would do so, least of all Rāvaṇa." (budhaḥ kaḥ kuryāt? na ko 'pi kuryāt. kimuta rāvaṇa iti bhāvaḥ). Cr takes this verse to suggest that Rāvaṇa's actions have been quite correct (etena rāvaṇakṛtaṃ samīcīnam eveti sūcitam). He further understands the verse to be a critique of Kumbhakarṇa's words at 6.51.4, where he rebukes Rāvaṇa for having acted out of the sheer arrogance of his strength. Cv, however, reads the response to the rhetorical question to be "Wise Rāvaṇa would indeed do such a thing (buddhimān rāvaṇaḥ tādṛśaṃ kuryād ity ayam asyārthaḥ)."

"wise man" budhaḥ: Literally, "wise one." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Cr read instead naraḥ, "man." Commentators associated with these texts

"an action such as could only be performed" śakyam . . . kartum: Literally, "capable of being performed." Ñ2,V,B1,3,4,D5–7,10,11,M3, and Ct, Ck, Cr, Cs, and Cm, as well as GPP, Gita Press, NNS, and KK, read aśakyam, "incapable [of being performed]," for śakyam. Cr then glosses the reading aśakyaṃ kartum as "improper (anucitam)," and Cm, as "unworthy (anarham)." For them, then, the sense is "What wise man would perform an act unworthy even of a vulgar-minded man." Ś,Ñ,V,B2–4,D1–4,8–13 read vaktum, "to speak or say," for the critical edition's kartum, "to do." This variant appears in the printed editions of NSP (but not GPP or Gita Press), Lahore, and Gorresio. Dutt (1893, p. 1305), the only translator of the southern text to follow this reading, is perplexed by it. He translates, "But what person ever acteth according to what is proposed feebly," and adds the following notes: "Vaktum açakyam—incapable of saying. But what sense can be attached to—'What man acteth according to what is not advanced by one having strength . . . . . aged?' I therefore venture to render the passage—feebly proposed—i.e. proposed with vascillation [sic] or half-heartedly."

The second half of the verse in northern texts, such as that of Lahore (6.43.5) and Gorresio (6.43.5), refers to the speech of Kumbhakarṇa rather than the actions of the king, thus rendering the reading vaktum easier to construe.

"a . . . man of brute strength" balavatā: Literally, "by one possessed of strength." We follow Cg, who glosses, "by one who relies on physical strength alone (kevala-śauryāvalambinā)."

"who does not honor his elders" anupāsitavṛddhena: Literally, "one by whom elders are not honored." Cs, as ever contrarian in his reading, breaks up the compound and the following interrogative pronoun kaḥ, "what . . . man?" so that he reads the vocative anupāsitavṛddha, "O you [Kumbhakarṇa] who do not honor your elders," and inakaḥ, "lord, master, powerful one [Rāvaṇa]." He then interprets, "our master, who is a wise man, might perform such actions that are suitable for him, even though they would not be undertaken by ordinary people (budho jñānī tādṛśaṃ prākṛtabuddhibhir ananuṣṭhīyamānaṃ svayogyaṃ kuryāt)." Alternatively, if one accepts the reading śakyam [the critical reading] for aśakyam [as discussed above], Cs continues, then we can retain the interrogative pronoun kaḥ, "what . . . man," by taking both anupāsitavṛddha and ina, "powerful one," as vocatives referring to Kumbhakarṇa. Cs claims that Mahodara speaks in this fashion to Kumbhakarṇa either out of anger [at Kumbhakarṇa] in the midst [of the conversation] because he [Kumbhakarṇa] is junior to his master or out of fear of his own destruction in order to make him turn and face him (svāmyanujatvān madhye kopena svadhvaṃsasādhvasād vā tam abhimukhīkartum evam uktiḥ). Cs concludes by quoting Ct's and Cm's reading of the term as an instrumental agreeing with balavatā. This yields "of brute strength, who does not honor his elders."

6. Mahodara here is refuting Kumbhakarṇa's remarks at verses 6.51.9–12 about separately practicing the three ends of man.

"can be practiced separately" pṛthagāśrayān: Literally, "having separate practices." Cg and Cv understand this to mean "having separate causes or separate results (pṛthagkāraṇān bhinnaphalān)." Cm glosses, "having predetermined results (vyava- sthitaphalān)." All these commentators thus believe that Mahodara is criticizing Kumbhakarṇa's view, since the actual results of various actions are not absolutely fixed. Ck, Ct, and Cr, on the other hand, understand the compound to mean "mutually exclusive and thus not to be practiced simultaneously (parasparaviruddhā naikānuṣṭheyāḥ—so Ct)."

"capacity" lakṣaṇam: The term normally means "mark, sign, distinguishing characteristic." However, the context forces us to agree with Ct, Cr, and Ck, who gloss, "ability, capacity (sāmārthyam)." Cg and Cm understand the term to refer to "that whereby something is discerned" and gloss it here as "a valid means of knowledge" or "reason (so Cm)" (lakṣyate 'neneti lakṣaṇaṃ pramāṇam [kāraṇam . . . vā—so Cm]).

"as they truly are" svabhāvena: Literally, "through inherent nature." D5–7,T,G1,3,M5, as well as VSP, KK, Crā, and Cg, read instead svabhāve tān, "[understand] them with respect to their true nature." The reading of the critical edition is somewhat ambiguous, since it can arguably refer to the inherent nature of Kumbhakarṇa as well as that of the puruṣārthas. The commentators who share this reading prefer, as we do, the latter reading, glossing, "correctly, truthfully (tattvataḥ)." Cg and Cm, who read svabhāve, similarly gloss, "as they truly are (svarūpataḥ)." All translators consulted follow suit, with the exception of Dutt (1893, p. 1305), who offers, "[thou art not] naturally [competent]." See 6.51.9; 6.105.13; and notes.

7. "the motivating force" prayojanam: Here the term should be taken in its sense of "cause, motive." As suggested by Ct, Ck(?), and Cr, who gloss, "instigating, causing, giving rise to (prayojakam utpādakam)," the term must be taken in its sense of "motive." M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg actually read instead prayojakam. They gloss, "effective means toward (sādhakam)," which Cg fleshes out by saying, "action alone is the cause of, that is, the means toward, fruits in the form of heaven and hell (svarganarakarūpāṇāṃ phalānāṃ karmaiva prayojakaṃ sādhakam)."

"all things" sarveṣāṃ kāraṇānām: Literally, "all causes or objects."

"in this world" atra: Literally, "here."

"even the most wicked actions may bear excellent fruit" śreyaḥ pāpīyasām . . . phalaṃ bhavati karmaṇām: Literally, "the fruit of very evil actions becomes good." As Cg and Cm explain, the argument here derives from the notion that the results of any action are unpredictable (kiṃtv atra karmajāte pāpīyasām api karmaṇāṃ śreyaḥ phalaṃ bhavati—so Cg). Ct, Cr, and Ck, however, read the sequence śreyaḥ pāpīyasām as a dvandva compound, śreyaḥpāpīyasām. They then understand, "the fruits of good and evil actions redound upon one and the same agent (śubhāśubhavyāpārāṇāṃ phalam atraikasminn eva kartari bhavati)." Dutt (1893, p. 1305) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1609) are the only translators to follow this interpretation. Thus, Gita Press translates, "moreover, the fruit of actions (both) noble and exceedingly sinful, in this world, accrues to the same agent."

8. "Righteousness and sound policy may yield excellent results; but so may their opposites. Still, unrighteousness and unsound policy may also yield results that are calamitous." niḥśreyasaphalāv eva dharmārthāv itarāv api / adharmānarthayoḥ prāptiḥ phalaṃ ca pratyavāyikam: Literally, "Dharma and artha have happiness or final beatitude as their fruit, as do the other two. The result of adharma and anartha is a diminished or harmful fruit." Like many of the formulations of the nītiśāstras in this passage, this verse is obscure and ambiguous, and is subjected to extensive analysis by the commentators.

"Righteousness and sound policy" dharmārthau: Normally, when the three categories of the Hindu trivarga—dharma, artha, and kāma—are mentioned as a set, we have rendered the second term as "profit." See verse 6 above. In the present context, however, we believe that the term is better understood as a reference to arthaśāstra, with an emphasis on successful political practice. Commentators fall into two basic groups regarding the interpretation of these two critical terms in this verse. Cg, Cv, and Cm, with whom we are in agreement, understand the reference to be to the two kinds of action (karmaṇī) that are, respectively, the means to righteousness and sound policy (dharmārthasādhanabhūte karmaṇī—so Cg). Ck, Ct, and Cr read the terms in a more soteriological sense. Thus, Ck and Ct understand the terms to refer to two varieties of religious practice, with dharma consisting of actions such as prayer, meditation, etc., that do not involve [the expenditure of] wealth. On the other hand, they understand artha to refer to those religious practices, such as sacrifice and charitable giving, that can be accomplished only through such expenditure. (atra dharmaśabdenārthanirapekṣo japadhyānādiḥ. arthaśabdena cārthasādhyo yāgadānādiḥ—so Ct.) In support of this, they quote Bhagavadgītā 18.5 in which Lord Kṛṣṇa declares that sacrifice, charity, and asceticism sanctify the wise (yajño dānaṃ tapaś caiva pāvanāni manīṣinām). Such activities, Ct and Ck continue, in serving to purify the mind, constitute the means for attaining spiritual liberation (mokṣa). The point here, according to Ct and Ck, is that the third member of the trivarga, kāma, "pleasure," never leads to final beatitude (niḥśreyasa). (teṣāṃ cittaśuddhidvārā mokṣasādhanatvam asti. kāmas tu na kadāpi niḥśreyasaphala iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct.) Cr has a somewhat different but related interpretation. He, too, understands niḥśreyasa to mean "spiritual liberation." However, he understands the respective fruits of dharma and artha to be the attainment of heaven and earthly rewards, such as kingship (niḥśreyasaṃ mokṣaḥ phalaṃ yayos tāv api dharmārthāv itarau svargaihikarājyādiphalāv api bhavata iti śeṣaḥ). Cs interprets similarly.

"but so may their opposites" itarāv api: Literally, "the other two as well." The commentators differ broadly in their interpretations, particularly regarding the meaning of the ambiguous pronoun itarau "the other two." Ck and Ct understand it to refer to dharma and artha themselves, which are "other" in the sense that they are distinct from kāma, "pleasure or desire," and so are conducive to the attainment, respectively, of heaven and worldly prosperity (abhyudaya) (dharmārthau niḥśreyasaphalāv eva santau kāmanāviśeṣeṇetarāv api svargābhyudayaphalāv api bhavataḥ—so Ct). Cr understands similarly (see note above to dharmārthau). These commentators understand that the point of the verse is that, among the three ends attainable through human effort, dharma and artha are superior to kāma.

Cv, Cg, and Cm, whom we follow, understand the verse to be reiterating the idea expressed in the previous verse, that the outcomes of various types of action, righteous and unrighteous, are unpredictable. They understand itarau to refer to the opposites of dharma and artha, specifically to actions that are unrighteous or that reflect unsound policy (adharmānarthasādhanabhūte karmaṇī—so Cg).

"unrighteousness and unsound policy" adharmānarthayoḥ: In keeping with their interpretation of dharma and artha discussed above, Ct and Ck continue their soteriological interpretation, arguing that, even when prayer, etc., is practiced, the failure to perform obligatory rites (nityadharma) gives rise to adharma and anartha, which, in turn, produce calamitous results for a person because of the failure to carry out enjoined rites. This situation, they argue, does not hold in the case of optional (kāmya) rites. (japādirūpe kriyāmaye vā nityadharme lupte saty adharmānarthau prāptau bhavataḥ. tayoś ca satoḥ prātyavāyikaṃ vihitākaraṇaprayuktapratyavāyajanyaṃ phalaṃ puṃsaḥ prāptaṃ bhavati. na tu kāmyākaraṇe pratyavāya iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct.) Cs argues similarly. This line of interpretation strikes us as inappropriate to the context of the passage. It has, however, been followed by translators who base their translations on the text and commentary of Ct.

"results that are calamitous" pratyavāyikam: The word is apparently an adjectival derivative of pratyavāya, "diminution, danger, contrariety, sin, offense." Ñ1,D5,6, 10,11,T1,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead prātyavāyikam. Ct and Ck appear to understand the term as a derivative adjective formed on the base of pratyavāya in the sense of "sin [of omission]," in regard to the failure to perform enjoined religious acts (see note to adharmānarthayoḥ above). Cr reads the term as a compound, prātyavayi plus kam, in the sense of "the happiness or beatitude of sinners (prātyavāyināṃ aparādhināṃ kaṃ sukham)." This beatitude, he argues, is brought about through the cessation of sin that is effected through the practice of dharma and artha (yasmāt tat phalam api bhavati pratyavāyasyāpy arthadharmābhyāṃ nivṛttir iti tātparyam).

9. We understand the point of the verse to be that, since various kinds of action may bear fruit in this world or the next, Rāvaṇa would be justified in pursuing his own desires, which will bring him gratification in the short term. Cr takes the verse as the inspiration to debate the validity of the vedic doctrine of karma. He has his objector claim that, since the agent and the action pass away, there are no real karmic consequences. Thus, a sacrificer can no more attain heaven than trees destroyed in a forest fire can still bear fruit, dead people still be nourished by balls of rice, or an extinct lamp be rekindled with oil. Cr refutes Mahodara's fallacious argument, reasserting the inexorable law that action must inevitably bear fruit. Thus, he concludes that it is not incorrect to regard Mahodara's statements as rooted in error, since they contradict the vedas. (nanu karmakartuḥ karmaṇāṃ cehaiva vinaṣṭatvāt pūrvakarmajanitasaṃskārāyattakarmapravṛttir durnivāreti tvaduktir vyāhatāta eva svargaḥ kartṛkriyākarmavināśe 'pi ca yajvanāṃ tadā dāvāgnidagdhānāṃ phalaṃ syād bhūri bhūrūhāṃ mṛtānām api jantūnāṃ piṇḍaś cet tṛptikārako nirvāṇasya ca dīpasya snehaḥ saṃvardhayec chikhām ityādy uktam ity āśaṅkāṃ nivarttayitum āha . . . karmaṇāṃ cāvaśyaṃ phaladātṛtvaṃ sūcitam ata eva vedānāṃ nāprāmāṇyam uktaślokau tu vedaviruddhatvena bhrāntimūlakāv iti na doṣaḥ.) Cg and Cm understand Mahodara to be refuting the rule that only religiously enjoined action brings auspicious results, while the opposite is true for that which is forbidden (ato vihitam eva śubhapradaṃ niṣiddhaṃ tu tathā na bhavatīti niyamo nāstīty arthaḥ—so Cg).

"engage in actions with reference to this world and the next" aihalaukikapāratryaṃ karma . . . niṣevyate: Literally, "worldly and otherworldly action is resorted to." The commentators generally understand karma, "action," here in the sense of karmaphala, "fruits of action." Ct and Ck understand that this is a continuation of the reference to calamitous results mentioned in the previous verse. Thus, for them, the consequences [of anartha and adharma] in this world would be such things as debt, poverty, etc., while those in the next world would be such things as the torments of hell. (iharṇadāridryādirūpam. paratra narakayātanādirūpam—so Ct.) Both commentators understand the verb niṣevyate, "is practiced or resorted to," in the sense of "is suffered or is experienced (anubhūyate)." Cg and Cm merely define the two as the fruits of action that are experienced in this and the next word. (aihalaukikam ihalokopayogi. paratraṃ paralokopayogi ca karma puṃbhir niṣevyate. tatphalaṃ cānubhūyate—so Cg.)

"a person who indulges in pleasure may still attain excellent consequences" karmāṇy api tu kalyāni labhate kāmam āsthitaḥ: Literally, "But one who indulges in desire (kāma) obtains good or auspicious actions." Here the context compels us to agree with the commentators in taking karmāṇi as "the results or fruits of actions (karmaphalāni—Cg, Cm)." Ct and Ck understand that, even when the pursuit of pleasure runs counter to righteousness, a person may still indulge in it on the basis of one's own asceticism, valor, etc. (dharmaviruddho yadi kāmas tadā sa svatapovikramādinā samādheyaḥ—so Ct). They cite a maxim supporting their point, according to which "people do not refrain from setting their cooking vessels on the fire just because there may be beggars around (na hi bhikṣukāḥ santīti sthālyo nādhiśriyanta iti nyāyād iti bhāvaḥ)." The idea is that one does not refrain from a necessary activity just because there may be some undesirable consequences. Cg and Cm understand the phrase kāmam āsthitaḥ to mean "a person who acts just as he pleases (yathecchācāraḥ)." Ct and Ck understand that the verse makes a distinction between dharma and artha, on the one hand, and kāma, on the other, with respect to the immediacy of their results. They understand Mahodara to be arguing that kāma brings immediate gratification, unlike dharma and artha, whose fruits are manifest only after some time or in the next world (śubhāni tu viśiṣyātrāpi sākṣāl labhate na tu dharmārthavat kālāntare lokāntare vā—so Ct).

10. Ct and Ck spend considerable energy refuting Cm's and Cg's interpretation of the previous five verses. Ct quotes Cm's comments verbatim, while Ck mockingly rejects the opinions of "Yadvābhaṭṭa" (Cm?). (On the identity and relative dating of "Yadvābhaṭṭa," see Lefeber 1994, p. 24, and n. 77. See notes to 4.33.15,44 and 4.2.56. Cf. 5.1.77 and note. See, too, notes to 6.12.10 and 6.80.1; and Introduction, pp. 99–107). Ct and Ck object to the position that both righteous and unrighteous actions may lead to good or bad results (see verses 8 and 9 above), the position that Cm and Cg ascribe to Mahodara. Cs takes the debate one step further, quoting Ct's refutation of Cm and, in turn, rejecting that refutation. Cs argues that by no means is it universally agreed that only happiness can come of dharma and unhappiness of adharma, as there are many counter examples in the purāṇas, etc., as well as examples from worldly experience. Cs further quotes a verse indicating that even dharma becomes adharma if it is not practiced by devotees of Viṣṇu, while even sin, when committed by Vaiṣṇava devotees, becomes dharma (dharmo bhavaty adharmo 'pi yo na bhaktaiḥ kṛto hare / pāpaṃ bhavati dharmo 'pi kṛto bhaktais tavācyuta //). This position, as advanced by Cm, has, in Cs's opinion, been trivialized by Ct.

"The king set his heart on this deed, and we all approved it." tatra klṛptam idaṃ rājñā hṛdi kāryaṃ mataṃ ca naḥ: Literally, "In this matter, the action was conceived by the king in his heart and approved by us." According to Cm and Cg, the deed in question is the abduction of Sītā (sītāharaṇarūpaṃ kāryaṃ—so Cg).

12. "in Janasthāna" janasthāne: The account of Rāma's slaughter of the rākṣasās in Janasthāna is related in the Araṇyakāṇḍa (sargas 23–29).

13. "You can see . . . those . . . rākṣasas whom he . . . defeated . . . still" ye . . . nirjitās tena . . . / rākṣasāṃs tān . . . api paśyasi: These rākṣasa would probably be the attendants of the rākṣasa warrior Khara who are described at 3.26.19 as fleeing the massacre of their master and all his troops (3.24–29). Since they must have been fairly limited in number, and Rāma is generally regarded as having single-handedly slaughtered

Khara's forces down to the last rākṣasa, the commentators seem perplexed at the idea that the demons defeated at that time should now be roaming the streets of Laṅkā. Ct deals with the difficulty by glossing nirjitāḥ, "defeated," with "put to flight (vidrāvitāḥ)." Cg glosses, "those of their kind (tajjātīyān)." D5,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read na paśyasi, "you do not see," for the critical edition's [a]pi paśyasi, "you also see." Ct takes the negative as part of an interrogative construction, "don't you see?" Translators who follow the text of Ct also read the sentence as a question. Cr, however, seems to take the negative at face value, thus making moot the question of the rākṣasa survivors of Janasthāna.

14. "In your ignorance" abuddhyā: This term is subject to variation among the different recensions and texts of the commentators. D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read aho buddhvā, "Oh, having realized," for the critical edition's ivābuddhyā, "in your ignorance . . . like." This variant is rendered in the translations of Dutt ("knowing full well [that he resembles]," 1893, p. 1305) and Gita Press ("knowingly," 1969, vol. 3, p. 1610). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 197) appears to mistakenly read the gerund buddhvā as a causative, rendering, "en l'éveillant," with the sense of "in awakening him [Rāma]." In this he has regrettably been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 171) and Pagani (1999, p. 1029). The texts and printed editions of Cv, Cm, and Cg read instead the irregular negative gerund abuddhya, "having not known," for which Cg and Cm gloss the correct form, abuddhvā. This variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 170) as "not realizing." The text of Gorresio (6.43.15) appears to support the negative forms in the critical text and that of Cm, Cv, and Cg, substituting the vocative abuddhe, "O you fool," rendered by Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 17) as "o insensato."

16. "Our whole army" idaṃ sarvam: Literally, "all this." We follow the majority of the commentators, who supply a word for army (balam, sainyam).

"your . . . there" tatra . . . tava: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read instead tāta . . . bhṛśam, "my child . . . strongly."

17. "lacking all resources . . . who possesses a wealth of resources" hīnārthas tu samṛddhārtham: Literally, "one with diminished resources . . . one with rich resources." Based on the context, we share the view of Ck, Ct, and Cr that these terms refer to the fact that Kumbhakarṇa, without any allies (sahāyarahitaḥ—Cr), is proposing to attack Rāma, who has a huge number of allies (pūrṇasahāyam—Cr). Cg glosses the former term as "whose strength is diminishing (hīyamānabalaḥ)" and the latter as "whose strength is increasing (vardhamānabalam)."

"could hope . . . to subdue" vaśam ānetum icchati: Literally, "he wishes to bring under [his] control."

"like some common fool" prākṛto yathā: Literally, "like a common or ignorant person." Ñ2,B,D1,3–7,9–11,13,T1,2,M2,3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cg, and Cr read instead the accusative prākṛtam, in which case the adjective modifies "the enemy (ripum)," and has the sense of "as if he were some ordinary [foe]."

"is determined to lay down his life" niścitaṃ jīvitatyāge: Literally, "resolved with respect to the abandonment of life." M3 and the texts and printed edtions of Cg and Cm read instead the gerund niścitya, "having resolved," which permits the phrase to be construed with the subject of the sentence, kaḥ, "who." Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 170) renders this reading, translating, "unless he were bent upon throwing away his life."

18. "who. . . is . . . equal to Indra or Vivasvant" tulyenendravivasvatoḥ: Literally, "with an equal of Indra and Vivasvant." Cs argues that we must understand that the two gods occupy a single body, thus constituting an unprecedented object of comparison (abhūtopameyam). Otherwise, he argues, since Indra and each of the other individual gods have been worsted so many times [by Rāvaṇa], we would have a very unsuitable demonstration of Rāma's power. (indravivasvator ekadeham āśritayor ity abhūtopameyam. anyathendrādīnām etadādiparābhavasya bahuvāram anubhavann anidarśanārhateti bodhyam.)

19. "enraged" saṃrabdham: Ñ2,V,B1,D1,3,5,7,13,T1,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read the nominative saṃrabdhaḥ, in which case the adjective would apply to Mahodara.

"Rāvaṇa, who caused the world to cry out" rāvaṇaṃ lokarāvaṇam: This etymological epithet is a favorite of Vālmīki. See notes to 6.8.12.

20. "you go on talking" punaḥ . . . prajalpasi: D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read vilambase, "you delay, hesitate," for prajalpasi, "you prattle." D6,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read purastāt, "already," for the critical edition's punas [tām].

"Sītā will submit to your wishes whenever you desire." yadecchasi tadā sītā vaśagā te bhaviṣyati: Cr takes advantage of the sandhi to provide a theological reading of the line. Resolving the sequence tadā sītā, "then Sītā," as tādā + āsītā, he understands the latter word to be a dvandva compound made up of āḥ, which he sees as an epithet of Rāma in his role as "the one who measures out all life breaths," and "Sītā." He interprets the phrase as follows: "By this he says, 'when you desire to solicit Sītā, then both Sītā, together with Ā, that is, with Rāma, the apportioner (?) of all life (nikhilaprāṇanakarttā) will be under your control. (ity ata āha yad yadecchasi sītāprārthanam iti śeṣaḥ. tadaivāsītā—ā nikhilaprāṇanakarttā rāmas tena sahitā sītā te tava vaśagā bhaviṣyati.)" Compare Cm's reading of verse 31 below.

D5,10,11,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read yadīcchasi, "if you desire," for yadecchasi, "whenever you desire."

21. "whereby Sītā will come to you" sītopasthānakārakaḥ: Literally, "which will cause Sītā's acceptance [of you as a suitor]." Vālmīki uses the term upasthāna, "approaching," in the sense of "accepting as a suitor" also at 6.80.43.

"If it appeals to your way of thinking . . . then hear me out." rucitaś cet svayā buddhyā . . . taṃ śṛṇu: Literally, "If it is pleasing by your own intellect, listen to it." The commentators differ as to how to construe the phrase svayā buddhyā, "by your own intellect." Ck and Ct take the half verse as elliptical and flesh it out as follows: "Listen to it. Once you have heard it and reflected upon it with your intellect, you should carry it out if it pleases you. (taṃ śṛṇu. taṃ śrutvā svayā buddhyā paryālocya rucitaś cet tam anutiṣṭheti śeṣaḥ.)" Cg construes the phrase more closely with the imperative śṛṇu, "listen to," explaining, "Listen with your own opinion, but do not follow the opinion of others (svayā buddhyā śṛṇu na tu parabuddhim anusarety arthaḥ)." Cr, whom we follow, construes the phrase more closely with rucitaḥ, "pleasing."

22. "Vitardana" vitardanaḥ: As noted by Pagani (1999, p. 1666, note 64.1), the name of this rākṣasa occurs only in this passage.

23. "we will . . . engage Rāma in fierce battle" yuddhaṃ dāsyāmas tasya yatnataḥ: Literally, "we will give him battle strenuously."

"no further need of such a ruse" nopāyaiḥ kṛtyam asti naḥ: Literally, "of us there will be nothing to accomplish through stratagems." The reference, as several commentators point out, is to devices to win over Sītā, such as mentioned in verse 21 above, since, having no further hope with regard to Rāma, she would come to Rāvaṇa of her own accord (rāmaṃ praty āśānivṛttyā svata eva tadānukūlyasya siddhatvād iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct).

24. "on the other hand" atha: Literally, "then." The logic of the passage, however, forces one to understand a conditional sense.

"then we shall adopt the ruse that I have devised in my mind" tataḥ samabhipatsyāmo manasā yat samīkṣitam: Literally, "then we shall adopt what was envisaged with the mind." We follow Cm in supplying the noun "ruse (upāyajātam, lit., 'set of stratagems')."

25. "Our bodies rent" vidārya svatanum: Literally, "having had our bodies rent." The text is somewhat ambiguous as to the actual agent of the wounding of the rākṣasas. Crā, Cg, and Cm understand that the rākṣasas see to it that Rāma wounds them (svatanuṃ vidārya rāmeṇa vidāritāṃ kārayitvā). Ct and Ck have a similar idea, indicating that the rākṣasas have actually put their lives in peril in their battle with Rāma (svatanum . . . vidārya kṛtavidāraṇāṃ saṃpādya yāvat prāṇasaṃkaṭaṃ yuddhvety arthaḥ). Cs, alone among the commentators, believes that the rākṣasas' wounds are self-inflicted (svatanuṃ bāṇaiḥ svayam eva vidārya). Among the translators consulted, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 171) and Pagani (1999, p. 1030) share this view. Thus, Raghunathan renders, "having inflicted wounds upon ourselves with arrows," while Pagani translates, "après avoir lacéré nos corps."

"by sharp arrows" bāṇaiḥ . . . śitaiḥ: Ñ,V,B1–3,D4–7,9–11,T2,G2,3,M3,5, and Cg, Crā, and Cv, as well as the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck, read śaraiḥ, "with arrows," for the adjective śitaiḥ, "sharp." However, the printed editions of Cg, i.e., VSP and KK, read with the critical edition, although KK notes the variant. This presents a problem of redundancy, which the commentators attempt to resolve in various ways. Ck and Ct ignore the issue completely. Cr attempts to resolve the problem by reading śaraiḥ adjectivally in the sense of "destructive, lethal (vighātakaiḥ)." Crā, Cg, and Cm dissociate the two words syntactically. They read the first as the instruments with which the rākṣasas cause themselves to be wounded. They then take the second as an instrument of accompaniment, adding the postposition saha, "with," so that the word refers separately to the arrows with which the rākṣasas will return (i.e., to show to Sītā). Cs faults Cm and Ct for their failure to notice the redundancy and its implications. He believes that the position of Ct and Cm, according to which the rākṣasas will actually be wounded in battle by Rāma's arrows and still return alive, is contradicted by the penultimate verse of the sarga (verse 34), which Cs claims the other commentators have failed to consider. His argument is as follows: If, according to verse 34, Rāvaṇa himself cannot survive a confrontation with Rāma, how then could his inferiors be wounded by Rāma and still live? Cs believes that Ct and Cm are ascribing too much merit to these lesser rākṣasas.

"marked with Rāma's name" rāmanāmāṅkitaiḥ: The same adjective is used to describe Rāma's signet ring at 5.34.2 (see note ad loc.). See 4.43.11 and note, where Rāma gives the ring to Hanumān. The phrase used there is svanāmāṅkopaśobhitam, "[a ring] engraved with his name." See Sankalia 1973, p. 56. See, too, Salomon 1998 and Pollock 1996.

26. "we shall reverently clasp your feet" tava pādau grahīṣyāmaḥ: Literally, "we shall grasp your feet." Touching of the feet is a time-honored gesture of subordination and respect.

"You must then reward us to our heart's content." tvaṃ naḥ kāmaṃ prapūraya: Literally, "you must fulfill our desire." Commentators are divided as to whether this sentence forms part of Mahodara's current advice to Rāvaṇa or a part of the false report the rākṣasas plan to bring from the battlefield. Cr chooses the latter explanation, whereas Ct, Ck, and Cg choose the former.

27. "from elephant-back" gajaskandhena: Literally, "by the shoulder of an elephant." We follow the idea proposed by Cg, Cm, and Cr, who understand that the proclamation is to be made by a man mounted on the back of an elephant (gajaskandhagata-puruṣeṇa—so Cg). Among the translators consulted, Dutt (1893, p. 1306) alone understands the term as a proper noun, presumably the name of a rākṣasa herald, rendering, "do thou through Gajaskandha publish it all round."

28–29. "feigning the greatest delight" prīto nāma . . . bhūtvā: Literally, "having become happy indeed." We follow the commentators who interpret the indeclinable nāma as a particle indicating a feigned state or action (aparamārthe—so Cm; alīke—so Cg).

"heroic warriors" vīrāṇām: Literally, "of heroes."

30ab–1138–30cdef. " 'The rākṣasas have devoured Rāma along with his companions!' has been heard" bhakṣitaḥ sasuhṛdrāmo rākṣasair iti viśrute: The critical edition relegates this line to its apparatus as passage 1138*, despite the fact that it is known to all manuscripts, northern and southern, consulted by the critical editors. No explanation is given for its excision from the critical text. According to the principles on which the critical edition is based (Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv), there is no reason that the line should be excluded. We have accordingly emended the text. Curiously, although it is not noted in the critical apparatus, the line appears to be missing only from the printed edition of Gorresio (see 6.43.31–32).

"this vicious rumor" kaulīne: Normally, this means "scandal or evil report." We follow Cg, Cm, Ct, and Ck, who gloss, "popular rumor (lokavāde; janavāde—Ct, Ck)." Cg and Cm cite Amarakośa 3.3.116 for this definition. Cr alone breaks the sequence into the words kau, "earth," which he glosses as "the land of Laṅkā (laṅkābhūmau)," and līne, which he glosses as "pervaded (vyāpte)." For him, then, the sequence means "spread throughout the land of Laṅkā."

31. Cm, in keeping with his Vaiṣṇava theological project, proposes an alternative reading of the verse. By breaking the sequence naṣṭanāthāgamiṣyati into naṣṭa na atha āgamiṣyati and reading the compound akāmā, "unwilling," to mean "desiring only A, i.e., Viṣṇu (= Rāma)," he extracts the following hidden meaning: "Sītā, who loves only Viṣṇu, will not come under your sway, O you who are destroyed! (naṣṭa na atha āgamiṣyati iti cchedaḥ . . . he naṣṭa rāvaṇa! akāmā viṣṇukāmā sītā. anayopadhayāpi tvadvaśaṃ na gamiṣyatīty arthaḥ.)" Compare Cr's reading of verse 20 above.

"which will give rise to fear and grief" bhayaśokānubandhayā: Ś1,B3,D6,10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read bhūyaḥ, "once again or to a greater extent," for bhaya-, "fear."

"believing her husband dead" naṣṭanāthā: Literally, "whose husband is dead."

"unwilling though she may be" akāmā: Literally, "having no desire."

32. "For . . . and" hi . . . ca: Cm continues his alternative reading of the passage (see notes to verse 31 above), here basing his interpretation on his reading of the particle hi, "for," in pāda a as a marker of the interrogative (kimiti). He then interprets the conjunctive particle ca, "and," of pāda c, in the sense of the particle api, "even though."

This yields the alternative sense: " 'Would the famous, supremely devoted wife Sītā come under your sway, even after learning that her husband was dead, even in her despair, even out of feminine frailty? She certainly would not!' That is the construction. (hīti kim ity arthe. cāpyarthe. sā prasiddhā paramapativratā sītā bhartāraṃ vinaṣṭam avagamyāpi nairāśyād api strīlaghutvāt strīcāpalyād api tvadvaśaṃ pratipatsyate hi? na pratipatsyata eveti yojanā.)"

"beloved" ramaṇīyam: D6,7,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ramaṇīyam, "pleasant, charming." Both Ck, who reads with the critical, and Ct, who does not, gloss, "worthy of being followed or obeyed (anuvartituṃ yogyam)."

"in her despair and feminine frailty" nairāśyāt strīlaghutvāc ca: Literally, "out of hopelessness and the weakness of a woman." Cr explains that Sītā, in her fear of being eaten by the rākṣasas, will place herself under Rāvaṇa's control in order to protect herself (rākṣasakartṛkabhakṣaṇabhiyā svarakṣārthaṃ tvadadhīnā bhavisyatīty arthaḥ). Cr goes on to claim that what is suggested here is that, when, at a [later] time, Sītā is told the news that Rāma is actually still alive, by virtue of that [having come under the sway of Rāvaṇa], Rāma also will come under Rāvaṇa's power (etena tasmin samaye rāmo jīvatīti vṛttāntam uktvā taddvārā rāmo 'pi tvadvaśago bhavisyatīti sūcitam). Cg and Cm gloss, "out of the fickleness of a woman (strīcāpalāt—so Cg). See Cr on verse 20 above.

33. "though that is what she deserves" sukhārhā: Literally, "deserving comfort."

"she will, by all means, come to you" sarvathopagamiṣyati: Literally, "she will approach by all means." The absence of an object of Sītā's approach leaves the door open for Cr and Cm to interpret that she will, in fact, put herself under the power of Rāma. Cm particularly elaborates his previous alternative readings, noting that, even though she had been accustomed to comfort and was subsequently racked with suffering, the supremely devoted wife, Sītā, recognizing that the comfort to be had with Rāvaṇa would bring with it sinfulness, will cleave firmly only to Rāma. (purā sukhasaṃvṛddhāpīdānīṃ duḥkhakarśitāpi sā paramapativratā sītā tvadadhīnaṃ sukhaṃ jñātvā durītāvāham iti śeṣaḥ. sarvathopagamiṣyati rāmam eveti śeṣaḥ.)

34. "It would be catastrophic for you to confront Rāma." rāmaṃ hi dṛṣṭvaiva bhaved anarthaḥ: Literally, "for, having seen Rāma, a disaster would occur." The disaster, as the commentators note, would be the death of Rāvaṇa. See Cs's anticipatory reference to this verse in notes to verse 25 above.

"Don't be so anxious" motsuko bhūḥ: According to Ct, Ck, and Cr, Rāvaṇa should not be so eager to see Rāma (rāmadarśanārtham—so Ct). According to Cg and Cm, he should not be eager for battle (mā raṇotsuko bhūḥ).

"without fighting" ayuddhena: Literally, "by non-battle." Cg takes this to refer to āsana, or "stasis," one of the six modes of political policy (yuddhavyatiriktāsanabalena). See notes to 6.51.7. Cs understands the term to suggest that, once Rāvaṇa has obtained Sītā and accomplished his purpose, he should then seek refuge with Rāma (etena sītālābhānantaraṃ kṛtakāryaḥ śaraṇaṃ vrajeti sūcyata iti jñeyam).

The meter is upajāti.

35. "without the loss of one's army" anaṣṭasainyaḥ: Ś2,Ñ,V,B1,3,4,D2,6,8,12, 13,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cm, Cg, Gorresio, and Lahore read instead adṛṣṭasainyaḥ, "whose army is unseen." Cg, the only commentator to comment on this reading, glosses, "without having seen the enemy army (adṛṣṭaśatrusainyaḥ)."

Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 19) shares this interpretation. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 171) renders, "without employing an army."

"lord of the earth" mahīpate: D7,9–11,T1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the nominative singular mahīpatiḥ, which would serve as the subject in the sense of "a king who is the lord of the earth."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

1. "addressed in this fashion" tathoktaḥ: Ck and Ct understand the reference to be to Mahodara's advice to avoid combat. Ck expands on this, seeing Mahodara's words as an example of the bakamantra, or "the counsel of the crane" (bakamantraṃ kṛtvā yuddhaṃ na kartavyam ity ukta ity arthaḥ). The reference is to the crane's habit of remaining immobile and waiting for its prey to come within its grasp.

2. "In killing that evil-minded Rāma" vadhāt tasya durātmanaḥ / rāmasya: In keeping with his devotional reading, Cm proposes what he calls the "true meaning (vāstavārthaḥ)" of the text: "Although I am a servant of Rāma, whose mind consists of grace even in the midst of suffering, still I belong to that well-known group of rākṣasas, headed by Prahasta. From the destruction of it [that group], a terrible danger has presented itself to you. I shall remove that so that you, being free from enmity, shall become happy. (vāstavārthas tu durātmano duḥkheṣv apy ātmā buddhir anugraharūpā yasya rāmasyāhaṃ rāmadāso 'haṃ yady api tathāpi tasya prasiddhasya prahastamukharākṣasasamūhasyety arthaḥ. vadhāt tava ghoraṃ bhayam upasthitam iti śeṣaḥ. tat pramārjāmy apanayāmi sa tvaṃ nirvairaḥ san sukhī bhaveti sambandhaḥ.)

"With your enemy out of the way," nirvairaḥ: Literally, "lacking an enemy."

3. "True heroes do not boast in vain, like empty clouds thundering." garjanti na vṛthā śūrā nirjalā iva toyadāḥ: Literally, "Heroes do not roar or thunder in vain like waterless clouds."

"Watch now as my boasts are proven true by my feats in battle." paśya saṃpādyamānaṃ tu garjitaṃ yudhi karmaṇā: Literally, "See the bellowing [boasting] being fulfilled by action in battle."

4. "True heroes" śūrāḥ: Literally, "heroes."

"True heroes do not tolerate insult, nor do they indulge in self-praise . . . they perform" na marṣayati cātmānaṃ saṃbhāvayati nātmanā . . . śūrāḥ . . . kurvanti: Literally, "Heroes do not tolerate nor do they honor the self with the self . . . they perform." Although the subject śūrāḥ, "heroes," and the final verb in the verse kurvanti, "they perform," are both plural forms, the prior two verbs—marṣayati, "he tolerates, abides, forgives," and saṃbhāvayati, "he praises"—are both singular forms. Commentators who share the reading of the critical edition attempt to explain the lack of agreement. Crā and Cg gloss the plural forms and understand the number disagreement to be the result of "transformation or inversion (ubhayatrāpi vyatyayenaikavacanam)." Cm simply writes it off to "epic irregularity (ubhayatraikavacanam ārṣam)." D7,9–11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read instead the plural facilior marṣayanti, "they tolerate."

The verb marṣayati, "he tolerates," appears to lack a direct object, and those commentators and translators who share this reading propose various strategies for supplying the ellipsis. Cg and Crā, whom we follow, supply, as an object, "the insulting speech rendered by an enemy (parakṛtām avamānoktim—Cg; parakṛtāṃ laghvuktim—Crā)." This interpretation is incorrectly also ascribed to Cm as well in the critical apparatus. According to VSP, Cm actually takes ātmānam, "self," of pāda a, by the maxim of the crow's [single but moveable] eyeball (kākākṣigolikanyāyena), as the object of both marṣayati and saṃbhāvayati. Cv and Cm take the phrase ātmānaṃ na marṣayati to mean "heroes do not calm themselves once angered without performing an act of valor (śūrā ātmānaṃ na marṣayati kruddham ātmānaṃ pauruṣam akṛtvā na śamayantīty arthaḥ)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 172), the only translator to render this reading, translates, "do not spare themselves."

D7,10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read the infinitive saṃbhāvayitum for the critical edition's finite form, saṃbhāvayati. This facilior both avoids the apparent number disagreement and eliminates the elliptical quality of the critical reading. Eliminating the second negative particle na of the critical reading, the vulgate thus yields the sense "[heroes] cannot bear to indulge in self-praise."

"without swaggering" adarśayitvā: Literally, "not having shown." The commentators agree in taking this to mean "not having boasted of their own prowess (ātmapauruṣam anuktvā—so Cg)."

"seemingly impossible" duṣkaram: Literally, "hard to accomplish."

*5. The text reconstructed by the critical editors appears to be highly defective and cannot be readily construed as a sentence. It reflects the reading of no manuscript collated for the critical edition. See Sutherland 1992. The critical text reads:

viklavānām abuddhīnāṃ rājñāṃ paṇḍitamānīnām /
śṛṇvatām ādita idaṃ tvadvidhānāṃ mahodara //

Literally, "of kings like you, Mahodara, who are cowards, fools, and think themselves wise, and who have heard this from the beginning . . ."

The verse shows considerable variation across the recensions, and, after careful consideration of the textual evidence, we have concluded that the most appropriate and textually supported available reading is that of the southern manuscripts affiliated with the commentaries of Cv, Cg, Crā, and Cm (the reading is also noted as a variant by Ct), and we have therefore translated accordingly. This text, as it appears at VSP and KK 6.65.5, reads as follows:

viklavānām abuddhīnāṃ rājñā paṇḍitamānīnām /
śṛṇvatā sāditam idaṃ tvadvidhānāṃ mahodara //

"heeding the advice" śṛṇvatā: Literally, "by [the king] who was hearing." We follow Cm, who argues that one needs to supply the word vacaḥ, "speech, advice." Cv and Cg avoid the necessity of adding the word "advice" by taking all the genitive plural nouns in the sense of ablatives (pañcamyarthe ṣaṣṭhī). This yields the sense "by the king hearing from cowards like you . . ."

"the king has been brought to such a sorry state" rājñā . . . sāditam idam: We follow Cg and Cv, who read the phrase as an abstract construction (bhāve niṣṭhā) with the literal sense "it was made despondent by the king." Cv, however, reads the genitive plural rājñām, "of kings," for rājñā. He thus interprets the verse to mean "kings who listen to cowards such as Mahodara, etc., that is, who are corrupted by bad counsel, experience this sort of calamity (śṛṇvatāṃ rājñāṃ sādanam idaṃ durmatidūṣitānāṃ rājñāṃ yad vinipātanaṃ tad idam ity arthaḥ)." Cm appears to read it more strictly as a passive construction, in the sense of "this [situation] was brought to ruin by the king (rājñā yat sāditam avasādanam asti tad idam iti yojanam)."

D7,10,11,G2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr [noted also as a variant by Cv] and Gorresio [6.44.8] read instead:

viklavānāṃ hy abuddhīnāṃ rājñāṃ paṇḍitamānīnām /
rocate tvadvaco nityaṃ kathyamānāṃ mahodara // [=GPP 6.65.5]

This yields the quite different sense "Your [sort of] advice, Mahodara, always pleases kings who are cowardly and foolish but who think themselves wise."

6. "It is people like you" bhavadbhiḥ: Literally, "by you gentlemen."

"sycophants of the king" rājānam anugacchadbhiḥ: Literally, "by [those] following the king." Cg and Cm gloss, "following the wishes of the king (rājecchānusāribhiḥ)."

"saying only what he wants to hear" priyavādibhiḥ: Literally, "by [those] saying pleasant things."

"constantly" nityam: We read the adverb with the participle vināśitam, "destroyed, subverted," taking our cue from Cg, who, as noted below, understands kṛtyam, "undertaking," as an ongoing process.

"this undertaking" kṛtyam etat: Literally, "this thing that is to be done." Cg understands, "the affair of Sītā's abduction culminating in the battle at hand (prakṛtayuddhaparyavasāyi sītāharaṇakṛtyaṃ sāditaṃ saṃpāditam)." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead sarvaṃ kṛtyam, "this entire affair."

7. "in counseling the king . . . you have acted . . . like an enemy" rājānam imam āsādya . . . amitrakam: Literally, "having approached the king . . . a hostile act." We follow Cr, who glosses āsādya, "having approached," with "having approached as a counselor (mantritvena prāpya)." We follow Cv, Cm, Ck, and Cg in carrying over the pronoun bhavadbhiḥ, "by you gentlemen." The term amitrakam has been read in two ways by the commentators. Ct glosses, "a hostile act" and supplies, "has been done" (amitrakāryaṃ kṛtam iti śeṣaḥ). Ck similarly offers, "you have done an act that ought not to have been done (akṛtyaṃ kṛtam)." Cr glosses, "enemy" and supplies the words "you are an enemy" (śatrus tvam asīti śeṣaḥ). Cg and Cm take a quite different tack. They gloss amitrakam with the adjective amitrabhūtam, "having become an enemy," which then modifies rājānam. As Cg explains it, the king has become an enemy to those who failed to prevent him from engaging in improper actions (akāryapravṛtto rājā yair na nivāryate sa teṣām amitra ity abhiprāyeṇāmitrakam).

"Laṅkā has been virtually emptied save for the king" rājaśeṣā kṛtā laṅkā: Literally, "Laṅkā has been made to have the king as a remainder." Cr interprets this phrase to mean that many of the city's vast armies have been destroyed (vināśitabahumahābalety arthaḥ).

"the army decimated" balaṃ hatam: Literally, "the army slain." Cr, who has interpreted a previous phrase to refer to the destruction of the armies, takes bala here in its other sense of "strength, capability," which, in his view, has been sapped through the destruction of the army and the depletion of the treasury (kośaḥ kṣīṇaḥ kṣapito 'ta eva balaṃ sāmarthyaṃ hataṃ vināśitam).

8. "In order to remedy" samīkartum: Literally, "to make even."

10. "the idea of battle" yuddham: Literally, "battle."

11. "loyalty" sauhṛdena: Literally, "by or through friendship."

Following verse 11, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of nine lines [1141*]; between lines 7 and 8 of which must be inserted an additional three lines [1097*, lines 12–14] (following 6.50.10 of the critical edition) [= GPP 6.65.12–17; KK 6.65.12–18ab; VSP 6.65.12–18ab]: " 'It was for that reason that I had you awakened in order to do away with this danger.[1][1141*, line 1] For now is the hour of the allies of the rākṣasas,[2] subduer of your foes.[1141*, line 2] So take your lance and go, like Yama, ender of all things, with his noose in hand.[1141*, line 3] You must devour the monkeys as well as the two princes whose blazing energy is that of the sun.[1141*, line 4] Once they see what you look like, the monkeys will flee, while the hearts of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa will burst.'[1141*, lines 5–6] When the great king had spoken in this fashion to the immensely powerful Kumbhakarṇa [1141*, line 7], that night-roaming rākṣasa[3] [Rāvaṇa] felt as if he had been reborn.[1097*, line 12] Confident of Kumbhakarṇa's strength and knowing his valor, the king was as delighted as the brilliant, hare-marked moon. [1097*, lines 13–14] When he had been addressed in this fashion, the immensely powerful Kumbhakarṇa was delighted. Heeding the king's orders, he made ready.[4][1141*, lines 8–9]"

[1]"It was for that reason . . . in order to do away with this danger" tasmāt tu bhaya-nāśārtham: The texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead śayānaḥ śatru-nāśārtham, "[you] who were sleeping . . . for the destruction of the enemy."

[2]"of the allies of the rākṣasas" suhṛdāṃ rākṣasānām: Literally, "of the friends of the rākṣasas or of the friends who are rākṣasas." D9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead sumahān, "very great," which then modifies kālaḥ, lending the phrase the sense "now is the great hour of the rākṣasas."

[3]"that night-roaming rākṣasa" rajanīcaraḥ: D5–7,9–11,S read instead rākṣasapuṃga-vaḥ, "that bull among rākṣasas."

[4]"Kumbhakarṇa . . . he made ready: kumbhakarṇaḥ samudyataḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead yoddhum udyuktavāṃs tadā, "he then prepared for battle."

12. "black iron" -kālāyasam: See 6.3.12; 6.55.47; and notes. See, too, 5.39.11; 5.51.38; and notes.

13. "equal . . . it was fearsome" -samaṃ bhīmam: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead -samaprakhyam, "its appearance was equal to [Indra's thunderbolt]." Ct glosses prakhyā as "splendor, brilliance (kāntiḥ)."

"Indra's thunderbolt . . . the vajra" indrāśani- . . . vajra-: It is not clear whether the poet means to distinguish these two terms, which are normally synonymous. See 6.55.43 and note.

"kinnaras" -kiṃnara-: V,D9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead -pannaga-, "great serpents."

14. "adorned with massive garlands of red blossoms" raktamālyamahādāma: We follow Ct and Cr in taking the compound as a bahuvrīhi with the literal sense of "having red blossoms for its large garlands." This reading is followed by all translators consulted, with the exception of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 200), who reads it as a dvandva, rendering, "Avec ses guirlandes rouges et ses grands liens." D6 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead raktamālyaṃ mahādhāma, "with red blossoms and of immense power." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 173) is the only translator to read and translate this variant.

"spewed forth its inner fire" svataś codgatapāvakam: Literally, "and which emitted fire of or by itself." Cg explains that the lance itself emitted sparks because of its [innate] fierceness (krauryāt svata evotpannāgnikaṇam).

17. "great" mahātmānaḥ: Cg takes ātman in its sense of "mind," glossing, "highly intelligent (mahābuddhayaḥ)." The translators consulted have rung all the possible changes on this common epithet. Translations include "high-souled" (Dutt 1893, p. 1309); "very intelligent" (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 173); "gigantic" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1614); "puissants" (Pagani 1999, p. 1031); "très énergiques" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 200); "extremely energetic" (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 173); and "magnanimi" (Gorresio 1858, vol. 10, p. 20).

"swift" śīghrāḥ: D9–11,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead śūrāḥ, "brave, heroic."

"They would . . . kill" nayeyuḥ . . . kṣayam: Literally, "they would lead to destruction."

"should you be alone" ekākinam: Literally, "one who is alone." We agree with Cr that Rāvaṇa is speaking specifically about a danger to Kumbhakarṇa. Cr adds the word "you (tvam)." With the exception of Dutt (1893, p. 1309), who follows this same tack, all other translators consulted take the statement as a general one with the sense of "anyone who is alone."

"caught off guard" pramattam: Literally, "incautious, negligent."

18. "by unassailable soldiers" durdharṣaiḥ sainyaiḥ: Ś2,Ñ1,V,B1–3,D1–4,7–13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the nominative singular durdharṣaḥ, making the adjective "unassailable" refer to Kumbhakarṇa rather than to his troops.

19. "bound upon Kumbhakarṇa's head a chaplet" srajam . . . ābabandha . . . kumbhakarṇasya: Literally, "he bound a chaplet or garland on [lit., of] Kumbhakarṇa." The precise nature and location of this ornament are difficult to ascertain as the term sraj can equally refer to a chaplet bound around the forehead or a garland hung about the neck. In this case, because of the mention of the jewel at the center and because Rāvaṇa will hang a necklace (hārā) on Kumbhakarṇa's neck in verse 20 below, we have chosen the former interpretation. Cr, the only commentator to specify the location of the ornament, glosses, "placed around [his] neck (gale saṃdhārayāmāsa)." The translators are divided in their choice. See Biswas 1985, p. 102; and 5.42.2 and note, where we translate the term sragvī as "he wore a flower chaplet."

The southern commentators, with the exception of Ck, are in agreement that the chaplet or garland is made of gold, and in this they are followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1614) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 173). Ck glosses only "chaplet or garland of jewels (ratnamālā)."

"a jewel" maṇi-: Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 200), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, pp. 173–74) and Pagani (1999, p. 1032), understands that the chaplet is adorned with pearls, rendering, "un diadème dont l'intérieur était en perles."

20. "upon great Kumbhakarṇa" mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "of the great one."

"rings" aṅgulīveṣṭān: Literally, "finger enclosures." We agree with the commentators in taking this as a kenning for rings. Only Dutt (1893, p. 1309) translates literally, "finger-fences."

"other fine ornaments" varāṇy ābharaṇāni ca: Literally, "and fine ornaments."

21. "and placed magnificent earrings on his ears" śrotre cāsañjayāmāsa śrīmatī cāsya kuṇḍale: Cm and Crā gloss the appropriate dual śrotrayoḥ for the critical edition's singular śrotre. This line shows considerable variation among the manuscripts. The texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead gātreṣu sajjayāmāsa śrotayoś cāsya kuṇḍale (=GPP 6.65.27cd), "... upon his limbs, and fastened earrings on his ears."

22. "Wearing his golden bracelets and armlets" kāñcanāñgadakeyūraḥ: Literally, "possessing golden bracelets and armlets." The terms añgada and keyūra both refer to ornaments worn around the upper arms. Cg appears to regard the terms as synonymous, taking the second as a corroborative repetition (anuvāda) of the first. According to Biswas (1985, p. 105), añgadas are coiled armlets and keyūras are circular armlets with designs, such as crosses, etc., on them. See Biswas 1985, p. 103, figures. 53.4,5; and Vyas 1967, p. 217 and figure 71. See 5.45.12 and note.

"golden necklaces and other ornaments" niṣkābharaṇa-: Literally, "niṣkas and ornaments." Ct defines niṣka as a chest or breast ornament (urobhūṣaṇam). Niṣkas are necklaces of gold, probably made from coins (Biswas 1985, pp. 101 and 103, figure 3; and Vyas 1967, pp. 217 and 216, figure 70.) See 5.45.12 and note.

"huge-eared" bṛhatkarṇaḥ: The epithet is a play on the name Kumbhakarṇa, "having pot[like] ears."

23. "With ... sword belt" śroṇīsūtreṇa: Literally, "with a hip-cord." The term frequently refers to an ornamental string or girdle worn around the waist. Here, however, as at 7.108* line 4 [=GPP 7.6.65], the context seems to call for the translation "[sword] belt."

"was as resplendent" virājitaḥ: Ñ2,V,B,D1–7,9–11,13,T,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the instrumental virājatā, "shining," which then must modify Kumbhakarṇa's belt. M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead the finite verb vyarājata, "he shone," rendered by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 173) as "he looked like."

"Mount Mandara" mandaraḥ: Mount Mandara is the mountain used as a churning rod by the gods and demons at the churning of the ocean. On the story of the churning of the ocean, see 6.12.22; 6.40.29; 6.41.17; 6.80.19; 6.105.19; and notes.

"great serpent" bhujaṃgena: Literally, "with the serpent." The reference, as noted by Cg, is to the great nāga Vāsuki, whom the gods and demons used as their churning rope when the ocean was churned for the amṛta.

"when the nectar of immortality was churned forth" amṛtotpādane: Literally, "at the production of the aṃrta." Cg understands the locative to be one of cause (nimittasaptamī).

24. "impenetrable ... armor" nivātam: Most of the commentators cite a lexical source that defines nivāta as "armor that is not to be pierced by any weapon (śastrābhedyaṃ tu yad varma)." Cm glosses, "having no holes or gaps (acchidram)." Cg agrees that the term essentially refers to armor that has no gaps (nirantaram) but takes the term in its other sense of "devoid of wind," explaining that the armor prevents the entrance of [even] the wind (vātapraveśanivārakam). Among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, pp. 173–74) follows Cg in this, rendering, "which not even air could penetrate." Cg, however, also cites Amarakośa 3.3.84 to justify the meaning "impenetrable armor."

"which could withstand any blow" bhārasaham: Literally, "withstanding weight." We follow Ct, Ck, Cr, and the first interpretation of Cg and Cm, according to which the term refers to the ability of the armor to withstand the blows of weapons, such as mountains (parvatāyudhādiprahārakṣamam—so Cm). Cv, Cg, and Cm, however, offer a second interpretation, which attempts to render more literally the term bhāra, "weight." In this interpretation the adjective refers not so much to the durability of the armor as to its weight. As these commentators put it, when the armor is placed on a scale, it bears up, i.e., balances many palas [a unit of weight for measuring gold, etc.]. (yadvā tulāyāṃ sthāpyamānān bahūn bhārān sahata iti tathā. anekapalabhāranirmitam ity arthaḥ—so Cm.)

"the king of the mountains" adrirājaḥ: The commentators are silent, although the reference is, no doubt, to Himalaya. Cf. KumāSaṃ 1.1. See. 6.47.12 and note.

"clouds at sunset" saṃdhyābhra-: Literally, "twilight clouds."

The meter is upajāti.

25. "His body adorned with every ornament" sarvābharaṇanaddhāṅgaḥ: Literally, "his body girded with every ornament." Alternately, this could be translated as "his every limb girded with ornaments." D7,10,11,G2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read sarvābharaṇasarvāṅgaḥ, "with his entire body or every limb [ornamented] with every ornament."

"Nārāyaṇa when he had resolved to take his three strides" trivikramakṛtotsāho nārāyaṇaḥ: The reference is to Viṣṇu's feat of traversing the triple universe in three strides to recapture it for the gods. This is the central act of the vāmanāvatāra, or dwarf incarnation, of Viṣṇu. There is a slight difference of opinion as to how precisely to analyze the compound trivikramaḥ. The majority of the commentators who comment on the term see it, as do we, as a reference to the three strides (triṣu vikrameṣu pādanyāseṣu—so Ct). Cr, however, understands the number tri, "three," to refer to the three worlds, glossing, "in order to stride, that is, to set his feet in the three worlds (triṣu lokeṣu vikramāya padanyāsāya). See 6.40.43; 6.47.119; 6.49.1–2; 6.59.7; 6.105.24; and notes. See, too, 1.28.2 and note.

26. "bowing his head to him" praṇamya śirasā tasmai: Literally, "having bowed with his head to him." We understand the dative tasmai, "to him," to serve here as the object of Kumbhakarṇa's bowing, as do the translations consulted. Cr, however, takes it as the indirect object of pratasthe (v.l. for saṃpratasthe), "he set forth," commenting: "for him, that is, in order to curry favor with him, he set forth (tasmai tam anukūlayituṃ pratasthe)."

"the immensely powerful warrior" mahābalaḥ: Literally, "one of great strength."

Following 26cd, D5–7,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm insert a passage of one line [1144*], which extends the description of Kumbhakarṇa: "...as he, huge and immensely powerful, was marching forth with a great roar." Of the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 174) renders this line.

27. "that great hero" mahātmānam: Literally, "the great one." Ñ2,V1,3,B2,D4,6,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the nominative plural mahātmānaḥ, "great," which then must modify rathinaḥ, "chariot-warriors," of pāda f.

"to the blare of conches and the beating of war drums" śaṅkhadundubhinirghoṣaiḥ: Literally, "together with the sounds of conches and dundubhis." See 6.17.31–33 and note.

"by...soldiers, elephants, horses, and chariots" sainyaiḥ...gajaiś ca turaṅgaiś ca syandanaiś ca: This group would constitute the typical four divisions, aṅgas, of the classical Indian army of infantry, cavalry, elephant corps, and chariots. See note to 6.3.24.

28. "serpents" sarpaiḥ: Cg, evidently perplexed at the strange array of mounts, remarks: "It is possible for snakes, etc., to serve as mounts, if they are very large (sarpādīnāṃ mahāśarīrāṇāṃ vāhanatvaṃ saṃbhavatīti bodhyam)."

"camels" uṣṭraiḥ: Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 201), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 174), takes the term in its less common sense of "buffalos."

"horses" aśvaiḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead caiva, "and," thus eliminating the horses from the list.

29. "intoxicated with strong drink" madotkaṭaḥ: This could also mean "intoxicated with pride or wildly excited." Translators have rendered variations on these two ideas. Our choice was governed by the fact that Kumbhakarṇa had been drinking heavily upon awakening (6.48.54,80–83). Cg glosses, "intoxicated with his natural frenzy (svābhāvikamadena mattaḥ)." Cr, however, interprets the term in its sense of "extremely fearsome (atibhayaṅkaraḥ)," in which he appears to be followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1310), who renders, "exceedingly terrible."

The meter is upendravajrā.

30. "making a huge uproar" mahānādāḥ: Literally, "having a huge sound." V1,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahāsārāḥ, "of immense strength," which is redundant in light of mahābalāḥ, "immensely powerful," which immediately follows it.

31–32. "With . . . their huge bodies" sumahākāyāḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead subahuvyāmāḥ, "many fathoms [in height]," which also must modify the rākṣasa soldiers.

"They brandished" udyamya: Literally, "having raised." The two verses do not constitute an independent syntactical unit in the original. The gerund here must be subordinated to the finite verb anvayuḥ, "behind [him] they came," of verse 30c.

"many fathoms long" bahuvyāmān: This adjective is similar to the one used in the vulgate in 31a to describe the rākṣasas. The commentators cite Amarakośa 2.6.87, which defines a vyāma as the distance between the tips of the fingers of a man's outstretched arms, i.e., a fathom. D9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead bhiṇḍi[bhindi—D9]pālān, either "short javelins" or "stones to be used with a sling." On bhiṇḍipālas, see 6.32.30; 6.42.19; 6.83.25; and notes.

33. "taking on a different form" anyad vapur ādāya: Literally, "having taken on a different body." Ck and Ct note that this form is quite different from the handsome, ornamented form mentioned in the preceding verses (athānyatsālaṅkārasaumyād anyat). Cr understands similarly.

"hair-raising" lomaharṣaṇam: Ñ2,V,B2–4,D6,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ghoradarśanam, "of terrible appearance."

34. "He was now a hundred bow lengths wide and six hundred tall." dhanuḥśataparīṇāhaḥ sa ṣaṭśatasamucchritaḥ: Literally, "he, having an expanse or circumference of one hundred bows and having a height of six hundred." Our understanding is that Kumbhakarṇa has taken a newly enlarged form for battle. The word "dhanuḥ (bow)" is one of the standard units of measurement in early India. It is equal to four hastas, or "hands," each of which measures approximately eighteen inches. This would make Kumbhakarṇa approximately 3,600 feet tall and 600 feet wide. Cr reads the pronoun sa[ḥ], "he," as the first member of the compound in the sense of "together with," yielding the sense "a hundred together with six (ṣaṭsahitaśatasaṅkhyākadhanuṣparimitocchrāyaviśiṣṭaḥ)." In other words, Cr thinks that Kumbhakarṇa is 106 bow lengths tall (approximately 3,636 feet) [and 100 wide]. These proportions would make him more or less spherical in shape. See 6.84.19 and note.

35. "arranged . . . in battle order" saṃnipatya: The gerund here, which would normally have the sense "having met together," should probably be read as an unmarked causative. Compare v.l. saṃnipātya, "having assembled, convened" (read by Ś2,D8,12,M1, and the text of Ck). We follow Ct and Ck, who gloss, "having arranged in military formation (vyūhya)." Cg, the only other commentator to address this form, glosses, "having gone near [the rākṣasas] ([rākṣasānāṃ] samīpaṃ gatvā)."

36. "one after another" bhāgaśaḥ: Literally, "in portions or part by part."

"so many moths" śalabhān: Literally, "moths."

37. "Granted" kāmam: We believe the rhetorical context supports our choice of this common sense of the adverb. Cr takes it in another of its senses, "of their own will (svecchātaḥ)." Ct and Ck, although they do not gloss kāmam in this way, suggest adding the adverb svataḥ, "of their own accord." They understand Kumbhakarṇa to be saying that the monkeys in and of themselves have not wronged the rākṣasas but are merely under Rāma's control. It is therefore Rāma alone, the root of all the wrongdoing, who should be killed. (niraparādhās te na hantavyāḥ kiṃtu rāma eva sarvāparādhamūlaṃ hantavya ity āha . . . svata iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct.)

"In fact, their kind" jātiḥ . . . sā: Literally, "this species."

"of folks like us" asmadvidhānām: Cg glosses, "[of us] who are devoted to play (krīḍāparāṇām)," to explain the rākṣasas' fondness for monkeys. Ck, similarly, describes the species of monkeys as the means of Kumbhakarṇa's amusement (me krīḍāsādhanabhūtā jātiḥ).

38. "Once he is killed, all of them will be destroyed" hate tasmin hataṃ sarvam: Literally, "when he is killed, all are killed." Cr reasons that, since Rāma is at the root of the whole affair, once he is killed, it will be as if everyone else were killed as well (tasmin mūlabhūtarāme hate sati sarvaṃ hataṃ nihatam iva bhaviṣyatīti śeṣaḥ). Cm, acknowledging the manifest meaning of the verse, also offers a true or inner meaning, whereby he suggests that the phrase sarvaṃ hatam should be repeated in order to yield the meaning: "I will slay in battle him by whom everything of ours was destroyed. Why? Because once he is slain, everything of his will be destroyed. (vastutas tu purarodhasya mūlaṃ sahalakṣmaṇo rāghavaḥ khalu sa tu tiṣṭhatu. yena sarvam asmadīyam iti śeṣaḥ. hataṃ saṃyuge vadhiṣyāmi. kutaḥ? tasmin hate tadīyaṃ sarvaṃ hataṃ syād ity āvṛttyā punaryojanīyam.)" See note to 6.27.4.

39. "the rākṣasas" rākṣasāḥ: B1,D7,9–11,G,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct (but not Cg, as mistakenly noted in the critical apparatus) read the genitive singular rakṣasaḥ, "as the rākṣasa [Kumbhakarṇa was speaking]." Ct reads the construction as a possessive genitive rather than as an absolute and feels obligated to add the words "hearing the words [of the rākṣasa]." Lacking an explicit subject, Ct is also forced to add the word "rākṣasāḥ." Translators who follow the text of Ct make similar adjustments.

"omens" nimittāni: The evil omens described in the following verses (41–44) are fairly stereotypical and are quite similar to those described above at 6.45.32–38 on the occasion of Prahasta's sortie. For a discussion of omens, see 6.4.6 and note.

41. "Extremely dreadful" ca sudāruṇāḥ: Literally, "and extremely dreadful." The reading is marked as uncertain in the critical edition, as well it should be. Ś,Ñ1,B4,D1,3,4,6–13,T2,3,G1,2,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead gardabhāruṇāḥ, "reddish brown like donkeys." Ñ2,V,B2,3,D2 read gardabhasvanāḥ, [V3,B3 -svarāḥ], "with the braying sound of donkeys." B1,D5,T1 read bhṛśa[tatra—B1]dāruṇāḥ, while Gorresio's edition (6.44.42) reads dāruṇasvarāḥ. This leaves only G3 and M5 [M4 is not recorded] as reading with the critical edition. The vast majority of northern and southern manuscripts support gardabha-, which should have been accepted. The difficilior reading would appear to be that of the vulgate, gardabhāruṇāḥ. The critical text should probably have read with the vulgate here and been marked as doubtful. See Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv.

"thundered" vineduḥ: Literally, "resounded." This reading, too, is marked as doubtful. D5–7,9–11,T,G2,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead babhūvuḥ, "they were," while Ś,D2,8–12 read viceruḥ, "they moved, drifted."

42. The howling or shrieking of beasts of prey, especially jackals, is a common ill omen. See 6.22.24; 6.31.7; 6.45.32,34; 6.83.33; 6.94.22; and notes. Cf. 6.41.32 and note.

"their mouths emitting flames" sajvālakavalair mukhaiḥ: Literally, "with mouths that had flaming mouthfuls." The idea is clearly the conventional one that these jackals are belching or vomiting flames. Compare the parallel verse and note at 6.45.34.

"wheeled in clockwise circles" maṇḍalāny apasavyāni babandhuḥ: Literally, "they bound non-left circles." Only Cr comments on the expression here, glossing, "moving to the right (dakṣiṇakramavanti)." The commentators, however, take considerable pains to explain and analyze the expression when it appears in an identical context at 6.45.33. See notes to that passage. It is curious to note that several of the translators consulted render the identical expression differently in the two passages. Thus Dutt (1893, p. 1269) translates the former occurrence as "at the right hand" but translates it here as "at the left" (p. 1311). Earlier Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 166) renders, "de gauche à droite," but here he has "à sa droite" (p. 201). Earlier Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1567) renders, "anti-clockwise," but here "right to left" (p. 1616). Pagani (1999, p. 1001) first translates, "de droite à gauche," but here she settles for "vers la gauche" (p. 1033). See translation and notes to 6.45.33. Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 22) avoids specifying the direction, rendering simply "in cerchi infausti."

43. "a vulture perched upon his lance" niṣpapāta ca gṛdhro 'sya śūle: Compare 6.45.36 and note, where a vulture settles on Prahasta's flagstaff. See, too, note to 6.45.33, where the commentators describe vultures as inauspicious birds. M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read māleva gṛdhro 'sya, "a vulture like a garland," for the critical edition's gṛdhro 'sya śūle, "a vulture . . . on his lance." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 175), the only translator to follow this reading, renders, "a vulture plunged down over his head like a garland falling." See note to 6.26.8.

44. "an ill wind began to blow" na pravāti sukho 'nilaḥ: Literally, "a pleasant wind did not blow." Given the all but invariable convention, e.g., at 6.45.35, that makes a harsh or unpleasant wind along with the crashing of meteors one of the standard ill omens in the repertory of the epic poets, we feel that a literal translation fails to convey the meaning adequately. Most of the translators consulted translate more or less literally. The exceptions are Pagani (1999, p. 1033), who translates similarly to us, "un vent néfaste se mit à souffler," and Gorresio. Gorresio's text (6.44.46) reads instead pravavau na ca mārutaḥ, "and the wind did not blow." He translates accordingly (1858, vol. 10, p. 22). See 6.4.42; 6.41.33; 6.43.8; 6.45.35; 6.65.19; and notes.

45. "fate" kṛtānta-: Literally, "that which makes the end." See note to 6.38.19.

46. "Stepping over the ramparts" laṅghayitvā prākāraṃ padbhyām: Literally, "having crossed or jumped over the rampart with his two feet. Ck and Ct note that Kumbhakarṇa proceeds on foot because of the absence of any mount capable of carrying him (tadvahanakṣamavāhanābhāvāt padbhyām iti—so Ct). Translators have understood either that Kumbhakarṇa leaps over the wall or simply passes through it. Given the extraordinary size that Kumbhakarṇa takes on in verses 33–34 above, it seems likely that the poet visualized him as simply stepping over the walls of the citadel. The majority of northern manuscripts, including the printed editions of Lahore (6.44.48) and Gorresio (6.44.48), read instead niṣkramya [nirgamya—Gorresio] puradvārāt, "going out by the city gate."

47. "who looked like a mountain" parvatopamam: Literally, "like a mountain."

48. "like a scattered mass of clouds . . . who resembled a cloud . . . roared thunderously like a cloud" dravadbhinnam ivābhrajālam . . . nanāda bhūyo ghanavad ghanābhaḥ: Literally, "[they] fleeing like a scattered mass of clouds . . . he who resembled a cloud roared repeatedly like a cloud." The poet has heavily belabored the cloud similes in this and the preceding two verses, as well as in the following verse. His choice of the word ghana, "cloud," which also coveys the sense of "density, solidity, or compactness," for Kumbhakarṇa is apparently intended to emphasize the contrast between this great dark, solid figure, and the now dispersed mass of the monkey troops.

49. "a rain-charged cloud" vāridasya: Literally, "of a giver of water." This is a common kenning for cloud.

The meter is upajāti.

50. "wielding a huge iron club" vipulaparighavān: Literally, "possessing a large iron club." The reference to Kumbhakarṇa's weapon is somewhat unclear and has caused concern among the commentators. At verses 12, 14, 29, and 43 above, the poet makes it unambiguously clear that Kumbhakarṇa is armed with a great śūla, or lance. A parigha or iron club is quite a different type of weapon. (See note to 5.3.30.) Ck and Ct appear to understand that the weapon referred to here is yet another in Kumbhakarṇa's arsenal but is, in fact, very much like a śūla (śūlavad idam apy asyāyudham). Cr glosses, "equipped with many different kinds of clubs (anekavidhaparighaviśiṣṭaḥ)." Cs offers two explanations. According to the first, the weapon Kumbhakarṇa is carrying is none other than his original lance, which Cs sees as being described here as "larger than even an iron club (vipulaṃ parighād apīti vipulaparighaṃ śūlaṃ tadvān)." For his second interpretation, Cs cites the Viśvakośa, according to which parigha is a synonym for "anger." The phrase would thus mean "filled with great anger (roṣa)." Cs then goes on to sharply criticize the positions of Ct and Cm on this point. He attacks Ct's claim that Kumbhakarṇa has a second weapon that is like a śūla, as this goes against the fact that [Kumbhakarṇa] has only one fixed weapon [here the daṇḍa, "club"] that he uses.

Ct then, according to Cs, is glossing something that is nowhere stated. Cs attacks what he takes to be Cm's argument [not clearly stated in Cm] that the adjective parighavān modifies not Kumbhakarṇa but the Lord (prabhuḥ) of pāda d, a position he describes as meaningless. Thus, Cs concludes that both of these commentators' arguments should be ignored. (idam apy asyāyudham iti nāgojibhaṭṭavyākaraṇaṃ tathā prabhuviśeṣaṇam iti tīrthavyākhyānaṃ cānuktānuvādatvena daṇḍasya niyatāyudhasya pṛthaggrahaṇān nairarthakyāc ca kramād upekṣye.)

"Lord Yama" prabhuḥ: Literally, "the lord." We follow the majority of commentators, who understand the reference to be to the god of death or universal destruction, Yama or Antaka (prabhuḥ antakaḥ—so Cg, Cm). Cs takes the term quasi-adjectivally, glossing it as "Yama, who is capable of destruction (saṃhārasamartho yamaḥ)." Ct and Ck also take the term in its adjectival sense of " powerful or capable. Ct understands that Kumbhakarṇa, in marching forth, is as mighty, that is, as fierce, as the fire at the end of a cosmic age or like Kālāgnirudra (an epithet of Śiva) (yugānte prabhuḥ kālāgnirudra iva viniḥsṛtaḥ), while Ck glosses, "angry (kruddhaḥ)." See note to 6.56.8.

"with his servants and his rod" kiṃkaradaṇḍavān: The compound is somewhat obscure in meaning and has been rendered variously by commentators and translators alike. We follow what appears to be the interpretation of Ck, who takes the underlying compound as a dvandva referring to two separate attributes of Yama: his servants (kiṃkaras) and his rod of punishment (daṇḍa). We believe that this interpretation best fits the context, because, even though it is not referred to in this specific verse, it has been made clear at verses 27–32 above that Kumbhakarṇa is accompanied by a large and fearsome retinue of rākṣasas. These troops and the great śūla or parigha he wields form the basis for the simile in which he is compared to death with his attendants and his rod. Other commentators and translators have attempted to subordinate the term kiṃkara in one way or another to daṇḍa. Cv, Cm, and Cg base their interpretation on the literal meaning of kiṃ-kara, "doing what?" i.e., a servant, and understand the daṇḍa to be a sentient or animated being, which keeps on saying, "What must I do? (kiṃ karomīty avasthāyī sacetano daṇḍaḥ tadvān)." In other words, the staff itself is the servant of the lord. Ct takes the two terms appositionally, so that the servants who engage in destruction are in effect so many rods of doom (kiṃkarāḥ saṃhāraparikarāḥ kāladaṇḍā asya santi).

Translators have treated the compound variously. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 202), in effect inverting the interpretation of Ct, renders "accompagné des fléaux, ses ministres." Pagani (1999, p. 1033) understands daṇḍa in its other sense of "punishment," offering, "accompagné des châtiments, ses serviteurs." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 175) seems to follow Cg, Cm, and Cv in rendering, "armed with the rod that works his will." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1616) similarly renders, "armed with his rod of punishment waiting upon him (in a living form) like a servant." Dutt (1893, p. 1311) fails to render kiṃkara, translating, "armed with the Fatal rod," while Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 175) drops the word daṇḍa, rendering, "accompanied by his minions."

The meter is puṣpitāgrā.

1. Before verse 1, all southern and northern manuscripts, with the exception of Ś,D1–3,8,12, include a transitional verse of the type normal to the epic in which the final action of the preceding sarga is recapitulated and the principal actor named. The southern variant is found at 1154*, a passage of two lines: "Stepping over the ramparts, enormous and mighty Kumbhakarṇa, resembling a mountain peak, swiftly left the city." The northern variant [1153*] omits the mention of Kumbhakarṇa stepping over the city wall and the comparison of him to a mountain, noting instead that he is followed by many roaring, angry rākṣasas.

"Kumbhakarṇa" saḥ: Literally, "he."

"shattering" vidhaman: Literally, "blowing apart." Cg appears to take the term in its sense of "blowing up [as with breath or bellows one does a fire]," glossing, "burning (dahan)."

2. "magnanimous Indra" maghavatā: Literally, "the magnanimous one."

3. "Vālin's son" vāliputraḥ: Ś,Ñ1,V3,B1,D1–4,6,8–13,T2,3,G3,M2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead rājaputraḥ, "the king's son."

4. "in such an access of panic" bhayatrastāḥ: Literally, "frightened with fear."

"forgetting who you are" ātmānam . . . vismṛtya: Literally, "having forgotten yourself." D7,10,11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the genitive singular ātmanaḥ, "your own," for ātmānam. This then construes with "heroic deeds (vīryāṇi)" and "noble lineage (abhijanāni)" of pāda b.

5. "gentle friends" saumyāḥ: Cs detects a note of irony here, arguing that Aṅgada is, in fact, spitefully taunting the monkeys for their gentleness [i.e., cowardice] at a moment when they should be displaying their ferocity (krauryapradarśanakāle 'pi tadaprakāśakā itīrṣyayā saṃbodhanam).

"Why are you trying to save yourselves?" kiṃ prāṇān parirakṣatha: Literally, "Are you protecting your lives?" Cs understands Aṅgada to be indicating that the monkeys' lives are worthless since they are not carrying out their master's desire (svāmikāmitākaraṇena jīvanaṃ dhig iti bhāvaḥ).

"This is no rākṣasa capable of fighting." nālaṃ yuddhāya vai rakṣaḥ: Most of the translators consulted tend to follow the interpretation of Ct, who glosses, "this rākṣasa is not able to fight with us (etad rakṣo yuddhāyāsmābhir nālaṃ na samartham)." The context, we believe, supports our interpretation, according to which Aṅgada is telling the monkeys that the ghastly apparition of Kumbhakarṇa is not, in fact, a real rākṣasa warrior. In this vein, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 176) renders, "this thing that you dread is not a Rākshasa at all, whom we have to fight . . ."

"It is just some huge scarecrow." mahatīyaṃ vibhīṣikā: Literally, "this is a huge 'frightener.' " Aṅgada is apparently speaking under the influence of the disinformation provided by Vibhīṣaṇa at 6.49.31 above, where the latter stops the panicked flight of the monkeys by having Rāma tell them that Kumbhakarṇa is not a real rākṣasa but rather "a mechanical man (yantram)." However, at verse 23 below, it appears that Aṅgada himself is fully aware of Kumbhakarṇa's identity (see note below). Cf. verse 26 below, where the monkeys do not appear to believe Aṅgada. At 6.49.31, Cg glosses yantram as bibhīṣakā, virtually the same term we find here. Here, Cg glosses, "an object to inspire fear, in the guise of an artificial man (bhayajanakaḥ kṛtrimapuruṣaveṣaḥ)."

6. "scarecrow towering amid the rākṣasas" utthitām . . . rākṣasānāṃ vibhīṣikām: Literally, "the upraised scarecrow of the rākṣasas." We follow the suggestion of Cr, who adds the adverb madhye, "in the midst," to construe with the genitive rākṣasānām. We take the participle utthitām, "towering," adjectivally as we did with the parallel participle samucchrita in the same context at 6.49.31. Other translators have rendered the phrase variously. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 203), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 176) and Pagani (1999, p. 1034), understands the term vibhīṣikā in its sense of "terror" rather than a physical object. Roussel translates, "Cette immense frayeur que 'inspirent les Rākshasas." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 176) reads the genitive rākṣasānām as if it were an instrumental, construing it with the passive participle utthitām, and renders, "which the Rākshasas have raised." Dutt (1893, p. 1312) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1617) read utthitām as an active participle of an intransitive verb, rendering, respectively, "this fearful phenomenon of the Rākshasas that hath presented itself" and "this nightmare of the ogres, come into being."

7. "When . . . had been reassured" samāśvāsya: Literally, "having reassured." The syntax requires that the causative gerund be read here either as a simplex or as a passive. D5,7,T1,G3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators substitute the simplex samāśvasya, "having regained their composure," while some northern texts, including that of Gorresio, substitute the passive participle samāśvastāḥ, "comforted, reassured."

"with trees and boulders in hand" vṛkṣādrihastāḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vṛkṣān gṛhītvā, "having seized trees."

8. "in a rage . . . wildly enraged" saṃkruddhāḥ . . . paramakruddhāḥ: Cg and Cr propose different strategies for avoiding the apparent redundancy. Cg, whom we follow, specifies that paramakruddhāḥ, "wildly enraged," is an adjective modifying the elephants of the simile. Cr, who, along with Ct, reads saṃrabdhāḥ, "agitated, inflamed, enraged," for saṃkruddhāḥ, "in a rage," takes both adjectives to refer to the monkeys but suggests that the latter were inflamed precisely because they were wildly enraged (paramakruddhā ata eva saṃrabdhāḥ).

"immensely powerful" mahābalāḥ: The texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead the singular mahābalaḥ. This fact is unnoted in the critical apparatus (which notes only T2 reading this variant). Ct and Cr read with the critical text. Cg and Cm, reading the singular, must then construe it with Kumbhakarṇa, the unnamed subject of the verb kampate, "he was [not] shaken," in verse 9, pāda b. Dutt (1893, p. 1312), who reads the plural with Ct, is evidently disturbed by it and notes, "Mahavalāh—plu—evidently a misprint for mahavalah—sing."

9. "into hundreds of pieces" śataśaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bahavaḥ, "many."

10. "that has flared up" utthitaḥ: Literally, "sprung up."

11. "like crimson-blossomed trees" tāmrapuṣpā iva drumāḥ: Compare 6.55.22 and note.

12. "did not watch where they were going" nāvalokayan: Literally, "they did not look." Commentators differ somewhat as to the exact sense of the verb. Ct, whom we more or less follow, glosses, "they did not look before them or behind them (agraprṛṣṭhadeśaṃ nālokitavantaḥ)." Cr believes that the monkeys did not even look at their kinsmen and that is why some of them fell into the sea. (nāvalokayann avālokayan svajanān apīti śeṣaḥ. ata eva kecit samudre patitāḥ.) Cg believes that the monkeys simply look back (pṛṣṭhadeśam ity arthaḥ). Translations vary similarly.

13. "immensely powerful" balīyasā: D10,11,G, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ca līlayā, "with ease or playfully," referring to the manner with which Kumbhakarṇa is able to decimate the monkey host.

14. "fled down to the shore" sthalāni tathā nimnam: Literally, "to places and depression(s)" The phrase is both elliptical, in that it contains no verb, and ambiguous in its meaning. The commentators, with whom we agree, suggest supplying [or bringing down from 13d] the verb "they fled (dudruvuḥ)" or "they had recourse to (āśritāḥ—so Cg)." Commentators and translators are divided as to how exactly to understand the terms sthalāni and nimnam. Cg understands the former term to refer either to regions that are highly suitable for flight (atidhāvanayogyān deśān) or elevated places (unnatadeśān). The latter construes well with nimnam, if we take that in the sense of "low lands or hollows." The sense would then be that the monkeys fled high and low. This is slightly problematic because of the lack of number parallelism between sthalān in the plural and nimnam in the singular.

Another way to read the phrase, proposed by Cr, is to take nimnam adverbially so that the fleshed-out phrase would mean "[They ran] downward [to the sthalas] (nimnaṃ yathā bhavati tathā dudruvur iti śeṣaḥ)." Cr remains silent, however, as to exactly what is meant by sthalān here. The term can mean, as Cg proposes, "high ground," but that clearly makes no sense if we read nimnam adverbially. The word sthala most frequently refers to firm or dry land as opposed to jala, "water." Given the context and what we know of the topography of Laṅkā, we believe the term is best taken here in its sense of "shore or shoreline." The idea would be that the monkeys, running blindly, would naturally run down from the higher elevations of Mount Trikūṭa, where the city of Laṅkā is located, until they are stopped in any direction by the encircling sea.

Translators struggle with the verse, offering variations on the above possibilities. Thus Dutt (1893, p. 1313) offers, "darted into downs." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 204) appears to take the two terms together in the sense of valley, i.e., low areas, translating, "par les vallées." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 177), who renders, "escaped to the valleys." Pagani (1999, p. 1034) offers, "couraient sur la terre ferme vers les vallées." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 176) renders, "took refuge in depressions." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1618), who understands nimnam adverbially as we do, renders, "[they rushed toward] the plains, taking a downward course." Some northern manuscripts, including the printed texts of Gorresio (6.45.23) and Lahore (6.45.22), in what can be taken as an attempt to gloss or rationalize, read ca nimnāni, for tathā nimnam. This yields a sense similar to that proposed by Cg as one of his alternatives, viz., "to high and low grounds." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 24) translates, "forre e balze."

"Some apes" ṛkṣāḥ: Most other translators who share this reading render "bears." The only exception is Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 204), who, as usual, leaves such terms untranslated. On the identity of ṛkṣas, see 6.4.17 and note. See, too, 1.16.10 and note; and R. Goldman 1989. Cf. 6.55.42 and note.

15. "Some of them plunged into the sea, while others took refuge in caves." mamajjur arṇave kecid guhāḥ kecit samāśritāḥ: D1,9–12,T3, and the printed editions of Ct and Cr omit this half verse (15ab).

"sank down" niṣeduḥ: Cg understands that the monkeys "remained still on the ground as if fallen (bhūmau patitā iva tasthuḥ)." Presumably, he understands that the monkeys are feigning death or unconsciousness. Ñ1,D6,9–11,T2,G2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead nipetuḥ, "they fell down." Ct suggests that we supply the words "in order to fight (yuddhārtham iti śeṣaḥ)."

Following verse 15, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1161*]: "Some of them fell to the ground, while others lay unconscious [lit., slept] as if dead."

Although the critical editors ascribe this verse to the entire southern recension, the editors of the printed editions of the text of Cg (KK and VSP) seem uncomfortable with it. Therefore, it is bracketed after 6.66.19cd in KK and after 6.66.18cd in VSP.

16. "had broken ranks" bhagnān: Literally, "were broken."

17. "I can see no safe place for you" na paśyāmi . . . sthānam: Literally, "I do not see a place." We follow Ct and Ck, who gloss, "support, stability (pratiṣṭhām)." The idea, as expressed by Ct and Ck, is that, even if the monkeys escape Kumbhakarṇa, Sugrīva will surely execute them for leaving without his orders (sugrīvājñāṃ vinā gatānāṃ vadha eva sarvatheti bhāvaḥ—so Ct). Sugrīva's reputation as a harsh ruler is established at 4.52.21–30, where the southern search party chooses suicide rather than face his wrath over their failure to accomplish their mission.

"the earth itself" mahīm imām: Literally, "this earth."

18. "Nothing can hinder your progress and your valor." asaṃgagatipauruṣāḥ: Literally, "O you whose motion and valor are unobstructed." The commentators (Cr, Ct, Ck, and Cg) generally agree that the term is a vocative referring to the monkeys. However, only Cr and Cg attempt to explain the compound's meaning. The former offers two alternatives. Cr first reads the compound to mean "you whose progress and valor are not to be hindered by your enemies (na saṅgau ripubhiḥ prāpyau gatipauruṣau yeṣām)." Cr also proposes a second alternative in which the compound refers to the wives of the monkeys and has the sense "by whom your progress and valor are not recognized (na saṅgau jñātau gatipauruṣau yaiḥ)." Cg appears to give no value to the term -gati- "motion, progress, gait," glossing, simply, "you whose valor is unobstructed (apratibaddhapauruṣāḥ)." Translators vary in their renderings. Dutt (1893, p. 1313) appears to understand the term to mean "cowards," translating, "Ye poltroons." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 204), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 177) and Pagani (1999, p. 1035), construes the compound with the adjective nirāyudhānām, "weaponless," understanding that the monkeys drop their weapons so as not to be impeded in their flight, "Soldats qui fuyez sans armes pour ne pas être gênés dans votre course." This interpretation is not persuasive, especially in light of 5.49.13, where the compound asaṃgagatiḥ, "whose progress is unhindered," serves as a general epithet of the monkeys. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 177) follows Cg in omitting the term -gati-, rendering, "You, whose prowess knows no check." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1618) understands as we do, rendering, "O monkeys! whose movement or valour knows no obstruction."

"weaponless" nirāyudhānām: The reference is presumably to the fact that monkeys would have dropped their weapons in their flight. This is the understanding of Ct and Ck, who gloss, "devoid of their weapons, such as stones, trees, etc. (pāṣāṇavṛkṣādyāyudharahitānām)." Cs, however, appears to think that the monkeys' dishonor lies in their fleeing unmarked by the weapons loosed by their enemies, glossing, "not marked by the weapons released by their enemies (ripumuktāyudhānaṅkitānām)."

"But though you will have survived" tu jīvatām: Literally, "But, of [you] who are alive." D10,11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, Cs, and Cr read instead sujīvatām[-inām—M3], "of those who live well." Translators who follow the text of Ct render this as "men of honor, good men or those who live an easy life, etc." It should be noted, however, that Ck and Ct, despite the reading of their texts, seem to know only the term jīvatām. Only Cs glosses this reading, offering, "possessing good or virtuous lives (sajjīvavatām)."

19. "you . . . all" sarve: Literally, "all." Cg thinks that Añgada wishes to include himself and so adds the pronoun "we (vayam)."

"contemptible" anāryāḥ: Literally, "ignoble or non-aryan." Ct and Ck gloss, "rebellious against your master (svāmidrohiṇaḥ)."

Following 19 ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1165*]: "Where are you going, overcome with fear, like ordinary tawny monkeys?"

20. "great" mahānti: Cg, the only commentator to read with the critical edition, glosses, "numerous (bhūyāṃsi)." D10,11,G3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead hitāni, "beneficial." Ck and Ct gloss, "beneficial to your master (svāmihitakarāṇi)." Cr understands similarly (svāmihitakārakatvasūcakāni). GPP and NSP (6.66.22d) read, perhaps in error, hatāni, "destroyed, killed, ruined," a reading attested in the critical apparatus only in Ñ2.

"that we heard . . . in the public assembly" janasaṃsadi: Literally, "in the assembly of the people."

22. Ck, Cs, and Ct note that here Añgada is expressing the sentiment, famously stated by Lord Kṛṣṇa at Bhagavadgītā 2.37, that a virtuous warrior wins heaven if slain in battle and conquers the earth if he is victorious (hato vā prāpsyasi svargaṃ jitvā vā bhokṣyase mahīm).

"our life spans being short" alpajīvitāḥ: Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 177) differs from us and the other translations consulted in understanding this as a general observation. He translates, "life is short in any case."

"we would have died" nihatāḥ: Literally, "slain."

"then, since we would have died in battle, we would attain the world of Brahmā, so difficult to reach" duṣprāpaṃ brahmalokaṃ vā prāpnumo yudhi sūditāḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr, Ct and Ck read instead prāpnuyāmo brahmalokaṃ duṣprāpaṃ ca kuyodhibhiḥ, "We would attain the world of Brahmā, impossible for cowards to attain."

Following verse 22, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1167*]: "Then, monkeys, we shall enjoy[1] our reward,[2] life[3] in the world of heroes.[4]"

[1]"we shall enjoy" bhokṣyāmaḥ: G2,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Cv, Cm, Crā, and Cg read instead the somewhat obscure mokṣyāmaḥ, "we shall release or set free." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 177), the only translator to render this reading, translates, "we shall . . . earn [the merit] that shall take us to the worlds of bliss when we die." Ct notes that the reading of Cm et al. is both inauthentic and meaningless. (pāṭho 'pāñktaḥ. nāpi tatrārthasāmañjasyam.)

[2]"reward" vasu: Literally, "wealth." Ct and Ck understand this to be "the bliss arising from Hiraṇyagarbha (dhanaṃ hiraṇyagarbhabhūm ānandam)." Cs glosses, "pleasures (bhogyam)."

[3]"life" jīvitam: D10,11,G1,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, Cs, and Cr read instead nihatāḥ, "slain."

[4]"in the world of heroes" vīralokasya: Literally, "of the world of heroes." The name conjures up the image of a kind of Indian Elysian fields or Valhalla, and, indeed, Ct and Ck refer to this as a world obtained by heroes who pass through the doorway of the sun. However, in order to avoid contradiction with the preceding verse, all commentators equate this world with the world of Brahmā, a region not normally attained merely through death in battle (vīraiḥ sūryadvārā prāpyasya brahmalokasya—so Ct, Ck). See Bṛhadāraṇyakopaniṣad 6.2.15–16, where the path of the sun leads to the immortal world of the gods.

23. "Kumbhakarṇa" kumbhakarṇaḥ: There seems to be a contradiction here between Aṅgada's recognition of the rākṣasa hero and his assertion at verse 5 above that he is a mere scarecrow. Either the poet has nodded or he wants to represent Aṅgada, like Vibhīṣaṇa at 6.49.31, as lying to the troops in order to prevent their flight.

24. "renowned" uddiṣṭāḥ: Literally, "pointed out, held up for illustration." We agree with Ct, Cr, and Cg in understanding the term in its sense of "accounted among great heroes (mahāvīreṣu gaṇitāḥ—so Ct)," "known among heroes (vīreṣu khyātāḥ—so Cr)," or, "pointed out or named (vyapadiṣṭāḥ—so Cg)." Cm, however, takes the term in the negative sense of "singled out or pointed to by people because of their cowardly flight (uddiṣṭā ete palāyitā iti janair nirdiṣṭāḥ). This interpretation is offered as an alternative by Ct.

"by a single warrior" ekena: Literally, "by one."

25. "Aṅgada of the golden armlets" aṅgadaṃ kanakāṅgadam: This is yet another of Vālmīki's echoing or etymological epithets. Cg attempts to make the epithet more suitable to the narrative context by stating that, in his excess of excitement or energy, Aṅgada is displaying his golden armlets (utsāhātiśayena prakāśitasvarṇāṅgadam). Presumably, the idea is that Aṅgada has raised or is waving about his arms. See 6.57.78; 6.116.67; and notes. Cf. 6.52.19 and note.

26. "The rākṣasa Kumbhakarṇa" kumbhakarṇena rakṣasā: Clearly, the monkeys are not taken in by Aṅgada's claim that the giant rākṣasa is merely a scarecrow. See verse 5 and note above; and note to verse 23.

"time to stand our ground" sthānakālaḥ: Literally, "time to stand."

"We value our lives; so" dayitaṃ jīvitaṃ hi naḥ: Literally, "for life is dear to us."

27. "Having said this much" etāvad uktvā vacanam: Literally, "having spoken speech to such an extent."

"the advancing rākṣasa" āyāntam: Literally, "him who was advancing."

"fled in all directions" bhejire diśah: Literally, "they had recourse to the directions."

28. "with . . . respectful words" bahumānaiḥ: Literally, "with respects." The reading is subject to considerable variation among the manuscripts and printed editions. Most northern manuscripts, as well as a number of southern manuscripts, including those of the southern commentators, and all printed editions except Gorresio, read instead anumānaiḥ, literally, "with inferences, arguments." The southern commentators take this to refer to Aṅgada's adduction of a variety of Rāma's earlier feats of martial valor, which are supposed to inspire confidence in his ability to defeat Kumbhakarṇa. Translations that follow the texts of the southern commentators render this variation. The text of Gorresio (6.45.39) reads instead abhimānaiḥ, "with proud words." This reading is not attested in the critical apparatus.

"those . . . wrinkle-faced monkeys" valīmukhāḥ: Literally, "the wrinkle-faced ones." Vālmīki occasionally uses this kenning for monkey. Translators either use the generic terms "apes or monkeys" or ignore it altogether. See 6.55.2; 6.57.49; 6.83.41; 6.85.2; and notes.

Following verse 28, D5–7,9–11,T,1,2,G,M insert a passage of two lines [1168*]: "Their enthusiasm restored by the wise son of Vālin, all the monkey troop leaders then stood fast, awaiting their orders."

29. This verse is omitted from Ñ1,M5,D9–11, and the texts of Ct, Ck, and Cr, as well as NSP. GPP includes the verse but notes that it is an additional verse in Cg's text. The verse is also omitted from Gorresio's text, although this fact is not noted in the critical apparatus. Ck complains about the impropriety of placing a sarga break between 6.54.28 and 6.55.1, arguing that there is no reason to do so since there is no break in the story line and [since his text omits verse 29] no change in meter (atra ca sargam avacchindantīdam apy ayuktam ekaprakaraṇatvād vṛttabhedarahitatvāc ca). Ct paraphrases this argument of Ck in his introductory remarks to the next sarga.

"Hanumān, the son of Vāyu" -vāyuputra-: Literally, "the son of Vāyu." Cm and Cg are quick to defend the honor of the mighty Hanumān, noting that, despite his inclusion in this list of would-be deserters, he was not among those who had actually tried to flee. They argue that we are to understand that Hanumān has merely met up with the returning group of monkey officers and has now turned back with them to fight Kumbhakarṇa. (atra vāyuputras tu na palāyya nivṛttaḥ. kiṃtv ṛṣabhādibhir militvā kumbhakarṇena saha yuddhārthaṃ nivṛtta iti jñeyam.)

"turned and headed back to the battlefield" -abhimukhaṃ raṇaṃ prayātāḥ: Literally, "facing [they] proceeded to the battlefield." GPP's reading, gaṇaṃ preyātāḥ, doubtless is the result of typographical errors.

The meter is puṣpitāgrā.

1. "resigning themselves to death" naiṣṭhikīṃ buddhim āsthāya: Literally, "having recourse to a state of mind that was associated with niṣṭhā." Commentators and translators differ in their interpretation of this phrase, depending on which of the meanings of the term niṣṭhā they find relevant here. Of the several meanings of the term, two are at issue: one is "firmness, fixity, determination" and the other is "finality, death, destruction." Ct and Ck gloss, "firm (sthirām)," and Cr, "resolute, unmoving (acalām)." Thus, translators who follow the text of Ct understand the phrase to mean "making a firm *o*r fixed resolution." Cg and Cm gloss, "destruction, death (nāśaḥ)," and understand that the monkeys are resolved to die. (naiṣṭhikīṃ niṣṭhā nāśas tatsaṃbandhinīm. maraṇavyavasāyinīm ity arthaḥ—so Cg.) Both interpretations are plausible. We, however, have chosen that of Cg and Cm for two reasons: first, because of the general tenor of this and the preceding sarga; and second, specifically because of the references in verse 3 below, where the monkeys are said to be resigned to their death and to have given up their lives (maraṇe kṛtaniścayāḥ . . . tyaktajīvitāḥ).

2. "the wrinkle-faced monkeys" valīmukhāḥ: Literally, "the wrinkle-faced ones." See 6.54.28; 6.57.49; 6.83.41; 6.85.2; and notes. B2,D10,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the adjective balīyasā, "powerful, mighty," which then modifies Aṅgada.

"incited to valor" samudīritavīryāḥ: Literally, "whose valor was stimulated." Ct, Cm, Cr, and Cg take the adjective samudīrita in its sense of "uttered, recited" and understand the compound to mean "those who had proclaimed their own previous feats of valor (kathitātmīyaprākparākramā ity arthaḥ—so Cm)."

3. "resigned to death . . . heedless of their lives" maraṇe kṛtaniścayāḥ . . . tyaktajīvitāḥ: Literally, "who had made a resolution with regard to death . . . who had abandoned their lives." Cg understands the second adjective to be the cause of the first and glosses, "who were devoid of any hope of living (jīvanāśārahitāḥ)." Cr understands the causal relationship to be the other way around. He takes tyaktajīvitāḥ in a technical sense, glossing, "having abandoned such activities as eating, etc. (parityaktabhojanādivyāpārāḥ)."

5. "struck at" ardayan: Literally, "striking, afflicting." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead dharṣayan, "assailing, being arrogant." Cr glosses, "demonstrating his skill (svaprāgalbhyaṃ prakaṭayan)."

"sending . . . flying in all directions" samantād vyākṣipat: Literally, "he tossed or scattered [them] all around."

6. "Struck down" pothitāḥ: The word is subject to numerous variants according to the critical edition. D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead tāḍitāḥ, "struck, struck down."

"in groups of seven and eight hundred, and even in groups of thousands" śatāni sapta cāṣṭau ca sahasrāṇi ca: Literally, "seven hundreds and eight and thousands." As is often the case in Sanskrit, the total number of enumerated items can be ambiguous. The sequence of numbers here has been read by various translators as "seven hundred, eight hundred, and thousands" or "eight thousand seven hundred." In light of the way the numbers are used in the following verse to indicate discretely numbered groups of monkeys as well as the repetition of the copulative "and (ca)" three times, we are inclined to agree with Cg. He understands that a single blow or action on the part of Kumbhakarṇa has felled the monkeys in groups of a hundred, etc. (kumbhakarṇasyaikena vyāpareṇa śatādisaṅgharūpeṇa patitā ity arthaḥ).

7. "sweeping up groups of monkeys—sixteen, eight, ten, twenty, and thirty at a time" ṣoḍaśāṣṭau ca daśa ca viṃśat triṃśat tathaiva ca / parikṣipya: Literally, "having embraced or having encircled sixteen and eight and ten and twenty and thirty as well." For a discussion of the numbers, see note to verse 6 above.

Following verse 7, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of fourteen lines [1175*]: "Rallied with great difficulty, the tawny monkeys regrouped and took their stand once more in the forefront of the battle, with trees and mountains in their hands.[1–2] Then, ripping up a mountain, that bull among leaping monkeys Dvivida hurled himself, like a low-hanging cloud, upon [Kumbhakarṇa], who looked like a mountain peak.[3–4] Having torn it up, the monkey hurled it at Kumbhakarṇa. But, failing to reach that huge [rākṣasa], it fell upon his army.[5–6] That huge mountain[1] crushed horses, elephants, and chariots, while yet another mountain peak [crushed] the other rākṣasas.[7–8] Struck by the impact of that mountain, the vast battlefield was drenched with the blood of the rākṣasas, its horses and chariots destroyed.[9–10] With dreadful cries, the chariot-warriors swiftly struck off the heads of the bellowing monkey leaders with arrows that resembled Kāla, the ender of all things.[11–12] But the great monkeys, for their part, tore up huge trees and crushed chariots, horses, elephants, camels, and rākṣasas.[13–14]"

[1]"That huge mountain" nagottamaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the accusative plural gajottamān, "best or most splendid of elephants," which then construes with the list of things and creatures crushed [by the mountain].

8. "many different kinds of trees" vṛkṣāṃś ca vividhān bahūn: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead śilāś ca vividhān drumān, "rocks and various trees."

9. "deflected" babhañja: Literally, "he broke, broke up."

10. "directly in the path" asya . . . purastāt: Literally, "before him."

The meter is upajāti.

11. "the enraged monkey" kupitaḥ; Literally, "the angry one."

"the blood-spattered rākṣasa" rudhirāvasiktaḥ: Literally, "the blood-spattered one."

The meter is upajāti.

12. "and resembled a mountain, its highest peak in flames" giriṃ yathā prajvalitāgraśṛṅgam: Ñ,V,B4,T2,G1,2,M1,2,5 read the nominative girir yathā prajvalitāgraśṛṅgaḥ, substituting the nominatives for the accusatives of the critical reading. This reading appears to make better rhetorical sense, since it compares the dark mountainous rākṣasa Kumbhakarṇa hurling his flaming lance to a volcanic mountain with flames shooting from its summit. GPP and NSP (6.67.19) mix the figure by putting giriḥ in the nominative and reading the accusative prajvalitāgniśṛṅgam, "with a summit with blazing fire," which would, of course, have to modify the lance. Translations offer various solutions based on these different readings.

"full in the chest" bāhvantare: Literally, "between his arms." Cf. verses 44 and 65 below.

"as Guha . . . Mount Krauñca" guho 'calaṃ krauñcam iva: The story of how Guha, also known as Skanda, pierced Mount Krauñca, thus liberating the asura Krauñca, is narrated at Mahābhārata 3.186.112ff. and 13.166.30ff. See, too, 4.42.24. Geese and vultures fly to Mount Meru through the hole made by Guha's javelin (MBh 7.114.82). Vālmīki is fond of using this image to describe the wounding of a great warrior by a sharp weapon; see 6.47.38; 6.51.19; and notes.

The meter is upajāti.

13. "from his mouth" mukhāt: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ruṣā, "with anger."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

14. "in the midst of battle" saṃyati: Literally, "in the battle."

The meter is upajāti.

Following verse 14, D5–7,9–11,S (except G3) insert a passage of one line [1178*]: "Then mighty Nīla, calming his troops . . ."

15. "Nīla then hurled" nīlaś cikṣepa: D5,7,9–11,T1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, which have already introduced Nīla in their insert 1178*, read instead pravicikṣepa, "he hurled."

"but the latter struck it" tam . . . abhijaghāna: Literally, "he struck it."

16. "shooting forth sparks and flames" savisphuliṅgañ sajvālam: Literally, "with sparks, with flames."

18. "immensely powerful monkeys" mahābalāḥ: Literally, "those of great strength."

"battered . . . on all sides" sarvato 'bhinijaghnire: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead nijaghnuḥ sarvato yudhi, "they battered on all sides in battle." T2,G3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read [a]bhipradudruvuḥ, "they rushed or ran," for the critical text's [a]bhinijaghnire, "they battered."

19. "felt to him like mere caresses" sparśān iva prahārāṃs tān vedayānaḥ: Literally, "experiencing those blows as if touches." Cr, Ct, and Ck all understand the touches to be like those of garlands, flowers, etc. (puṣpamālādisaṃyogān iva—so Cr). Cg understands that they are like pleasurable contact, that is, like pleasant pressing or massage (sukhasparśān iva sukhamardanam iva). According to Dutt's note (1893, p. 1316), Rāmānuja (Crā) understands, "like the feel of wreaths, unguents, etc."

"He crushed . . . with both arms." bāhubhyāṃ pariṣasvaje: Literally, "he embraced with his two arms."

20. "blood oozing from his mouth" pramukhāgataśoṇitaḥ: Literally, "with blood come to or from his mouth." The upasarga pra placed at the beginning of the compound is unusual and difficult to construe. Commentators propose two solutions, neither of which seems entirely convincing. Ct, Ck, and Cr read pra as an abbreviation of the adverb prakarṣeṇa, "to a high degree or great extent," and understand that blood is flowing copiously from Ṛṣabha's mouth. M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead pra mukhād vāntaśoṇitaḥ, "vomiting blood from his mouth." Cg cites Pā 1.4.82 vyavahitāś ca in support of his contention that here we have a vedic usage in which an upasarga may be separated from a verbal form and may precede or follow it. Cg thus construes the upasarga with the principal verb in the sentence, nipapāta, "he fell down, collapsed." (preti chedaḥ. mukhād vāntaśoṇitaḥ praṇipapātety anvayaḥ. vyavahitāś cety upasargasya vyavahitaprayogaḥ.) One problem here is that the resultant form, praṇipapāta, normally would have the sense "he bowed down, offered obeisance," which hardly suits the context. See note to 6.75.16.

21. "Kumbhakarṇa, Indra's foe" indraripuḥ: Literally, "the foe of Indra."

Following verse 21, M1–3 and the printed texts of Cg and Cm read a passage of one line [1182*]: "And in a rage, he swiftly struck Gandhamādana with his foot."

Despite the statement in the critical apparatus that this line is found in the vulgate, it belongs properly only to the textual tradition of Cg, and thus it appears in KK (6.67.30ab) and VSP (6.67.30ab). The line appears after verse 28 in GPP (=6.67.29ab), with the notation that it is additional in the text of Cg (idam ardham adhikam go). In the text of the Gita Press, the verse appears as 6.67.28ef. It is not found in NSP. Because of its peculiar attestation in the printed versions of the southern text, it is rendered in the translations only of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 180), Pagani (1999, p. 1037), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1622).

22. "kiṃśuka trees" kiṃśukāḥ: The red blossoms of the tree make it one of Vālmīki's favorite objects of comparison for a bleeding warrior. See 6.35.9; 6.60.34; 6.62.19; 6.67.33; 6.76.28; and notes. Cf. 6.54.11.

23. "When those . . . had fallen" patiteṣu: Ś2,Ñ,V,B2,D3,4,9–13,T2,3,G1,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the causative pātiteṣu, "among those struck down."

24. "And . . . mighty" ca mahābalāḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead plavagarṣabhāḥ, "bulls among leaping monkeys," a repetition of the same epithet that occurs in pāda b. Among the commentators who have this reading, only Cr takes note of the redundancy. He explains it by reading the two epithets as belonging to separate clauses, a relative and correlative (śailābhā ye plavagarṣabhāḥ te plavagarṣabhāḥ śailam iva taṃ kumbhakarṇam samāruhya dadaṃśuḥ). Most translators who follow this reading drop one of the terms. Dutt (1893, p. 1316) notes the repetition and that he has left out one of the terms from his translation.

25. "gigantic" mahākāyam: D6,7,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahābāhum, "great-armed."

"with . . . knees" jānubhiḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bāhubhiḥ, "with their arms."

26. "who already resembled a mountain, now looked like one" parvatopamaḥ / rarāja . . . giriḥ . . . iva: Literally, "who was like a mountain, resembled a mountain."

27. "mighty rākṣasa" mahābalaḥ: Literally, "the mighty one."

28. "crammed . . . until they came out" prakṣiptāḥ . . . nirjagmuḥ: Literally, "tossed . . . they came out." As indicated by our translation, we believe that the idea of the verse is that Kumbhakarṇa has stuffed so many monkeys into his mouth that they overflow through his other orifices.

"into his mouth—as wide as the underworld Pātāla" vaktre pātālasaṃnibhe: The phrase is identical to the one at 6.48.50. Compare 6.48.23.

"his nose and ears" nāsāpuṭābhyām . . . karṇābhyāṃ caiva: Literally, "through two nostrils [lit., nose cavities] and two ears." Pagani (1999, p. 1038), alone among the translators, appears to read nāsāpuṭābhyām as a dvandva in the sense of "nose and eyelid," rendering, "par le nez, les paupières, les oreilles." This is improbable on both syntactic and semantic grounds.

29. "in his towering rage, the furious" bhṛśasaṃkruddhaḥ . . . saṃkruddhaḥ: Literally, "extremely enraged . . . enraged." The commentators ignore the redundancy.

"routed the entire monkey host" babhañja vānarān sarvān: Literally, "broke all the monkeys." Cg, the only commentator to address the verb babhañja, "he broke," construes it with the participle bhakṣayan, "devouring." He then interprets the phrase to mean that Kumbhakarṇa broke up the monkeys in order to eat them (bhakṣaṇārthaṃ babhañjety arthaḥ). This interpretation is followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 180), who renders, "He crumbled up the apes in his hands to eat them." Pagani (1999, p. 1038) understands, "il les anéantissait." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1623) offers, "mutilated." Others translate, simply, "broke" or "broke down." We believe, however, that the poet uses the verb $\sqrt{bhañj}$ here in the same sense in which he has used it in the preceding sarga (6.54.17,24), that is, "to break up or rout [an army]." This reading also seems to us to better suit the syntax of the verse. Cf. note to verse 113 below. See, too, 6.44.7; 6.68.24; 6.84.13–14; 6.87.8; and notes.

30. "frenzied" mūrcchitaḥ [mūrchitaḥ—so crit. ed.]: Literally, "stupefied, in a daze." Cr, the only commentator to remark on the term, glosses, "augmented, grown great (pravṛddhaḥ)." This is followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1623). Other translators have taken the word in a variety of its senses. Dutt (1893, p. 1317) renders, "transported with passion." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 180) has "raging." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 28) renders, "insano." Roussel, followed by Shastri and Pagani, appears to ignore the term.

31. "In that battle" tasmin: Literally, "in that." V3,D6,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and the printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead yuddhe, "in the battle," while the printed editions of Cg and Cm (KK and VSP) read saṃkhye, "in the battle."

33. "their troops decimated and their leaders slain" hatayūthā vināyakāḥ: Literally, "their troops slain, their leaders gone." The term vināyakāḥ must be read as proposed by Cg, who glosses, "whose leaders are gone (vigatanāyakāḥ)," and not in its normal lexical senses of "a remover of obstacles or leader." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read plavaṅgamāḥ, "leaping monkeys," for vināyakāḥ.

"loudly and discordantly" visvaraṃ bhṛśam: Ñ1,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vikṛtaiḥ svaraiḥ, "with unnatural or discordant sounds."

34. "despairing" khinnacetasaḥ: Literally, "with dejected minds." Although it is not recorded in the critical apparatus, the printed editions of Ct (GPP and NSP 5.67.41, as well as Gita Press 5.67.41) read bhinnacetasaḥ, "broken-hearted."

Following verse 34, D5–7,10,11,T,G1,2,M3, and the texts of the southern commentators insert a passage of eighteen lines [1186*]: "Seeing that the monkeys were routed, [Aṅgada], the son of the son of Indra, wielder of the vajra, swiftly charged Kumbhakarṇa in that great battle.[1–2] Seizing a huge mountain peak and roaring again and again, so as to terrify all the rākṣasa followers of Kumbhakarṇa, he hurled that mountain peak at Kumbhakarṇa's head.[3–5] Then, struck in the head by that mountain, [Kumbhakarṇa], Indra's foe,[1] blazed up in a towering rage.[6–7] With a mighty roar, terrifying all the monkeys, [Kumbhakarṇa] swiftly charged Vālin's furious son.[8–9] In his fury, the immensely powerful [rākṣasa] hurled his lance at Aṅgada.[10] But that mighty bull among monkeys, skilled in the ways of battle, saw it flying toward him and, by means of his agility, dodged it.[11–12] Then, leaping up, he struck [Kumbhakarṇa] on the chest with the palm of his hand. When the latter, who was like a mountain, was struck by him, he was beside himself with rage.[13–14] Regaining his composure, the immensely powerful rākṣasa clenched his fist and, with a mocking laugh, let it fly so that [Aṅgada] fell unconscious.[15–16] Once that bull among leaping monkeys had fallen to the ground unconscious, [Kumbhakarṇa] recovered his lance and charged at Sugrīva.[17–18]"

[1]"Then . . . by that mountain, [Kumbhakarṇa], Indra's foe: śailenendraripus tadā: D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead giriśṛṅgeṇa mūrdhani, "with the mountain peak on the head."

36. "the great monkey" mahākapiḥ: V3,B4,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahābalaḥ, "immensely powerful."

37. "his every limb unscathed" vivṛtasarvāṅgaḥ: The word vivṛta- most commonly has the sense "manifested, clear." We understand it in the sense in which it is noted in Apte (s.v. meaning 10), that is, "unhurt, woundless." The reading of the critical edition, although well attested, does not appear in any of the texts that have served as the basis for the translations consulted. Ñ2,V,B1,3,4,D1,6,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read vivṛtta-, normally, "turning, whirling," for vivṛta-, "unhurt, woundless." Translators who follow the text of Ct have generally rendered the compound as "with stretched or braced limbs." Ś,Ñ1,B2,D2,4,5,12,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead vikṛta-, "deformed, distorted." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 181), the only translator to render this variant, translates, "his body bearing the marks of injuries all over." The critical reading, vivṛta-, could also be understood to mean "with all his limbs spread out or extended," although to us this seems to make even less sense than the meaning we have offered.

39. The four actions credited to Kumbhakarṇa are simply listed with no logical or syntactical hierarchy or subordination. Cr, the only commentator to treat this verse, structures it as follows: "You have struck down heroes and devoured troops. Therefore, you have performed an impossibly difficult feat, and for that reason you have gained the highest renown (tvayā vīrāḥ pātitāḥ sainyāni ca bhakṣitāny ata eva suduṣkaraṃ karma kṛtam ata eva paramaṃ yaśas te tvayā prāptam)." Translators vary in their structuring of the verse.

"our troops" sainyāni: Literally, "troops."

40. "common soldiers" prākṛtaiḥ: Literally, "with common or ordinary ones."

"Now try to withstand" sahasva: Literally, "withstand, endure." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 209) has given the second half of the verse an idiosyncratic rendering that seems impossible to derive from the text. He translates, "Contente-toi de me tuer, ô Rākshasa, toi qui as l'air d'une montagne." In this he has been followed by Pagani (1999, p. 1039) (same wording as Roussel). Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 181) appears to have rendered the Sanskrit correctly and then followed his translation with a rendering of Roussel, yielding, "Do thou seek to bear the weight of this rock I am about to hurl on thee, O Titan! Find thy satisfaction in slaying me, O Titan, thou who resemblest a mountain!"

"blow" nipātam: Literally, "fall, descent, attack."

41. "that speech . . . a speech" tad vākyam: Literally, "that speech."

42. "the grandson of Prajāpati and the son of Ṛkṣarajas" prajāpates tu pautras tvaṃ tathaivarkṣarajaḥsutaḥ: Several of the commentators recall the legend according to which Sugrīva is the son of the monkey Ṛkṣasrajas, who was, in turn, born from the mouth of Brahmā [Prajāpati] when he happened to yawn. Cv and Cg retell the legend of the births of Sugrīva and Vālin at some length. Reference to this episode is found at 7.36.35–39. According to Cv's and Cg's account, Ṛkṣarajas had been transformed into an apsaras by immersing himself, unwittingly, in a heavenly lake. In this form he aroused the lust of the gods Indra and Sūrya, who, upon touching his/her hand, shed their semen on his/her hair [vāla] and neck [grīva], respectively. From the semen thus deposited were produced, respectively, the brothers Vālin and Sugrīva. Ṛkṣarajas then regained his male simian form by immersing him/herself on Brahmā's advice in another enchanted pond. For a discussion of this theme, see R. Goldman 1993. Cv and Cg conclude by noting that other authorities derive Sugrīva's lineage differently, making him a son of Vivasvant [i.e., the sun], who was in turn a son of Prajāpati Kāśyapa. The text of Gorresio (6.46.46cd = 1187*) is a variant in which the role of the Sun in the procreation of Sugrīva is mentioned. Gorresio discusses this in his note to the passage (1858, vol. 10, p. 286, n. 17).

Dutt (1893, p. 1318) reads the name "Ṛkṣarajas" to mean "king of bears," as he had done previously, perhaps mistaking -rajas for -rāja. See note to 6.21.20 above. The same peculiarity is found in Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 29), who translates, "re degli orsi." It is not clear why these scholars should think that the king of bears would sire a monkey. Pagani (1999, p. 1039) offers, "roi des singes." See R. Goldman 1989. See, too, 1.16.10; and 6.54.14 and note. Cf. note to verse 45 below.

"That is why you boast so" tasmād garjasi: Literally, "therefore you roar." It appears, as we have indicated in our translation, that Kumbhakarṇa thinks that Sugrīva is boastful because of his high lineage, etc., and this is how the majority of translators have interpreted the phrase. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 181), however, understands the rākṣasa to be surprised to hear such boastfulness from so lofty a personage.

He translates, "[Being possessed of learning and valour,] how could you brag thus . . .?"

43. "When Sugrīva had heard" niśamya: Literally, "having heard."

"Indra's vajra or a thunderbolt" vajrāśani-: The terms vajra and aśani are more or less synonymous in their meanings of "lightning or thunderbolt" or the name of Indra's weapon. Our translation attempts to differentiate them. Apte (s.v.) defines the compound simply as "Indra's thunderbolt." The compound is used in both epics to indicate weapons that have tremendous striking force. See notes to 6.42.15; 6.45.17; 6.47.17,127; and 6.53.12. See, too, verse 121 below.

The meter is upajāti.

44. "against his . . . chest" bhujāntare: Literally, "between the arms." Cf. verses 12 and 65.

"the leaping monkeys" plavaṅgamāḥ: The word makes pāda c hypermetric. Ñ2,V1,B1–3,D1,3,5,7,9–12,T1,G1,M, and all printed editions read the metrically correct plavaṅgāḥ. The irregularity of the meter is not noted in the critical edition. One can only assume that the critical editors have made their choice on the basis of the lectio difficilior.

The meter is upajāti; pāda c is hypermetric.

45. "the apes and tawny monkeys" haryṛkṣa-: Most translators understand, "bears and monkeys." See 6.4.17; 6.54.14; and notes. See, too, R. Goldman 1989; and 1.16.10 and note. See note to verse 42 above.

The meter is upajāti.

46. "Hanumān, son of Anila" suto 'nilasya: Literally, "Anila's son."

"in both hands" dorbhyām: Literally, "with both arms."

"gold-corded" kāñcanadāmajuṣṭam: Literally, "equipped with golden cords." It is not clear to us exactly how or why cords are affixed to the lance, whether as ornamentation, to enhance the grip, or as a device for throwing it. Some translators render, "with chains of gold" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1625 and Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 181) or "with golden chains" (Dutt 1893, p. 1319). D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead kāñcanadāmayaṣṭim, "with golden cords and pole."

The meter is upajāti.

47. Cs provides a variant of this episode, which he claims is to be found in many purāṇas etc. (bahupurāṇādiṣv iyaṃ kathā). He is provoked, no doubt, by Hanumān's sudden and unheralded intervention in the duel between Sugrīva and Kumbhakarṇa to claim that the episode described here is out of place either because of scribal carelessness or because of the author's excessive eagerness to recount the heroic deeds of Hanumān. (atra vyatyasya kathanaṃ lekhakapramādataḥ. ślokāś caite 'nantaraṃ paṭhanīyā iti vā kuryuḥ kvacic ca vyatyāsam iti kavikṛta evāyaṃ hanumatparākrama-kramavarṇanaparāyattacittatayā vyatyāsa iti vā jñeyam.)

"black iron" kālāyasam: See 6.3.12; 6.53.12; and notes. See, too, 5.39.11; 5.51.38; and notes.

"weighing many tons" bhārasahasrasya: Literally, "of a thousand bhāras." The bhāra, like other units of weight in ancient Indian texts, is difficult to translate precisely into a modern unit of measure. Various texts, which do not always agree, give the weights, of course, in terms of other traditional weights. On the basis of the listing of weights in Kane and on a conjecture that the small unit māṣa, "black bean," is roughly equivalent to a gram, we calculate that a bhāra would be approximately 275 pounds. Thus one thousand of these would come to roughly 137.5 tons, a figure well within the hyperbolic range of Vālmīki and not an unreasonable weight for so gargantuan a figure as Kumbhakarṇa (Kane 1941–1975, vol. 2, p. 880, n. 2352). See Barnett (1913, p. 229), who understands a bhāra to be a heavy weight equal to twenty tulās.

"bull among leaping monkeys . . . in great excitement" prahṛṣṭaḥ plavagarṣabhaḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead tadā hṛṣṭaḥ plavaṅgamaḥ, "then the excited leaping monkey."

Following verse 47, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of five lines [1189*]: "When the monkey army saw that lance broken by Hanumān, they roared again and again in great delight and came running from all directions.[1–2] But the rākṣasa was frightened and his face downcast. In their delight, the forest-ranging [monkeys] roared like lions.[3–4] Seeing the lance in such a state, they honored Māruti.[5]"

48. "of Laṅkā's Mount Malaya" laṅkāmalayāt: The identity of this mountain causes some consternation among the commentators, since the well-known Mount Malaya is located in southern India, and no mountain of this name in Laṅkā has been previously mentioned. Commentators resolve the problem in one of two ways. Crā and Cg understand that there is no contradiction, for even though Kumbhakarṇa is standing on the peak of Mt. Trikūṭa in Laṅkā and Mount Malaya is in another country entirely, his gigantic body is equal to the task of reaching the distant peak (trikūṭaśikharasthalaṅkādvāre sthitvā yudhyataḥ kumbhakarṇasya pradeśāntarasthalaṅkāmalayaśṛṅgotpāṭanaṃ katham upapadyata iti cet tadanuguṇapramāṇaśarīratvān na doṣaḥ—so Cg). Cg provides as an alternative explanation that the term "Laṅkā's Malaya" is a metaphorical reference to Mt. Trikūṭa itself (laṅkāmalayaśabdena trikūṭaṃ vopacaryate). Ck and Ct understand the reference to be to a Mt. Malaya that is near Laṅkā (laṅkāmalayāl laṅkāsamīpavartimalayāt). On this mountain, see also note to 6.61.41.

The meter is upajāti.

49. "in battle . . . in battle" yudhi . . . yudhi: M3 and the printed editions of Cg read instead tv atha, "but then," for the second yudhi, "in battle," apparently to avoid the repetition.

"the yātudhānas" yātudhānāḥ: See 6.3.27 and note.

The meter is upajāti.

50. "Seizing . . . carried him off" jahāra . . . abhipragṛhya: Ct understands that Kumbhakarṇa places Sugrīva in his armpit and takes him from the midst of the army to another location (abhigṛhya kakṣapuṭe kṛtvā jahāra sainyamadhyād anyadeśaṃ ninīya)."

The meter is upendravajrā.

51. "holding aloft" utpāṭya: Literally, "uprooting, tearing up." Vālmīki uses this verb frequently to indicate the uprooting of mountains, trees, etc., as at verse 48 above. In this verse and the next, however, we must understand it, as Cg suggests, in the sense of "holding aloft, raising up (uddhṛtya)."

"Sugrīva, who resembled a huge cloud" mahāmeghanikāśarūpam: Literally, "he whose form resembled a huge cloud."

"whose form rivaled that of Mount Meru, now resembled Mount Meru with a new, fearsome peak soaring above it" rarāja merupratimānarūpo merur yathātyucchritaghoraśṛṅgaḥ: Literally, "he, whose form was similar to Meru, shone like Meru with an extremely high and fearsome peak." Our interpretation is inspired by that of Cg, who understands that the first reference to Mount Meru serves as an object of comparison to Kumbhakarṇa's inherent form, while the second refers to his enhanced appearance as he holds the gigantic Sugrīva above him (svākārasādṛśyāya prathamaṃ merūpādānam. dvitīyaṃ tu sugrīvadhāraṇakālikasādṛśyāya)."

The meter is upajāti.

52. "The hero Kumbhakarṇa, holding Sugrīva aloft" samutpātya . . . vīraḥ: Literally, "the hero, having held aloft." See note on utpātya at verse 51 above. D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tam ādāya, "having taken him," for samutpātya.

"proceeded on his way" jagāma: Literally, "he went." Ct understands that Kumbhakarṇa is heading back to the city and suggests that we add the name "Laṅkā" (laṅkām iti śeṣaḥ).

"as the rākṣasa lords sang his praises" saṃstūyamānaḥ . . . rākṣasendraiḥ: Literally, "being praised by the rākṣasa lords." D9–11,T1,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead the nominative singular rākṣasendraḥ for the instrumental plural, yielding the meaning "being praised, the rākṣasa lord."

"the cries" ninādam: Literally, "the sound." As Ct and Ck note, these are cries of grief (duḥkhajam).

"of those who dwelt in heaven, home of the thirty gods" tridaśālayānām: Literally, "of those possessing the abode of the thirty." The compound is somewhat elliptical. The reference is clearly to the various denizens of heaven, the gods, seers, etc. Cg glosses, "of those possessing heaven (svarginām)," while Cm glosses, "of those who were located in the abode of the thirty (tridaśālayasthānām)." The reading -daśa- is marked as uncertain in the critical apparatus. Ś,Ñ,V1,B1–3,D2–13,T, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read instead -diva-, yielding the compound tridivālayānām, "of those whose abode is the triple heaven."

The meter is upajāti.

53. "Indra's foe, whose valor was that of Indra . . . lord of the tawny monkeys . . . the equal of Indra himself" harīndram indropamam indravīryaḥ . . . indraśatruḥ: Literally, "the Indra of tawny monkeys, comparable to Indra, of Indra's valor . . . Indra's foe."

"out of the way . . . as good as gone" hṛte . . . hṛtam: Literally, "removed . . . removed." Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B,D1,2,6–13,T1,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read hate, "slain," for hṛte, while D5–7,9–11,T1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read hatam, "slain, destroyed," for hṛtam.

The meter is upajāti.

56. "By all means" sarvathā: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead asaṃśayam, "without a doubt."

57. The meter is upendravajrā.

58. "the king" pārthivaḥ: B2,4,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead vānaraḥ, "the monkey."

59. "must not yet have regained consciousness" na tāvad ātmānaṃ budhyate: Literally, "he does not yet know himself." Ct and Ck understand that Sugrīva does not know that he has been captured by his enemy because he is dazed (mohavaśād ātmānaṃ pareṇa gṛhītaṃ na budhyata iti).

61. "it would incur his most severe displeasure, as his reputation would be forever tarnished" aprītiś ca bhavet kaṣṭā kīrtināśaś ca śāśvataḥ: Literally, "[of him] there would be harmful displeasure and eternal destruction of fame." Compare this sentiment with that expressed by Sītā to Hanumān at 5.35.57, where she argues that Rāma himself must rescue her.

62. "I shall wait . . . until our king's valor is recouped" kāṅkṣiṣye vikramaṃ pārthivasya naḥ: Literally, "I shall await the valor of our king." Ct fleshes out the elliptical phrase by adding the words "[until] I shall witness the valor (vikramaṃ tu drakṣyāmīti śeṣaḥ)." V3,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read mokṣitasya, "once he is freed," for pārthivasya, "of [our] king."

63. "halted the flight" saṃstambhayāmāsa: Literally, "he immobilized." The idea, as expressed by Cg, is that Hanumān has halted or turned back the army from its flight (gamanān nivartayāmāsa).

64. "As he did so, he was strewn" avakīryamāṇaḥ: Literally, "being strewn." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead abhipūjyamānaḥ, "being honored." Translations that follow the text of Ct render this variant. Because of the mention of "showers of blossoms," however, most of these translations also add a word like "shower, strewn," etc.

"and at the gates of the buildings on the main thoroughfares" -caryāgṛhagopura-: The compound could also be read to mean "on the houses on the main thoroughfares and on gateway towers." See 6.47.32 and note, where the compound and its possible interpretations are discussed in detail.

The meter is upajāti.

Following verse 64, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1192*]: "As he was being sprinkled with showers of parched grain and perfumed water and because of the coolness of the royal highway, the mighty [monkey] gradually regained consciousness."

65. "still held in the arms" bhujāntarasthaḥ: Literally, "located within the arms." Cf. notes to verses 12 and 44 above.

"of the much stronger rākṣasa" balīyasaḥ: Literally, "of the stronger one."

"the great monkey" mahātmā: Literally, "the great one."

The meter is upendravajrā.

*66. "how in the world can I now strike back" kathaṃ nu nāma śakyaṃ mayā saṃpratikartum adya: The sequence saṃprati + kartum is printed in two ways in the various editions consulted. The critical edition, as well as GPP (6.67.85) and Gita Press (6.67.85), insert a space between saṃprati and kartum, whereas NSP (6.67.85), KK (6.67.86), VSP (6.67.86), and Gorresio (6.46.71) do not, reading instead saṃpratikartum. The former would yield the meaning "How shall I now act?" whereas the latter yields "How shall I strongly retaliate?" The commentators support the latter, and, to our way of thinking, preferable reading, and we have emended and translated accordingly. Cg and Cv, evidently aware of the alternative reading, further observe that, if one accepts it, then the adverb saṃprati, "now," becomes redundant in light of the adverb adya, "now, today." (saṃpratikartuṃ samyakpratikartum. anyathādyepi punar uktiḥ syāt—so Cg.) Manuscripts, of course, do not make a distinction between the two readings. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 210), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 183) and Pagani (1999, p. 1040), translates as if the words were separate.

The meter is upajāti.

67. "Suddenly grasping the foe of Indra, lord of the immortal gods, with his fingertips, the king of the tawny monkeys rent his ears with his claws and his nose with his fangs. Then he slashed Kumbhakarṇa along his flanks." tataḥ karāgraiḥ sahasā sametya rājā harīṇām amarendraśatroḥ / nakhaiś ca karṇau daśanaiś ca nāsāṃ dadaṃśa pārśveṣu ca kumbhakarṇam //: The verse is elliptical and somewhat confusing both in the critical text and its variants. A literal rendering would be: "Then, suddenly coming together with his fingertips, the king of the tawny monkeys bit with his nails the ears and with his fangs the nose of the enemy of Indra and [he bit] Kumbhakarṇa on his sides." The critical text presents a number of problems for the translator. The first of these is the seeming redundancy between the terms karāgraiḥ, "fingertips," and nakhaiḥ, "nails, claws." The second is the difficulty in interpreting the gerund sametya, whose normal meaning is "having joined with or come together." Finally, the syntax is awkward. The verse contains only one finite verb, dadaṃśa, "he bit," which has to serve not only for the act of biting but also for the act of scratching. This verb, then, must serve a dual role, taking as its objects both Kumbhakarṇa, on the one hand, and Kumbhakarṇa's ears and nose, on the other.

The readings of the southern commentators attempt to address some of these difficulties, while the commentators seek to explain away the others. D10,11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators substitute the adjective kharaiś ca, "and with sharp [objects]," for nakhaiś ca, "and with claws," of pāda c. This enables them to take karāgraiḥ, "fingertips," in pāda a, as a kenning for "claws," reading the two words together as "with his sharp claws." The north substitutes the finite verb cakarta, "he cut or scratched," for the critical text's nakhaiś ca, yielding the sense "he cut or tore with his claws."

Ct proposes supplying an additional finite verb luluñca, "he tore or he tore out," to indicate the action Sugrīva performs with his claws on Kumbhakarṇa's ears. Cr proposes taking, as we have done, dadaṃśa, "he bit," generically in the sense of "he tore (vidārayāmāsa)." This option is adopted also by northern manuscripts, which substitute dadāra, "he tore," for dadaṃśa.

D6,7,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr substitute dadaṃśa pādair vidadāra pārśvau, "he bit and rent his flanks with his feet," or a close variant for pāda d, providing an additional finite verb, vidadāra, "he tore," to describe what Sugrīva does to Kumbhakarṇa's flanks. Ct glosses the somewhat awkward plural pādaiḥ, "feet," with pādanakhaiḥ, "claws of the feet, toenails." Cg and Cm, who do not read with Ct, nonetheless suggest adding the phrase "he tore with his feet (pādābhyāṃ vidadāreti śeṣaḥ)." By pārśveṣu, Cg, Cm, and Cv (damaged) understand, "the cheeks, the shoulders, and the sides of the abdomen (pārśveṣu kapolayor aṃsayor udarapārśvayoś ca)."

We have construed the gerund sametya, "having come together," with the instrumental karāgraiḥ to indicate that Sugrīva, having lain passive in the grasp of Kumbhakarṇa, now suddenly revives and clutches at his adversary. Commentators have struggled with this word as well. Cr reads it to mean "having reflected in this fashion (evaṃ vicārya)," referring to Sugrīva's thoughts in the previous verse. Cg and Cm gloss, "having ruined or destroyed (saṃhṛtya)," which is what they think Sugrīva has done to Kumbhakarṇa's ears with his claws. The north avoids this problem by substituting ūrdhvam etya, "having gone or risen up." This is rendered by Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 31) as "levatosi." Translators vary in their understanding of the gerund. Dutt (1893, p. 1320) renders, "advancing." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1627), following Cr, translates, "Reaching this conclusion." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 211), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 183) and Pagani (1999, p. 1040), renders "s'attaquant."

"the foe of Indra, lord of the immortal gods" amarendraśatroḥ: Literally, "of the enemy of the lord [Indra] of the immortals." The partitive genitive must construe with the ears and nose (karṇau . . . nāsam) of pāda c. We have modified the syntax somewhat for the sake of clarity. D7,T1,G,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead the accusative amarendraśatrum.

The meter is upajāti.

68. "bruised" vimarditaś ca: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead radair nakhaiś ca, "[wounded] by fangs and claws."

The meter is upajāti.

69. "with terrible force" bhīmabala-: An alternate way to take the compound is to read it with Cr as a bahuvrīhi, in the sense of "he of fearsome strength," describing Kumbhakarṇa (bhīmabalena kumbhakarṇena).

"jumping up, swiftly" vegavad abhyupetya: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead kandukavaj javena, "[bouncing up] quickly like a ball."

"by the rāksasas, the foes of the gods" surāribhiḥ: Literally, "by the foes of the gods."

The meter is upendravajrā.

70. "gushing blood" śoṇitotsiktaḥ : Literally, "overflowing with blood."

"covered with waterfalls" prasravaṇaiḥ, Literally, "with streams or waterfalls."

Following verse 70, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of eight lines [1195*]: "The mighty,[1] gigantic, and fearsome-looking rākṣasa, drenched with blood, turned back and resolved to do battle once more.[2][1–2] In his rage, Rāvaṇa's younger brother, who was like a mass of black collyrium, resembled, as the blood gushed from him, a storm cloud at sunset.[3][3–4] When Sugrīva had escaped, the enemy of Indra, king of the gods, raced back once more to battle, in a rage. Then that fearsome warrior, reflecting, 'I don't have a weapon,' took up a dreadful war hammer.[4][5–8]"

[1]"mighty" mahābalaḥ: D6,9–11,T2,3,G1,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead niśācaraḥ, "the night-roaming [rākṣasa]."

[2]"once more" bhūyaḥ: D6,9–11,G2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bhīmaḥ, "fearsome."

[3]D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read line 2 after line 4.

[4]Lines 5–8 constitute an upajāti verse.

71. "great" mahātmā: D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Gita Press read instead mahaujāḥ, "of immense strength."

"blazing" pradīptaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead pravṛddhaḥ, "increased, grown great."

Following 71ab, D7,T2,3,G2, and KK (in brackets following 6.67.94ab) insert a passage of two lines [1196*]: "In that form, enraged, he suddenly smashed with his foot and with blows of his fist . . ."

The meter is upajāti.

72. "in his madness" mohāt: Literally, "out of delusion." Ct and Ck explain that Kumbhakarṇa has lost all self-control because of his intoxication from drinking blood (madyādineva raktapānajamadavaivaśyād iti bhāvaḥ). Cr glosses, "because of a lack of discrimination (i.e., indiscriminately) (avivekād dhetoḥ)."

"piśācas" piśacān: Piśācas are yet another class of demons. This appears to be the first mention of their service in Rāvaṇa's ranks. At 5.5.24 there is mention of a piśāca named Karāla who has a mansion in Laṅkā, although in the context, it is possible that the term is used as the proper name of a rākṣasa. See 6.47.18 and note, where a rākṣasa by the name of Piśāca is mentioned. Cf. note to 6.49.10.

"apes" ṛkṣān: See note to verses 42 and 45 above.

The meter is upajāti.

Following verse 72, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines in the upendrvajrā meter [1198*]: "He devoured the principal tawny monkeys, just as Death wreaks destruction at the end of a cosmic age."

73. "or more" bahūn: Literally, "many."

74. Following verse 74, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of three lines [1200*]: "In a towering rage, Kumbhakarṇa raced onward, devouring monkeys. Sweeping them up in his arms, in groups of seven and eight hundred and even in groups of two or three thousand,[1] he ran about devouring them."

[1]"two or three thousand" śatāni . . . viṃśat triṃśat tathaiva ca: Literally, "hundreds . . . twenty and thirty." In keeping with the general hyperbole of the Kumbhakarṇa episode, we construe the numbers twenty and thirty with hundreds, just as we have done with the numbers seven and eight.

Lines 2 and 3 repeat or closely paraphrase 6a and 7b–d above.

Following 1200*, D7,10,11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr (Gita Press 6.67.99; KK [in brackets] as 6.67.102; GPP 6.67.99; and NSP 6.67.99) insert an additional passage of four lines [1201*]: "With his sharp fangs, his body smeared with fat, marrow, and blood, and, with garlands of tangled entrails hanging about his ears, Kumbhakarṇa, like Kāla himself, grown powerful at the end of a cosmic era, showered down[1] lances."

[1]"Kumbhakarṇa . . . showered down" vavarṣa: Literally, "he showered down."

The meter is upajāti.

76. Following verse 76, D7,10,11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr (Gita Press 6.67.102–114; KK [in brackets] as 6.67.105–117; KK (1905 edition) [in brackets] 6.67.101–113; GPP 6.67.102–114; and NSP 6.67.102–114) insert a passage of twenty-six lines [App. I, No. 35]: "Although he was stricken, the rākṣasa removed that missile.[1] Then the mighty increaser of Sumitrā's joy grew angry.[1–2] With his arrows, he covered Kumbhakarṇa's[2] splendid, shining armor, made of jāmbūnada gold, as does Māruta a cloud at twilight.[3][3–4] Enveloped by those arrows with their golden ornamentation, Kumbhakarṇa, who looked like a mass of black collyrium, resembled the many-rayed sun enveloped in clouds.[4][5–6] Then that fearsome rākṣasa, his voice like the sound of a mass of thunderclouds, contemptuously addressed these words to the increaser of Sumitrā's joy.[7–8] 'By fearlessly fighting with me in battle, who easily defeated in combat even Yama himself, the ender of all things, you have proven your valor.[9–10] For anyone who could stand before me when I have a weapon in hand in a great battle, as if before Death himself, is deserving of honor. How much more so someone who could actually offer me combat?[11–12] For not even Lord Śakra himself, mounted on Airāvata and surrounded by all the immortal gods, has ever stood before me.[13–14] I am pleased by the valor you, a mere boy, have shown this day, Saumitri. Letting you go, I wish now to go to Rāghava.[15–16] Since I have been pleased by your valor, strength, and energy in battle, I wish to kill only Rāma. For once he has been slain, all the rest will be slain as well.[5] [17–18] Once I have slain Rāma, I will have my murderous army fight any that remain standing in battle.'[19–20] When the rākṣasa had spoken these words mingled with praise, Saumitri, smiling slightly, responded with these fearsome words on the battlefield.[21–22] 'It is true enough that, once you display your valor,[6] you cannot be withstood*[7] by Śakra and the other gods. It is not other than you say, hero, for today we have witnessed your prowess.[23–24] Nonetheless, here stands Rāma Dāśarathi, immovable as a mountain.' But when the night-roaming rākṣasa had heard those words, he paid no heed to Lakṣmaṇa.[25–26]"

[1]"removed that missile" astraṃ tu viśeṣam: The phrase is elliptical and obscure. It would appear to mean "that peculiar or specific missile." We agree with Ct and Cr, who, however, take the adjective viśeṣa to mean "whose remainder has departed (vigataśeṣam)," fleshing out the phrase with the finite verb cakāra, "he made or did." This gives the phrase the sense: "He made that weapon such that it had no remainder." The idea is that he removed it completely.

[3]"as does Māruta a cloud at twilight" saṃdhyābhram iva mārutaḥ: Literally, "like Māruta a twilight-cloud." The simile seems defective in that it is not clear how the wind [Māruta] is supposed to cover or obscure a cloud.

[4]"Enveloped . . . Kumbhakarṇa, who looked like a mass of black collyrium, resembled the many-rayed sun enveloped in clouds" nīlāñjanacayaprakhyaḥ . . . āpīḍyamānaḥ śuśubhe meghaiḥ sūrya ivāṃśumān: Literally, "he, being closely pressed or garlanded, resembled the many-rayed sun [being garlanded] by clouds." The simile seems inverted, since the dark Kumbhakarṇa, surrounded by the golden arrows, is compared to the brilliant sun surrounded by dark clouds.

[5]"For, once he has been slain, all the rest will be slain as well." yasmin hate hatam: Literally, "who when slain . . . it is slain." We follow Cr in fleshing out this elliptical phrase with the words "the whole army (nikhilaṃ sainyam iti śeṣaḥ)." This same idea is expressed less elliptically at verse 53c above.

[6]"once you display your valor" prāpya pauruṣam: Literally, "having acquired strength or valor."

[*7]"cannot be withstood" asahyam: The reading of the critical edition, which requires one to construe the adjective with pauruṣam, "valor," is probably a typographical error. Printed editions that have this line read the nominative masculine singular asahyaḥ, which must then modify tvam, "you," a reference to Kumbhakarṇa himself. The only variant (G1) shown in the critical apparatus supports the reading of the printed editions of GPP, NSP, and KK. We have emended accordingly.

77. "seeming as he did so to tear up" dārayann iva: Literally, "tearing as it were." Ś,D8–12,T2,3,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead kampayann iva, "as if making [the earth itself] tremble." The first two syllables of the word dārayann are marked as doubtful.

78. "invoking the divine weapon-spell of Rudra" raudram astraṃ prayojayan: Literally, "employing the raudra astra." The raudra appears to be one of the divine weapon-spells or magical weapons of which Rāma is said to be the master. It is not named, however, in the list of divine weapons that Viśvāmitra conferred upon Rāma at Bālakāṇḍa 26. Such weapons are invoked mentally, and their power may then be invested in an ordinary arrow or even in such benign-seeming objects as a blade of grass. See, for example, 5.36.26–27 and notes. It is unlikely that, as some translators have understood, the raudra weapon is an actual bow. See note to 115 below. See, too, 6.87.33–34; 6.88.2; and notes.

79. "wounded" viddhasya: Literally, "pierced, hurt."

Following verse 79, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1202*]: "Wounded by Rāma's divinely charged weapons, the bull among rākṣasas ran about in a towering rage bellowing frightfully and putting the tawny monkeys to flight in the battle."

80. "fletched with peacock feathers" barhiṇavāsasaḥ: Literally, "with peacock feathers for clothing." Cf. 6.35.12.

"massive mace . . . fell to the ground" papātorvyāṃ mahāgadā: D9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead gadā corvyāṃ papāta ha, "his mace fell to the ground."

Following verse 80, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1205*]: "And all his weapons were scattered over the ground."

81. "immensely powerful rākṣasa" mahābalaḥ: Literally, "the immensely powerful one."

"and his feet" caraṇābhyāṃ ca: B1,D5,7–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ca karābhyāṃ ca, "and with his [open] hands."

82. "as a mountain does its waterfalls" giriḥ prasravaṇān iva: D7,G1,2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cg read instead giriḥ prasravaṇaṃ yathā, "as a mountain does a waterfall"

83. "suffused . . . covered" mūrcchitaḥ[mūrchitaḥ—so crit. ed.]: The adjective normally means "dazed, stupefied, etc.," and several translators have rendered it in this fashion. It is difficult, however, to read this sense with both "rage (kopena)" and "blood (rudhireṇa)." We have therefore followed the suggestion of Cg and Cr, who understand the term in its other meaning of "filled, pervaded with (vyāptaḥ)."

Following verse 83, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of eight lines [1207*]: "Then that mighty rākṣasa[1] of fearsome valor, who resembled Yama, the ender of all things, brandished a fearsome mountain peak and hurled it toward Rāma.[1–2] But Rāma nocked seven straight-flying arrows to his bow and, with them, cut that mountain peak to pieces in midair before it ever reached him.[3–4] Righteous Rama, bull among men,[2] cut that immense mountain peak to pieces with arrows whose shafts were variegated with gold.[5–6] Shining with splendor, resembling the peak of Mount Meru,[3] it felled two hundred of the monkey leaders[4] as it fell.[7–8]"

[1]"that mighty rākṣasa" balavān: Literally, "mighty one."

[2]"bull among men" puruṣarṣabhaḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bharatāgrajaḥ, "the older brother of Bharata."

[3]"resembling the peak of Mount Meru" meruśikharākāram: Literally, "having the form of the peak of Meru." D10,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the instrumental plural meruśikharākāraiḥ, which would make the adjective modify the arrows (śaraiḥ) in line 6.

[4]"of the monkey leaders" vānarendrāṇām: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Gita Press (6.67.126) read instead vānarāṇāṃ ca, "and of the monkeys."

84. "intent" yuktaḥ: Literally, "engaged, focused." Cr, the only commentator to remark on this term, glosses, "who had been earlier assigned [this task] by Rāma (pūrvaṃ rāmeṇa niyuktaḥ)."

"many methods of doing so" yogān . . . bahūn: Literally, "many means."

85. "He cannot distinguish between" na vijānāti: Literally, "He does not recognize."

"his allies and his enemies alike" svān parāṃś caiva: Literally, "his own and the others as well."

86. "Very well" sādhu: We understand the term here as an interjection, a sense in which it is often used in the literature. In the present context, the idea seems to be that, after deliberating over the various possible means of killing Kumbhakarṇa, as indicated in verse 84 above, Lakṣmaṇa has now decided upon this one. The expression here is thus similar to the English expression "I have it!" or "I know!" Most translators, following Cr, have tended to read the term adverbially as a description of how the monkeys should climb upon Kumbhakarṇa. Translations are various, including "straight" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1631), "putting forth their best" (Dutt 1893, p. 1324), and "bravement" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 213). Roussel is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 185), who translates, "courageously," and Pagani (1999, p. 1043), who renders, "vaillamment." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 186) translates it adjectivally as "[all] able [monkeys]." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 31) appears to render, "Or."

87. "Then" api: The particle is used here in verse-initial position as a marker of a change of subject. V3,B2,D2,6,7,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead adya, "today."

"falling to the ground" prapatan . . . bhūmau: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead pracaran, "moving about." This yields the sense of "moving about [the battle]ground."

"will not kill any more of the leaping monkeys" nānyān hanyāt plavaṅgamān: Literally, "he would not kill other leaping monkeys." For reasons unclear to us, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 213) appears to misread the nominative singular rākṣasaḥ (for which the critical apparatus shows no variants) in pāda c as an accusative plural (perhaps reading rakṣasaḥ). This leads him to the erroneous translation, "massacrera les Rākshasas, et non plus les autres, les Plavangamas." In this he has regrettably been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 185), who renders, "will annihilate the titans and not the monkeys" and Pagani (1999, p. 1043), who translates, "ne pourra . . . tuer que les rākṣasa et non pas les autres, les singes."

88. "the leaping monkeys" plavaṅgamāḥ: B2,3,D9–11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahābalāḥ, "very powerful ones."

89. "riders mounted on his back" hastipān: Literally, "elephant keepers." The term generally applies to elephant drivers or riders (Apte s.v.).

90. "This rākṣasa is infuriated" ruṣṭo 'yam iti rākṣasaḥ: The placement of the word rākṣasaḥ after the quotation marker iti, is somewhat irregular, but this practice is not utterly unknown to Vālmīki. Cv informs us that we should read the iti after rākṣasaḥ (ruṣṭo 'yam iti rākṣasa iti. atretiśabda . . . yojyaḥ). D9–11 and Ct seek to avoid this awkwardness by reading the accusative rākṣasam for the nominative rākṣasaḥ. In this case the quote becomes "He is infuriated," while rākṣasa becomes the explicit object of the verb "sprang toward (samutpapāta)" of pāda c. D5,9,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read duṣṭaḥ, "vicious," for ruṣṭaḥ, "infuriated." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 186), alone among the translators, appears to follow this reading, rendering, "The Rākshasa runs berserk."

Following verse 90, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of three lines [1211*]: "His eyes red with rage, swift and heroic[1] Rāghava rushed swiftly upon the rākṣasa, burning him up, as it were, with his gaze. In so doing, he cheered all the troop leaders, who had been battered by the forces of Kumbhakarṇa."

[1]"heroic" vīraḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead dhīraḥ, "steadfast."

91. "quiver of arrows" -tūṇabāṇaḥ: Given this word order, one would have to take the final members of the compound as a dvandva and understand, "with [his splendid] quiver and arrows [fastened on him]." We prefer to follow the suggestion of Cg, who reads the final member as paranipāta (nibaddhottamabāṇatūṇa ity arthaḥ). This gives the compound the sense of a genitive tatpuruṣa, "quiver [full] of arrows."

The meter is upajāti.

Following verse 91, Ś,Ñ2,B2,D2,8,9,12,T2,3, and the text of Gita Press (in a footnote following its verse 142 [1969, vol. 3, pp. 1632–33]) insert a passage of twenty-one lines [App. I, No. 36]. According to the critical editors, the passage is known to the second edition of KK (1930) (in brackets following 6.67.145 = crit. ed. 6.55.98), but the passage is not found in the 1913 edition of KK. The translation of this passage appears only in Gita Press (as noted above) and in Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, pp. 186–87) in brackets. Gita Press notes that this passage is known to only a few manuscripts, while Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 630), in his note to the sarga, remarks that this is one of the two passages in this sarga "as to the authenticity of which there is difference of opinion." See verse 76 above for the other passage to which Raghunathan refers. However, both Gita Press and Raghunathan place the passage between verses 98 and 99 of the critical edition. This placement differs from that indicated in the critical apparatus and is not marked as an alternative placement for any manuscript consulted in the collation of the critical apparatus. Since this passage is not part of the standard vulgate text, and is, despite Raghunathan's belief that it is "quite in consonance with what the poet says of Kumbhakarna" (p. 630), seemingly at odds with the tenor of the rākṣasa's characterization, we believe it to be a late Vaiṣṇava interpolation. The following is a summary of the passage: In the midst of the battle between Rāma and Kumbhakarṇa, the latter's brother, Vibhīṣaṇa, appears on the scene, mace in hand, acting on Rāma's behalf. Kumbhakarṇa addresses him, urging him to abandon any tenderness for him, his brother, and to rely on the code of the warrior to strike him down in battle in order to please Rāma.[1–5] Kumbhakarṇa then praises Vibhīṣaṇa, claiming that his actions in defecting to Rāma have served the rākṣasas. He states that Vibhīṣaṇa is the only rākṣasa in the world who is a protector of truth and righteousness. He further states that no calamity ever befalls those who are devoted to truth and prophesizes that Vibhīṣaṇa alone will survive to carry on the rākṣasa dynasty. He then states that, through the grace of Rāma, Vibhīṣaṇa will become king of the rākṣasas.[6–10] Kumbhakarṇa warns Vibhīṣaṇa, however, that he should steer clear of him, since, in his own frenzy of battle, he is unable to distinguish between his allies and his enemies. It is his duty, he continues, to protect his younger brother [Vibhīṣaṇa].[11–14] Upon hearing Kumbhakarṇa's words, Vibhīṣaṇa responds, saying that he had spoken earlier in the assembly in order to save the rākṣasa race, but, since none of the rākṣasas would heed him, he defected to Rāma.[15–18] He begs Kumbhakarṇa to forgive him for his actions, whether they be good or evil. Then, his eyes filled with tears, Vibhīṣaṇa retires to a secluded spot and broods about the coming destruction [of his family].[19–21]

92. "invincible" paramadurjayaḥ: D6,9–11,T2,3,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the instrumental plural paramadurjayaiḥ for the critical edition's nominative singular, thus making the adjective apply to the monkey troops rather than to Rāma.

"Rāma" rāmaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vīraḥ, "the hero."

"continued to advance" saṃpratasthe: Literally, "he advanced, set forth."

93–96. These verses consist largely of a string of descriptive adjectives modifying Kumbhakarṇa. They can equally well serve as the objects of dadarśa, "he gazed upon," in 93a, as Cg suggests, whom we follow, or as the objects of the gerund dṛṣṭvā, "having gazed upon," in 97a, as Cr proposes.

"mighty" mahābalam: D7, GPP, and Gita Press read the nominative mahābalaḥ for the accusative, thus making the adjective apply to Rāma instead of Kumbhakarṇa. Only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1632) translates this variant.

"whose every limb was drenched with blood" śoṇitāplutasarvāṅgam: A number of manuscripts, with some variations, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead śoṇitāvṛtaraktākṣam [Gita Press = śoṇitāplutaraktākṣam], "his eyes reddened and covered [bathed] in blood." The translator of Gita Press and Dutt read the compound as a dvandva: "with his body drenched in blood, and with blood-shot eyes" (Dutt 1893, p. 1324), and "bathed in blood, his eyes red (with fury)" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1632).

"He spewed . . . pouring" sravantam: Literally, "streaming."

"Drenched with blood, he lapped it up with his tongue." jihvayā parilihyantaṃ śoṇitaṃ śoṇitokṣitam: Literally, "licking blood with his tongue [and] drenched with blood." The printed texts of Ct (NSP, GPP, and Gita Press) read instead śṛkkiṇī śoṇitokṣite. This gives the half verse the sense "licking with his tongue the blood-drenched corners of his mouth." D5,T1,M3, and the printed editions of Cg and Cm read śoṇitekṣaṇam, "with bloody eyes," for śoṇitokṣitam, "drenched with blood." This reading is rendered by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 186) as "with bloodshot eyes."

"he resembled Yama, who brings time itself to an end" kālāntakayamopamam: Literally, "comparable to Yama, Kāla, the ender." The three-member karmadhāraya compound is awkward. Normally we leave untranslated the term kāla, "Time or Doom," when it serves as an epithet or synonym of Yama, but here we render the last two terms as a tatpuruṣa because of the additional third term and for the sake of readability. Cg offers as a second alternative that we read kāla-, "time," to refer to the time of universal destruction at the end of a cosmic era (kāle yugāntakāle 'ntako nāśako yama upamā yasya sa tathoktaḥ), lending the compound the sense "comparable to Yama, who is the ender, that is, the destroyer, at the time of the end of a cosmic era." Cg's first explanation is that, because of the different aspects or conditions of the one individual [Kumbhakarṇa], he is compared to two different aspects of Śiva—that is, as Kāla, or the three-eyed Rudra, and Antaka, that is, the destroyer of Tripura, the triple citidel of the asuras (rudras trinetras tripurāntako vetivat. ekasyaivāvasthābhedāt kālādināmabhedaḥ). Cm and Crā echo this view, and Ct quotes Cm. See 6.21.26 and note. Cf. 6.59.73 and notes for a discussion of Tripura.

98. "at the sound of his bow. . . it" cāpanirghoṣāt . . . ghoṣam: Literally, "because of the sound of the bow . . . the sound."

"that bull among rākṣasas, sons of chaos" nairṛtarṣabhaḥ: Literally, "the bull among nairṛtas." Ś,B1,2,D5,7,9–13,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead rākṣasarṣabhaḥ, "the bull among rākṣasas."

99. "his arms like the splendid coils of the king of great serpents" bhujañgarājottamabhogabāhum: Ct identifies the king of serpents as Śeṣa. D9–11,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read the nominative -bāhuḥ for the critical edition's accusative, -bāhum. This reading makes the compound a description of Rāma rather than of Kumbhakarṇa.

"the wind" vāta-: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the somewhat awkward dhārā-, "stream, torrent." Translations that follow the text of Ct have, in any case, generally translated "wind or storm."

The meter is upendravajrā.

100. "Don't lose heart now" āgaccha . . . mā viṣādam: The literal meaning of this phrase would normally be, "Do not come to despondency," i.e., "Do not despair." However, the seeming inappropriateness of this advice in this particular context has inspired the commentators to offer a variety of ingenious interpretations and has led the translators, in many cases, either to ignore the context or force the language. The exact intention of Rāma's words here is not completely clear. We believe that Rāma, fearing that Kumbhakarṇa may have been weakened or worn down by his conflicts with the monkeys, may hesitate to give him battle. Thus he is exhorting him to pluck up his courage to stand and fight. Cv proposes that we break up the sequence māviṣādam as mā aviṣādam (rather than mā viṣādam). This could be taken to lend the phrase the sense of "do not be non-despondent," that is, "don't be too cocky [since you now face me, Rāma]." It is apparent, however, from the remarks of Cm and Cg (first alternative), who tend to follow Cv's interpretation, that we are intended to take mā not as the prohibitive particle but rather as the enclitic form of the first person singular accusative pronoun mām, and then read aviṣādam as a bahuvrīhi compound modifying that pronoun. This yields the sense "Come to me, who am free from despondency [i.e., cheerful, confident]." Ck and Ct understand that Rāma is exhorting Kumbhakarṇa not to despair (mā viṣādam āgaccha) because it is Rāma that he faces. This appears to lend the verse a soteriological meaning, in that Kumbhakarṇa will attain salvation through death at the hands of Lord Rāma, although neither commentator makes this explicit. Cr offers a similar interpretation, arguing that Rāma is telling Kumbhakarṇa not to be despondent over the destruction of his race, since it is I [Rāma], who stand here, bow in hand (sa tvaṃ viṣādaṃ svakulavidhvaṃsajanitakhedaṃ mā gaccha prāpnuhi yataḥ pragṛhītacāpo 'ham avasthitaḥ). Cg offers, as his second interpretation, the notion that Rāma is telling Kumbhakarṇa to give up, through death, the torments of the burden of his body (yadvā viṣādaṃ mā gaccha maraṇena śarīrabharaṇakleśaṃ tyajety arthaḥ).

Translators generally offer one of two interpretations. The first is that Kumbhakarṇa should not be afflicted with grief or despair (Dutt 1893, p. 1325; Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1633; and Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 187). The second, first given by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 214) and followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 186) and Pagani (1999, p. 1044), forces the sense of viṣāda to mean "tremble," thus yielding "do not tremble."

"foe of Śakra . . . Rāma" śakrasapatna rāmam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the hypermetric rākṣasavaṃśanāśanam, "the destroyer of the rākṣasa race."

"You are about to die." muhūrtād bhavitā vicetāḥ: Literally, "after a moment you will be deprived of your senses." We agree with the commentators that the adjective vicetāḥ, which normally has the sense "unconscious," must be understood here to mean "dead" (vicetā nirjīvo mṛtaḥ—so Ct).

The meter is upajāti.

101. "When Kumbhakarṇa realized" vijñāya: Literally, "having realized."

"caused . . . to sink" pātayann iva: Literally, "as if causing to fall." D7,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead dārayann iva, "as if rending, breaking." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 187) evidently reads the simplex root √pat in its sense of "to leap or fly," rendering, "making their hearts jump into their mouths."

Following 101ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1213*]: "He ran about in a rage scattering the tawny monkeys in battle."

103. "Virādha, Kabandha, Khara, Vālin, or Mārīca" nāhaṃ virādhaḥ . . . na kabandhaḥ kharo na ca / na vālī na ca mārīcaḥ: All the individuals named had previously been killed by Rāma. As Cr notes, Kumbhakarṇa is suggesting the relative weakness of those he names compared to himself (etena virādhādīnām alpabalavattvaṃ sūcitam). Virādha was killed by Rāma at Araṇyakāṇḍa 3; Kabandha was mortally wounded at 3.66–68; Khara was slain at 3.28.25; Mārīca was shot at 3.42.11–21; and Vālin was mortally wounded at 4.16.25.

104. "war hammer" mudgaram: Cg is the only commentator to note the apparent contradiction between this verse and verse 81 above, where Kumbhakarṇa is shown to have lost his last weapon and is thus compelled to fight with his arms and feet. Cg hastens to reassure us that we are to understand that in the interval Kumbhakarṇa has picked up a war hammer (yady api nirāyudhatvaṃ pūrvam uktam tathāpy adya mudgaraṃ gṛhītavān iti jñeyam).

"all made of black iron" sarvakālāyasam: See 5.39.11; 5.51.38; 6.53.12; and notes.

106. "puny strength" vīryam . . . laghu: The term laghu is ambiguous here. It can be read, as Cg proposes, adverbially in the sense of "quickly." This sense has been followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 187), who translates, "without loss of time." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 33), the only other translator to share this reading, takes the term as an adjective modifying vīryam, "strength," rendering, "l'agile tuo vigore." We, too, read the term adjectivally but, in keeping with the contemptuous tenor of Kumbhakarṇa's words, take it in its common sense of "slight, insignificant, puny." V3,B4,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead [me] 'nagha, "O faultless one."

"against my limbs" gātreṣu me: Cr, the only commentator to remark on this phrase, understands, as do we, that Kumbhakarṇa is inviting Rāma to demonstrate his martial prowess against his own huge body. He explains, "Demonstrate your own valor upon my limbs. The meaning is 'shoot your arrows to the best of your ability' (vīryaṃ svaparākramaṃ me gātreṣu darśaya yāvacchakti śarān prakṣipety arthaḥ)." This same understanding is shared by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1634), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 187), and Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 33). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 214), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 186) and Pagani (1999, p. 1044), understands Kumbhakarṇa to be challenging Rāma to demonstrate the strength of his own limbs, rendering, "Montre-moi . . . la vigueur de tes membres." Dutt (1893, p. 1325) appears to read the causative darśaya idiosyncratically as some sort of hypothetical simplex, translating, "do thou witness the prowess that is in my frame."

"once I have witnessed your manliness and valor" dṛṣṭapauruṣavikramam: Literally, "[you] whose manliness and valor have been seen." The terms pauruṣa and vikrama as well as the term vīrya in pāda b are all more or less synonymous in the senses of "strength" and "courage." See note to 6.2.14.

107. "was neither shaken nor harmed" na cukṣubhe na vyathate: Literally, "he did not shake; he is not agitated." The two verbs are closely similar in meaning. Cg, the only commentator to take note of this issue, remarks that the action expressed by the root √kṣubh is mental (kṣobho 'tra mānasaḥ), leaving us to assume that the verb √vyath refers to a physical state.

The meter is upajāti.

108. "Those same arrows" yaiḥ sāyakaiḥ: Literally, "by which arrows." Both Cg and Cs are disturbed by the use of the plural here, since the text has made it clear at 4.12.2–5 and 4.16.25 that Rāma has employed but a single arrow to accomplish the feats referred to in this verse. Cg explains the plural by stating that it is used because the arrows used earlier are the same kind as those used in the present context (sālabhedakasya vālināśakasya ca bāṇasyaikatve 'pi bahuvacanaṃ tadvargyāṇām ekatvād upapadyate). Cs comments that, even though it was stated earlier that Rāma used a single great arrow to split the tāla trees [Cs reads the vulgate variant tāla, "palmyra tree," for the crit. ed.'s sāla], the plural is used here because the description of Kumbhakarṇa's greatness [apparently accentuated by his ability to withstand multiple arrow wounds] serves to enhance the greatness of Rāma (yady apy ekeṣuṇā bhittvā ca tān sa ityādiṣv eka eva saptatālapāṭako vipāṭa uktaḥ tathāpi kumbhakarṇamahattvavarṇanaṃ rāmamāhātmyopayogīti yair ityādy uktiḥ).

"pierced the great sāla trees" sālavarā nikṛttāḥ: See 4.12.2–5.

"slain Vālin" vālī hataḥ: See 4.16.25ff.

The meter is indravajrā.

109. "absorbed those arrows . . . as one might drink a trickle of water" sa vāridhārā iva sāyakāṃs tān pibañ śarīreṇa: Literally, "drinking with his body those arrows like streams of water." The image the poet has in mind is most likely the gentle stream of water poured from a drinking vessel to the mouth or, as Ck and Ct understand, a mountain drinking or absorbing showers of water [rain] (vāridhārāḥ parvata iva sāyakāñ śarīreṇa pibann iti yojanā). Hence we have translated "trickle" to indicate how insignificant Kumbhakarṇa finds the blows of Rāma's arrows. The idea, Ck and Ct continue, is that the arrows sink into [Kumbhakarṇa's] body but do not harm him (etena sarve sāyakāḥ śarīre magnā api na vyathayantīti darśitam).

"in whirling . . . he had blunted" jaghāna . . . vyāvidhya: Literally, "having whirled, he struck." We follow Ck and Ct, who clearly indicate that they understand that Kumbha-karṇa whirls his war hammer in order to slow down or neutralize the arrows (ugravegaṃ taṃ mudgaraṃ vyāvidhya bhrāmayitvā rāmasya śarapravegaṃ jaghāna—so Ct). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 214) and Pagani (1999, p. 1044) understand that the action of swinging the war hammer is simultaneous with, but not the cause of, the obstruction of the arrows.

The meter is upajāti.

110. "covered with blood, the rākṣasa, a terror to the vast hosts of the gods, whirling his war hammer" rakṣaḥ kṣatajānuliptaṃ vitrāsanaṃ devamahācamūnām / vyāvidhya taṃ mudgaram: We understand both vitrāsanam and kṣatajānuliptam to modify the neuter noun rakṣaḥ, "rākṣasa," since both qualifiers are eminently suited to the description of Kumbhakarṇa. Cr and all translators consulted understand the adjective vitrāsanam, "terrifying," to modify mudgaram, "war hammer." The translators similarly understand the compound kṣatajānuliptam, "covered with blood," to modify the weapon. Both readings are certainly possible.

The meter is upajāti.

111. "the excellent divine weapon-spell of Vāyu" vāyavyam . . . varāstram: Ñ2,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead [a]parāstram. We believe that the proper interpretation of this reading would be "unsurpassed weapon-spell." However, most of the translators who render the text of Ct translate apara- in its other sense of "another." Ś,V1,2,B,D1–3,6,7,12,13,T2,3, and the text of Cr read instead mahāstram, "great or mighty astra." This may be the source of Dutt's rendering, "a mighty Vāyavya weapon" (1893, p. 1326). The divine vāyavya weapon, associated with the vedic wind god Vāyu, is among those conferred upon Rāma by Viśvāmitra as a reward for the latter's slaying of the rākṣasī Tāṭakā at Bālakāṇḍa 25. The weapon, there given the proper name "Prathama" (among other variants), is presented to Rāma at 1.26.11. See Jacobi 1893, p. 52, n. 1; cf. R. Goldman 1984, pp. 63ff.

"Kumbhakarṇa" saḥ: Literally, "he."

The meter is upajāti.

112. "wreaking carnage among the monkey troops" jaghāna tāṃ vānaravāhinīṃ ca: Literally, "and it destroyed the monkey army." Cr and some of the translators are concerned at the apparent sense that the entire monkey host has been annihilated here. Cr glosses the term vānaravāhinīm, "the monkey army," as "a certain army [i.e., one specific division of the army] (kāṃcit senām)." Dutt (1893, p. 1326) translates, as do several other translators, "destroyed that army," but adds a footnote saying, "This, of course, is not to be taken literally." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1634), trying to avoid the destruction of the entire army, translates, "and killed a well-known regiment of the monkeys." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 35) renders, "e batacchiava a furia i Vānari." Our solution is similar to that of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 188), who renders, simply, "causing great havoc."

The meter is upendravajrā.

113. "who had survived that carnage were routed" bhagnahatāvaśeṣāḥ: Literally, "the broken, slain remainders." We understand the compound to be a dvandva made up of two adjectives describing the monkeys: one is bhagna, a term Vālmīki uses widely elsewhere in the sense of "routed" (see verse 29 and note above), and the other is hatāvaśeṣāḥ, "remainders of the slain." Commentators and translators propose a variety of alternative interpretations. Ct and Ck gloss, bhagnasamudgarapatitabāhu hatāvaśiṣṭāḥ, which could mean either "the routed and the remainder of those slain by the fallen arm with its war hammer," or "the remainder of those slain by the fallen arm, which was broken and held a war hammer." Cr understands the compound to be a tatpuruṣa, glossing, "the remnants of the slain, that is, the slaughter, caused by the breaking, that is, the falling, of Kumbhakarṇa's arm together with the war hammer (bhagnena samudgarakumbhakarṇabāhupātena hatād hananād avaśeṣāḥ)." Several of the translators understand that the monkeys are the survivors of those who have been broken, i.e., injured and mutilated, and those who have been slain.

"the edge of the battlefield" paryantam: Literally, "to the periphery." Ct and Ck explain, "near the area where the arm and war hammer had fallen (samudgarabāhupāta-pradeśasamīpam)." Cr, on the other hand, understands, "to another place (deśāntaram)."

"their bodies trembling" pravepitāṅgāḥ: Ś1,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead prapīḍitāṅgāḥ, "their bodies crushed or wounded."

The meter is upajāti.

114. "huge . . . whose peak had been severed" mahān nikṛttāgraḥ: D5,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahāsikṛṃttāgraḥ (D5,9, and Ct and Cr—kṛttāgraḥ), "whose peak was severed by a huge sword."

The meter is upajāti.

115. "jāmbūnada gold" jāmbūnada-: See note to 6.15.2.

"charged with the divine weapon-spell of Indra" aindrāstrayuktena: Literally, "joined with the aindra missile." The idea here, as is explained by Cr and Cg and as seen elsewhere in the epics, is that Rāma has invoked a spell associated with the weapon of Indra to empower an ordinary arrow. See notes to verse 78 above. See, too, 6.47.81 and note. Rāma is given control over Indra's weapon at 1.26.5, although there the weapon is explicitly said to be a cakra, or "discus."

"Kumbhakarṇa's" tasya: Literally, "of him."

"sāla tree" -sālavṛkṣam: D6,7,9–11,T2,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead -tālavṛkṣam, "palmyra tree." See note to verse 108 above.

The meter is upajāti.

116. For some reason, Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 187) omits this entire verse from his translation.

"thrashing about" viveṣṭamānaḥ: Literally, "winding, twisting." Ś,Ñ,V2,B1–3,D1–4,6–13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead viceṣṭamānaḥ, "moving, writhing, twitching." Cg glosses, "revolving, whirling about (vivartamānaḥ)." Dutt (1893, p. 1326) idiosyncratically reads the upasarga vi as a privative particle and thus renders the participle as "inert."

The meter is upajāti.

117. "Kumbhakarṇa" tam: Literally, "him."

"two . . . half-moon-headed arrows" dvāv ardhacandrau: Literally, "two half-moon-headed ones." Cg understands that Rāma has fitted both arrows to his bow simultaneously (yugapat sandhāya). See 6.44.18. Cf. 6.35.23; 6.57.57; and notes.

The meter is upajāti.

Following verse 117, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines [1215*]: "His feet fell, making the cardinal and intermediate directions, the hills, the caves,[1] the vast ocean, Laṅkā, and the hosts of monkeys and rākṣasas resound."

[1]"the hills, the caves" girīn guhāḥ: D9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead girer guhāḥ, "the caves of the mountain."

The meter is upajāti.

118. "Kumbhakarṇa . . . hurled himself . . . upon" dudrāva: Literally, "he ran toward." Cg raises the otherwise unspoken problem of how Kumbhakarṇa is supposed to move once his arms and feet have been severed. He states that Kumbhakarṇa must have moved on the stumps of his thighs or else both his motion here and his fall as described in the subsequent verses would be impossible. (ūruśeṣābhyām idam. anyathedaṃ gamanaṃ vakṣyamānaṃ patanaṃ ca na sambhavataḥ—so Cg.)

"the mare's head fire that lies beneath the sea" vaḍavāmukha-: See 6.48.49; 6.61.42; and notes.

"Rāhu, demon of the eclipse" rāhuḥ: Literally, "Rāhu."

The meter is upajāti.

119. "Kumbhakarṇa's" tasya: Literally, "his."

"moaned" cukūja: Literally, "he made indistinct sounds."

The meter is upajāti.

120. See R. Goldman 1984, pp.101–4, for a comparison of the description of the death of Kumbhakarṇa (verses 120–125) with Homer's description of the death of Pandaros.

"perfect" ariṣṭam: Ct, Ck, Cg, and Cm understand the term here to mean "inauspicious to one's enemies (ripūṇām aśubhapradam)." Cg and Cm substantiate this interpretation by citing Amarakośa 3.3.35.

"resembled the staff of Brahmā or Kāla, the ender of all things" brahmadaṇḍāntakakālakalpam: The meaning of the compound is not absolutely clear. The commentators are silent, and translations vary. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 189) understands three separate figures, translating, "as invincible as the rod of Brahmā or death or all-destroying time," while Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1636), understanding, as we do, that kāla and antaka are more or less synonymous, translates, "resembles the rod of Brahmā (the creator) and the destructive Kāla (Time-Spirit)." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 36) renders similarly, offering, "pari allo scettro di Brahma ed alla morte." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 215) reads the compound in reverse as a kind of paranipāta, understanding that the arrow is like the staff of Brahmā at the time of final destruction. He translates, "pareil au sceptre de Brahmā, à l'époque de la destruction finale." He is followed in this by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 188). Pagani (1999, p. 1045) has a similar interpretation but makes kāla or, "Time," the wielder of Brahmā's staff. She renders, "pareil à Kāla qui brandit le brahmadaṇḍa à l'heure de la destruction finale." See note to 6.48.3.

The meter is upajāti.

121. jāmbūnada gold: -jāmbūnada-: See note to 6.15.2.

"Indra's vajra or a thunderbolt" -vajrāśani-: See verse 43 and note above.

"It shone like the blazing sun or fire" pradīptasūryajvalanaprakāśam: The sequence sūryajvalana- can be read either as a dvandva, as we have done, following the suggestion of Cr, or as a tatpuruṣa, which lends the compound the sense of "its luster was like the brilliance of the blazing sun." Translators are divided on this point.

The meter is upajāti.

122. "sped on its way . . . and its power was equal to that of mighty Śakra's thunderbolt" jagāma śakrāśanitulyavikramaḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the accusative singular -bhīmavikramam, "of fearsome power," for -tulyavikramaḥ. This reading slightly changes the meaning of the compound and makes it describe not Rāma's arrow but Kumbhakarṇa himself. It also makes Kumbhakarṇa the destination of the arrow. The sense thus becomes "[the arrow] sped toward him whose fearsome power was like that of Śakra's thunderbolt."

"as that of Agni Vaiśvānara, undimmed by smoke" vidhūmavaiśvānara-: Literally, "smokeless Vaiśvānara." D5,7,T1,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead sadhūma-, "smoky," for vidhūma-, "smokeless." Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 189) renders this variant.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

123. "With it, Rāma" saḥ: Literally, "he or it." The most immediate antecedent is the arrow in verse 122 above. To take it as the subject here, however, would vitiate the force of the simile in pāda d, which calls for Rāma himself to be compared to Indra. We therefore follow Cg in taking the pronoun explicitly to refer to Rāma, while we add the phrase "with it" to maintain the narrative consistency.

"its fangs bared" vivṛttadaṃṣṭram: The participle vivṛtta- would normally have the sense of "turned or twisted." Of the two translators consulted who share the critical reading, only Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 37) accepts this, translating, "con denti ritorti." We believe that the sense intended is that of vivṛta, "opened, bared, uncovered." The doubling of the "t" appears to be metri causa to provide the requisite heavy syllable in this position of the vaṃśasthavila meter. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 189), the other translator to share this reading, agrees, rendering, "with its bared fangs." Compare 6.47.15 and notes.

B2,D6,9–11,T2,3,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead suvṛtta-, "beautifully rounded, globular." Translations that follow the text of Ct render this variant.

"swinging wildly" cala-: Literally, "moving, swinging." Ct understands that the earrings are falling or flying off Kumbhakarṇa's head (cale gate cāruṇī ramaṇīye kuṇḍale yasmāt). Dutt (1893, p. 1327), alone among the translators, accepts this interpretation, rendering, "from which the earrings had fallen off."

"Indra, smasher of citadels . . . of Vṛtra" vṛtrasya . . . puraṃdaraḥ: Literally, "Puraṃdara . . . of Vṛtra." The legend of Indra slaying Vṛtra is well known throughout the literature far back into the vedic period. See, for example, AV 1.32; TaiS 6.5.5; ŚatBr 1.6.3; JaimiBr 2.155; MBh 5.9–10; and Rām 1.23.17–19. See BhāgP 6.12, especially verses 3 and 29. See Bhattacharji 1970, pp. 254ff. and Dikshitar 1951–1955, vol. 1, pp. 189–90. See, too, notes to 5.19.28. See also 6.75.31; 6.97.21; and notes.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Following verse 123, D6,7,9–11,T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of two lines [1217*]: "Adorned with its earrings, the enormous head of Kumbhakarṇa resembled the moon in the midst of the sky when the twin stars of Punarvasu have risen at night.[1]"

[1]"the twin stars of Punarvasu have risen at night" āditye 'bhyudite rātrau: Literally, "when Āditya has risen at night." The exact meaning of this phrase is unclear, and it is understood variously by the different commentators and translators. The most common sense of the term āditya in a context such as this is the sun, but clearly it makes no sense for the sun to be rising at night. Ct, Cs, and Cm (as a variant) propose breaking the sequence abhyudite rātrau into abhyudite 'rātrau [= arātrau], that is, "arisen during the non-night, that is, during the day." Citing Amarakośa 3.3.251, they take alam (from the term alaṃkṛtam, "adorned," in line 1) in its sense of "blocking (vāraṇa)" and interpret the verse to mean "deprived of its shining earrings, the head of Kumbhakarṇa looked as pallid or lusterless as the moon in the sky in the morning when the sun has risen." (kuṇḍalābhyām alaṃkṛtaṃ vinākṛtam . . . kumbhakarṇasya śiraḥ. arātrau prātaḥkāla āditya udite gaganamadhyasthacandramā iva niṣprabhaṃ bhātīty arthaḥ—so Ct.) This interpretation has been followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1327), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 215), Pagani (1999, p. 1046), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 188). Cr, somewhat fancifully, takes āditye to mean "two suns." This reading, of course, retains the earrings but now has the moon floating in the sky between two suns. We have followed the interpretation of Cm (first alternative) and Cg, who take the term āditya to refer to the nakṣatra Punarvasu, which is presided over by the divinity Aditi. According to this rendering, the severed head of Kumbhakarṇa, immobile for a moment through the force of the arrow that severed it and flanked by its glittering earrings, resembles the moon suspended in the sky and flanked by the two twinkling stars that constitute Punarvasu (kartanavegād gagane sthitaṃ sat kumbhakarṇaśira āditye 'ditidevatāke punarvasunakṣatre rātrāv abhyudite tanmadhyagataś candramā ivābhātīty arthaḥ—so Cm). Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1636) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 189) follow this interpretation as well.

Ct and Cs note that many authorities consider this verse to be an interpolation (ayaṃ ślokaḥ prakṣipta iti bahavaḥ).

124. Both Ct and Cs note the apparent contradiction between Vālmīki's account of the death of Kumbhakarṇa and that related by Vyāsa in the Rāmopākhyāna of the Mahābhārata (MBh 3.271), where it is Lakṣmaṇa (Saumitri) who kills the rākṣasa with the brahmāstra. Both commentators offer explanations to rationalize the seeming contradiction. Ct explains that, as our text stated earlier, Rāma had been accompanied by Lakṣmaṇa in his effort to kill Kumbhakarṇa (see verse 92 above). However, because Rāma plays the principal role in this deed, the poet refers to him alone as the killer. On the other hand, Ct continues, Vyāsa speaks of Lakṣmaṇa as the killer because of the latter's assistance to Rāma (lakṣmaṇasāhityena). Cs, who typically bitterly rejects any interpretation offered by Ct (or Cm), proposes several alternative explanations, including that Rāma himself is referred to here as "Saumitri" because he was even dearer to Sumitrā than her own son Lakṣmaṇa. It is, Cs contends, thus like the usage of the patronymic Dāśarathi for both Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. (sumitrāyā apatyaṃ hi saumitriḥ. tasyāś ca lakṣmaṇād api premapadaṃ rāma iti tadapatyatvenokto vyāsena dāśarathir iti vā.) Alternatively, Cs proposes that this is a kind of esoteric expression (guhyabhāṣā) to refer secretly to Rāma with the term "Saumitri." Finally, Cs argues that the term "Saumitri" might be used for Rāma in the Mahābhārata through a substitution of persons (puṃvyatyāsaḥ) such as occurs when warriors struck down by the arrows of Bhīma are said to by killed by Dhanañjaya (śataṃ duryodhanādīṃs te dhanañjayaśarair hatān / darśayiṣyāmīty kṛṣṇena kṛṣṇāṃ pratyudīrite vacasi bhīmasenaśarair hatān iti vaktavye dhanañjaya ity uktivad vā jñeyaḥ). Cf. note to 6.67.36.

"the gates of the buildings on the main thoroughfares" caryāgṛhagopurāṇi: See verse 64 above; and 6.47.32 and note. Here Cg slightly modifies his definition of caryā, understanding it now to refer to "areas laid out near the rampart and suitable for the patrolling of soldiers (caryāḥ prākāropāntaklptabhaṭasaṃcārārhapradeśāḥ)."

The meter is upajāti.

Following verse 124, M3 and texts and the printed editions of Cg (VSP, KK (1905) = 6.67.160; KK = 6.67.174) insert a passage of two lines [1219*]: "Kumbhakarṇa fell, knocking down with his body tens of millions of the leaping monkeys as they fled in all directions." This verse is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 189).

125. "who looked like Himalaya" himavatprakāśam: D5,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead hi mahatprakāśam. Translators who have this reading interpret it generally to mean "of great resplendence."

"crocodiles, shoals of huge fish, and serpents" grāhān mahāmīnacayān bhujaṅgamān: The pāda is hypermetric, and a number of manuscripts correct this by substituting readings such as bhujaṅgān for bhujaṅgamān. The printed texts of Ct read instead grāhān parān mīnavarān bhujaṅgamān, "great crocodiles, splendid fish, and serpents." Printed texts of Cg read grāhān varān mīnavarān bhujaṅgān, "splendid crocodiles, splendid fish, and serpents." See 6.3.14 and note.

"before he entered the earth" bhūmiṃ ca tathā viveśa: Literally, "and he entered the earth." Cr understands that it is the tremendous force of Rāma's arrow that drives the body into the seabed (bāṇavegavaśena . . . ata eva bhūmiṃ samāviveśa), while Cg thinks that the body simply sinks to the bottom (lit., "it touched the ground") (bhūmim aspṛśad ity arthaḥ).

The meter is upajāti, with a hypermetric pāda c.

126. "the earth shook and all the mountains trembled" cacāla bhūr bhūmidharāś ca sarve: Literally, "the earth moved, and all the mountains." We follow Ct and Cs, who supply "they moved (celuḥ)" to agree with "mountains (bhūmidharāḥ)."

The meter is upajāti.

127. "The divine seers, great seers . . . gods" devarṣimaharṣi- . . . surāḥ: Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 216), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 188) and Pagani (1999, p. 1046), mistakenly reads the compound devarṣi- as a dvandva in the sense of "gods (devas) and ṛṣis." Reading the compound in this way creates a redundancy between the synonymous deva and sura, which might remain unnoticed because of Roussel's practice of leaving the terms untranslated. Dutt (1893, p. 1327) appears to do the same thing, rendering devas as "deities," and suras as "celestials."

"the spirits of the departed" bhūtāni: This term has a variety of meanings in different contexts. It can be used generically to refer to any and all living creatures, and sometimes, more restrictively, to refer, for example, to the malignant spirits that serve as Śiva's attendants. Here, since all the beings listed appear to be hovering in the sky, the generic sense seems to be ruled out. The context also rules out malignant spirits, such as those mentioned at 6.47.9,23 and notes. The reference is probably to the class of departed ancestors, or pitṛs. Cs takes the term in another of its senses, that of the five elements that constitute the physical universe. He says that these elements, space, etc., are gratified by the death of Kumbhakarṇa because he had obstructed their natural functions. (bhūtāny ākāśādīni. svakāryapratibandhakatvāt tadvadhena teṣāṃ toṣaḥ.) See notes to 6.15.4. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 189) comes closest to this idea, rendering, "the elementals." Cf. 6.4.16 and note.

"guhyakas . . . yakṣas" -guhyakāḥ . . . -yakṣa-: Both are classes of autocthonous semidivine beings associated with Kubera, the god of wealth, and are represented as guardians of his treasure. In some cases, for example, at Meghadūta 1 and 5, the terms are interchangeable. Cf. 6.4.16 and note.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila, with a hypometric pāda d.

Following verse 127, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of eight lines [1221*]: "Then upon that great slaying, the wise kinsmen of the king of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos, were shaken and wailed loudly, gazing upon the foremost of the Raghus, as might elephants upon a lion.[1][1–4] When he had slain Kumbhakarṇa in battle, Rāma was as resplendent in the midst of the army of tawny monkeys[2] as is the sun when, freed from the mouth of Rāhu, demon of the eclipse, it dispels the darkness of the heavens.[5–8]"

[1]"as might elephants upon a lion" harim . . . yathā matañgajāḥ: Literally, "as do the offspring of elephants, the lion." M3 and the printed editions of Cg (VSP, KK 1905 = 6.67.164; KK = 6.67.178) read surārditāḥ, "those afflicted by the gods," for matañgajāḥ, "elephants." The adjective must refer to the asuras or, as Cm contends, the rākṣasas. In this reading, the term hari must be taken as an epithet of either Indra or Viṣṇu rather than a kenning for "lion." Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 190) renders this reading, translating, "as the Asuras, harried by the gods, did when they looked at Hari."

[2]"in the midst of the army of tawny monkeys" harisainyamadhye: G2,3,M, and the printed editions of Cg (VSP, KK 1905 = 6.67.165; KK = 6.67.179) read instead bhuvi vānaraughe, "on the ground, in the throng of monkeys." This reading is rendered only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 190), who translates, "[shone] on earth among the apes."

The meter of lines 1–4 is vaṃśasthavila.

The meter of lines 5–8 is upajāti.

128. "countless" bahavaḥ: Literally, "many."

"their faces like blooming lotuses" prabuddhapadmapratimair ivānanaiḥ: Literally, "their faces as if having the likeness of awakening lotuses." As most of the commentators point out, the term pratimā, which at the end of compounds means "resemblance or similitude," must be taken here in the sense of "appearance or beauty" because of the force of the particle iva, "like." (pratimāśabdo 'tra rūpavacanaḥ. na tu sadṛśavacana ivaśabdaprayogāt—so Cg.)

"unassailable" durāsade: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the accusative nṛpātmajam, "son of the king," which then refers to Rāma.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

129. "whose efforts had never before been thwarted" aparājitaśramam: Literally, "of undefeated efforts." The manuscript evidence for this verse is greatly varied. T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, and Cv read instead parājitaśramam, which must then be rendered as "who had conquered weariness." This reading is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 190), who renders, "tirelessly." Ś,Ñ,V,B1,2,4,D1–4,7,8,12,13,G2, and the text of Cr read instead [a]jitaṃ kadācana, while D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct reverse the word order to read kadācanājitam. Ct explains this reading as "who had never failed to be victorious (na kadāpy ajayavantam)."

"Indra, the lord of the immortal gods" amarādhipaḥ: Literally, "the lord of the immortals."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Cm states that the death of Kumbhakarṇa occurs on the seventh lunar day [of the bright half of the month of Phālguna/Caitra] (saptamyāṃ kumbhakarṇavadhaḥ). See 6.4.4 note.

Cv and Cg conclude their comments on this lengthy sarga by remarking that scattered throughout it are a number of verses that may not be found in all versions. Cg remarks that he has not commented on those verses. He states his opinion that the [proper] number of verses in the sarga is 166 ½. (atra sarge 'dhikāḥ kecana ślokāḥ kvāpi kvāpi dṛśyante te na vyākhyātāḥ. asmin sarge sārdhaṣaṭṣaṣṭyuttaraśataślokāḥ.) This count is most closely approximated among the printed editions by VSP and KK (1913), each of which has 167. KK (1930), which includes and numbers several suspect verses including App. I, No. 35, has a total of 181 ślokas. Printed editions of Ct show 176 (NSP and GPP) or 177 (Gita Press). The text of Gorresio has 141 and that of Lahore has 155.

1. "to Rāvaṇa" rāvaṇāya: According to Cg and Cm, the syllable "ya" in the word rāvaṇāya, "to Rāvaṇa," is the eighteenth syllable of the Gāyatrīmantra as it is distributed throughout the poem. He notes further that this point marks the completion of seventeen thousand ślokas from the beginning of the poem. See note to 6.1.1.

Following verse 1, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of eight lines [1222*]: "Your majesty, he, who was like Kāla himself, has now come under Kāla's power.[1] After routing the monkey army and devouring the monkeys, after burning them up for a time, he has been extinguished by the blazing power of Rāma.[1–3] Now, his ears, legs, and arms hacked off, he lies gushing copious blood,[2] his body half-submerged in the fearsome-looking sea.[4–5] Your mountainous brother Kumbhakarṇa, mutilated by Kākutstha's arrows, lies blocking the gates of Laṅkā, like a mangled[3] tree trunk burned by a forest fire and reduced to a shapeless mass.[4][6–8]"

[1]"he, who was like Kāla himself, has now come under Kāla's power" kālasaṃkāśaḥ saṃyuktaḥ kālakarmaṇā: Literally, "resembling Kāla, he has been joined to the action of Kāla." Ct and Cr gloss kālakarmaṇā, "with the action or work of time," as "with death (mṛtyunā)." Cg makes this more explicit, explaining that the work of time is the action of death itself (kālasya mṛtyoḥ karmaṇā maraṇarūpakriyayeti yāvat). Alternatively, Cg explains the compound as a locative tatpuruṣa, glossing, "by action in time, that is, by his own matured karma (yadvā kāle karmaṇā kālakarmaṇā paripakvakarmaṇety arthaḥ)."

[2]"Now, his ears, legs, and arms hacked off, he lies gushing copious blood" nikṛttakarṇorubhujo vikṣaran rudhiraṃ bahu: Literally, "his ears, thighs, and arms cut off, [he is] flowing much blood." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead nikṛttanāsākarṇena vikṣaradrudhireṇa ca, which would then modify the instrumental kāyena, "with a body," in line 4, yielding the sense "with his body gushing blood, its nose and ears cut off." D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read -kaṇṭha-, "neck," for the Ct's -karṇa-, "ears."

[3]"mangled" vikṛtaḥ: Literally, "deformed." D7,9–11,G,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead vivṛtaḥ, "exposed." Ct notes that the sense is that Kumbhakarṇa's corpse is exposed because it has lost its clothing. (vikṛto vivṛtakāyaḥ. avastratvāt.)

[4]"reduced to a shapeless mass" lagaṇḍabhūtaḥ: Cv, Crā, Cm, and Cg refer to two possible meanings of the obscure term lagaṇḍa, either "a lump (piṇḍa)" or "a python (ajagara)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 190), the only translator consulted to share this reading, renders, like us, "a shapeless mass." The texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead agaṇḍabhūtaḥ. The commentators cite an unnamed lexical source to support their interpretation that the term means "headless, limbless trunk (aśirahpāṇipādas tu kabandho 'gaṇḍa ucyate)."

3. "Devāntaka, Narāntaka, Triśiras, and Atikāya" devāntakanarāntakau / triśirāś cātikāyaś ca: As indicated by the fact that Kumbhakarṇa is their paternal uncle and as explicitly stated by Ct, Ck, and Cr, the four rākṣasas named here must be sons of Rāvaṇa. A powerful rākṣasa warrior named Triśiras, a lieutenant of Khara, was killed in single combat with Rāma at Araṇyakāṇḍa 26. There is, however, no mention there, or in subsequent discussion of these events, that he was a son of Rāvaṇa. It is likely, therefore, that the Triśiras mentioned here is another rākṣasa of the same name. The four rākṣasas mentioned here will meet their deaths at 6.58.24 (Devāntaka), 6.57.87 (Narāntaka), 6.58.36–42 (Triśiras), and 6.59.104–105 (Atikāya).

4. "Mahodara and Mahāpārśva" mahodaramahāpārśvau: According to Ct and Ck, these are half brothers of Kumbhakarṇa (mahodaramahāpārśvau vimātrajau bhrātarau tasya). They will be killed in sarga 58 below.

5. "Rāvaṇa" sa rāvaṇaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ākulendriyaḥ, "his senses disordered."

6. "where have you gone" kva . . . gacchasi: Literally, "where are you going?" D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead tvam . . . gacchasi, "you are going." Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 191) renders this variant, translating, "you have deserted [me]."

Following 6ab, D5–7,9–11,S, and the text of Gorresio (line 1 only = 6.47.6cd) insert a passage of two lines [1224*]: "Having abandoned me because of fate, you have gone to the abode of Yama without having first removed this thorn in the side[1] of my kinsmen and me."

[1]"this thorn in the side" śalyam: Literally, "dart or thorn." A thorn or dart is a common metaphor in Sanskrit literature for a major irritation or affliction. As Cr points out, the reference is to "an arrow in the form of the enemy (ripurūpaśaram)." Cg glosses, merely, "grief (śokam)."

7. "Now I am truly lost" idānīṃ khalv ahaṃ nāsmi: Literally, "Now I do not exist." Ck, Ct, and Cr gloss, "as good as dead (mṛtaprāyaḥ)." Although acknowledging this as a possible alternative explanation, Cs ingeniously proposes, as his first alternative, that we read the phrase as ahaṃ nā nāsmi, taking nā as the nominative singular of nṛ, "man," and taking the negative particle na from pāda d to negate both asmi, "I am," and bibhemi, "I fear." Thus, he understands the phrase to mean "I am not or no longer am a man (ahaṃ nā pumān nāsmi)." The sense, according to Cs, is that Rāvaṇa now views himself as "virtually castrated." (ahaṃ nā pumān nāsmi napuṃsakaprāya ity arthaḥ . . . netyāvartate na bibhemi.)

8. "who was like the fire at the end of time . . . today" kālāgnipratimo hy adya: Literally, "like the fire of Kāla . . . today." M3 as well as the printed texts of Cg and Cm read instead kālāgnirudrapratimaḥ, which can be interpreted either as "like Rudra in the form of fire at the end of a cosmic age" or, as Raghunathan does, "like the fire at the end of a cosmic age or Rudra." This variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 191). Cf. note to 6.53.50. See, too, 6.59.52; 6.62.36; 6.83.3; and notes.

"have been slain . . . in battle by Rāghava" rāghaveṇa raṇe hataḥ: T3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead raṇe rāmeṇa vai hataḥ, "slain in battle by Rāma." This variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 191).

9. "Indra's vajra" vajra-: Literally, "the vajra."

11. "will seize the opportunity" labdhalakṣyāḥ: Literally, "having obtained an opportunity." An alternative meaning would be "having achieved their objective." Among the translators consulted, only Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 38) understands this latter meaning, rendering, "ottenuto il loro intento." The vast majority of northern and southern manuscripts (Ś1,Ñ,V1,2,B,D1,2,6,7,10,13,T1,G,M) as well as all printed editions, except for Gorresio, read instead labdhalakṣāḥ. Although the range of meanings would be similar, the critical reading is the weaker and the text should probably be emended to read labdhalakṣāḥ. See 6.57.42 and note, where the term is repeated. There, the textual support for the reading labdhalakṣāḥ is even stronger. Cf. 6.78.51 and note.

"the unbreachable gates of Laṅkā" durgāṇi laṅkādvārāṇi: Like most of the translators consulted, we understand durgāṇi to be an adjective in the sense of "impassable, inaccessible, etc.," modifying dvārāṇi. The word, however, can also be taken as a noun in the sense of "ramparts, fortifications." This interpretation has been followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1329), who renders, "gateways and fortifications of Laṅkā," and Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 38), who translates "baluardi ed alle porte di Lanka." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 190) appears to read the term both ways, rendering, "the gates and fortifications of Lanka . . . which heretofore were impregnable."

12. "what good is Sītā to me now" kiṃ kariṣyāmi sītayā: Literally, "what will I do with Sītā?" Cr argues that this expression suggests that Rāvaṇa had desired to win over Sītā for the good of his kingdom, so that now, having lost all interest in rulership, he has similarly become indifferent to Sītā (etena rājyakalyānārtham eva rāvaṇakartṛkasītāprasādakaraṇecchābhavad iti sūcitam).

"I can take no pleasure in life" jīvite nāsti me ratiḥ: Literally, "there is no pleasure in life for [lit., of] me." D6,9–11,T2,3,G2,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead matiḥ, "mind, thought, intention," for ratiḥ, "pleasure." Translators who follow the text of Ct struggle somewhat with this slightly awkward expression. They tend to follow the suggestion of Ct and Ck, who explain, "there is no intention to remain alive (saṃjīvatayāvasthāne buddhir nāstīty arthaḥ)."

13. "surely, death would be better for me than this pointless existence" nanu me maraṇaṃ śreyo na cedaṃ vyarthajīvitam: Literally, "surely death [is] better for me; not this pointless existence." Cr suggests that continued existence for Rāvaṇa would be pointless precisely in the event of a failure to avenge Kumbhakarṇa (yady ahaṃ rāghavaṃ na hanmi tarhi me maraṇaṃ śreya idaṃ bhrātṛvighātakavadharahitaṃ vyarthajīvitaṃ na śreyaḥ). Cm, after giving a straightforward analysis of the verse, argues that it also contains an inner theological meaning (vāstavārthaḥ). According to this reading, the verse means "If I kill Rāghava, the slayer of my brother, then I will not die. But then I will not attain the summum bonum [śreyaḥ], which consists of the attainment after death of inclusion in the assembly of the Lord. Therefore, this life would be pointless. (bhrātṛhantāraṃ rāghavaṃ hanmi yadi tadā me mama maraṇaṃ nāsti, ata eva śreyo maraṇānantarabhāvibhagavatpārṣadatāprāptirūpaśreyaś ca nāsti, ata evedaṃ jīvitaṃ vyartham iti sambandhaḥ.)" See notes to 6.27.4.

GPP (6.68.18) reads the ungrammatical vyarthajīvitum, a reading not attested in the critical apparatus or other texts or printed editions of Ct. This does not appear to be a simple misprint, however, as the editors note that Cr and Cg read instead vyarthajīvitam, as in the critical edition.

14. "without my brothers" bhrātṝn samutsṛjya: Literally, "having let go or released brothers." Commentators are divided as to the significance of Rāvaṇa's choice of the plural apparently to refer to Kumbhakarṇa. Cg, Crā, and Cm understand that it is the plural of respect (bahuvacanaṃ pūjāyām—Crā, Cm). Ct and Ck understand that Rāvaṇa is regretfully remembering his other slain brothers, Khara, etc. (kharādayaś cānusmaryante). Cs proposes three explanations: 1) Rāvaṇa is demonstrating through the use of the plural that he has become weak by equating the passing of one prominent brother with that of many (ekasya mukhyasya bhrātur gamanenānekaprakāreṇa svadaurbalyam āyātam iti dyotayati bahuvacanena); 2) equals Ct's explanation; and 3) Rāvaṇa is regretfully remembering his slain brother (Kumbhakarṇa) along with the two he himself has banished, viz., Vibhīṣaṇa and Kubera (vibhīṣaṇakuberābhyāṃ bahiṣkṛtābhyāṃ saha mṛtam ekaṃ saṃsmṛtya vā bahuvacanam).

Cs further notes that the natural sense of ut √sṛj, "to release, drive out," evokes the remorse that Rāvaṇa will express at verse 18 below over his banishment of Vibhīṣaṇa (utsṛjyapadasvārasyād ivottaratra sa nirasto vibhīṣaṇa iti tadanutāpasvārasyāc ca).

16. This and the following verses mark the only point in the epic where Rāvaṇa exhibits remorse over his treatment of Vibhīṣaṇa.

"This has befallen me, because . . ." tad idaṃ mām anuprāptam . . . yat: Literally, "since . . . therefore, this has befallen me." Cr, the only commentator who discusses this verse, understands idam, "this," to refer to the misery (duḥkham) that has overtaken Rāvaṇa. An alternative way to read the verse would be to take the relative and correlative yat and tat not adverbially but rather pronominally to refer to the words of Vibhīṣaṇa (vibhīṣaṇavacaḥ). This would yield the sense "Those beneficial words of great Vibhīṣaṇa, which in my folly I failed to heed, have now come back to me." This interpretation is offered by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 218), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 190), Pagani (1999, pp. 1047–48), Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 39), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 191), and Dutt (1893, p. 1330).

"in my folly" ajñānāt: Literally, "out of ignorance."

19. The meter is puṣpitāgrā.

Sarga 57

1. "After listening to the lamentations" śrutvā: Literally, "having heard." The gerund uncharacteristically lacks a direct object. Ct and Ck suggest that we supply the word vilāpam, "lamentation," and we have done so. Cr addresses the issue by taking vākyam, "words," of pāda d as the object of śrutvā, leaving the finite verb abravīt, "he said," without an explicit object. In this reading, the sequence would be "upon hearing the words . . . Triśiras spoke."

"Triśiras" triśirāḥ: One of the four sons of Rāvaṇa. See 6.47.16; 6.56.3; and notes.

2. "True enough" evam eva: Literally, "in just this fashion." The expression is ambiguous here. We follow the suggestion of Cr, who understands it to be an affirmation or acceptance of the fact of Kumbhakarṇa's death. He glosses it to mean "there is no doubt, whatever, in this matter (atra saṃśayo nāstīty arthaḥ)." Ct, Ck, Cm, and Cg understand the phrase to be recapitulating the fact that the mighty Kumbhakarṇa, qualified by all the attributes posited by Rāvaṇa in his lament in sarga 56, has indeed been slain because of fate. (evam eva devadānavadarpahā kālāgnipratima ityādyuktaprakāreṇa mahāvīryo hataḥ. daivād iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct, Ck.) The phrase could also be taken simply adverbially with the participle hataḥ, "slain," in the sense of "that is indeed the fashion in which Kumbhakarṇa was slain."

"dear . . . uncle, middlemost among you three brothers" nas tātamadhyamaḥ: Literally, "the middlemost among our venerable elders." The expression is difficult to convey succinctly in English. The term tāta here would refer collectively to Triśiras's father and uncles. Triśiras is referring to the fact that his uncle Kumbhakarṇa is the middlemost of three brothers, born as he was after Rāvaṇa and before Vibhīṣaṇa.

"true men" satpuruṣāḥ: Ct glosses, "heroes (śūrāḥ)." See 6.59.57 and note.

3. "you are a match for all the three worlds" tribhuvanasyāpi paryāptas tvam asi: Literally, "you are sufficient for the three worlds." The idea, as expressed by Ck and Ct, is that Rāvaṇa is capable of conquering the three worlds (trailokyavijayasamarthaḥ—so Ck). Cr agrees.

"in this fashion" īdṛśam: We follow Cg in taking the term adverbially with the action of grieving or feeling sorry (śokakriyāviśeṣaṇam), as opposed to Ct, who reads it adjectivally with ātmānam, "self," in the sense of "capable of conquering the three worlds (trailokyavijayasamartham)."

4. "Brahmā has given" brahmadattā: Cf. the boons that Brahmā gives to Atikāya at 6.59.31.

"rumbling like a thundercloud" meghasamasvanaḥ: Literally, "with a sound similar to [that of] a thundercloud." D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead meghasvano mahān, "huge [and] with the sound of a thundercloud."

5. "even when unarmed" viśastreṇa: Literally, "[by you] without a weapon." D5–7,9–11,T,G2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead hi śastreṇa, literally, "for or indeed, [by you] with a weapon." Translations that follow the text of Ct render this variant.

"slain" viśastāḥ: D9 and G3 read instead vitrastāḥ, "frightened." Ct notes this as a variant reading, explaining it as "the simplex for the appropriate causative, vitrāsitāḥ, 'terrified.'" None of the printed editions shows this variant. Dutt (1893, p. 1330), however, appears to read it, rendering, "have . . . been terrified."

6. "Or rather" kāmam: In this context, the adverbial use of this term can also mean "according to desire or pleasure." Most of the translators consulted have, in fact, interpreted it in this way. The only exceptions are Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 192), who reads the term as we do, rendering, "better still," and Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 39), who takes the term in its sense of "surely," rendering, "pur."

7. "Rāma shall be laid low" śayitā rāmaḥ: Literally, "Rāma will lie down." Cm understands that the true meaning (vāstavārtha) of the verse is realized only if we break up the sequence of words here as śayitā arāmaḥ, yielding the sense "someone other than Rāma shall lie (rāmo vyatiriktaḥ kaścana)." The real meaning of this, then, according to Cm, is that [killing] Rāma is beyond the capacity [of Triśiras] (rāmasyāsādhyatvād iti bhāvaḥ). See notes to 6.27.4.

"Śambara by Indra, king of the gods" śambaro devarājena: Literally, "Śambara by the king of the gods." The enmity between the asura Śambara and Indra, and the latter's destruction of the former, is known to the mythological texts as far back as the Ṛgveda (1.51.6; 1.54; 1.112.14; 1.130; 3.47; 7.18; etc.). See 6.63.42 and notes. See, too, 2.9.9–11 and note.

"Naraka by Viṣṇu" narako viṣṇunā: A number of the commentators, including Cv, Cm, Cg, and Ct (quoting Cm), identify the demon referred to here as one of the sons of Vipracitti and Siṃhikā. They support this claim by citing a verse from the Viṣṇupurāṇa that lists the offspring of this couple. (ayaṃ narakaḥ siṃhikāyāṃ vipracitter jāteṣu putreṣv anyatamaḥ. tad uktaṃ viṣṇupurāṇe vātāpir namuciś caiva ilvavaḥ sṛmaras tathā / andhako narakas caiva kālanābhas tathaiva ca // iti sa ucyate—so Cm.) These commentators further assert that this figure is not to be confused with the asura of the same name, a son of the goddess earth, who was slain by Kṛṣṇa (MBh 5.47.79) (na tu yadunāyakena hato bhaumaḥ—so Cm). Cg notes that this must be the case, since the latter Naraka could not have been born at the time of Vālmīki's composition (tasya vālmīkiprabandhanirmāṇakāla asaṃjātatvāt).

At 7.27.9 and Mahābhārata 3.165.18, Indra is said to have killed [the other?] Naraka and Śambara along with other demons. Elsewhere in the Mahābhārata (3.165.18), a demon called Naraka is also said to have been killed by Indra.

8. "impelled as he was by his own impending doom" kālacoditaḥ: Literally, "impelled by kāla (Time)." Ck and Ct raise the question as to how Rāvaṇa could hope for victory now that he knew that the defeat of Rāma was beyond the capacity of Kumbhakarṇa, one of his most formidable warriors. Their answer is that Rāvaṇa is driven in his actions by Doom or Time (kāla). The sense, according to Ct and Ck, is that under the impulsion of the Lord, in the form of Doom (kāla), whose motive was to encompass Rāvaṇa's destruction, the latter did not desist from thinking about [further] battle. (nanu kumbhakarṇāsādhye 'rthe kathaṃ rāvaṇasya tasmāj jayapratyāśayā saṃtoṣas tatrāha kālacodita iti. tannāśapravṛttakālātmakabhagavatpreraṇayā punas tasya yuddhabuddhyanuparama ity arthaḥ—Ct.)

"he felt . . . that he had obtained a new lease on life" punarjātam ivātmānaṃ manyate: Literally, "he thought himself to have been, as it were, reborn."

9. "Devāntaka, Narāntaka . . . Atikāya: devāntakanarāntakau / atikāyaḥ: Cg, evidently disturbed that Rāvaṇa has issued no instructions to these warriors, remarks that they react as they do because Triśiras's words apply equally to them (triśiraso vacanaṃ sveṣām api tulyatvāt).

10. "cried out, 'I'll go! I'll go!' " aham aham ity eva garjantaḥ: Literally, "[they were] bellowing, 'I, I.' " We agree with Cr, who understands that we must add the verbs "I will go, I will go (gamiṣyāmi gamiṣyāmi)" and the finite verb "they were (babhūvuḥ)."

12. "provided with troops and divinely charged weapons" astrabalasampannāḥ: Literally, "endowed with astras and troops." The compound could also, less plausibly, be interpreted to mean "endowed with divinely charged weapons or weapon-spells and strength" or "endowed with the power of divinely charged weapons or weapon-spells." D5,7,9–11,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead subalasampannāḥ, "endowed with great strength." See note to 6.35.5.

"None had ever been known to suffer defeat in battle" sarve samaram āsādya na śrūyante sma nirjitāḥ: Literally, "all of them had not been heard of as defeated once they had encountered battle."

Following verse 12, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1232*]: "even by the gods themselves, together with the gandharvas, kinnaras, and great serpents."

13. "endowed with higher knowledge" pravaravijñānāḥ: It is not entirely clear as to what sort of knowledge the poet is referring, whether it be martial, spiritual, or other. Ct and Ck gloss, "possessing most excellent knowledge (śreṣṭhajñānavantaḥ)," while Cg offers, "possessing knowledge of the foremost śāstras (utkṛṣṭaśāstrajñānāḥ)."

14. "who had crushed the strength of their enemies" śatrubalapramardanaiḥ: The compound can also mean "destroyers of enemy armies." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the somewhat irregular śatrubalaśriyārdanaiḥ, "destroying the strength and majesty of their enemies."

"magnanimous Indra" maghavān: Literally, "the magnanimous one."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

16. "his two brothers" bhrātarau: Literally, "the two brothers." According to Cg, these two are the brothers of Rāvaṇa (rāvaṇabhrātarau). At 6.59.1 below, Ck also identifies Mahodara as Rāvaṇa's brother. See, too, 6.58.29 and 6.58.54.

"Mahodara and Mahāpārśva" mahodaramahāpārśvau: B1,D3,6,7,9–11,T1,G1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead yuddhonmattaṃ ca mattaṃ ca, "Yuddhonmatta and Matta." The commentators, anticipating confusion or contradiction when the brothers Mahāpārśva and Mahodara are mentioned in the coming verses (verses 19, 31ff.), indicate that the names in the vulgate are alternative names or nicknames ("Frenzied-in-battle" and "Frenzied") for the names given in the critical edition (yuddhonmattamattaśabdau mahodaramahāpārśavayoḥ paryāyanāmanī—so Cm, Ct). Cs shares this view but regards these two warriors as different from the other well-known warriors also called Mahodara and Mahāpārśva, whose battles are described later on (sargas 83–86). Mahodara is slain at 6.85.27 and Mahāpārśva, at 6.86.22. Cv, apparently the only southern commentator to read with the critical text, notes the vulgate reading as a variant. All translations consulted, with the exception of Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 40), translate the variant reading. See also Pagani's note on this issue (1999, p. 1666). The Mahodara and Mahāpārśva mentioned are slain below at 6.58.28 and 53, respectively.

17. "Rāvaṇa, who made his enemies cry out" rāvaṇaṃ ripurāvaṇam: This is yet another of the etymological epithets of which Vālmīki is so fond. See note to 6.8.12. V3,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the more common lokarāvaṇam, "who made the worlds cry out." Cf., too, verse 78 and note below.

18. "with all protective herbs and fragrances" sarvauṣadhībhir gandhaiś ca: Literally, "with all herbs and with fragrances." According to the commentators, the herbs are intended to ward off the blows of weapons (āyudhaprahāranivārakauṣadhiviśeṣaiḥ—so Ct). Cg cites an āyurvedic verse according to which the term sarvauṣadhī, "all herbs," refers to a specific set of ten fragrant or healing herbs (koṣṭhaṃ [v.l. koṣṭaṃ, kuṣṭhaṃ, kuṣṭam] māṃsī haridre dve murā śaileyacandane / vacācampakamustāś ca sarvauṣadhyo daśāmṛṭāḥ //). Cf. Rajananighaṇṭu 22.61, which specifies eight fragrant healing herbs. The ten plants in question are koṣṭa [or kuṣṭha v.l. kuṣṭā], Costus speciosus; māṃsī, or musk root, Nardostachys jatamansi; two kinds of haridra, or turmeric, Cucuma Longa; murā, an unidentified fragrant plant; śaileya, gum benjamin or gum benzoin, Styrax benzoin; candana, or sandal, Sirium myrtifolium; vacā, common sweet flag, Acorus calamus; campaka, or Michelia campaka; and mustā, the root of nutgrass, Cyperus rotundus.

Following verse 18, D5–7,9–11,S (except M5) insert a passage of two lines [1233*]: "Impelled as they were by their own impending doom, Triśiras, Atikāya, Devāntaka, Narāntaka, Mahodara, and Mahāpārśva set forth."

19. "an elephant named Sudarśana" sudarśanaṃ nāma: Literally, "named Sudarśana." The critical text lacks a word for elephant, although the kind of creature is evident from the fact that it is a descendant of Indra's great battle-elephant, Airāvata. Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,7–13,G2,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read nāgam, "elephant," in place of the adverb nāma, "by name."

20. "equipped with every weapon and adorned with quivers" sarvāyudhasamāyuktaṃ tūṇībhiś ca svalaṃkṛtam: D6,9–11,13,T2,G3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -samāyuktaḥ for -samāyuktam, making the compound modify Mahodara rather than his elephant. V3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read [a]py alaṃkṛtaḥ, "and ornamented," for the critical edition's svalaṃkṛtam, making the participle modify Mahodara rather than his elephant.

"Sūrya, impeller of all creatures," savitā: Literally, "the impeller." The aspect of the sun as "the impeller of creatures" is celebrated as far back as the Ṛgveda, in the famous Gāyatrīmantra (ṚV 3.62). See note to 6.75.26, 1668*, line 2 and note. Compare notes to 6.93.27, App. I, No. 65, lines 19–20.

"perched on the summit of the western mountain" astamūrdhani: Literally, "on the head of Asta." Asta, literally, "setting," is the term used to refer to the western mountain range, behind which the sun is perceived to set. See 6.16.47; 6.19.13–15; and notes. Ct and Cg take the simile to suggest Mahodara's imminent demise (anena śīghraṃ nāśaḥ sūcitaḥ).

21. "laden with every sort of weapon" sarvāyudhasamākulam: Literally, "full of all weapons."

22. "charged with lightning and meteors" savidyudulkaḥ: Literally, "with lightning and meteors." It is not clear why a cloud should be accompanied by meteors. Perhaps the reference is to large hailstones.

"flashing fire" sajvālaḥ: D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead śailāgre, "[perched] on a mountain peak." This is perhaps an emendation that serves to avoid the seeming redundancy of flames and lightning while at the same time reflecting the comparison of the great chariot to a lofty mountain. Among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 192) renders this variant.

"traversed by a rainbow" sendracāpaḥ: Literally, "with the bow of Indra."

23. "with his three diadems" tribhiḥ kirīṭaiḥ: It is evident that we are to take Triśiras's name (i.e., "three-headed") literally.

25. "splendidly yoked" susaṃyuktam: According to Cr and Ct, this means "having well-yoked horses (susaṃyuktāśvam—so Ct)." Cg, however, glosses, "firm, solid (sudṛḍham)."

"It had a fine frame" sānukarṣam: Literally, "with an anukarṣa." According to Ct, Cr, and Ck, this is a piece or block of wood placed above the axle as a support or receptacle for the yoke pole (rathākṣopari kūbarādhāratayā sthāpito dāruviśeṣo 'nukarṣaḥ). These commentators, as well as Cg and Cm, quote Amarakośa 2.8.57, which defines anukarṣa as "a block of wood placed below (dārv adhaḥstham)." Translators take the term variously to mean "axle-tree, bottom, carriage, body (caisse)" or leave the term untranslated. The term also occurs at 6.59.18 below. Cf. MBh 6.85.34; 6.92.64; 6.102.21; 7.43.17; 7.88.10; 7.97.23; 7.113.17; 7.172.36; 8.24.70; and 9.13.7. Hopkins (1889, pp. 186–87) understands anukarṣa, or "the drag," with its various interpretations, as, primarily and most simply, "a piece of additional wood fastened beneath the car for the purpose of quickly repairing damages sustained in battle." He identifies it as "part of the upaskaras, or general furnishing, of the war-car." Hopkins goes on to note that the anukarṣa may have been used as ballast to prevent the chariot, which, according to him, was very light as it was constructed from bamboo, from tipping over.

26. "Atikāya was as resplendent as . . . illuminated" saḥ . . . babhau: Literally, "he shone or resembled."

"of the shining sun" bhāsvataḥ: Literally, "of the shining one." Textual support for the critical reading is weak. Only four manuscripts (D5,T1,M1,2) read with the critical edition. With the exception of B2, which reads toyadaḥ, "a cloud," the remaining northern manuscripts read the nominative bhāskaraḥ, "the sun." This reading, in which the sun itself, rather than Mount Meru, becomes the upamāna, entails either the elimination of the word "Meru" or its shift to an oblique case. This variant is translated only by Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 41). The remaining southern manuscripts and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read the present participle bhāsayan, "shining," which must then modify Meru.

27. "Standing in that chariot" rathe tasmin: Literally, "in that chariot."

"Indra, vajra in hand" vajrapāṇiḥ: Literally, "he who has a vajra in his hand."

28. "Uccaiḥśravas himself" uccaiḥśravaḥ-: Literally, "the one with erect ears." This is the name of Indra's celebrated battle-steed, produced during the churning of the ocean. See 1.44.14–17, esp. notes to verse 14.

29. "Guha" guhaḥ: This is one of the several names for the mighty war god, also known as Skanda, Kārttikeya, Subrahmaṇya, Kumāra, etc., who is the son of Lord Śiva.

"amid his enemies in battle" śatruṣv ivāhave: D5,7,10,11,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead śikhigato yathā, "like [Guha] mounted upon his peacock." The peacock is the vāhana, or mount, of this divinity.

30. "studded with diamonds" vajrabhūṣaṇam: Literally, "adorned with diamonds." D5,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead hemabhūṣaṇam, "adorned with gold."

"looked like the very image of Viṣṇu" vapur viṣṇor viḍambayan: Literally, "imitating the form of Viṣṇu." As the commentators note, we must carry over the finite verb virarāja, "resplendent as, resembled," from the previous verse (virarājety anukarṣaḥ—so Ct).

"when he had seized the mountain with both arms" parigṛhya giriṃ dorbhyām: As the commentators suggest, the reference is to Viṣṇu's having seized Mount Mandara to serve as the churning rod at the time of the churning of the ocean (samudramathane mandaragiriṃ parigṛhya sthitasya viṣṇoḥ—so Ct). The story is told at 1.44.14ff. See ad loc. and notes. However, no specific reference is made there to Viṣṇu's having taken hold of the mountain. Northern manuscripts substitute a passage of one line [1240*] in place of 30cd, which states that Viṣṇu uprooted Mount Mandara in battle.

32. "surrounded by incomparable troops . . . were like the gods in Amarāvatī, surrounded by incomparable troops" balair apratimair vṛtāḥ / surā ivāmarāvatyāṃ balair apratimair vṛtāḥ //: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read, for the first occurrence of balair apratimair vṛtāḥ [pāda b], [a]marāvatyāḥ surā iva, while D5,7,9–11,T,G1,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck omit pādas cd. The resulting line in the printed text of Ct is thus [te pratasthur mahātmāno] 'marāvatyāḥ surā iva, "As those great warriors set forth [from Lañkā], like the gods from Amarāvatī." Ct and Ck supply the phrase "from Lañkā (lañkāyāḥ)."

"those great warriors" mahātmānaḥ: Literally, "the great ones."

33. "mounted on elephants and horses and riding on chariots" gajaiś ca turañgaiś ca rathaiś ca: Literally, "with elephants, horses, and chariots."

35. "The white row of parasols" chatrāṇām āvaliḥ sitā: These would be the white parasols, symbols of royalty, that would be held above the princes. The term is subject to variation in the different manuscript traditions. D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vastrāṇām āvaliḥ śivā, "the auspicious line of garments." D5–7,T1,2,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cr read śastrāṇām, "of weapons," for chatrāṇām, "of parasols." This yields the sense "a glittering line of weapons." See 6.47.13–14; 6.60.14; 6.115.13–16; 6.116.25–26; and notes.

"a line of haṃsas" haṃsāvaliḥ: Although the haṃsa is commonly identified as the bar-headed goose, or Anser indicus, that cannot be the bird intended here as these birds are not white. More likely the bird represented here is either the Mute swan (Cygnus olor) or Whooper swan (Cygnus cygnus). See Dave 1985, pp. 422–31. See, too, Thieme 1975, pp. 3–36. See note to 6.110.22.

36. "grimly resolved, for they had determined" niścitya . . . iti kṛtvā matim: Literally, "having decided, they made up their mind[s]."

37. "bellowed, roared" jagarjuś ca praṇeduś ca: This is another of those pairs of near synonyms of which the poet is so fond. Cg attempts to avoid the redundancy by taking the former term to refer to a thundering sound and the latter to a leonine roar. (jagarjuḥ meghadhvaniṃ cakruḥ. praṇeduḥ siṃhanādaṃ cakruḥ.) See note to 6.2.14.

"loosed arrows in their frenzy" cikṣipuś cāpi sāyakān / jahṛṣuś ca: Literally, "they threw arrows and were delighted." The critical reading jahṛṣuḥ is textually weak, apparently known to only five manuscripts (D2,3,G1,M1,2). According to the critical apparatus, Ś,Ñ2,V1,2,B,D5–13,T,G2,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of all southern commentators read jagṛhuḥ, "they grabbed or seized." However, unnoted in the critical apparatus is that the printed editions of Gorresio and Lahore read with the critical edition. The few remaining manuscripts (Ñ1,V3,D1,4) read jahasuḥ, "they laughed."

Cv, Ct, Cm, and Cg explain their reading jagṛhuḥ by taking cikṣipuḥ to mean not "they loosed or fired" but "they hurled insults." This permits them to take sāyakān as the object of the verb jagṛhuḥ, "they seized." (cikṣipuḥ kṣepavacanāny ūcuḥ. sāyakān jagṛhur ity anvayaḥ.) This interpretation is followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 194), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 221), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 193). Dutt (1893, p. 1333), Pagani (1999, p. 1050), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1645) take sāyakān as the object of both cikṣipuḥ and jagṛhuḥ, with the notion that the rākṣasas "took up and then loosed their arrows."

38. "the slapping of their arms" -āsphoṭa-: See notes to 6.17.13–15.

39. "with its upraised boulders and trees" samudyataśilānagam: Literally, "having rocks and immovable objects upraised." The term naga, "that which does not go," can refer equally to trees and mountains. We understand with Ct that the reference is to trees (nagā vṛkṣāḥ). Dutt (1893, p. 1333), however, alone among the translators consulted, renders, "upraised rocks and stones."

40. "the army of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos" nairṛtaṃ balam: Literally, "the nairṛta army." V2,B3,4,D6,9–11,T2,3,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read rākṣasam for nairṛtam, yielding "the rākṣasa army."

41. "it bristled with huge weapons" samudyatamahāyudham: Literally, "its huge weapons raised."

"filled" vṛtam: Literally, "surrounded."

42. "perceiving their opportunity" labdhalakṣyāḥ: Ś2,Ñ,V,B,D1–3,5–10,12,T1,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead labdhalakṣāḥ. See note at 6.56.11. We understand the compound here in more or less the sense proposed by Cr, who understands that the monkeys have now obtained targets for their blows and have therefore raised their weapons (prāptaprahāraviṣayā ata eva samudyatamahāśailāḥ). Cg and Cm similarly gloss, "having found scope for their valor (labdhaparākramaviṣayāḥ)."

"again and again" muhur muhuḥ: T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read instead mahābalāḥ, "mighty, powerful."

Following verse 42, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1246*]: "Unable to tolerate the rākṣasas, the monkeys roared back at them." The line poses a slight narrative difficulty. Since it was the monkeys themselves who are shown to be bellowing in the preceding verse (42), it seems slightly awkward to have them now roar back at the rākṣasas, who have not been described as roaring since verse 37 above. Nonetheless, the difficulty is not insurmountable, as one would understand that the rākṣasa army would have continued its vociferation. The problem has persuaded Cr to force the grammar so as to take the nominative vānarāḥ of pāda b as the object of the verb "they roared back (pratinardanta v.l. for pratinardanti)" on the somewhat dubious grounds that the fact of the noun's collectivity enables us to read it as an accusative without it being in the second, or objective, case (samudāyasya karmatvān na dvitīyā). Cr thus understands that the rākṣasas are setting up a counter-roar against the vānaras. This interpretation appears to have been followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1333), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 221), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 193).

43. "the resounding cries" samudghuṣṭaravam: Literally, "the sounded cry." Ñ,V,B2–4,D4,6,9–11,T2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead samutkṛṣṭa-, "loud."

The meter is upajāti.

44. "stormed about" viceruḥ: Literally, "they moved about."

"with . . . boulders" śailaiḥ: The word can also refer to mountains, and we have so translated it elsewhere (for example, see verses 46, 48–49 below). Here, however, given the simile, such a translation would be redundant. Cr, the only commentator to deal with this verse, glosses, "with mountain peaks (śailaśṛṅgaiḥ)." A number of northern manuscripts, as well as the editions of Gorresio (6.49.32) and Lahore (6.49.30), read instead śṛṅgaiḥ, which may similarly be an attempt at a gloss (Pollock 1984a, pp. 85–86).

45. "Armed with trees and boulders . . . stormed through" cerur drumaśilāyudhāḥ: Literally, "they moved about with trees and rocks for weapons." D6,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead kecit, "some," in place of ceruḥ, "they moved." This restricts the possession of trees and boulders to a third group of monkeys, different from the two mentioned as engaging in aerial and ground assaults. It also deprives the verse of a finite verb, which must then be supplied, as Cr suggests (vicerur iti śeṣaḥ). Translations that follow the texts of Ct and Cr tend to construe this third kecit with the southern insert [1247*] that follows.

Following verse 45, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1247*]: "[Some of those] bulls among monkeys [stormed about],[1] having seized trees with huge trunks. Then a fearsome battle took place between the massed rākṣasas and monkeys.[2]" All these texts repeat line 2 following 1253* (see notes to verse 56 below).

[1]"[Some of those] . . . [stormed about]": For the syntax, see note to verse 45 above.

[2]"the massed rākṣasas and monkeys" rakṣovānarasaṃkulam: Literally, "[battle] crowded with rākṣasas and monkeys."

46. "were kept at bay" vāryamāṇāḥ: Literally, "being warded off."

"unleashed a stupendous hail" cakrur vṛṣṭim anuttamām: Literally, "they made an unsurpassed shower." D7,9–11,T3,G3,M2,3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead anūpamām [v.l. anupamām], "incomparable."

"mountains" -śailaiḥ: See note to verse 44 above.

47. "Both the rākṣasas and the monkeys . . . in the battle" raṇe rākṣasavānarāḥ: Cr, who evidently wishes to restrict the action to only the monkeys in this verse, breaks up the sandhi and this unexceptional dvandva compound into the elements raṇe 'rākṣasāḥ [=arākṣasāḥ], "non-rākṣasas," which he glosses as "monkeys inimical to rākṣasas," the particle vā, "or," and narāḥ, "men," which he glosses as "leaping monkeys similar to men" (arākṣasā rākṣasavirodhino vā narā narasadṛśāḥ plavaṅgamāḥ).

"the yātudhānas" yātudhānān: See note to verses 48–49 below.

48–49. "the yātudhānas" yātudhānān: See 6.3.27 and note.

"by . . . falling mountain peaks" śailaśṛṅganipātaiś ca: Literally, "by the descents of mountain peaks." The critical reading is supported by only a handful of diverse manuscripts (Ś2,D6,8,G1,3). The critical apparatus shows no fewer than fourteen variants, all of which, however, are adjectives in the nominative plural. The critical reading should have been marked as uncertain. The instrumental plural could also be construed as the karaṇa, or instrument, of the finite verb nijaghnuḥ, "they slaughtered," in pāda 49a, yielding the sense "they slaughtered with descents of mountain peaks." It is also possible to take the compound as a bahuvrīhi modifying muṣṭibhiḥ, "with fists," in the sense of "with fists that had the impact (lit., descent) of mountain peaks." D9,11,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read -[ā]citāñgāḥ for -nipātaiś ca, yielding the sense "their bodies piled up with mountain peaks." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 195) renders this reading, translating, "the bodies of some being buried under mountain crests." D10 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead [a]nvitāñgās te, which, according to Ct, who glosses, "their bodies covered with mountain peaks (giriśikharair vyāptadehāḥ)," has a similar meaning. Cf. note to verse 44 above.

Following verse 49, B3,D5–7,9–11,S, [Ñ,V,B2,4,D4,10 insert line 1 after verse 49; line 2 after 50ab; and lines 3–4 after verse 51] insert a passage of four lines [1248*]: "Meanwhile, the rākṣasas cut down those elephants among monkeys with their sharp arrows and slew them with lances, war hammers, swords, darts, and javelins.[1–2] The monkeys and the rākṣasas, their bodies drenched with the blood of their foes, struck one another down in their eagerness to conquer one another.[3–4]"

51. The verse, as recorded in the critical edition, appears to us to make only marginal sense. Here a complex set of editorial decisions have resulted in a passage that is actually found in no other manuscript or printed edition of the text. See Sutherland 1992. A comparison of the various versions shows an interpolation of two lines interspersed between and following the lines of the critical edition, and an interpolation of one line into many of the northern manuscripts. In addition, the various versions show different cases for various words so that the same descriptions may apply in one version to the rākṣasas, in another to the monkeys, and in yet another to both.

The southern recension—D5–7,9–11,S—inserts two lines, one [1250*] after 51ab, and the other [1251*] after 51cd. The critical text with the two inserts [1250*, 1251*] is most closely represented by the printed editions of Cg (VSP 6.67.56cd–57; KK 6.67.56cd–57). A translation of this passage would be as follows: "Then the earth was filled with rākṣasas, crushers of their foes, drunk with battle, like shattered mountains;[51ab–1250*] for they had been thrown down and repulsed, their lances broken by the monkeys.[51cd] Although they were near death,[1] still they put up a wondrous battle with their bare limbs.[1251*]" This version is translated by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 195).

[1]"Although they were near death" āsannāḥ: Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1646), which reads a mixed version (see below), takes the participle, less persuasively and somewhat redundantly in our opinion, as "at close quarters." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 195) appears to ignore this term.

The printed editions of Ct (GPP, NSP 6.67.55cd–56) show a number of variations from the previous text. This variant would be translated as follows: "Then the earth was filled with shattered rākṣasas, who resembled mountains, and who, although drunk with battle, had been battered.[51ab–1250* with variants] They had been thrown down and repulsed by the monkeys with broken rocks.[51cd with variants] Then the monkeys put up a wondrous battle with their bare limbs.[1][1251* with variants]"

[1]"with their bare limbs" aṅgaiḥ: Literally, "with limbs." We follow Ct, who glosses, "with hands, feet, etc. (hastapādādibhiḥ)," and who, we believe, understands that the monkeys [or rākṣasas] are now fighting hand to hand. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 222), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 194) and Pagani (1999, p. 1051), understands that the monkeys are using severed limbs found on the battlefield as weapons.

Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, pp. 1645–46) reads the first line with Ct and the second with Cg. The printed editions of Gorresio and Lahore present still other versions of this passage (Gorresio 6.49.41–42ab; Lahore 6.49.38). Gorresio's edition reads 1250* following 51ab, although this is not noted by the critical apparatus. His version would yield: "Then the earth was filled with shattered rākṣasas, who resembled mountains, and who, although drunk with battle, had been battered.[51ab–1250* with variants] Throwing down and being thrown down the yātudhānas and the monkeys . . . [1248*, line 8]." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 43) translates this passage as follows: "ed era gremito il suolo di Racsasi pari a monti e inebbriati dalla battaglia, quà e là distesi e sgretolati. Rincacciando e i rincacciati, vānari e Racsasi."

The Lahore edition (6.49.38) has only two lines (= 51 with variants). These would be translated as: "Thrown down and repulsed, their heads broken, the monkeys were battered and shattered, cut down by the rākṣasas with their arrows."

52. "Night-roaming rākṣasas" rajanīcarāḥ: The printed editions of GPP, NSP, and Gita Press (6.69.57) read instead nairṛtarṣabhāḥ, "bulls among the sons of chaos (nairṛtas)." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"monkeys with monkeys . . . rākṣasas with rākṣasas" vānarān vānaraiḥ . . . rākṣasān rākṣaāḳṣasas" vānarān vānaraiḥ . . . rākṣasān rākṣasaiḥ: The commentators are silent on exactly what is happening here. Evidently, we are to understand that the combatants are hurling the bodies [living or dead] of their enemies against other enemies. A majority of the translators consulted understand that it is specifically corpses that are being used as weapons.

53. "the tawny monkeys' . . . them . . . the rākṣasas' . . . them" teṣām . . . harīn . . . teṣām . . . rakṣāṃsi: Literally, "of them . . . [they slaughtered] tawny monkeys . . . of them . . . [they slaughtered] rākṣasas." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read śailān, "mountains," for the first teṣām, and tadā, "then," for harīn, "tawny monkeys." This lends the first line the sense "seizing stones and mountains, the rākṣasas then began to slaughter."

54. "roared like lions" siṃhanādān vineduḥ: Literally, "they roared lion roars."

"with boulders, lances, and missiles" śailaśūlāstraiḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead śailaśṛṅgaiś ca, "and with mountain peaks." See note to verse 44 above.

55. "their mail and armor pierced" chinnavarmatanutrāṇāḥ: The term tanutrāṇa, literally, "body protector," is more or less synonymous with varma, "armor." Cg, the only commentator to address this issue, glosses, "their body protection, in the form of armor, pierced (chinnavarmarūpatanutrāṇāḥ)."

"vital sap" rasasāram: The compound is slightly ambiguous, since both rasa and sāra can refer to tree sap. We take the latter term here in its sense of "most essential portion." Ct, Cg, Cm, and Cr gloss, "tree sap or resin (niryāsam)."

56. Following verse 56, D5–7,T1,G1,3,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg insert a passage of two lines [1253*]: "Their minds worked up to a frenzy, all the tawny monkeys, holding huge boulders,[1] slaughtered the rākṣasas with many-branched trees."

[1]"huge boulders" -mahāśilāḥ: M3, KK, and VSP read instead -manaḥśilāḥ, "red arsenic." This variant is rendered only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 195), who translates, "rocks of antimony."

Following 1253*, all these manuscripts repeat line 2 of 1247*. See note to verse 45 above.

57. "horseshoe-headed, half-moon-headed" kṣuraprair ardhacandraiś ca: According to Apte (s.v.), kṣurapra refers to "an arrow with a sharp horseshoe-shaped head." The critical edition has a small typographical error unnoted in the errata. It mistakenly reads kṣuraprarairdhacandraiś ca. Cf. 6.35.23; 6.55.117; and notes. See, too, 6.44.18 and note.

58. "With the monkeys and rākṣasas . . . and with all the shattered mountaintops and splintered trees" vikīrṇaiḥ parvatāgraiś ca drumaiś chinnaiś ca . . . kapirakṣobhiḥ: Literally, "with shattered mountaintops, split trees, and monkeys and rākṣasas." D9–11,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read vikīrṇā, "littered, scattered," an adjective describing the ground or earth (vasudhā), while D9,10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read parvatās taiś ca for the critical edition's parvatāgraiś ca. In addition, D9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read drumacchinnaiś ca for drumaiś chinnaiś ca. Following Ct in reading the latter two compounds as paranipāta, the half verse would mean "littered with scattered mountains and splintered trees (nirastaparvataiḥ . . . chinnadrumaiḥ)." One can also take the compounds as adjectives meaning "tossed by mountains and shattered by trees," and modifying the compound kapirakṣobhiḥ, "with monkeys and rākṣasas." The verse would then mean "Littered with monkeys and rākṣasas, who had been slain in battle—tossed by mountains and shattered by trees—the ground became impassable." This interpretation has been followed by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 222) and, after him, Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 194).

Following verse 58, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines [1258*]: "Abandoning their fear, all the monkeys, whose actions reflected their pride and excitement,[1] entered the battlefield, and there, in high spirits and armed with various weapons,[2] they gave battle to the rākṣasas."

[1]"whose actions reflected their pride and excitement" garvitahṛṣṭaceṣṭāḥ: We follow Cg in reading the first two elements of the compound adverbially. He explains, "they behaved proudly and excitedly (garvitaṃ hṛṣṭaṃ ca yathā bhavati tathā ceṣṭanta iti)." Ck, Cr, and Ct read the compound slightly differently to mean "whose pride was aroused and whose actions were excited (saṃjātagarvā hṛṣṭaceṣṭā yeṣāṃ te—so Ct)."

[2]"armed with various weapons" nānāyudhāḥ: Ct and Ck understand this to refer to the normal weaponry of the monkeys, viz., trees, rocks, teeth, claws, etc. (drumaśaila-dantanakhādinānāpraharaṇayutāḥ), while Cg takes it as a reference to weapons seized from the rākṣasas (gṛhītarākṣasāyudhā ity arthaḥ).

The meter of 1258* is indravajrā.

59. "cheered" neduḥ: Literally, "they shouted."

The meter is upajāti.

60. "the army of the monkey king" vānararājasainyam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vānarasainyam ugram, "the fierce monkey army."

The meter is upajāti.

61. "In an instant . . . single-handedly" ekaḥ kṣaṇena: Literally, "one in an instant." Ś2,Ñ2,V3,B1,4,D8,12,T2,3,G2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, as well as the texts of Gorresio (6.49.55) and Lahore (5.49.50), both unnoted by the critical edition, read instead ekakṣanena, "in a single moment or instant."

The meter is upajāti.

62. "that great warrior" mahātmānam: Literally, "the great one."

"rampaged" carantam: Literally, "moving, ranging."

63. "One could mark his path" sa tasya dadṛśe mārgaḥ: Literally, "His path was seen."

65. B3,D6,7,9–11,T2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read pāda ab of verse 65 after verse 66 below.

"in the midst of the battle" samgrāmānte: Literally, "inside or in the interior or the end of the battle." Ñ1,V3,B3,4,D4,G1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead saṃgrāmāgre, "in the forefront or vanguard of the battle."

66. See note to verse 65 above for the verse order in printed editions of Ct.

67. "rampaged" vicacāra: Literally, "he roamed about."

"everything in his path" sarvataḥ: Literally, "on all sides."

68. "to flee" dhāvitum: Literally, "to run." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bhāṣitum, "to speak." The critical apparatus prints this incorrectly as bhāvitum. Translators who follow the text of Ct render bhāṣitum, with the exception of Dutt (1893, p. 1336), who mistakenly appears to have read bhāsitum, "to appear," and therefore renders, "could not appear prominently."

"in any direction" kutaḥ: Literally, "from where." D7,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Cg read instead bhayāt, "out of fear." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 196) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1647) render this variant.

"to . . . stand their ground . . . stood still" sthātum . . . sthitam: Literally, "to stand . . . stood."

69. "Pierced" bhinnāni: Ś,Ñ2,D2,7–12, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bhagnāni, "broken."

"by that lone warrior, who, with his dart as brilliant as the sun, was like Yama, the ender of all things" ekenāntakakalpena prāsenādityatejasā: Literally, "by that one, who resembled Antaka, with the dart that had the splendor of the sun." We share the view of Cr, against the unanimous opinion of the translators consulted, that the first two words of the verse refer to Narāntaka, who is the subject of the participle bhinnāni, "pierced," in pāda c, and that prāsena is the karaṇa, or instrument, of the participle (ekena narāntakena bhagnāni harisainyāni nipetuḥ). Other translators regard prāsa as the subject and regard all the adjectives in pādas ab to modify it, yielding the sense "pierced by that single dart, as brilliant as the sun and resembling death, the ender of all things."

70. "of a thunderbolt" vajra-: This could also be a reference to Indra's weapon, the vajra. Cf. verses 87–88 and notes below.

"wailed loudly" vinedur mahāsvanam: Literally, "they roared a loud sound."

*72. "those . . . fully recovered" te 'svasthāḥ: Literally, "those . . . who were unwell." The critical editors have printed the term as if it were the negative by inserting an avagraha to mark the elision of the negative prefix "a." There is, however, no reason for them to have done so, as manuscripts would not generally mark any such elision. All commentators and printed editions uniformly have the contextually apposite svasthāḥ, "healthy, recovered," and this reading has been followed by all translators who share this half verse. The idea, as expressed by Cg, is that the principal monkeys, such as Nīla, etc., who had been knocked unconscious by Kumbhakarṇa, have now recovered, and the poet mentions this to maintain narrative consistency with their later heroic actions (kumbhakarṇena pātitānāṃ nīlādīnām uttaratra pauruṣakathanasāṅgatyāyaiṣāṃ labdhasaṃjñatvam āha). None of the commentators acknowledges the possibility of reading asvasthāḥ. On the basis of all this, we propose emending the critical text to remove the avagraha and have translated accordingly.

73. "in all directions" itas tataḥ: Literally, "here and there."

75. "Then" atha: D6,7,9–11,T2,3,G,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead dṛṣṭvā, "having seen."

76. "Hero, you must advance against that rākṣasa" gacchainaṃ rākṣasaṃ vīra: Literally, "go to that rākṣasa, O hero." Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1,4,6,8–12,T2,3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the accusative vīram for the critical edition's vocative vīra, yielding the sense "go to that rākṣasa hero."

"terrorizing" kṣobhayantam: Literally, "causing to shake or tremble." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bhakṣayantam, "devouring, eating."

"the army of tawny monkeys" haribalam: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead parabalam, "the army of the enemy."

"you must . . . kill him" prāṇair viyojaya: Literally, "separate [him] from [his] life breaths."

77. "forth from that host—so like a cloud—as does the many-rayed sun from a host of clouds" anīkān meghasaṃkāśān meghānīkād ivāṃśumān: Literally, "from that army, which resembled a cloud, like the one possessing rays from a cloud-army." Cg comments on the basis for the two similes. He notes that the comparison of the monkey army to a mass of clouds is derived from their shared quality of density, whereas the comparison of Aṅgada to the sun is based on their shared quality of emergence from a mass. (meghasaṃkāśād iti nibiḍatvalakṣaṇasamānadharmaprayukteyam upamā. meghānīkād ity atra tu niṣkramaṇāpādānatvadharmaprayuktety upamādvayasya nirvāhaḥ.)

V3,D6,7,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Cr, Ck, and Ct read aṃśumān iva vīryavān for meghānīkād ivāṃśumān. This can be interpreted here either to mean "like the mighty-rayed one" or "that mighty one [Aṅgada], [who was] like the rayed one."

78. "Adorned with his golden armlets . . . Aṅgada" aṅgadaḥ . . . aṅgadasaṃnaddhaḥ: Literally, "Aṅgada girded with aṅgadas (armlets)." This is yet another of the etymological epithets of which Vālmīki is so fond. See verse 17 and note above. See 6.54.25; 6.116.67; and notes.

"laced with shining ore" sadhātuḥ: Literally, "with minerals or metallic ore."

80. "Why bother with" kim . . . tvaṃ kariṣyasi: Literally, "what will you do with."

"as hard to the touch as adamant" vajrasamasparśe: Ś,Ñ2,V2,B1,4,D2,4–6,8–12, T,G1,2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead the accusative vajrasamasparśam, which then modifies prāsam, "dart."

81. Following verse 81, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1269*]: "Approaching Vālin's son Aṅgada, Narāntaka, in a rage . . ."

82. The meter is upajāti.

83. "the coils" -bhoga-: Ś1,D5,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead the awkward -vīrya-, "power, strength."

"Narāntaka's" asya: Literally, "of him."

The meter is upajāti.

84. "the horse" tasya vājī: Literally, "his horse."

"its feet driven into the earth" nimagnapādaḥ: Literally, "its feet sunken." Ñ2,V3,B1,D2,13,M3, the printed editions of Gorresio and Lahore, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead nimagnatāluḥ, "its palate sunken in." Of the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 197; "its jaw bashed in") and Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 46; "col palato schiacciato in bocca") render this variant.

The meter is upajāti.

86. "great gouts" tīvram: We take the term here as an adverb in the sense of "copiously." See 6.59.81 and note.

"he flared up in anger" vijajvāla: Literally, "he burned." The verb is somewhat ambiguous here and has lent itself to three different interpretations on the part of the translators. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 197) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 196), like us, understand that Aṅgada flares up in anger at the blow before losing consciousness. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1649) and (Dutt 1893, p. 1337) understand that Aṅgada experienced a burning sensation before fainting. Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 46), understands similarly, rendering, "arse ad ora ad ora come fiamma." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 224) and Pagani (1999, p. 1053) believe that Aṅgada actually emits flames, "il projeta des flammes" (so Roussel).

The meter is upajāti.

87. "thunderbolt" vajra-: This could also be a reference to Indra's weapon, the vajra. However, given the context, it probably refers to a thunderbolt. Cf. verses 70–71 and notes above. Ś,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mṛtyu-, "death."

The meter is upajāti.

88. "His chest shattered by the impact of that fist" muṣṭiniṣpiṣṭavibhinnavakṣāḥ: We follow the interpretation of Cr, who takes -niṣpiṣṭa- nominally in the sense of "impact (vega)" rather than adjectivally in the sense of "crushed" (muṣṭer niṣpiṣṭena vegena). D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read -nirbhinna-, "split," for -niṣpiṣṭa-, "impact." In addition, D10,11,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read -nimagna-, "sunk in, stove in," for -vibhinna-, "shattered." The resulting compound in the text of Ct yields "his chest shattered and stove in by that fist."

The meter is upajāti.

89. "that most eminent of heroes" [a]gryavīre: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D2–4,6–8,12,13, and the printed editions of Gorresio and Lahore read ativīrye [D6—agra-], "of extraordinary power/strength," while D1,5,9–11,T2,3,G,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead agryavīrye, "whose valor or strength is outstanding." Translators who follow the text of Ct, with the apparent exception of Pagani (1999, p. 1053), render this variant. Given the strength of the textual evidence, the reading -vīre should at least have been marked as doubtful.

"hovering in the sky" antarikṣe: Literally, "in the sky or atmosphere."

The meter is upendravajrā.

90. "of extraordinary might and valor" ativīryavikramaḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the hypometric atha bhīmakarmā, "of fearsome deeds."

"he was somewhat astonished" visiṣmiye so 'pi: Commentators and translators are divided as to whether this phrase refers to Aṅgada or Rāma. Ck, Ct, and Cr take the latter position; thus, in their view, the verse's sequence of verbs first has Aṅgada as the subject, followed by Rāma, and then Aṅgada again. This interpretation has been followed by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 224), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 197), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1650), and Pagani (1999, p. 1053). Cg, whom we have followed, acknowledges that Rāma is astonished at Aṅgada's feat but believes that the adjective rāmamanaḥpraharṣaṇam, "delighting Rāma's heart," must lead us to understand that the word "Rāma" is of secondary importance in this sentence, and that therefore Aṅgada must be the subject of the verb visiṣmiye, "he was astonished." (visiṣmiye. so 'pīty atra tacchabdena rāmamanaḥpraharṣaṇam ity atra guṇībhūto rāmaśabdaḥ parāmṛśyate.) We believe that Cg is correct and that it is perfectly plausible that young Aṅgada might be somewhat surprised at the lethal effect of his heroic blow. This interpretation has also been followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1337) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, pp. 197–98). Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 47) shares the belief that Aṅgada is the subject of the verb visiṣmiye, but he takes it in its other sense of "to be haughty or conceited," rendering it (with his variant nāti, "not excessively," for the critical edition's so 'pi) as "non superbi fuori di modo."

"filled once more with energy for battle" punaś ca yuddhe sa babhūva harṣitaḥ: Literally, "He became once again excited in battle." Cg understands the phrase somewhat differently from other commentators and translators, glossing, "harṣita means 'gratified with praise by the astonished Rāma. He, that is, Aṅgada, was once again in the battle, that is, he became prepared with respect to battle.' (harṣito vismitena rāmeṇa ślāghayā toṣitaḥ. sa cāṅgadaś ca punar yuddhe babhūva. yuddhaviṣaye sannaddho babhūvety arthaḥ.)"

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Ck, also quoted by Cm, and Ct (at the beginning of GPP 70) note that, in many manuscripts, there is no sarga break after verse 90, and that they concur with this division of the text on the grounds that (as Ck noted) the preceding and following sections describe the continuing combat on the part of the same figure (Aṅgada) (atra sargāvacchedo bahuṣu pustakeṣu na dṛśyata ity asmābhir api na kṛtaḥ pūrvottaravākyayor ekakartṛkayuddhavarṇanād iti kaṭakaḥ). According to the critical apparatus, only D10,11 fail to insert a break at this juncture. Among the printed editions consulted, NSP continues to number its verses sequentially in sarga 69 after this point to include the following sarga, arriving at a total number of 162 ślokas. The edition does, however, draw a small line after verse 90 [= NSP 6.69.96] and shifts the sarga number of its running header to 70. Among the translations consulted, Dutt (1893, pp. 1330–43) continues sarga 69 of his text to include sarga 70 but skips a number, moving from sarga 69 [LXIX] to sarga 71 [LXXI] with no intervening section marker. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 219), too, reads the two sargas together for a total of 162 ślokas and entitles this extended sarga "Sargas LXIX, LXX."

1. "Devāntaka, Trimūrdhan Paulastya, and Mahodara" devāntakas trimūrdhā ca paulastyaś ca mahodaraḥ: It is difficult to determine with precision exactly how many rākṣasas are mentioned here and who they are. One would have expected the list to include the remaining five of the six rākṣasas who set forth in the previous sarga to avenge the death of Kumbhakarṇa, viz., Devāntaka, Triśiras, Atikāya, Mahodara, and Mahāpārśva (see 6.57.9,12). In this verse, however, a maximum of four and, at least arguably, a minimum of two are mentioned. Two of the names or epithets listed here are more or less problematic. The most probable number is three, because in the following verses only Devāntaka, Triśiras, and Mahodara are specifically mentioned as attacking Aṅgada, and because in verse 5 the number is explicitly given as three. The name Trimūrdhan, literally, "three-headed," is almost certainly a variant of Triśiras, but Dutt (1893, p. 1338) takes it as an epithet for the rākṣasa Devāntaka. More problematic is the patronymic term paulastya, "son or descendant of Pulastya." This term is normally used of Rāvaṇa but by normal practice could also refer to any male descendant of the ṛṣi Pulastya. Thus, Ck takes it here as an epithet of Rāvaṇa's brother Mahodara (see, too, 6.57.16 and note) (paulastya iti paulastyo rāvaṇas tadbhrātā mahodaraś ca). This position is represented in the translations of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 224), Pagani (1999, p. 1054), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 197), and Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 47), all of whom believe that the list consists of Devāntaka, Triśiras (a.k.a. Trimūrdhan), and Mahodara Paulastya. Cg, whom we follow, explicitly rejects Ck's position, claiming that Paulastya here is an epithet of Trimūrdhan (Triśiras) and not of Mahodara. He thus also sees a list of only three rākṣasas, viz., Devāntaka, Trimūrdhan Paulastya, and Mahodara. (paulastya iti trimūrdhaviśeṣaṇaṃ na tu mahodarasya. devāntakādayas trayaś cukruśur iti saṃbandhaḥ.) Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1650) represents this position in its translation. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 198) also envisions a list of three but wishes to apply the patronymic to both Devāntaka and Trimūrdhan (Triśiras), rendering, "Devāntaka and Triśiras, scions of the Pulasthyas, as well as Mahodara." Dutt (1893, p. 1338), idiosyncratically, sees only two rākṣasas in the list and translates, "including the thre[sic]-headed Devāntaka and Pulastya's descendant, Mahodara."

2. "magnificent bull elephant" vāraṇendram: Literally, "lord or best of elephants."

"Aṅgada, Vālin's . . . son" vāliputram: Literally, "Vālin's son."

"immensely powerful" vīryavān: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,2,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vegavān, "swift."

4. "Triśiras" triśirāḥ: In verse 1, this rākṣasa is referred to as Trimūrdhan.

5. "those . . . lords of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos" nairṛtendraiḥ: Literally, "best or lords among the nairṛtas." D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead rākṣasendraiḥ, "lords or best among the rākṣasas."

7. "leapt up into the sky" utpapāta: Literally, "he leapt or flew up."

9. "And Surāntaka" ca surāntakaḥ: Literally, "and the ender of the gods." The name is clearly a variant of Devāntaka, literally, "ender of gods." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead sa mahodaraḥ, "he, Mahodara."

10. "Mahodara, too" mahodaraḥ: Literally, "Mahodara."

"with iron cudgels" tomaraiḥ: According to Dikshitar (1944, p. 107), tomaras are found in two varieties: sarvāyasam and daṇḍa. He identifies these as "iron club" and "javelin," respectively. We, along with Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1651) and Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 48) understand the term here in its former meaning. Other translators consulted either leave the term untranslated or choose the latter meaning (Pagani 1999, p. 1054). Dikshitar (1944, p. 107) cites a commentator on Kauṭilya as identifying the tomara as "a rod with an arrowlike edge." See note to 6.59.28; and 6.63.14 and note.

"that struck with the force of thunderbolts" vajrasaṃnibhaiḥ: Literally, "[with iron cudgels that were] like the vajra." The vajra can also refer to Indra's weapon, and some translators take it in this sense. See notes to 6.57.70–71,87–88. See verse 49 below.

11. "Meanwhile" tadā: Literally, "then."

12. " immensely powerful and valorous warrior" mahātejāḥ . . . pratāpavān: Literally, "powerful and valorous one."

Following verse 12, D5,7,10,11,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [1274*]: "That swift and supremely invincible warrior[1] [Aṅgada] putting forth tremendous speed . . ."

[1]"That . . . supremely invincible warrior" paramadurjayaḥ: Literally, "the supremely invincible one."

13. "Leaping up, he struck . . . violently" bhṛśam utpatya jaghāna: The easiest reading of the syntax would be to construe the adverb bhṛśam, "swiftly, violently," with the gerund. And, indeed, the only two translators consulted who share this reading have done so (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 198 and Gorresio 1858, vol. 10, p. 48). We, however, believe that the logic of the passage supports construing the adverb with the finite verb, jaghāna, "he struck," in pāda b. D5–7,9–11,T1,3,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead samabhidrutya, "having rushed or having raced up," for bhṛśam utpatya.

"Mahodara's" asya: Literally, "his." Verses 2 and 10 above, as well Ck, Ct, and Cg, support the notion that the elephant is Mahodara's. Perhaps because Aṅgada will attack Devāntaka with the elephant's tusk in verse 14 below, Cr identifies the elephant as belonging to that rākṣasa (devāntakasya mahāgajam).

"with his open hand" tālena: Literally, "with his palm."

"Its eyes knocked out" petatur locane tasya: Literally, "its two eyes fell."

"trumpeted loudly" vinanāda: D9–11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vinanāśa, "he was destroyed."

Following 13ab, D5–7,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg insert a passage of one line [1275*]: "Through the force of his blow in battle, [the eyes] of that prince of elephants . . ."

14. "rushed upon" abhidrutya: T1,2,G1,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Crā, and Cm read instead abhiplutya, "having sprung or leapt up." Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 198) among the commentators renders this variant.

15. "Swaying with every limb" vihvalitasarvāṅgaḥ: D6,7,10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vihvalas tu tejasvī, "that powerful one staggered."

"Devāntaka" saḥ: Literally, "he."

"lac" lākṣārasa-: Literally, "lac juice." Lac is a bright red dye derived from secretions of the insect Laccifer lacca, which also yields a resin, the common lacquer. See, too, Hobson Jobson 1903, pp. 499–500 (s.v. lac); and note to 4.23.13.

"from his mouth" mukhāt: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahat, "great, copious."

16. "dreadful" ghoram: Ś,Ñ,V,B1,2,4,D (except D6),T1,G3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vegāt, "swiftly."

17. "the son of the lord of the monkeys" vānarendrātmajaḥ: The reference is to Aṅgada's being the son of the former king of the monkeys, Vālin, not his successor, Sugrīva.

18. "the son of the lord of the tawny monkeys" haripateḥ putram: See note to verse 17 above.

"with three . . . arrows that resembled venomous serpents" tribhir āśīviṣopamaiḥ: Literally, "with three that resembled venomous serpents." In attempting to mediate between the different readings of the two recensions, the critical editors have produced a peculiar version that omits a necessary and expected noun meaning "arrows." Virtually all northern manuscripts as well as the printed editions of Lahore and Gorresio read śaraiḥ, "arrows," in place of tribhiḥ, "three," yielding the sense "with arrows resembling venomous serpents." The great majority of southern manuscripts (D7,9–11,T2,3,G3,M) and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read bāṇair ajihmagaiḥ, "with [three] straight-flying arrows." Some manuscripts (Ñ,V2,3,B1,2,4,D4,6,G1,2) substitute the word bāṇaiḥ, "with arrows," for ghoraiḥ, "dreadful," in pāda c. The critical reading is defective and lacks any persuasive textual support. Given the principles on which the critical edition was based, the editors should have probably selected the southern reading and perhaps have marked it as uncertain. See Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv and Sutherland 1992.

19. "they ran to his aid" pratasthatuḥ: Literally, "they set forth."

21. "shooting forth sparks and flames" savisphuliṅgaṃ sajvālam: Literally, "with sparks, with flames."

22. "Then" tataḥ . . . tadā: Literally, "after that . . . then." D5,7,9–11,T1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read balī, "strong, mighty," which modifies Devāntaka, for tadā.

"upon witnessing that explosion" jṛmbhitam ālokya: Literally, "then having seen that bursting open." D7,10,11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the minor variation sa vijṛmbhitam. Commentators and translators differ considerably in their understanding of the term jṛmbhitam (v.l. vijṛmbhitam) here. We believe that Ck and Ct are correct in taking the term in its sense of "manifestation or bursting open." They gloss, "that manifestation of Triśiras, which consisted of the shattering of the mountain peak (triśirasaḥ parvataśikharabhedanarūpaṃ jṛmbhaṇam)." Cg and Cm understand the term adjectivally in the sense of "broken, smashed (bhagnam)," applying it thus to the mountaintop that was shattered in the previous verse. In the absence of any lexical support for such a reading, Cg cites 1.74.17,19 (= GPP 1.75.17,19), where Śiva's bow is said to be jṛmbhitam, "disabled, unstrung," through the power of Viṣṇu's uttering of the mantra "hum." The majority of northern manuscripts seem to support this. B3,D13, and the printed edition of Gorresio substitute, perhaps by way of a gloss, tat tu bhagnam, "[seeing] that broken," while the remaining northern manuscripts and the Lahore edition substitute tat tu cūrṇitam, "[seeing] that pulverized." We believe that the term at 1.74.17,19 has been correctly understood by Ct and Cr as "slackened or unstrung (śaithilyaṃ prāptam—so Cr)," but there Cg glosses, "broken (bhagnam)." Cr reads the term here adjectivally with mārutātmajam, in the sense of "his appearance transformed by his having been suffused with anger (krodhāveśena pariṇatarūpam)." Translators have similarly differed. Several of the translators take the term explicitly or implicitly in its sense of "gaping, yawning [with amazement or joy]" (Dutt 1893, p. 1339; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 225; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 198; and Pagani 1999, p. 1055). Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1652) understands as we do.

23. "son of Māruta" mārutātmajaḥ: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,8,10–13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead kapikuñjaraḥ, "that elephant among monkeys."

"Devāntaka" tam: Literally, "him."

"with . . . which had the force a thunderbolt" vajravegena: Literally, "which had the impact of the vajra." On vajra, see note to verse 10 above. Ñ1,B3,D6,7,9–11,13,T2,3,G2,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead vajrakalpena, "like the vajra."

Following verse 23, D5–7,9–11,T,G1,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of two lines [1278*]: "The mighty son of Vāyu then struck him on the head. With a roar, that great monkey made the rākṣasas tremble."

24. The meter is upajāti.

25. "Trimūrdhan" trimūrdhā: D9,10,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead yet another synonymous name for Triśiras, triśīrṣaḥ, "Triśīrṣa." See note to verse 1 above. Pagani (1999, p. 1055) renders the name and its literal translation, offering, "Triśiras, le monstre tricéphale." See, too, her note (1999, p. 1667).

"a fierce shower of sharp-tipped arrows" niśitāgram ugram . . . bāṇavarṣam: Literally, "a fierce arrow-shower with sharp tips." D6,7,10,11,T2,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read -astram, "missile or divinely charged weapon," for -agram, "tip."

The meter is upajāti.

Following verse 25, D5–7,9–11,T1,2,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of four lines [1280*]: "But Mahodara, in a towering rage, once again mounted his elephant, which resembled a mountain, just as the many-rayed sun[1] climbs Mount Mandara.[1–2] From there he let fall upon Nīla's chest[2] a shower of arrows, just as a storm cloud, complete with a rainbow and, with a discus in the form of lightning,[3] lets fall a torrent upon a mountain. [3–4]"

[2]"Nīla's chest" nīlasyorasi: D3,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead nīlasyopari, "upon Nīla."

[3]"complete with a rainbow and, with a discus in the form of lightning" taḍiccakra-cāpavān: Literally, "possessing a lightning-discus and a bow." D3,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead taḍiccakraṃ sa garjan, "[the cloud] thundering with its discus in the form of lightning." Ct understands the disc, or circle of lightning, to refer to a bow, that is, Indra's bow, or the rainbow (taḍiccakraṃ cāpam indradhanuś ca yasyāsti saḥ).

26. "slack limbed" visṛṣṭagātraḥ: Literally, "having released limbs." We follow the commentators who understand the compound to mean that Nīla's limbs were loosened or slackened (śithilagātraḥ—so Cg on his v.l. nisṛṣṭagātraḥ). Cm, however, offers, as an alternative, "whose limbs were under the control of another (paravaśagātraḥ)."

"mighty Triśiras" mahābalena: Literally, "by the one of great strength."

The meter is upajāti.

27. "with its masses of trees" savṛkṣaṣaṇḍam: D7,9–11,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead savṛkṣakhaṇḍam, "with its broken pieces of trees."

The meter is upajāti.

28. "Crushed together with his elephant by the mountain as it fell" śailābhinipātabhagnaḥ . . . tena saha dvipena: Literally, "[he] broken by the fall of the mountain along with that elephant." See note below.

"mortally wounded" vipothitaḥ: We follow Cg, the only commentator to read with the critical edition, who glosses, "injured (hiṃsitaḥ)." D10 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vyāmohitaḥ, "unconscious." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1653) is the only translation to follow the text of Ct here, and it renders this variant. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 226) reads with Ct but has apparently misunderstood the phrase tena saha dvipena, taking it as a metaphorical reference to Nīla and as the agent of the participle vyāmohitaḥ. He renders, "que ce grand élephant (des Kapis) venait ainsi d'assommer." In this error he has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 199) and Pagani (1999, p. 1055).

The meter is upendravajrā.

29. Following verse 29, Ñ,B1(line 1 only)–3,D4–7,9–11,S insert a passage of six lines [1283*]: "Furious, the son of Vāyu hurled a mountaintop, but mighty Triśiras shattered it into myriad fragments[1] with his sharp arrows.[1–2] Seeing that his mountain had had no effect, the great monkey[2] released a hail of trees upon the son of Rāvaṇa in battle.[3–4] But with his sharp arrows, valorous Triśiras splintered that hail of trees as it flew toward him in the air, and he roared.[5–6]"

[1]"into myriad fragments" bibheda bahudhā: Literally, "he split [it] many ways."

[2]"the great monkey" mahākapiḥ: D6,7,9–11,T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead tadā kapiḥ, "then the monkey."

30. "the horses" hayān: Ñ1,V3,B3,D9–11,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the singular hayam, "horse." This seems textually less apt since Triśiras is said to be riding in a chariot, "yoked to splendid horses," at verse 4 above. Perhaps the singular has been chosen to maintain number parallelism with the singular "elephant" of the simile.

"a lion, king of beasts" mṛgarāṭ: Literally, "king of beasts." The lion is the proverbial foe of elephants in Sanskrit literature.

31. "just as Yama, ender of all things . . . Kālarātri, the dark night of universal destruction" kālarātrim ivāntakaḥ: Literally, "just as the ender, Kālarātri." See 6.23.15 (where Sītā refers to herself as Kālarātri); and 6.34.15 and notes (v.l. Kālarātrī).

"hurled . . . unleashes" cikṣepa: Literally, "he threw." The simile is an awkward one in that it compares Triśiras's handling of his javelin (śakti) with Yama's relationship to Kālarātri. According to the syntax, the common element in the simile would appear to be the act of "having seized, taken up" expressed by the gerund samādāya of pāda a, and most of the translations consulted read the verse in this way. B1,D6,7,9,10,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read samāsādya, which has a similar sense, for samādāya. Translations that follow the text of Ct render this in connection with the upamāna as "employeth" (Dutt 1893, p. 1340), "take in his service" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1653), "s'armant" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 226; Pagani 1999, p. 1056), and "arming himself" (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 199). We, however, prefer the translations of Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 49, "spande") and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 200, "lets loose"), who appear to base the comparison of the two actions on the finite verb rather than on the gerund.

32. "blazing meteor" ulkām: Literally, "meteor."

"hurtling through the sky" divi kṣiptām: Literally, "hurled into the sky." D5–7,9–11,T1,2,M1,3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead the ablative divaḥ, "from the sky."

33. "they roared thunderously like storm clouds" vinedur jaladā iva: Literally, "they roared like clouds [water-givers]."

34. "in his rage" roṣāt: Literally, "from anger." The reading is marked as uncertain by the critical editors and rightly so. D9–11,G2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct repeat the word khaḍgam, "sword," from pāda a in place of roṣāt, which yields the meaning "[and he buried] that sword . . ." D5,6,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read instead the adjective vyūḍhe, "broad," which modifies the word urasi, "chest." This variant is found in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 200). Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 50) reads instead the noun śūraḥ, "hero," which stands in apposition to Triśiras, rendering "il prode Trisiras." D7 and the text of Cr read instead ca khaḍgena, "and with that sword," for tadā roṣāt, "then from anger." The instrumental then construes with Cr's finite verb jaghāna, as noted below.

"buried it" nicakhāna: Literally, "he buried." Ñ2,D6,7,T2,3,G3,M1,3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, and Cr read instead nijaghāna, "he struck [with it]."

35. "Trimūrdhan" trimūrdhānam: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,8,12,13,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read the synonymous variant triśirasam, "Triśiras." See note to verse 1 above.

36. "When Hanumān struck him with his open hand" sa talābhihatas tena: Literally, "struck by him with his palm, he."

"let his garments slip from his hands" srastahastāmbaraḥ: Literally, "having slipped-hand-garments." The sense of this compound is far from clear. It is uncertain as to why Triśiras would be holding garments in the midst of battle. Commentators, who share this reading, are silent as to its meaning. Only three of the translators consulted render this reading. Dutt (1893, p. 1340) takes hastāmbaraḥ as a dvandva and renders the compound, peculiarly enough, to mean "with his hands and attire dropping off." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 226) takes hastāmbaraḥ as a tatpuruṣa in the sense of "hand-garment," which he takes to be a kenning for glove or gauntlet, rendering, "laissa échapper son gantelet." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 199), who renders, "let his gauntlet fall." We have hesitantly read the compound as a paranipāta for hastasrastāmbaraḥ, "whose garments have slipped from his hands." Ñ2,V1,2,B2–4,D5,T1,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Gorresio read the more intelligible -āyudhaḥ, "weapon," for -ambaraḥ, "garment." The remaining northern manuscripts read either khaḍgahastaḥ, "sword in hand" (Ś,D2,8,12), or ślathagātraḥ, "with slackened limbs" (V3,D4,13).

37. "And as Triśiras fell" tasya patataḥ: Literally, "of him who was falling or as he was falling."

"grabbed" samācchidya: A number of the translations consulted (Dutt 1893, p. 1341; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 226; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 199; and Pagani 1999, p. 1056) take this verb or its variant (D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct) [tam] ācchidya in its sense of "having broken or shattered." This, however, makes little sense, as Hanumān will use the weapon effectively in verse 40 below.

"the rākṣasas, sons of chaos" -nairṛtān: Literally, "the sons of Nirṛti." Ś,Ñ,V,B, D1–4,8–13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead -rākṣasān, "the rākṣasas."

39. "he seized . . . by the crown" nijagrāha kirīṭe: Literally, "he grasped at the diadem." Ck, Ct, and Cr are evidently skeptical about the ability to capture someone by seizing an easily detachable ornament like a kirīṭa. They gloss, "at the place of the diadem (kirītapradeśe)." We concur, offering "crown" here to refer to the dome of the skull but also because of its additional meaning as a royal head ornament. This interpretation is shared by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1654), who renders, "seized hold of Triśirā by his head covered with a diadem," and by Dutt (1893, p. 1341), who, however, understands nijagrāha, "he seized," to mean "he smote," rendering, "smote about his diadem." Other translators read the phrase literally, understanding that Hanumān actually catches hold of the diadem.

40. "with Triśiras's own sharp sword . . . cut off his heads" tasya śīrṣāṇy asinā śitena . . . / . . . praciccheda: Literally, "he cut off his heads with a sharp sword."

"just as did Śakra the heads of Tvaṣṭṛ's son" tvaṣṭuḥ sutasyeva śirāṃsi śakraḥ: Literally, "as Śakra, the heads of Tvaṣṭṛ's son." The reference is to Indra's beheading of Viśvarūpa, the three-headed son of Tvaṣṭṛ. The myth is found in numerous places in the vedic corpus. See, for example, TaiS 2.5.1ff. Compare also ŚatBr 1.6.3.1–5; 5.5.4.2–6; Maitrāyanī Saṃhitā 2.4.1; and JaimiBr 2.153–157 (Oertel). See Hopkins 1902, p. 130. See 6.70.28 and note.

The meter is upajāti.

41. "Like so many stars fallen from the path of the sun" jyotīṃṣi muktāni yathārkamārgāt: Literally, "like heavenly luminaries released from the sun's path." The allusion, as Cg points out, is to shooting stars or meteors, which (according to a traditional Indian belief) are souls who, having attained positions in the heavens as a result of meritorious actions, fall to earth upon the exhaustion of their accumulated merit (muktāny anubhūtapuṇyaphalāni). See 5.7.39 and note.

The printed editions of Ct (GPP and NSP) read indramārgāt, "from the path of Indra," for arkamārgāt, "from the path of the sun." Both variants are kennings for the sky or heavens.

"with their gaping orifices and their eyes blazing like Agni Vaiśvānara" āyatākṣāṇi . . . pradīptavaiśvānaralocanāni: Literally, "with big or extended eyes, with eyes like blazing Vaiśvānara." Ct, Ck, and Cr are disturbed by the apparent redundancy of these two compounds. They avoid it by taking -akṣa-, "eye," by a kind of lakṣaṇā to stand for "the sense organs in general (indriyāṇi)." We agree and understand the reference to be specifically to the apertures of the cranial sense organs, such as nostrils, etc. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1654) and Dutt (1893, p. 1341) translate as we do. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 227), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 200) and Pagani (1999, p. 1056), resolves the redundancy by taking locana in the sense of "glance," translating, "regards." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 200) collapses the two expressions, rendering, "with their big eyes that burned like blazing fires."

The meter is upajāti.

42. "cheered" neduḥ: Literally, "they roared, bellowed."

"the earth trembled" pracacāla bhūmiḥ: Cr observes that the earth trembled with joy (harṣeṇa).

The meter is upajāti.

43–44. "mighty Mahāpārśva" mahāpārśvo mahābalaḥ: D9–11,G1,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cg, Cm, Cr, and Ck read instead matto rākṣasapuṃgavaḥ, "Matta, bull among rākṣasas." As Cg notes, Matta is an alternative name for Mahāpārśva. (matto mahāpārśvaḥ. matta iti mahāpārśvasya nāmāntaram.) See note to verse 47 below. See, too, 6.57.16 and note.

"Mahodara" mahodaram: D9–11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead yuddhonmattam. This is a variant name for Mahodara. Ck merely identifies Yuddhonmatta as "a certain rākṣasa (kaścid rākṣasaḥ)" (mistakenly noted under verse 47 in the critical apparatus). See note to 6.57.16 above.

"and" cāpi: D5,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead ghorām, "dreadful," which then serves as an additional modifier of gadām, "mace."

"splendid" śubhām: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,6,8–13,G1,3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tadā, "then."

"made of solid iron" sarvāyasīm: Literally, "entirely of iron." See 6.59.40. Cf. 6.3.12; 6.53.12; 6.55.47; and notes.

45–46. "It was encircled . . . it shone . . . it could terrify" -parikṣiptām . . . virājamānām . . . -bhayāvahām: The two verses consist of a series of accusative adjectives and adjectival phrases with no finite verb. Grammatically the verses must be construed with either jagrāha, "he seized," in verse 44c, or the gerund ādāya, "having grasped," in verse 47a. For the sake of transparent English syntax, we have broken up the sequence into a series of short sentences.

"smeared with flesh and blood" māṃsaśoṇitalepanām: Literally, "having flesh and blood for its ointment." D6,9–11,T3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead -phenilām, "foaming." Cg distinguishes this description from "reddened with the blood of his enemies (śatruśoṇitarañjitām)" in pāda 45d, by observing that the former describes the mace's appearance at the time of battle, while the latter describes it prior to battle. (māṃsaśoṇitaphenilām iti yuddhakālikarūpām. śatruśoṇitarañjitām iti pūrvakālikarūpām.)

"with splendor" vapuṣā: Literally, "with beauty." Ñ,V,B2–4,D9–11,13,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vipulām, "broad."

"Adorned with red garlands" raktamālyavibhūṣitām: Red garlands are associated with a victim about to be slaughtered. This description therefore fits the tone of the passage. See 5.25.19 (cf. 20). Cf. 6.59.21; 6.60.22; and notes.

"the mighty elephants Airāvata, Mahāpadma, and Sārvabhauma" airāvata-mahāpadmasārvabhauma-: Literally, "Airāvata, Mahāpadma, and Sārvabhauma." These are three of the great diggajas, or elephants that support the earth at its cardinal and intermediate compass points. Airāvata and Sārvabhauma are both named at Amarakośa 1.3.3–4, where the diggajas are listed. Cg and Cm claim that Mahāpadma ("Great Lotus") is another name for the elephant otherwise known as Puṇḍarīka ("Lotus"), which name is also found in the Amarakośa list. Mahāpadma, the guardian of the south, is named among the diggajas at 1.39.12,16,17. Airāvata is also the name of Indra's great battle-elephant. Cf. 6.4.5; 6.31.4; and notes.

47. "mighty Mahāpārśva" mahāpārśvo mahābalaḥ: The phrase is repeated from 44b. D9–11,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead matto rākṣasapuṃgavaḥ, "Matta, that bull among rākṣasas," as they do at verse 44 above. See note to verse 44 above.

48. "Mahāpārśva" mahāpārśvam: D9–11,G2,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead mattānīkam. This term has the sense of "Matta's army," but Cg and Cr understand this to be yet another alternate name (like Matta) of Mahāpārśva, in which case it would have the sense of "having a frenzied army" (mattānīka iti ca mahāpārśvasya nāmāntaram). Translations that follow the texts of the southern commentators accept this latter interpretation, with the exception of Dutt (1893, p. 1341), who renders, "the hosts of Matta." See note to verse 52 below.

49. "Mahāpārśva, in a rage" kruddhaḥ: Literally, "the angry one."

"which was like a thunderbolt" vajrakalpayā: Literally, "resembling the vajra." See notes to verses 10 and 23 above.

50. "gushed forth gouts of blood" susrāva rudhiraṃ bahu: Literally, "he poured forth copious blood."

51. "bull among monkeys" vānarṣabhaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vānareśvaraḥ, "lord among monkeys."

"his lips quivering in his rage, glared at Mahāpārśva" kruddho visphuramāṇauṣṭho mahāpārśvam udaikṣata: Literally, "Angry, his lips trembling, he looked at Mahāpārśva." KK places this half verse in brackets (= KK [1913] 6.70.58cd). The half verse is omitted from the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 201).

D6,9,T,G1,2,M, VSP, and KK (1905) omit this half verse, replacing it with one line [1290*]: "He ran swiftly and [seizing] the mace of that great one." D7,10,11,G3, as well as the printed editions of Ct (GPP 6.70.63ab and NSP 6.70.159ab) read 1290* following 1289* (see below). The line appears as KK (1913) 6.70.64; VSP 6.70.58cd; and KK (1905) 6.70.58cd. The sequence of verses as it appears in KK is translated only in Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 201).

Following verse 51, D7,10,11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct (GPP 6.70.58–62 and NSP 6.70.154–158), as well as KK within brackets (6.70.59–63), insert a passage of twenty lines (= five upajāti verses) [1289*]: "The swift leader of the monkey heroes, resembling a mountain in form, swiftly approached the rākṣasa and, swinging his fist, struck him violently in the chest.[1–4] The latter fell suddenly to the ground, like a tree cut off at the roots, his body drenched with blood.[5–6] Then, swiftly seizing Mahāpārśva's[1] dreadful mace, which resembled the rod of Yama, he roared.[7–8] For a moment that foe of the gods lay as if dead. But then, recovering himself, he, whose color was like that of a cloud at twilight, suddenly leapt up and struck Ṛṣabha, son of Varuṇa, lord of the waters.[2][9–12] The latter fell to the ground unconscious, but, regaining his senses after a while, he sprang up, and, brandishing the rākṣasa's[3] mace, which was like a mountain among the foremost of mountains,[4] struck him with it[5] in battle.[13–16] That terrible mace struck the body of that terrible foe of gods, sacrifices, and brahmans. It split his chest, and he gushed gouts of blood, as Himalaya, the king of mountains,[6] pours forth water stained red with minerals.[7][17–20]"

[2]"Ṛṣabha, son of Varuṇa, lord of the waters" vārirājātmajam: Literally, "son of the king of waters."

[3]"the rākṣasa's" tasya: Literally, "his."

[4]"which was like a mountain among the foremost of mountains" adrivarādrikalpām: This could also be read as "like the foremost mountain among mountains."

[5]"he . . . struck him with it" jaghāna: Literally, "he struck."

[6]"Himalaya, king of mountains" adrirājaḥ: Literally, "the king of mountains."

[7]"water stained red with minerals" dhātvambhaḥ: Literally, "mineral-water."

D7,10,11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct (GPP 6.70.63ab and NSP 6.70.159ab) read 1290* following 1289* (see above).

52. "round and round" punaḥ punaḥ: Literally, "again and again."

"he struck . . . with it" jaghāna: Literally, "he struck."

"Mahāpārśva Mattānīka" mattānīkaṃ mahāpārśvam: The sequence of these two names for this character appears to be found in none of the manuscripts collated for the critical edition. The entire south shows only the name "Mattānīka," while the north knows only "Mahāpārśva." The reading is thus extremely suspect. D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahātmā saḥ, "that great one [Ṛṣabha]." Dutt (1893, p. 1342), as he did earlier (see note to verse 48 above), renders mattānīkam as "Matta's forces." D5,T1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read mahātmānam, "the great [Mattānīka]." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 201) renders this as "the mighty Matta." An alternate translation of the critical edition's reading would be to take mattānīkam as a descriptive adjective, "whose army was frenzied." See note to verse 48 above. See Sutherland 1992.

53. "Mahāpārśva" mahāpārśvaḥ: D9–11,G,M read instead tadā (M3 = tataḥ] mattaḥ, "then Matta."

Following verse 53, D3 (line 1 only),5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1292*]: "Once that rākṣasa had fallen to the ground—his eyes knocked out, his strength vanished, his life ended—the rākṣasa army fled."

Following 1292*, M3, GPP (in brackets unnumbered between 6.70.65 and 66), KK (in brackets as 6.70.68–77), and VSP (as footnote below commentary at bottom of p. 528, marked by an asterisk between verses 6.70.61 and 62) show a passage of twenty-two lines [App. I, No. 37]. In this passage a brother of Mahāpārśva [Matta], Unmatta, enters the battle only to be slain by the monkey Gavākṣa. No translation consulted renders this passage. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 201), however, places an unexplained asterisk at this point in his translation, presumably in reflection of the similar mark in VSP. The footnote in VSP mentions that these verses are found only in late manuscripts (ete ślokā auttarāhapāṭha evopalabhyante).

54. "ran for its life" kevalajīvitārtham: Literally, "having for its purpose life alone." Cg explains that the rākṣasas sought life without glory (yaśorahitajīvanārtham)."

"like an ocean scattering in all directions" bhinnārṇavasaṃnikāśam: Literally, "resembling a dispersed or shattered ocean." The commentators, whom we follow, indicate that the compound is to be read adverbially, although they provide no gloss to illuminate its meaning (kriyāviśeṣaṇam—so Ct). Virtually all the translators consulted who share this reading read the compound as if it were a madhyamapadalopisamāsa, with a middle term, such as "bank or shore (tīram or kūlam)," omitted. Their idea is that the army is being compared to an ocean that has burst or breached its shores. Such an image is found in the epic (see 6.84.32 and note). However, in the present context, where the image seems to be one of scattering rather than breaching a limit, this sense does not seem as apposite to us. Dutt (1893, p. 1343), alone among the translators consulted, appears to understand the image as we do. He renders, "rushed away, like unto the deep riven (by the winds)."

The meter is indravajrā.

1–3. "his brothers" bhrātṝn: The reference is to Triśiras, Devāntaka, and Narāntaka.

"his two paternal uncles, the brothers Mahodara and Mahāpārśva, bulls among rākṣasas" pitṛvyau cāpi . . . mahodaramahāpārśvau bhrātarau rākṣasarṣabhau: Ct, Cg, and Cr understand that the two brothers are the uncles of Atikāya. (pitṛvyau kāv ityātrāha. yuddhonmattaṃ cetyādi. bhrātarāv anyonyaṃ bhrātarau—so Ct.) Ck disagrees, understanding that the brothers are Matta and Yuddhonmatta (variant reading), while the uncles are Kumbhakarṇa and Mahodara (pitṛvyau kumbhakarṇamahodarau yuddhonmattaṃ ca mattaṃ ca bhrātarāv iti). (Cf. note to 6.58.43–44.) D5,7,9–11,T1,G1,2,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read the variant names yuddhonmattaṃ ca mattaṃ ca for mahodaramahāpārśvau. See notes to 6.57.16; and 6.58.1,43–44,47. D6,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead rākṣasottamau, "foremost among rākṣasas."

"granted boons by Brahmā" brahmadattavaraḥ: We find out in verses 30 and 31 below that Brahmā had granted Atikāya divine weapon-spells, invulnerability to gods and asuras, a suit of celestial armor, and a splendid chariot. Pagani (1999, p. 1667), in a note to this passage, states that, as a consequence of his great asceticism, Atikāya obtained three boons from Brahmā, which were the brahmāstra (the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā), a fabulous suit of armor, and the power not to be disturbed by any unwelcome or inopportune desire. The source for Pagani's particular list here is unclear, as it does not agree with her translation of verses 31 and 32 (p. 1059). Citrāv Śāstri, in his Prācīnacaritrakośa (1964, s.v. Atikāya), identifies four boons, including a divine weapon-spell, armor, a celestial chariot, and invulnerability to the gods and demons. Cf. 6.80.25, where Rāvaṇa mentions the armor Brahmā gave him for his austerities.

4. "which blazed with the brilliance of a thousand suns" bhāskarasahasrasya saṃghātam iva bhāsvaram: Literally, "as radiant as an assemblage of a thousand suns."

5. "great" mahat: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed texts of Ct read instead tadā, "then."

"Atikāya, adorned with diadem and burnished earrings" kirīṭī mṛṣṭakuṇḍalaḥ: Literally, "he who possessed a diadem and who had burnished earrings."

6. Following verse 6, D5–7,9–11,S (G2 after verse 4) insert a passage of two lines [1294*]: "When the monkeys saw the size of his body, they thought,[1] 'It's Kumbhakarṇa arisen once again!' And, stricken with terror, they all huddled together.[2]"

[1]"they thought, 'It's Kumbhakarṇa arisen once again!' " kumbhakarṇo 'yam utthitaḥ: We follow Ck, Cr, and Ct in supplying a form of the root √man, "to think" (manyamānāḥ, "thinking"—Ct, Ck; matvā, "having thought"—Cr). Like most of the commentators, we understand that one must supply the quotation marker iti to indicate that this statement is a direct quote.

[2]"they . . . huddled together" saṃśrayante parasparam: Literally, "they took refuge with one another."

7. "his gigantic form . . . like that of Viṣṇu when he traversed the three worlds" tasya rūpam . . . yathā viṣṇos trivikrame: Literally, "his form or appearance like that in the triple step of Viṣṇu." The reference is to the well-known purāṇic tale of Viṣṇu's vāmanāvatāra, or dwarf incarnation, according to which he assumes a gigantic size in order to traverse the universe, thus wresting it from the control of the asura king, Bali. See 6.40.43; 6.47.119; 6.49.1–2; 6.53.25; 6.105.24; and notes. See, too, 1.28.2 and note. It will be recalled that Atikāya's name reflects his gargantuan size. See 6.47.16 and note above.

"all the monkeys were stricken with terror" bhayārtā vānarāḥ sarve: D6,7,9–11,T2,3,G1,2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead bhayād vānarayūthās te, "the troops of monkeys out of fear." This variant is represented in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 202). D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct substitute the word -yodhāḥ, "warriors," for -yūthāḥ, "troops," in this variant.

"in the ten directions" diśo daśa: D5–7,9–11,T,G1,2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead tatas tataḥ, "here and there." Ñ,V,B,D1,4,13,G3, and the printed edition of Gorresio read instead parasparam, "to one another." On the basis of the textual evidence presented in the critical edition, the critical reading is weak and should be considered uncertain.

8. "Confronted by Atikāya" atikāyaṃ samāsādya: Literally, "having approached Atikāya."

"refuge . . . the refuge of all" śaraṇyaṃ . . . śaraṇam: See 6.13.4; 6.47.43; 6.31.56; 6.81.14; and notes. See, too, 5.36.26–29.

9. The critical edition provides no apparatus for this verse. All printed editions consulted read as does the critical edition.

10. "that gigantic warrior" mahātmānam: Literally, "the great one." We agree with Cr that the term here refers to the size of Atikāya's body (mahātmānaṃ bṛhaccharīram atikāyam). D6,9–11,T2,3,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahākāyam, "of huge body."

11. "with the gaze of a lion" harilocanaḥ: The compound is ambiguous because of the multiple possible meanings of the word hari. We agree with the majority of southern commentators, who take it in its common sense of "lion," giving the compound the sense of "with the eyes or glance of a lion" (siṃhadṛṣṭiḥ—so Ct). Cs takes the reference to be to the eyes either of a lion or a monkey (siṃhadṛṣṭir markaṭadṛṣṭir vā). As an alternative, he understands the compound to mean "whose eyes were fixed on the tawny monkeys (hariṣv eva locanaṃ yasyeti vā)." The word hari also frequently serves as an adjective in the sense of "yellow or tawny." Ck understands that Atikāya's eyes are yellow, like those of a lion (harivat piṅgalanetraḥ). A number of translators have understood only that the eyes are yellow or another similar color (Gorresio 1858, vol. 10, p. 52; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 229; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 202; and Pagani 1999, p. 1058). Cf. note to 6.60.9.

12. "sharp . . . formidable" niśitaiḥ . . . sutīkṣṇaiḥ: The adjective tīkṣṇa can mean "sharp, pungent, fierce, rough, etc." Unlike most of the other translators consulted, we have rejected its common meaning, "sharp," in an effort to avoid redundancy with the adjective niśitaiḥ, "sharp," in pāda a.

"Maheśvara surrounded by his malignant spirits" vṛtaḥ . . . bhūtair iva maheśvaraḥ: Literally, "like Maheśvara surrounded by beings." See 6.47.9,23–24; 6.74.4; and notes.

13. "with his glittering chariot-javelins" rathaśaktībhiḥ: Literally, "by chariot-javelins." We have carried over the word "glittering (arciṣmadbhiḥ)" from verse 12 above to make the simile intelligible. The commentators note the irregular length of the final stem "i." See notes to 6.33.21 and 6.95.9 for discussions of the term rathaśakti.

"which resemble the tongues of Kāla" kālajihvāprakāśābhiḥ: Kāla, "Time," is used throughout the epics to refer to Yama, the god of death or destruction, or to one of the great deities, Viṣṇu or Śiva, in the guise of the destroyer of the world. Here the image is reminiscent of the representation of Kṛṣṇa as Kāla at Bhagavadgītā 11.25–32, where he is said to swallow up all the worlds in his blazing mouths.

14. "well-strung" sajyāni: Literally, "with their bowstrings." Ś,Ñ,V,B2–4,D1–11,13,T1,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sajjāni. Although this term can also refer to a bow that is strung, a more common meaning is "ready, prepared." Several of the translators who follow the text of Ct appear to take it in the latter sense.

"with their golden facing" hemapṛṣṭhāni: Literally, "with golden backs."

"the rainbow, Śakra's bow" śakracāpam: Literally, "Śakra's bow." This is a standard epic kenning for the rainbow.

15. "Who is this . . .?" ka eṣaḥ: V2,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the relative pronoun yaḥ, making this verse yet another subordinate clause rather than a question.

16. "with the emblem of Rāhu, demon of the eclipse, waving from his flagstaff" dhvajaśṛṅgapratiṣṭhena rāhuṇā: Literally, "with Rāhu situated at the tip of his flagstaff." Principal chariot-warriors in the epics normally fly distinctive banners with some sort of identificatory emblem or device. Here, as some of the commentators indicate, we are to understand that Atikāya's battle flag bears the image of the eclipse demon, Rāhu (rāhudhvajatvam uktam—so Ct).

17. "thrice-curved" triṇatam: Literally, "triply bent." The reference is to a recurved bow, which, as Cg mentions, is bent in the middle and at each end (triṣv ādyantayor madhye ca natam). See note to 6.35.24.

"as the rainbow, the bow of Indra of the hundred sacrifices" śatakratudhanuḥprakhyam: Literally, "resembling the bow of Śatakratu." See note to verse 14 above.

18. "furnished with flags and banners" sadhvajaḥ sapatākaś ca: The terms dhvajaḥ and patākā form a more or less synonymous pair, as both refer to flags or battle standards. The word dhvajaḥ can also refer to a flagstaff, and the redundancy could be mitigated by translating it in that sense. Cg addresses the issue by defining dhvajaḥ as "an extraordinary banner (asādhāraṇaketanam)" and patākā as "the ordinary kind (sādhāraṇī)."

"has a fine frame" sānukarṣaḥ: See 6.57.25 and note.

"manned by four grooms" catuḥsādisamāyuktaḥ: Literally, "equipped with four charioteers." Cg and Ct understand the term sādin in the sense of sārathiḥ, "charioteer, driver." However, since it is difficult to envisage a chariot actually being driven by more than one person at a time, we prefer Cr's gloss of aśvavāraiḥ [samāyuktaḥ], "grooms, horse-handlers." One should keep in mind, however, that, as mentioned in verse 11 above, the chariot is yoked to a thousand horses. This may well account for the additional grooms.

19. "thirty-eight quivers" viṃśatir daśa cāṣṭau ca tūṇīrāḥ: Literally, "twenty, ten, and eight quivers." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3. p. 1658), alone among the translators of the southern text, takes the numbers distributively to refer to the various articles mentioned in the verse, rendering, "twenty quivers, ten . . . bows, and eight bowstrings."

"bows" kārmukāṇi: Cg is concerned that the reference here may be redundant in light of the description of the bows given in verse 14 above. He claims, however, that there is no redundancy, since kārmuka refers to a particular type of bow (kārmukāṇi dhanurbhedā na paunaruktyam). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 203), apparently under the influence of Cg, renders, "crossbows."

20. "And in his chariot there are two swords, one on each side." dvau ca khaḍgau rathagatau pārśvasthau: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read ca pārśvasthau, "and . . . one on each side," for rathagatau, "in [his] chariot," and pradīpau (pradīptau—D11), "lamps (blazing—D11)," for pārśvasthau.

"Clearly visible" vyakta-: We follow Cg, Cr, and Cm in taking vyakta as an adjective modifying khaḍgau, "swords." Cr glosses the term as "characterized by extraordinary splendor or beauty (atikāntiviśiṣṭāv eva)." Ct reads it adverbially as vyaktam, in the sense of "clearly, manifestly." This interpretation has been followed by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 230), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1658), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 202), who take the term in the compound to mean that the swords are certainly of the length described.

"their blades are fifteen feet in length and their hilts, six" caturhastatsarucitau . . . -hastadaśāyatau: Literally, "they are ten hastas in length and are equipped with four-hasta hilts." The hasta is an ancient unit of measurement marking the distance from a man's elbow to his fingertip. It is more or less equivalent to the ancient western measurement of the cubit and is thus approximately eighteen inches in length. In order to avoid either archaism or obscurantism, we have translated the measurement into modern units. See note to 5.33.18.

Our understanding, shared by Dutt (1893, p. 1344) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 203), is that the total length of each sword is fourteen hastas, or twenty-one feet. Some translators appear to believe that the four hastas of the hilt are part of the total of ten hastas for the entire weapon. We believe that the proportion of blade to hilt thus represented would be implausible. Other translators are ambiguous in their renderings.

"They beautify both sides." pārśvaśobhinau: Literally, "beautiful on the sides." D2,5,7,10,11,13,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cm, Cg, Cr, and Ct read instead pārśvaśobhitau. These commentators understand this variant differently. Ct glosses, "beautiful on their own sides (svapārśvaśobhitau)." Cr understands that, since the swords are placed on either side of the chariot (or of Atikāya), they therefore beautify both sides (pārśvasthāv ata eva pārśvayoḥ śobhitaṃ śobhā yābhyāṃ tau). This is similar to our understanding of the critical reading. Cg and Cm gloss, "beautified by both sides (pārśvābhyāṃ śobhitau)."

21. "With a red garland hung about his neck" raktakaṇṭhaguṇaḥ: Literally, "having a red neck-thread." We follow the commentators in understanding the reference to be to a garland of red flowers. See 6.58.46 and note.

"his huge mouth like that of Kāla, that dark warrior" kālaḥ kālamahāvaktraḥ: We follow Ck, Ct, and Cr in taking the first occurrence of the word kāla in its sense of "black, dark" and the second in the sense of "Yama, Time, Death." A literal translation would then be "black with a huge mouth [like that] of Kāla." (kālaḥ kṛṣṇavarṇaḥ. kālasya mṛtyor iva—so Ct.)

22. "Himalaya . . . with its . . . twin peaks" śṛṅgābhyām . . . himavān: Literally, "Himavat with two peaks."

23. "that . . . of his" tu yasyaitat: Literally, "of whom . . . that." The verse, like several of the preceding ones, is actually a relative clause. D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead ubhābhyāṃ ca, "and with those two [earrings]."

"radiant" śubhekṣaṇam: Literally, "with shining or beautiful appearance." This has been rendered by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 203) as "serene." The word īkṣaṇam can also mean "eye," and Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 53) has rendered the compound accordingly as "[faccia] dai fulgidi occhi." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead subhīṣaṇam, "very fearsome."

"the orb of the full moon passing between the twin stars of the constellation Punarvasu" punarvasvantaragataṃ pūrṇabimbam ivaindavam: Literally, "like the full lunar orb situated in the interval of Punarvasu." Punarvasu is generally regarded to be the fifth of twenty-eight nakṣatras, or lunar mansions, of ancient Indian astronomy, although according to some sources it is the seventh. Some texts regard it as having two stars, while others represent it has having four. Here, since the simile depends on the image of the bright face of Atikāya between its two golden earrings, the poet would apparently have had the former in mind. See GaruḍaP 1.59.2–9. Cf. AgniP 130.2–17. See Dange 1986–1990, pp. 298–313; and Kane 1941–1975, vol. 5, pp. 501–4. For a similar use of this constellation in a simile involving earrings, see notes to 6.55.123.

D1,3,6,7,9–11,T2,3,G2,3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read punarvasvantaragataḥ pari[prati—D6,T2,3,G3]pūrṇo niśākaraḥ, literally, "the full moon, bringer of night, situated in the interval of Punarvasu." Note that this variant lacks a dyotakaśabda, or specific marker of similitude, a lack that is generally supplied by the translators.

24. "great-armed hero" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed one!"

"at the sight of whom" yaṃ dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen whom." As Cr notes, this verse marks the last of the series of relative clauses that, in effect, make it and the preceding twelve verses a single extended syntactic unit (dvādaśānām ekatrānvayaḥ).

"in all directions" diśaḥ: Literally, "to the directions."

26. "energetic" mahotsāhaḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahātmā hi, "the great one."

"the younger brother of Kubera Vaiśravaṇa" vaiśravaṇānujaḥ: Literally, "born after Vaiśravaṇa."

27. "in battle" raṇe: V3,B1,4,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bale, "in strength."

"deeply learned" śrutadharaḥ: Literally, "bearing learning or what was heard." Ñ,V,B,D4,5,12,13,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead śrutidharaḥ, literally, "holding śruti or the vedas." This variant is rendered by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 203), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1658), and Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 53).

28. "highly regarded for his skill" saṃmataḥ: Literally, "highly regarded, esteemed."

"chariot, and elephant" rathe nāge: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead nāgapṛṣṭhe, "on elephant-back."

"and the noose" karṣaṇe: The precise sense of the word here is unclear. However, the context and the parallel passage at 7.32.33 strongly suggest that this is the name of a particular weapon. At that later passage, karṣaṇa is unmistakably one of a list of weapons, and Cg, Ck, Cm, and Ct all define the term there as "a type of weapon (āyudhaviśeṣaḥ)." We believe that Cm (also quoted by Ct) is correct in understanding the term to refer to weapons such as "the noose or lasso, etc." with which one drags an enemy (kṛṣyate 'neneti karṣaṇaḥ pāśādiḥ). Cm also suggests an alternative: "a type of iron cudgel [or javelin] (tomarabhedo vā)." See note to 6.58.10.

Cm further suggests that the three weapons listed—sword, bow, and noose—are used, respectively, from the three platforms indicated, viz., horseback, chariot, and elephant (aśvarathagajasthānānāṃ krameṇa pratiniyatāyudhāny āha khaḍge dhanuṣi karṣaṇa iti). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 203) follows this suggestion of Cm, translating, "in fighting from horseback with the sword, from the chariot with the bow and from elephant-back with the noose." Other translators consulted attempt to render the term in accordance with various senses of the root $\sqrt{kṛṣ}$, "to draw or drag," none of which strikes us as plausible in this context. Dutt (1893, p. 1345) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1658) understand the reference to be to the drawing of the bow or bowstring. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 230), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 203), takes the term in its sense of "destruction, massacre." Pagani (1999, p. 1059) renders, "de traîner un ennemi á sa merci." It should be mentioned that, as noted above, these translations do not read "chariot" and therefore cannot make the one-to-one correspondence between platform and weapon that is possible in the texts of Cg and Cm and the critical edition.

"sowing dissension, conciliation, and bribery" bhede sāntve ca dāne ca: These are the three nonviolent elements of statecraft referred to frequently in the nīti literature and the epics. See 6.9.8; 6.51.11–13; 6.71.12; and notes. Cf. notes to 6.31.48–49.

29. "He is known as" imaṃ viduḥ: Literally, "they know him as."

"Dhānyamālinī's" dhānyamālinyāḥ: As Cr notes, this is the name of one of Rāvaṇa's junior, literally, alternate, wives (tadabhidharāvaṇabhāryāntarasya). Dhānyamālinī is introduced in the Sundarakāṇḍa. See 5.20.37 and note; and note to 5.56.68.

"remains secure" bhavati nirbhayā: Literally, "[Laṅkā] becomes fearless or free from danger."

30. "His mind focused" bhāvitātmanā: Literally, "by him whose mind was purified or intent." Cr, the only commentator to treat this term, glosses, "he by whom an effort was assiduously made (bhāvitaḥ pariśīlita ātmā yatno yena tena)."

31. "self-existent Brahmā granted him . . . invulnerability" avadhyatvaṃ dattam asmai svayaṃbhuvā: Literally, "the state of being unable to be killed was given to him by Svayaṃbhū." These boons are strikingly similar to those said to have been given to Rāvaṇa at 6.57.4. Most noteworthy here is the gift of invulnerability to supernatural beings, which otherwise seems to be an exclusive property of Rāvaṇa. See verses 1–3 and notes above. See, too, 6.57.4 and notes.

33–34. "stopped . . . in its course" viṣṭambhitam: Literally, "stopped, obstructed." Cg glosses, "rendered motionless (niścalīkṛtam)."

"wise Indra's" indrasya dhīmataḥ: D6,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the instrumental dhīmatā for the genitive dhīmataḥ, thus making the adjective apply not to Indra but [redundantly—cf. dhīmān in verse 34] to Atikāya.

"of Varuṇa, monarch of the waters" salilarājasya: Literally, "of the king of the waters."

36. "twanged his bow" visphārayāmāsa dhanuḥ: It is actually the bowstring that is twanged as a warning to one's enemies, and, in most descriptions of this activity, this is expressly stated. See, for example, 6.42.23 and note. Pagani (1999, p. 1667) has a brief note on this practice.

37. "fearsome to behold" bhīmavapuṣam: Literally, "of fearsome form or appearance."

"the . . . leaping monkeys" plavaṅgamāḥ: Ś,V3,B1,D1–3,5,7–12,T1,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead vanaukasaḥ, literally, "forest dwellers."

38. "Armed with trees and mountain peaks" pādapair giriśṛṅgaiś ca: Literally, "with trees and mountain peaks."

39. "among those skilled in the use of divine weapon-spells" astravidām: Literally, "of those who know astras."

40. "that night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming one." B2,D5,7,9–11,T1,G1,2,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead viśāradaḥ, "clever, skillful."

"facing those tawny monkeys" harīn . . . abhimukhaḥ: Ś,Ñ2,V1,2,B,D1–4,8–12,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and the edition of Gorresio (6.51.39) read instead the accusative plural abhimukhān, lending the sequence the meaning "the tawny monkeys facing [him]."

"made of solid iron" sarvāyasaiḥ: See notes to 6.58.44. Cf. 6.3.12; 6.53.12; 6.55.47; and notes.

41. "pierced in every limb" bhinnagātrāḥ: G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read bhagnagātrāḥ, "their limbs broken."

"the leaping monkeys" plavaṅgamāḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead parājitāḥ, "defeated."

42. "in the full flush of youth" yauvanam āsthitaḥ: Literally, "having reached youth." V3,B1,D1–3,7,9–11,T3,G1,2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead yauvanadarpitaḥ, "arrogant because of youth." Cs argues that it is not necessary for a lion to be in the full flush of youth to terrorize a mere herd of deer, and therefore he believes the description should apply to the rākṣasa (Atikāya) and not to the lion. (rākṣasaviśeṣaṇam. na mṛgayūthamathane siṃhasya tāruṇyam apekṣitam.)

43. "would not strike any that did not resist" nāyudhyamānaṃ nijaghāna kaṃcit: Literally, "he did not strike anyone who was not fighting." As Ck and Ct explain, Atikāya refrains from attacking those who are not actually fighting because he is a true hero (vīratvāt). Cs sees this quality of Atikāya's to be in keeping with his description as a learned, and therefore highly dharmic, individual in verses 27 and 28 above (etena śrutadhara ityādīnā sūcitaṃ dharmiṣṭhatvaṃ dhvanitam).

"armed with bow and quiver" dhanuḥkalāpī: Literally, "possessing bow and quiver." The majority of commentators and all translators consulted who share this reading take kalāpa in its sense of "quiver." Cg and Cm justify this choice by quoting Amarakośa 3.3.128 in which tūṇīra, "quiver," is given as one of the meanings of this term (kalāpo bhūṣaṇe barhe tūṇīre saṃhatāv api). Cr, alone among the commentators, understands the word in the last of the senses given by Amara, "mass, collection (saṃhati)," lending the compound the sense "with a collection of bows." It should be noted that kalāpa can also mean "arrow," in which case the compound could also mean "with a bow and arrow[s]." This interpretation would seem to be supported by Atikāya's description of himself in the following verse (44) as "having bow and arrow in hand (śaracāpapāṇiḥ)."

"approached" upetya: Literally, "having approached." Ñ2,V3,B1,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead utpatya, "having jumped up on."

The meter is upajāti.

44. "Here I stand, mounted in my chariot" rathe sthito 'ham: Literally, "I am standing in my chariot."

"whomever has the ability coupled with resolve" yasyāsti śaktir vyavasāyayuktā: Literally, "of whom there is ability linked with resolve." V3,B3,D4,5,9–11,T1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the nominative masculine singular vyavasāyayuktaḥ for vyavasāyayuktā, which lends the compound the sense "he who is resolute."

D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read kaścit, "anyone," for śaktiḥ, "ability." This variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 204), who translates, "if anybody dares."

The meter is upajāti.

45. "overheard those words of Atikāya as he was speaking" tat tasya vākyaṃ bruvato niśamya: Literally, "hearing that speech of him who was speaking." As Ck and Ct remind us, these words were addressed not to Lakṣmaṇa but to Rāma (tat tasya vākyaṃ rāmaṃ pratyuktam).

"with a contemptuous smile" smayitvā: Literally, "having smiled." The commentators cite Dhātupāṭha 32.37 according to which the root $\sqrt{smi}$, "to smile," can be used to express contempt or disrespect (ṣmiṅ anādare iti dhātuḥ—Cg).

The meter is upajāti.

47. "The . . . sound of . . . bowstring could be heard" jyāśabdaḥ: Literally, "the sound of the bowstring." The verse lacks a finite verb. We have added the words "could be heard," more or less in keeping with the commentators'suggestion that one supply a verb with the sense of "arose (udabhūt)."

"the mountains" śailān: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sarvām, "all, entire." This adjective then construes with mahīm, "earth," to yield the sense "the whole earth."

50. "Get out of my way!" gaccha: Literally, "Go!"

"Do you really want to provoke me to fight" kim . . . māṃ yodhayitum icchasi: Literally, "Do you wish to cause me to fight?" Cr, the only commentator consulted to note the phrase, glosses, " 'Why do you want to make me fight?' The meaning is 'You don't want to [lit., there is no desire]' (māṃ yodhayituṃ kiṃ kim artham icchasi necchety arthaḥ)." Translators consulted generally understand, "Why do you wish to fight with me?"

"who am like Kāla himself" kālasadṛśam: Literally, "like Kāla."

51. "of the divinely charged weapons" astrāṇām: Literally, "of astras." D1,6,7,9–11,G1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bāṇānām, "of arrows."

52. "Would you want . . .?" icchasi: Literally, "you wish." We follow the lead of Cr, who adds the words kim artham, "why," in taking the sentence as interrogative.

"Don't sacrifice your life by confronting me." mā prāṇānjahi madgataḥ: Literally, "gone to me, do not destroy [your] life breaths." The imperative jahi of the root √han, "to strike or kill," is rather awkward in this context. Cg glosses, "do not injure (mā hiṃsīḥ)," but still the idiom is strange. Most northern manuscripts and the printed editions of Lahore and Gorresio substitute one or another verb with the sense of "loose, give up, abandon," from the roots √tyaj, "to abandon," or √muc, "to release," providing, in effect, a gloss on the slightly difficult southern reading (Pollock 1984a, pp. 85–86). Translations consulted generally take the verb jahi as if it had the sense of "give up, forfeit, lose, etc." See 6.67.2 and note.

53. "if you are obstinate" pratiṣṭabdhaḥ: Commentators are divided as to the meaning of the term here. Ct and Cr gloss, "egotistical, haughty, obstinate (ahaṃkāravān)," and we believe this interpretation best fits the context. Ck, Cg, and Cm take the term to mean "holding your ground or remaining facing me (pratiṣṭhitaḥ—Ck; pratimukhaṃ sthitaḥ—Cg; abhimukhasthitaḥ—Cm)." Cm also offers one of his "inner" readings of the verse, according to which Atikāya is really telling Lakṣmaṇa that he should stay if he does not wish to turn back, and that he, Lakṣmaṇa, will depart after gaining victory; that is, that, by a shift in the subject of the verb, it is he, Atikāya himself, who will go [to Yama's abode] after losing his life. (vastutas tu nivartituṃ necchasi yadi tvaṃ tiṣṭha. gamiṣyasi jayaṃ prāpyeti śeṣaḥ. prāṇān parityajyāhaṃ gamiṣyāmīti kriyāviparyāmaḥ.) See note to 6.27.4.

54. "the weapon of Lord Śiva" īśvarāyudha-: Literally, "the weapon of Īśvara." The commentators believe that the term is a reference to Śiva's characteristic weapon, the trident (triśūla). This identification has been followed by several of the translators consulted, either in their translations or in their notes. The text of Gorresio (6.51.52) shows a synonymous variant, aiśvarāyudha-, unrecorded in the critical apparatus. Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 55) renders, erroneously we believe, "armi divine."

55. "This arrow . . . will drink your blood" eṣa te . . . bāṇaḥ pāsyati śoṇitam: After showing that he reads the verse in its obvious sense, Cm once again proposes an inverted reading according to which the enclitic pronoun te, "your," construes with bāṇaḥ, "arrow." Cm then adds the genitive pronoun mama, "my," construing with śoṇitam, "blood." This yields the sense "your [Lakṣmaṇa's] arrow will drink my [Atikāya's] blood (vastutas tu te tava bāṇaḥ śoṇitaṃ pāsyati mameti śeṣaḥ)."

"a . . . lion, king of beasts" mṛgarājaḥ: Literally, "the king of beasts."

Following verse 55, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1306*]: "Having spoken in this fashion, he fitted an arrow to his bow, in a towering rage."

56. "Prince Lakṣmaṇa" rājaputraḥ: Literally, "the son of the king."

"enormously majestic hero . . . highly sensible" bṛhacchrīḥ . . . mahārtham: Literally, "enormously majestic one . . . [words] of great sense or import." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cs read manasvī, "intelligent," for bṛhacchrīḥ, "enormously majestic." These same editions and manuscripts (except for D11) read bṛhacchrīḥ (erroneously printed as manasvī in the critical apparatus) for mahārtham, "highly sensible." Cs explains that these two epithets (bṛhacchrīḥ and manasvī) show that Lakṣmaṇa is unafraid (dvābhyām apy abhītatāṃ dyotayati). It should be noted, however, that Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 232), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 204) and Pagani (1999, p. 1061), reads bṛhacchrīḥ adverbially. Roussel and Shastri translate the term to mean "avec une noble fierté" and "proudly," respectively, while Pagani renders "majestueusement."

The meter is upajāti.

57. "You cannot attain excellence" na . . . bhavān pradhānaḥ: Literally, "you, sir, are not the foremost."

"true heroes" satpuruṣāḥ: Literally, "virtuous men." We follow the interpretation of Cg, who glosses, "heroic men (śūrapuruṣāḥ)." See 6.57.2 and note.

"demonstrate your prowess" vidarśayasvātmabalam: Literally, "show your own strength." KK (both editions) and VSP 6.71.58 both break the sequence into vidarśaya svātmabalam (instead of vidarśayasva ātmabalam), which would yield a sense something like "show the strength of your own [sva-] body [ātmā]."

"evil-minded wretch" durātman: Literally, "O evil-minded one."

The meter is upendravajrā.

58. "Show what you are made of through your deeds." karmaṇā sūcayātmānam: Literally, "reveal yourself through action."

"truly endowed" yuktaḥ: Literally, "endowed, joined."

60. For some reason, this verse has been omitted from the translation of Dutt (1893, p. 1347).

61. "spurting from the gaping holes made in your body by my arrowheads" gātrād bāṇaśalyāntarotthitam: Literally, "from the body [blood] arising from the openings of arrow-darts." The term bāṇaśalya here can also be taken as a dvandva in the sense of "arrows and darts." Of the translators consulted, only Dutt (1893, p. 1347) comes close to this in rendering, "my arrows, resembling darts." Other translators who have this reading take the compound as a tatpuruṣa in the sense of "sharp points or tips of arrow." Although there is no clear lexical support for such a reading, we are inclined to accept it, as Lakṣmaṇa is not shown to use any weapons other than arrows in the battle that follows. See, too, verse 93 below.

62. "you must know me to be your death" mṛtyuṃ jānīhi: Literally, "know death." We follow Cg and Cr in adding the word "me (mām)." This interpretation is rendered or paraphrased in most of the translations consulted. Dutt (1893, p. 1347) translates, "death shalt thou know in the conflict," and adds, in a footnote, "The commentator says the passage means—'Thou knowest (me) for death itself.' I prefer the sense given." Most northern manuscripts as well as the text of Gorresio make the reading proposed by Cg explicit by including the pronoun mām in the second half of the verse. See Pollock 1984a, pp. 85–86.

Following verse 62, D1,2,5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1311*]: "When Viṣṇu was only a child, he[1] traversed the three worlds in three strides.[2]"

[1]"When Viṣṇu was only a child, he" bālena viṣṇunā: Literally, "by the child Viṣṇu."

[2]"in three strides" tribhiḥ kramaiḥ: Literally, "with three strides or steps." The reference is, of course, to the vāmanāvatāra, or dwarf incarnation, of Viṣṇu. See notes to verse 7 above.

63. "splendid" uttamam: Literally, "best, excellent."

64. For some reason, Dutt (1893, p. 1347) has, quite jarringly, placed his translation of this verse between pādas b and c of verse 63.

"Then . . . watched" dadṛśus tadā: T1,M3, the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm, and Gita Press (6.71.65) read instead draṣṭum āgaman, "they came to see."

"spirits of the departed" bhutāḥ: See 6.55.127 and note.

"guhyakas" guhyakāḥ: See 6.55.127 and note.

65. "shrinking, as it were, the space between them" saṃkṣipann iva cāmbaram: Literally, "as if compressing the sky." We follow the interpretation of Ct and Cg, who understand, "devouring, as it were, the space between them with the speed of his arrow (bāṇavegenāntarālasthitam ākāśaṃ grasann iva—so Ct)." Cr glosses, "as if turning back (nivartayann iva)," for saṃkṣipann iva. Cv glosses, "as if destroying (saṃharann iva)." Most of the translators consulted who read with the critical edition follow the interpretation of Ct and Cg. Pagani (1999, p. 1061) renders, "parut ébranler l'espace."

67. "was beside himself with rage" bhṛśaṃ kruddhaḥ: Literally, "extremely angry."

"five more" pañca: Literally, "five."

70. "drawing the bow" vicakarṣa: Literally, "he drew."

"with tremendous force" vegena: Literally, "with force or speed."

"the arrow" sāyakam: D5,7,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead vīryavān, "mighty or heroic."

71. "straight" anataparvaṇā: Literally, "with unbent or undepressed joints." The reference is to a bamboo arrow, whose knots or joints are smooth and level with the intermediate portions of the shaft. D2,3,6,7,10,12,T1,G,M, and the texts and printed texts of the southern commentators read instead nataparvaṇā, literally, "with depressed [i.e., not protuberant] joints." Despite the fact that the variants would appear to be antonyms, they essentially mean the same thing, since both nata and anata refer to deviations from the level surface. Cg and Cm, the only commentators to deal with this term in either of its variants, gloss, literally, "with hidden joints (ni[vi—Cm]līna-parvaṇā)." Both commentators agree that the idea is that the arrows are straight (ṛjuṇeti yāvat), and we concur. Translators vary considerably in their interpretations. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1662), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 206), and Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 57) understand the term to refer to smooth, flat, or straight joints of the arrow shaft. Dutt (1893, p. 1348), taking nata in its sense of "bent or bowed, renders the unlikely "having bent knots." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 233) offers the odd "aux noeuds adoucis." Pagani (1999, p. 1061), again idiosyncratically, renders, "à la pointe effilée." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 205) ignores the term completely. Compare the note at 6.78.5 to App. I, No. 47, line 10. See 6.114.20 and note.

72. "in battle" āhave: The reading is peculiar in the context of the simile. It is not clear why the arrow in Atikāya's head should look like a snake in battle. Given this reading, it is possible perhaps to detach the word from the simile and read it in a general sense: "In that battle . . . the arrow . . . resembled a serpent lord." The only translator to share the critical reading, Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 57), renders, "in una zuffa." The critical reading, however, does not appear to be a very strong one. Ñ1,D1,5–7,9–11,13,T1,2,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead acale, "on or in a mountain," while several northern manuscripts read acalaḥ, "[like] a mountain." From a rhetorical point of view, this variant is only a modest improvement. It is still not clear why a serpent on a mountain should be red, unless it is through the unexpressed coating by metallic ores. This idea is made explicit in Ñ2,V1,B2–4, which compare the arrow to a mountain reddened with minerals (dhāturakta ivācalaḥ). The comparison of the arrow rather than the huge rākṣasa to a mountain seems, however, highly suspect. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 206), alone among the translators of the southern text, attempts to cope with the simile by shifting the adjectival phrase "smeared with blood (śoṇitenāktaḥ)" to the serpent instead of the arrow, rendering, "The arrow . . . looked like a serpent smeared with blood on a mountain." This too, however, is not very persuasive, since it is not clear why a serpent on a mountain should be smeared with blood.

73."Tripura" tripura-: Literally, "the Triple City." The reference is to the three splendid cities of gold, silver, and iron in the sky, air, and earth, respectively, crafted for the asuras by their architect Maya. The cities along with their inhabitants were destroyed by Śiva's fiery arrow. The well-known purāṇic story is found throughout the literature. See 1.73.19; 1.74.12; and notes. Compare MatsyaP 128–129; ŚivaP, Rudrasaṃhitā 5.10; BhāgP 7.10, especially verses 66–71; and MBh 8.24.1–124. For a translation and discussion of the myth, see O'Flaherty 1975, pp. 125–36, 325. See note to 5.52.13. Tripura is also the personal name of the asura king ruling the Three Cities. Ck and Ct understand the term in this sense (tripurāsurapurasya). See, too, notes to 6.61.23 and 6.88.2. Cf. notes to 6.55.93–96.

74. "reflecting . . . thought" cintayāmāsa . . . vimṛśya: Cg and Cm understand the gerund vimṛśya to indicate that Atikāya is considering what he ought to do, while the finite verb indicates the content of his thought about Lakṣmaṇa (karaṇīyaṃ nirdhārya—so Cg). Cr reverses this (svakartavyaṃ cintayāmāsa). Cg and Cm, who gloss the gerund vidhāya, which begins the next verse in their text, as "having spoken (abhidhāya)," evidently understand the verb cintayāmāsa, "he thought," to mean that Atikāya spoke his thought aloud to Lakṣmaṇa. This idea, at any rate, has been adopted by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 206) and Dutt (1893, p. 1348), both of whom render, "said." Dutt has a footnote at this point in which he says, "Chintayāmāsa—thought, I apprehend, means said in this connection." See note to verse below.

75. "Reflecting in this fashion, he lowered his face and both his arms." vicāryaivaṃ vinamyāsyaṃ vinamya ca bhujāv ubhau: Literally, "having reflected in this fashion, having lowered his face and having lowered both arms." None of the available printed editions and few, if any, of the manuscripts collated for the critical edition have the same sequence of gerunds as does the critical text. The texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read vidhāyaivaṃ vidāryāsyaṃ vinamya ca mahābhujau, literally, "having ascertained thus, having split open his mouth, and having lowered both arms." As noted above, Cg, Cm, and some translators understand vidhāya, "having ascertained," in the sense of "having spoken, having said." Translators who follow the text of Ct render this half verse variously. Dutt (1893, p.1348), ignoring the phrase vidāryāsyam, offers, "having spoken thus candidly, he, folding his hands at ease." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1662) translates, "Distending his mouth and speaking (to him) as aforesaid, (nay) controlling his mighty arms." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 233), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 205), renders, "Sur cette considération, il ouvrit la bouche, étira ses grands bras." Pagani (1999, p. 1062) similarly translates, "Sur ce, il ouvrit la bouche, ploya ses grands bras." Printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead vidhāyaivaṃ vinamyāsyaṃ niyamya ca bhujāv ubhau, literally, "having ascertained in this fashion, having lowered his face, and having restrained both arms." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 206), the only translator consulted who renders this variant, translates, "Saying this, he snapped his mouth shut, held his arms close to his side . . ."

76. "one, three, five, or seven arrows at a time" ekaṃ trīn pañca sapteti sāyakān: Literally, "arrows: one, three, five, seven." Translators are divided as to whether the arrows are deployed in groups or if this is a running total of those shot. We are inclined toward the former position on the grounds that, in verses 67–68 above, Atikāya has already shot five arrows at a time.

"nocked them" saṃdadhe: Literally, "he joined or fitted." This is the normal verb used to express the action of fitting an arrow to a bowstring.

77. "which were like Kāla himself" kālasaṃkāśāḥ: Literally, "resembling Kāla."

78. "with many sharp arrows of his own" niśitair bahubhiḥ śaraiḥ: Literally, "with many sharp arrows."

79. "yet another sharp arrow" niśitaṃ śaram: Literally, "a sharp arrow."

80. "The immensely powerful warrior" mahātejāḥ: Literally, "The immensely powerful one."

"with tremendous force" sahasā: Literally, "violently, suddenly."

"It then struck" tataḥ . . . ājaghāna: Given the critical reading, we understand the arrow, mentioned in pāda b, to be the subject of the verb. Ś,V3,B1,D1–5,7–12,T1,G1,2,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read tena, "with it," for tataḥ, "then." In this reading, Atikāya becomes the subject of the verb ājaghāna, "he [i.e., Atikāya] struck."

81. "great gouts of blood" rudhiraṃ tīvram: See note to 6.57.87.

"as does a rutting elephant rut fluid" madaṃ matta iva dvipaḥ: Cr, the only commentator to deal with this verse, notes that the rut fluid of an elephant is reddish in color (aruṇavarṇam). He also glosses mattaḥ, "rutting," as "maddened in the sense of being characterized by the frenzy of battle (yuddhotsāhaviśiṣṭaṃ yathā bhavati tathā mattaḥ)." See 6.46.37 and note.

82. "that mighty man . . . removed that dart from his body" sa cakāra . . . ātmānaṃ viśalyam . . . vibhuḥ: Literally, "that powerful one made his body free from darts."

The term vibhuḥ here is ambiguous and lends itself to a number of interpretations. One meaning of the term is "lord, prince, or king," and some translators, e.g., Dutt ("that lord" [1893, p. 1349]) and Shastri ("that prince" [1959, vol. 3, p. 206]), translate in this sense. Several of the southern commentators, however, see the term as used here in its sense of "supreme divinity," particularly, but not exclusively, in reference to Lakṣmaṇa's status as a partial incarnation of Viṣṇu. Ct thus understands that the reason Lakṣmaṇa is able to rid himself of Atikāya's arrow is because he is the vibhuḥ, or "Lord," because of his connection with a portion of Viṣṇu (viṣṇvaṃśatvānusaṃdhānavān ity arthaḥ). Cr similarly understands that Atikāya's divinely charged weapon is destroyed by its mere contact with Lakṣmaṇa's [divine] body (śarīrasaṃbandhamātreṇa śaro dhvasta ity arthaḥ). The term vibhuḥ is equally an epithet of Brahmā, Viṣṇu, or Śiva, and Ck, who has theological interests in Brahmā (Goldman and Goldman 1996, p. 96; and note to 5.1.177), believes that this is the divinity indicated by the term here (brahmāṃśatvānusaṃdhānavān ity arthaḥ). Four of the translators consulted follow the interpretation of Ct and Cr, viz., Gita Press ("all-powerful Lakṣmaṇa [who was a part manifestation of Viṣṇu]" [1969, vol. 3, p. 1663]), Roussel ("Il se guérit . . . lui-même en sa qualité de Vibhu" [1903, vol. 3, p. 233]), Raghunathan ("Then the all-powerful Lord . . . healed himself [freed himself from pain]" [1982, vol. 3, p. 207]), and Pagani ("Mais il se débarrassa lui-même . . . de sa flèche, parce qu'il était de nature divine" [1999, p. 1062]). Pagani (p. 1667) provides a note on the term vibhuḥ in which she claims that the term is used here in reference to the divine nature of the sons of Daśaratha.

Although no doubt Vālmīki believes that Lakṣmaṇa, like Rāma, is a partial incarnation of Viṣṇu (see 6.26.31; 6.47.104,115; and notes; and Pollock 1984b and 1991, pp. 15–54), we do not believe it is his intention to allude to that identification in this passage. First, it is unnecessary, because it is quite normal in both Sanskrit epics for outstanding warriors, such as Lakṣmaṇa, to sustain and quickly recover from seemingly life-threatening injuries. Therefore, there is no need to assert the divinity of Lakṣmaṇa as a reason for his rapid recovery. More important, we believe that the occluded nature of divinity in the Rāmāyaṇa, which is made necessary by the boons of Rāvaṇa, militates against the idea that Lakṣmaṇa is immune to injury because he is a divinity. Certainly this is not the case elsewhere, where Lakṣmaṇa and Rāma are both injured and represented as near death (see 6.35.8–26 and 6.60.47–49). We have therefore rendered vibhuḥ in its most basic sense of "a powerful or heroic individual." In this we are in agreement with Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 58), who renders the term as "il prode Raghuide."

"invoking a divine weapon-spell, he nocked it" astreṇāpi samādadhe: Literally, "he fitted it with an astra as well." Dutt (1893, p. 1349), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 207), and Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 58) take the verb samādadhe (v.l. samādade, saṃdadhe) in the sense in which it has been used in the preceding verses (76 and 80), that is, "to nock an arrow." Cr and Cg, however, understand the verb here to refer to Lakṣmaṇa's charging or joining his arrow with the divine weapon-spell. They gloss, respectively, abhimantrayāmāsa and yojayāmāsa. In this they have been followed by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 233), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 206), Pagani (1999, p. 1062), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1663). We think that both actions are being described in this verse and understand that we need to supply the term yojayāmāsa, as in the following verse, to indicate that the arrow is being nocked but also charged with a divine spell.

83. "He charged that arrow with the divine weapon-spell of Agni" āgneyena tadāstreṇa yojayāmāsa sāyakam: Literally, "he then connected the arrow with the āgneya astra." As Cg, Ct, and Cm note, here the term astra, "divine weapon-spell or divinely charged weapon," stands, as it does in the previous verse, for the mantra, or "spell," that governs any weapon into which it is invoked (astramantreṇa). Lakṣmaṇa's access to the divinely charged weapons or divine weapon-spells is noteworthy. At Bālakāṇḍa 26–27, Rāma is granted such access as a boon from Viśvāmitra. No such power is ascribed explicitly to Lakṣmaṇa. See note to 6.35.5. Note, however, that in Bhavabhūti's understanding, the astras appear to be revealed to most, if not all, of Rāma's male kin. See UttaRāC 6.15; 7.9 and 10; etc.

"of that great warrior" mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "of that great one." B3,D10,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tadātmanaḥ, "then, of his own."

"as . . . his bow" dhanuś cāsya: Literally, "and his bow." D4,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Gita Press read instead dhanuṣy asya, "on his bow."

84. "invoked the divine weapon-spell of Sūrya" sauram astraṃ samādade: Literally, "he took up or called to mind the saura astra." The term sūra is a less common synonym for sūrya. V2,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read raudram, "belonging to Rudra [Śiva]," in place of sauram, "belonging to Sūra." Most of the translators who share this variant understand the sense to be "the weapon of Rudra." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1663), however, takes raudra in its general adjectival sense of "fearsome." See note to verse 86 below. See, too, 6.55.78; 6.87.33; 6.88.2; and notes.

85. "he had fitted to his bow" āhitam: Literally, "placed." We take the term in the sense of sam + ā √dhā, "to nock or to fit [to a bow]," which has been used above. See notes to 76 and 80 above. Ct and Ck understand the participle to refer to the conjunction of the arrow with the divine spell, glossing, "in which was placed the power of the divine weapon (āhitadīvyāstraśaktim)." Cr appears to have a similar view, glossing, "united, joined (sandhitam)." Cg glosses, saṃhitam, which could be taken in either the sense of "conjoined" or "placed on a bow."

"just as Kāla, the ender of all things, might his staff of doom" kāladaṇḍam ivāntakaḥ: Literally, "as the ender, the staff of Kāla."

86. "charged with the divine weapon-spell of Agni" āgneyenābhisaṃyuktam: Literally, "conjoined with the āgneya." The phrase is rather elliptical. A number of manuscripts, Ñ,V1,2,B2–4,D7,9–11,13,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct remedy this by reading instead āgneyāstrābhisaṃyuktam, literally, "conjoined with the āgneya astra."

"blazing . . . charged with the divine weapon-spell of Sūrya" dīptaṃ sūryāstrayojitam: Literally, "blazing . . . conjoined with the sūrya astra." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read raudram, "fearsome," for dīptam, "blazing." The term is slightly ambiguous, since these same texts read raudram in the sense of "belonging to Rudra (Śiva)," in place of saura, "belonging to Sūra," in verse 84 above (see note to verse 84 above). Most of the translations that follow the text of Ct and read this variant understand that Atikāya is shooting some combination of the missiles of Rudra and Sūrya, including Dutt (1893, p. 1349), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 233), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 206), and Pagani (1999, p. 1062). Pagani (pp. 1667–68), who understands that the astra was consecrated to both Sūrya and Rudra, has a note in which she attempts to justify this association on the basis of an indirect mythological connection they each have with Agni. This, she argues, explains why the two arrows, dedicated, respectively, to Agni and to (Sūrya-) Rudra, cancel each other out.

87. "as they flew through the sky" ambare: Literally, "in the sky."

88. "their flames extinguished" nirarciṣau: Literally, "flameless."

Following verse 88, D6,7,9–11,T2,G3,M5 insert a passage of one line [1320*], while Ś,V3,B1,D1–3,8,12 substitute it for 88cd. This line appears in printed editions of Ct (GPP, NSP 6.71.88cd), in Lahore (6.52.87), and in brackets in KK (6.71.90ef): "Deprived of their arrows,[1] the two, Lakṣmaṇa and Atikāya,[2] no longer shone in battle.[3]"

[1]"Deprived of their arrows" śarahīnau: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead dīpyamānau, "blazing." This variant lends the line the sense "Those two, who had been blazing, [no longer shone]."

[2]"the two, Lakṣmaṇa and Atikāya" tāv ubhau: Literally, "those two."

[3]"in battle" saṃyuge: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahītale, "on the ground."

These variants of the vulgate lend the line the sense "Those two, which or who had been blazing, no longer shone on the ground." The reference could be either to the arrows or to the warriors who shot them. Cr and Cs are the only commentators to remark on this line. Cr believes that the reference is to Lakṣmaṇa and Atikāya. His idea is that the reference to the warriors no longer shining suggests that they are suffering regret at the destruction of their prized weapons. (dīpyamānau tau lakṣmaṇa-rākṣasāv api mahītale na bhrājete. etena bāṇadhvaṃsahetukapaścāttāpas tayor jāta iti dhvanitam.) Cs agrees with Cr that the reference is to the two archers but feels that their loss of luster is occasioned not only by the failure of their arrows but also by their frustration at the failure of their initial hopes that they had killed their foe. (tau moktārau lakṣmaṇātikāyāv api dīpyamānau prāk hato 'yam iti parasparaṃ jayaprakāśau na bhrājete sma moghībhūtabāṇāv ity abhrājanaṃ yuktam iti bhāvaḥ.)

89. "the divinely charged aiṣīka missile" astram aiṣīkam: Literally, "the aiṣīka astra." Aiṣīka is the name of one of the divine weapon-spells conferred upon Rāma by Viśvāmitra at Bālakāṇḍa 26.6. It is given to him there immediately after the gift of the powerful brahmaśiras, or "Brahmā-head weapon." It is not, however, associated in that passage with any specific divinity. The word aiṣīka means "reed," and it is Aśvatthāman's investment of an aiṣīka, or reed, with the brahmaśiras astra at Mahābhārata 10.13.17 that lends the whole Mahābhārata episode from 10.10 to 10.18 the name Aiṣīkaparvan. Note that at Sundarakāṇḍa 36.26, Rāma is said to similarly infuse a blade of darbha grass with the brahmāstra. See, too, note to 5.36.26 (note that the reference to the Mahābhārata passage is incorrectly given there as 10.14.17).

D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read tvāṣṭram, "belonging to the divinity Tvaṣṭṛ," instead of tv astram, "divine weapon-spell." At 1.26.19, the weapon associated with Tvaṣṭṛ that is given to Rāma is a discus (cakra) called Sudāmana and is quite distinct from the aiṣīka weapon he is given several verses earlier.

"that divinely charged missile . . . with the divinely charged missile of Indra" astram aindreṇa: Literally, "that astra with the aindra." At 1.26.5, Viśvāmitra gives Rāma a discus (cakra) belonging to Indra. V3,B1,3,D1,3,6,T2,3,G1,2,M1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead astreṇaindreṇa, "with the divine weapon-spell or divinely charged missile of Indra." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 207), the only translator to render this variant, inexplicably translates "with an arrow united with Rudrā's [sic] missile."

90. "prince" kumāraḥ: D5,7,T1,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead the redundant ruṣitaḥ, "angry."

"with the divine weapon-spell of Yama" yāmyenāstreṇa: Literally, "with the yāmya astra."

91. "that divinely charged missile . . . it" tad astram . . . tad astraṃ tu: Literally, "that astra . . . but that astra." The majority of northern manuscripts and some southern manuscripts, including the printed editions of Cg, read instead some form of the instrumental singular for the second occurrence of the phrase tad astram (Ś,B1,D8—tam astreṇa; Ñ2,V,B3,D2,3,10,12,M3,5—tad astreṇa; B2,D9,11,G3—tadāstreṇa), yielding, literally, "with the [vāyavya] astra."

92. "with volleys of arrows . . . with torrents of rain" śaradhārābhir dhārābhir: Literally, "with showers of arrows . . . with showers."

93. "arrowheads" -agraśalyāḥ: Literally, "tip darts." Cr glosses, "the tip portion of the dart (śalyāgrabhāgaḥ)." See note to verse 61 above.

"with tremendous force" sahasā: See note to verse 80 above.

95. "with his impenetrable armor" avadhyakavacaḥ: Literally, "whose armor is not to be destroyed."

Following verse 95, Ñ2,V,B2–4,D6,T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg insert a passage of ten lines [1326*]: "He then shot at Lakṣmaṇa an arrow that resembled a venomous serpent.[1] Pierced in a vital spot by that arrow, Lakṣmaṇa Saumitri, tormentor of his foes, lost consciousness for a moment. Then, regaining consciousness, he slew in battle, in that great battle, the horses and charioteer [of Atikāya] with four splendid arrows. That conqueror of his foes then quickly destroyed [Atikāya's] banner.[1] [2–6] Seeing[2] the destruction of his banner, that bull among rākṣasas was furious. That powerful subduer of his foes showered[3] [Lakṣmaṇa] with torrents of arrows.[7–8] But Saumitri, unshaken, cut those arrows to pieces with his own arrows.[4] He then released blazing arrows[5] in order to kill that rākṣasa.[9–10]"

[1]"That conqueror of his foes then quickly destroyed [Atikāya's] banner." unmamātha ca vegena dhvajaṃ tasya ripuṃjayaḥ: D6,T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg omit this line.

[2]"Seeing" dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen." D6,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead kṛtvā, "having done."

[3]"that bull among rākṣasas was furious. That powerful . . . showered" dṛṣṭvā kruddho rākṣasapuṃgavaḥ / abhyavarṣata tejasvī: D6,T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg omit this line.

[4]"with his own arrows" śaraiḥ: Literally, "with arrows."

[5]"then . . . blazing arrows" ca śarān dīptān: D6,T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead lakṣmaṇo bāṇān, "Lakṣmaṇa [released] arrows."

Among the printed editions consulted, this passage appears as a regular part of the text only in Gita Press (6.71.98–101). KK prints and numbers the passage (6.71.98–100) but encloses it in brackets, adding in a footnote that it is found only in later manuscripts and not in older texts. GPP places these verses, without numbering them, in brackets between its verses 6.71.95 and 96. VSP excludes the passage from its text, placing instead a footnote marker between its 6.71.97cd and ef. It prints the passage in the footnote and notes that it is added [in some manuscripts]. NSP, Gorresio, KK 1905, and Lahore omit the passage entirely. Among the translations consulted, only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1664) renders this passage.

96. "that foremost of men" narottamaḥ: D6 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm, except for KK 1905, read instead śarottamaḥ, "the foremost of arrows." This variant is translated only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 207), who renders, "the most powerful arrow."

"But then" atha: Literally, "then."

97. "this rākṣasa" eṣaḥ: Literally, "this one."

Following verse 97, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1329*]: "For that mighty warrior,[1] encased in his armor, is invulnerable to other divinely charged weapons."

[1]"mighty warrior" balī: Literally, "mighty one."

98. "of irresistible force" amoghavegam: Literally, "of infallible impact." B2,3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead athogravegam, "then, [an arrow] of fierce impact."

"charged it with the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā" brāhmam astram . . . niyojya: Literally, "having employed the brāhma astra." Cg glosses, "having muttered the spell governing the brahmāstra (brahmāstramantraṃ niyojya japitvā)."

The meter is upajāti.

99. "all the directions, as well as the moon, the sun, the great planets, and the heavens, shook with fear" diśaḥ sacandrārkamahāgrahāś ca nabhaś ca tatrāsa: Literally, "the directions, together with the moon, sun, and great planets [trembled or were afraid], and the sky trembled or was afraid." Cr, perhaps uncomfortable with the notion of the intangible directions trembling, understands the term diśaḥ, "directions," to refer to the divinities that govern the quarters (dikpadena taddevatānāṃ grahaṇān nāsaṃbhavaḥ).

"groaned" rarāsa: Literally, "[the earth] cried out." We understand the reference to be to the rumbling sound that sometimes accompanies earthquakes. Cr glosses, "it shook (cakampe)," and most of the translators consulted understand the verb in this sense.

The meter is upajāti.

100. "with the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā" brahmaṇo 'streṇa: Literally, "with the astra of Brahmā."

"charged . . . fitted it to his bow" niyujya cāpe: Literally, "having charged or joined . . . on the bow." The verse is somewhat elliptical since it has only one verbal element to express both the charging of the arrow with the astra and the fitting of the arrow to the bow. As it happens, the one verb provided, the gerund niyujya, can function in either of these capacities but surely not both. Cr, the only commentator to address this verse, understands the gerund to refer to the fitting of the arrow to the bow and therefore supplies the adjectival participle yuktam, "charged with, conjoined with," to construe with the instrumental astreṇa, yielding the sense "having fitted to his bow the arrow that had been charged with the astra" (brahmaṇo 'streṇa yuktam . . . bāṇaṃ cāpe niyujya). Since the poet has so regularly used the verb $\sqrt{yuj}$ in this passage to refer specifically to the charging of divine weapon-spells (cf. verses 83, 86, 98, etc., above) and has used the verb sam $\sqrt{dhā}$ to refer to the fitting of an arrow to a bow (cf. verses 76, 80, etc., above), we have taken the gerund in the former sense here and supplied the verb "fitted."

"which was like Indra's vajra" vajrakalpam: Literally, "like the vajra." See 6.58.10 and note.

101. "hurtling toward him" samāpatantam: Literally, "as it came flying."

"loosed by Lakṣmaṇa . . . Its force was irresistible" lakṣmaṇotsṛṣṭam amoghavegam: For amoghavegam, see note to verse 98 above. D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead lakṣmaṇotsṛṣṭavivṛddhavegam, literally, "whose force was increased as it was released by Lakṣmaṇa." Translators who follow the text of Ct have understood this compound variously. Dutt (1893, p. 1350) understands a causal relationship between the increased force of the arrow and the fact of Lakṣmaṇa's having released it, translating, "acquiring enhanced vehemence arising from its having been discharged by Lakshmana." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1665) and Pagani (1999, p. 1063) posit no causal relationship between the two adjectival phrases (lakṣmaṇotsṛṣṭa and vivṛddhavegam). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 234), for reasons unclear to us, appears to understand vivṛddhavegam as an adjective modifying Lakṣmaṇa and having the sense "d'un bras vigoureux." In this impossible reading, he has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 207), who translates, "[loosed] by the mighty-armed Lakshmana."

"with gold" suvarṇa-: V1,2,B3,D10,11,T2,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead suparṇa-, literally, "beautifully feathered." Among the translators consulted, only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1665) and Dutt (1893, p. 1350) render this rather awkward variant. The word is also a name of Garuḍa, and this sense informs Gita Press's rendition: "provided with lovely feathers resembling the wings of Garuḍa (the king of birds)."

"it shone like fire" jvalanaprakāśam: Ś,V1,3,B1,3,D2,3,6,8–12,T2,3,G1,3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read śvasana-, "wind, breath," for jvalana-, "fire."

The meter is upajāti.

102. "continued to hurtle toward him" tasya . . . jagāma pārśvam: Literally, "it went to his side."

"with tremendous speed" ativegena: D7,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read instead atikāyasya, "of Atikāya," yielding the sense "to the side of Atikāya."

The meter is upajāti.

103. "fiercely blazing" pradīpta-: Literally, "blazing, glowing."

"never slackened his efforts" avipannaceṣṭaḥ: Literally, "of unfailing actions or efforts." D5,T1,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read -cetāḥ, "mind," for -ceṣṭaḥ, "efforts," lending the compound the sense of "his mind undistressed." Among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 208) renders this variant, translating, "with all his wits about him." The text of Gorresio (6.51.108), however, reads the variant vinaṣṭacetāḥ, "his wits scattered or destroyed." This reading is unattested in the critical apparatus.

"ploughshares" halaiḥ: This appears to be a weapon that resembles the blade of a plough. The hala, or "plough," is the characteristic weapon of Balarāma. D6,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead śaraiḥ, "with arrows." M1–3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead hulaiḥ, "with knives or daggers." Crā and Cg, the latter citing the lexicon of Vaijayantī, understand the term hula to refer to a type of double-bladed or double-edged (?) weapon (dviphalapattrāgram). See 6.83.23–25 and note.

The meter is upajāti.

104. "impervious to those wondrously formed weapons" tāny āyudhāny adbhuta-vigrahāṇi moghāni kṛtvā: Literally, "having rendered ineffective those weapons of wonderful form."

"violently" prasahya: Ñ1,V,B1,3,4,D1,3,4,6,9–11,13,T2,3,G1,2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead pragṛhya, "having seized."

The meter is upajāti.

105. "Battered" -prapīḍitam: Literally, "pressed, crushed." The critical reading appears weak and is apparently supported only by four southern manuscripts (G3,M1–3). It should at least be marked as doubtful. The majority of manuscripts, including the printed texts of Ct and Cr, read instead -pramarditam, "crushed."

Following verse 105, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of six lines [1330*]: "Seeing him fallen to the ground, his ornaments scattered,[1] all the surviving night-roaming rākṣasas were deeply distressed.[1–2] Despondent, their faces dejected, exhausted from the blows they had received, many of them cried out violently and loudly in discordant voices.[3–4] Then those night-roaming rākṣasas, terrified and despairing now that their leader had been slain, turned their faces toward the city and, moving swiftly,[2] fled.[5–6]"

[1]"Seeing . . . his ornaments scattered" dṛṣṭvā vikṣiptabhūṣaṇam: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vikṣiptāmbarabhūṣaṇam, "[Seeing him with] his ornaments and clothing scattered."

[2]"swiftly" tvaritam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead paritaḥ, "on all sides."

106. Virtually the entire north (Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,8,12,13) omits this verse, and, according to the principles on which the critical edition is based, the verse should be considered suspect and very likely should have been deleted from the critical text (Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv).

"who had accomplished their cherished goal" iṣṭabhāginam: Literally, "possessing as his portion that which was desired." The commentators, evidently deriving bhāga, "share or portion," from the sense of the verbal root √bhaj, "to obtain for oneself," gloss the compound as "possessing the accomplishment of what was desired (iṣṭaprāptimantam—so Cr)." The commentators indicate variously that the cherished object is the death of Atikāya or victory in battle (iṣṭam atikāyavadhaṃ prāptavantam iti—so Cv, Cm, Ct; iṣṭasya jayasya bhāgo prāptiḥ so 'syāstītīṣṭabhāgī tam—so Cg).

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

According to Ct, the killing of the six rākṣasa heroes—Triśiras, Atikāya, Devāntaka, Narāntaka, Mahodara, and Mahāpārśva—was carried out over the six days ending with the sixth [tithi] of the dark half of the month Bhādrāśvina (triśiro 'tikāyadevāntakanarāntakamahodaramahāpārśvānāṃ ṣaḍbhir dinair bhādrāśvinakṛṣṇaṣaṣṭhyantena vadha ityagre spaṣṭam). See note to 6.4.4.

Following verse 106, T1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm insert a passage of four lines in the vaṃśasthavila meter [1331*]. The lines are found in KK (1905 = 6.71.112); KK (1913), in brackets and numbered (6.71.116); VSP, in brackets and numbered (6.71.111); GPP, in brackets, no number, and placed after 109, indicating in a footnote that this verse is an addition in the text of Cg: "Having slain in battle the immensely powerful Atikāya, who resembled a storm cloud, Lakṣmaṇa was delighted. Then, honored by the multitudes of monkeys, he quickly returned to Rāma's side."

Following sarga 59, D3,5–7,9–11,T1,2,G,M (Ñ,V1,2,B2–4,D4,13 insert after 6.61; T3 inserts after 6.62) insert a passage of thirty-nine lines [App. I, No. 38]. This passage corresponds to sarga 72 in the printed editions of the texts of the southern commentators. "When the king had heard that Atikāya had been slain by great Lakṣmaṇa, he was deeply distressed and he spoke these words [1–2]: 'The supremely hot-tempered bowman[1] Dhūmrākṣa, foremost of those who bear weapons, Akampana, Prahasta, and even Kumbhakarṇa—all of them were immensely powerful rākṣasa warriors. They were eager for battle, conquerors of enemy armies, and were never conquered by their foes.[3–6] Those gigantic rākṣasa heroes, skilled in the various weapons, were slain together with their troops by Rāma, tireless in action, while many other great heroes were also felled.[7–9] But then, those two heroic[2] brothers were bound by my son, renowned Indrajit, with arrows granted him as a boon.[10–11] I do not understand by what extraordinary powers,[3] illusion, or delusion the brothers Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa escaped the bondage of those arrows, which fearsome bondage neither the gods, the immensely powerful asuras, nor the yakṣas, gandharvas, or kinnaras[4] could escape.[12–15] All those heroic rākṣasa warriors that sallied forth at my command have been slain in battle by the immensely powerful monkeys. I do not see anyone who, in battle, will slay Rāma, together with Lakṣmaṇa, and their heroic army, together with Sugrīva and Vibhīṣaṇa.[16–19] Oh! How powerful must this Rāma be! How great the power of his divinely charged weapons! For once they encountered his valor, the rākṣasas were destroyed.[5] [20–21] It is for fear of him that the citadel of Laṅkā has its doors and gateways shut tight.[6] [22] Let the citadel be guarded at every point by vigilant garrisons.[7] And let all comings and goings in the aśoka grove,[8] where Sītā is being guarded, be constantly reported to me.[23–25] And, surrounded by your respective[9] troops, you must take up your positions repeatedly at every point where there is a garrison.[26–27] And, night-roaming rākṣasas, you must closely watch the monkeys' every move,[10] whether in the evening, at midnight, or at dawn.[28–29] And you must never underestimate the monkeys. But keep your eyes on[11] the industrious army of our enemies, whether it be stationary or on the move.'[30–31] Then, when they had heard that entire speech of the overlord of Laṅkā, all those immensely powerful rākṣasas acted accordingly.[32–33] When Rāvaṇa, overlord of the *rā*kṣasas, had given his orders to all of them, he retired to his own dwelling, despondent and pierced with[12] the dart of rage.[34–35] Then, with the fire of rage blazing within him, the immensely powerful overlord of the night-roaming rākṣasas sighed over and over again, as he brooded[13] on the death of his son.[14] [36–39]"

[1]"The . . . bowman" dhanvī: Ñ1,D3,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead sarva-, "all," which yields sarvaśastrabhṛtāṃ varaḥ, "foremost of those who bear all weapons."

[2]"heroic" vīrau: The printed editions of Ct do not have the term vīrau in their line but substitute, in a somewhat different position, the adjective ghoraiḥ, "dreadful, feasrsome," which then modifies śaraiḥ, yielding the sense "with dreadful arrows."

[3]"extraordinary powers" prabhāvaiḥ: Literally, "powers, superhuman faculties." The commentators differ somewhat in their understanding of this ambiguous term. Ct glosses, "powers starting with his own innate strength (sahajasvabalādivaibhavaiḥ)." Cr understands, "Rāma's blazing energies (rāmatejobhiḥ)." Cg glosses, simply, "power, capability (sāmarthyam)," while Cm understands, "innate divine powers (sahaja-māhātmyaiḥ)."

[4]"kinnaras" -kiṃnaraiḥ: V1,D3,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead, -pannagaiḥ, "with serpents."

[5]Following line 21, D3,6,7,9,G2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read an additional line [3*] in which Rāvaṇa appears to be credited with knowledge of Rāma's status as a manifestation of Viṣṇu: "I believe the heroic Rāghava to be the flawless Nārāyaṇa." Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 209) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1667) translate this line.

[6]B2,3,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr omit line 22. Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 209) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1667) translate this line.

[7]"garrisons" gulmaiḥ: M3 and the printed editions of Cg and Cr read instead guptaiḥ, "protected." Cg glosses, "by those who effect their own protection (svayaṃ kṛtarakṣaṇaiḥ)."

[8]"And . . . in the aśoka grove" aśokavanikāyāṃ ca: D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the nominative aśokavanikā caiva (cedam—M1,2), "and the aśoka grove as well." As Ct explains, the aśoka grove in this reading is to be listed, along with the citadel of Laṅkā mentioned in the previous line, as needing to be guarded.

[9]"respective" svaiḥ svaiḥ: D3,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the seemingly redundant sainyaiḥ, "with the troops," which construes with balaiḥ, "with the troops." Cr glosses balaiḥ with parākramaiḥ, which he appears to read adjectivally in the sense of "powerfully."

[10]"every move" padam: Literally, "position, place, or step." We agree, more or less, with Ct, Ck, and Cr, who gloss, "comings and goings (gatāgatam)." Cg glosses, "what is attempted or resolved (vyavasitam)."

[11]"But keep your eyes on": The phrase has been added. Line 31 lacks a verbal element and is separated by line 30 from the nearest plausible one, the gerundive draṣṭavyam, "you must closely watch (lit., it is to be seen [by you])" in line 28. However, we follow Cg, who suggests that we read lines 28 through 31 as a single syntactic unit, thus implying that one should construe balam, "army," in line 31, with draṣṭavyam.

[12]"pierced with" vahan: Literally, "bearing, carrying."

[13]"sighed . . . as he brooded" vicintayan . . . viniśvasan: Literally, "thinking . . . sighing." The sentence constituted by lines 36–39 lacks a finite verb.

[14]The meter of lines 36–39 is vaṃśasthavila with a hypometric pāda a.

2. "When . . . heard" niśamya: Since all the southern commentators accept App. I, No. 38, in which Rāvaṇa is apprised of the death of Atikāya, etc. (line 1), as the preceding sarga (72) in their texts, they are confronted with a narrative inconsistency. Crā (second alternative), Cg (second alternative), Cm, and Cv understand the present verse to be a repetition of what has gone before (pūrvoktānuvādaḥ—so Crā). Crā's first alternative is that Rāvaṇa had previously been informed only of the death of Atikāya and not of the others (pūrvaṃ rāvaṇenātikāyavadha eva śruta ity avagamyate). Cg's first alternative is that Rāvaṇa had previously heard only a general report or rumor of the death of Kumbhakarṇa, etc., but now receives a detailed account from trusted informants (pūrvaṃ kumbhakarṇādivadhaḥ sāmānyena śrutaḥ saṃpraty āptaiḥ saviśeṣaṃ śruta iti). See note to 6.59.106.

"The king . . . the king" rājā . . . rājā: Only Cr among the commentators is concerned about the two occurrences of the term rājā in the same verse. He rationalizes it by taking the first occurrence adjectivally in the sense of "endowed with lordly splendor (aiśvaryadīptyā saṃyutaḥ)."

"he was stunned and his eyes filled with tears" mumohāśrupariplutākṣaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahābāṣpa- for mumohāśru. This yields the sense "his eyes filled with big tears."

The meter is upajāti.

3. "Now . . . that bull-like warrior" atharṣabhaḥ: Literally, "now . . . the bull." Ś,V3,B1,4,D2,3,5,8,10–12,T1,M3, the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators, and the editions of Gorresio and Lahore read instead ratharṣabhaḥ, literally, "bull among chariots." The commentators take this compound as a madhyamapadalopī in the sense of "foremost of those who ride in chariots, that is, a great chariot-warrior. (rathasthānām ṛṣabhaḥ. madhyamapadalopī samāsaḥ. mahāratha ity arthaḥ—so Ck.)" The critical reading seems elliptical and unusual, as it is not common for Vālmīki to use the word ṛṣabha, "bull," as a metaphor outside of compounds. See 6.72.33; 6.80.6; 6.81.18; 6.83.8; 6.84.15; and notes. Cf. 6.77.36.

"floundering" saṃparipupluvānam: Literally, "floating." The commentators make note of the uncommon use of the middle perfect participle (kānac) suffix.

The meter is upajāti.

4. "lord of the rākṣasas" rākṣasendra: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead nairṛteśa, literally, "O lord of the nairṛtas."

"despondency" moham: Literally, "confusion, delusion or affliction, pain."

"Indra's foe" indrāri-: Indrajit is referring to himself.

"can escape with his life" prāṇān samarthaḥ . . . abhidhartum: Literally, "is able to maintain the life breaths." D1,5,7,9–11,T1,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read abhipātum, "to protect or save," for abhidhartum, "to maintain."

The meter is upajāti with a hypermetric pāda a.

5. "you will surely see" paśya: Literally, "see."

"dismembered" -vikīrṇa-: Literally, "scattered, strewn."

"my arrows . . . with . . . shafts" -bāṇa- . . . śaraiḥ: Literally, "arrows . . . with arrows."

"bristling" ācita-: Literally, "filled, covered, heaped up with."

The meter is upajāti.

6. Cm asserts that this verse and the previous one have a hidden inner meaning (vāstavārtha) according to which Indrajit is really saying that he is unable actually to kill Rāma since the latter is endowed with strength and valor. Instead, he is able merely to wound him with his arrows. (atibalaparākramaśālino rāmasya hanane tu nāhaṃ samarthaḥ. athāpy etāvat kariṣyāmi. paśyety āha paśyeti. madbāṇavikīrṇadeham api gatāyuṣaṃ prāptāyuṣaṃ śarair ācitasarvagātraṃ rāmaṃ paśyeti saṃbandhaḥ.) See notes to 6.27.4.

"Śakra's foe" śakraśatroḥ: Indrajit is, once again, referring to himself.

"well founded" suniścitām: Literally, "well ascertained." Cr glosses, "truthful (satyām)."

"infused with both human and divine power" pauruṣadaivayuktām: Literally, "endowed with that which is human and that which is divine." The commentators understand that the term bala, "strength, power," is omitted from the compound. Their understanding, as expressed by Ck and Ct, is that Indrajit's vow is effectuated by its being conjoined with human power in the form of his own innate strength and with the divine power granted him by Lord Brahmā (pauruṣeṇa sahajaśauryabalena daivabalena bhagavadbrahmabalena ca yuktāṃ kriyamāṇām). The idea is that Indrajit is a fearsome warrior in his own right and is also equipped with the divine weapons conferred upon him by Brahmā. Translators have understood the compound variously. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1669), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 209), and Dutt (1893, p. 1353) all understand, more or less, as do we and the commentators. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 210), idiosyncratically, understands Indrajit to be swearing by all the gods and his own valor. Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, pp. 60–61), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 238), and Pagani (1999, p. 1065) understand daiva nominally in its sense of "fate, destiny." Cf. 6.6.7–8 and notes.

"I shall consume" saṃtāpayiṣyāmi: Ś,V2,3,B1,2,4,D2,3,5–12,T1,2,G2,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators and Lahore read instead saṃtarpayiṣyāmi, "I shall gratify." The reading should perhaps be marked as doubtful (Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv). Cv, Cm, and Cg gloss, "I shall fill (pūrayiṣyāmi)." Translators who share this reading take the verb metaphorically in the sense of "to overwhelm," with the exception of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 210) and Pagani (1999, p. 1065), who read it more literally in the sense of "to sate or surfeit."

The meter is upajāti.

7. "Mitra" -mitra-: Mitra is the vedic divinity of contracts and agreements. V3,D6,7,9–11,T2,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead -rudra-, "Rudra."

"the sādhyas, the Aśvins" -sādhyāśvi-: Literally, "the perfectible beings and the Aśvins." The sādhyas are a class of celestial beings. See ManuSm 1.22; 3.195. Ñ,V,B2–4,D3,4,7,9–13,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead sādhyāś ca, "and the sādhyas," thus eliminating the Aśvins from the list.

"shall witness" drakṣyanti: V3,B4,D10,11,T2,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, and Ct read instead the future imperative drakṣyantu, literally, "they will have to witness."

"of Viṣṇu in Bali's sacrificial enclosure" viṣṇoḥ . . . baliyajñavāṭe: This is yet another reference to the vāmanāvatāra, or dwarf incarnation, of Lord Viṣṇu. Compare 6.40.43; 6.44.37; 6.49.1–2; 6.47.119; 6.53.25; 6.59.7; 6.105.24; and notes. See 1.28.2 and note.

The meter is indravajrā.

8. "Indrajit, the enemy of the lord of the thirty gods" tridaśendraśatruḥ: Literally, "the enemy of the lord of the thirty."

"in high spirits" adīnasattvaḥ: Literally, "whose spirit was not despondent."

"yoked to . . . donkeys" khara- . . . yuktam: Note that, at verse 18 below, a verse that has doubtful textual support, Indrajit's chariot is said to be drawn by horses.

"equipped with the implements of war" -samādhiyuktam: Literally, "yoked to a set." We follow the interpretation offered by Ct, Ck, and Cr, in which samādhi is defined as anything by which battle is accomplished, i.e., weapons such as a bow, a sword, etc. (samādhīyate yuddham ebhir iti samādhayo dhanuḥkhaḍgādayas taiś ca yuktam—so Ck and Ct). This interpretation is followed by most of the translators consulted who share this reading. Cv, Cm, and Cg take samādhi in the sense of "a yoke or a connection (saṃbandhaḥ—so Cm)," lending the compound the sense of "yoked to a brace of splendid donkeys." Among the translators, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 210) appears to follow this interpretation, translating, "to which powerful asses were attached."

The meter is upajāti.

9. "the chariot of Indra himself" hariratha-: Literally, "the chariot of Hari." Commentators and translators are divided as to how to take the polysemic term hari, which, among its many other meanings, can refer to a number of different divinities. Ct and Ck gloss, "Indra's chariot (indrarathaḥ)," and, given the context of the chapter in which Indrajit refers to himself several times as "the rival or foe of Indra" (see verses 4 and 6 above), we believe that they are probably correct. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 210) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1669) translate accordingly. Cg, citing Amarakośa 3.3.174, which lists arka, "the sun," as one of the meanings of hari, glosses, "Sūrya's chariot (sūryarathaḥ)." Cr offers no gloss, implying that he understands hari in its common use as an epithet of Viṣṇu. This use of the name Hari is followed by all the other translators consulted, except for Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 61), who makes the identification fully explicit by rendering, "carro di Visnu." Even though Pagani (1999, p. 1066) translates, "ce char . . . celui de Hari," her note follows Cg's interpretation. She there asserts, "il s'agit de l'immense char du soleil dans lequel les dieux prennent place à tour de rôle chaque mois" (1999, p. 1668). Cf. note to 6.59.11.

"drove" jagāma: Literally, "he went."

"to where the battle raged" tatra yatra yuddham: Literally, "there where the battle [was]."

10. "great Indrajit" mahātmānam: Literally, "the great one."

"immensely powerful warriors" mahābalāḥ: Literally, "immensely powerful ones."

11. "mounted on elephant-back" gajaskandhagatāḥ: Literally, "situated on the shoulders of elephants."

"rode splendid chargers" paramavājibhiḥ: Literally, "with splendid horses." Because of their acceptance of the southern insert 1335*, discussed below, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 239), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 210), and Pagani (1999, p. 1066) understand the compound to mean "extraordinary mounts [such as the creatures listed in 1335*]."

"They were armed with" -dharāḥ: Literally, "bearing."

Following 11ab, D7,10,11,M3,G3 (after11cd), and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators (KK numbered in brackets 16.73.11cd–12; VSP as a footnote following 6.73.11b) insert a passage of three lines [1335*]: "Those rākṣasas of fearsome valor also rode on tigers, scorpions, cats, donkeys, camels,[1] serpents, boars,[2] ferocious[3] lions, jackals huge as mountains, crows,[4] haṃsas, and peacocks."

[1]"camels" -uṣṭraiḥ: Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 239), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 210), takes the term in its sense of "buffalo."

[2]"boars" varāhaiḥ: Dutt (1893, p. 1354), presumably as the result of a typographical error, renders, "bears."

[3]"ferocious" śvāpadaiḥ: We believe that the adjectival sense of this term, "savage, ferocious," fits the context better than the seemingly redundant sense of "wild beast." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1669) and Dutt (1893, p. 1354) render, "beast of prey," although Dutt reads this as a separate member of his list, while Gita Press subordinates it to lions. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 210) renders, "cheetahs," while Pagani (1999, p. 1066) thinks the reference is to dogs. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 239) leaves the term untranslated.

[4]"crows" kāka-: M3 and the texts of VSP and KK read instead śaśa-, "rabbits."

Following verse 11, D7,G2, and the printed editions of Gita Press (=6.73.13cd) and GPP (6.73.12cd) insert a passage of one line [*1336]: "And they were armed with bludgeons,[1] war hammers, āyaṣṭis [clubs?], hundred-slayers,[2] and iron clubs." This line is translated only by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1669) and Pagani (1999, p. 1066).

[1]"bludgeons" musṛṇṭhī-: D7 and the printed texts of GPP and Gita Press read instead bhṛśuṇḍi- (bhuśuṇḍi—Gita Press). The identification of this weapon is uncertain. See note to 6.48.32 and note to 6.78.20, 1726*, n. 3. Pagani (1999, p. 1066) renders, "plommées." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1669) leaves the term untranslated and follows it in parentheses with the phrase "probably a kind of fire-arm."

[2]"hundred-slayers" -śataghnī-: See note to 6.3.12.

12. "Praised by the night-roaming rākṣasas" stūyamāno niśācaraiḥ: Literally, "being praised by the niśācaras." D9,10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ājiṃ vegena vīryavān, "That mighty warrior [went forth] swiftly to battle."

"fearsome" bhīmaiḥ: Ñ1,V3,B3,D4,5,7–11,13,T1,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead pūrṇaiḥ, here, "full-sounding, sonorous."

"the thunderous sound" mahāsvanaiḥ: Literally, "with the great sounds." D1,5–7,9–11,T,G2,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead [cā]pi nisvanaiḥ (niḥsvanaiḥ—D1,6,7,10), "with sounds."

13. "illuminated by the full moon" paripūrṇena . . . candramasā: Literally, "with the full moon."

14. "with the most splendid, golden yak-tail fly whisks" haimaiḥ . . . cārucāmaramukhyaiḥ: Literally, "with the foremost of beautiful chowries, made of gold." Ct, Cr, Cg, and Cm note that the handles of the whisks would be made of gold (hiraṇamayadaṇḍaiḥ—so Ct). This is reasonable, as the whisks themselves would, of course, be yak-tails. See 6.115.13–16 and notes.

"all adorned with gold" hemavibhūṣitaiḥ: Literally, "adorned with gold." D9–11,T2,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the nominative hemavibhūṣaṇaḥ, "possessing golden ornaments." In this reading the adjective modifies Indrajit.

15. See note to verse 16 below.

"illuminated by Indrajit" indrajitā: Literally, "by Indrajit."

16. B4,D4,5,7,9–11,T1,G,M1,2,5, and the texts of the southern commentators omit this verse, as well as verses 17 and 18. Printed editions treat these verses variously. GPP places them unnumbered in brackets between its verses 6.73.15 and 16 (=critical edition 6.60.14 and 15), with a footnote stating that these two and a half verses (critical edition verses 16–18cd) are additional in the text of Cg (idaṃ sārdhapadyadvayam adhikaṃ go. pāṭhe). KK places them in brackets numbered as its 6.73.17–18, following critical edition 6.60.14. A footnote indicates that these two verses (five half verses = critical edition 16–18cd) are found "only in later manuscripts and not in older southern manuscripts (idaṃ ślokadvayam auttarāhapāṭha eva dṛśyate na tu dākṣiṇātyaprācīnakośeṣu)." VSP relegates the entire passage to a footnote and makes the same textual observation as does KK. KK 1905 and NSP omit the verses entirely. Lahore (6.53.16–18), Gita Press (6.73.17–19ab), and Gorresio (6.52.16–16) all include and number the verses without comment as part of their texts. Only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1670) and Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, pp. 61–62) translate the passage. According to the principles on which the critical edition is based, these verses (verses 16, 17, 18, and possibly 19) should be considered suspect and should have been relegated to the critical apparatus. See Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv, no. 5.

17. See note to verse 16 above.

"You have conquered even Vāsava in battle" jitas te yudhi vāsavaḥ: M3 and the printed editions of GPP, VSP, and KK read instead tvayā vai vāsavo jitaḥ, "Vāsava was conquered by you."

"How then would you not more easily slay" kiṃ punaḥ . . . na vadhiṣyasi: Literally, "how much more will you not kill." The construction is awkward and unusual, although the sense is clear. D6,T2,3,M3 attempt to improve the syntax by substituting the upasarga ni for the awkward negative particle na, reading instead nihaniṣyasi, "you will slay," for the critical edition's na vadhiṣyasi. This variant is seen in all printed editions of the southern texts that read the line, and is the variant rendered in the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1670). Similarly, the text of Gorresio (6.52.17) substitutes the pronoun tvam, "you," for the negative particle na.

18. See note to verse 16 above. Additionally, B3,D13,T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators, including Gita Press, omit pādas cd (". . . the hero proceeded swiftly to the shrine of Nikumbhilā in his horse-drawn chariot").

"the shrine of Nikumbhilā" nikumbhilām: In the Sundarakāṇḍa (5.22.41), Nikumbhilā appears to be the name of a goddess worshiped by the rākṣasa women. According to several commentators (ad loc.), this is the name of a manifestation of Bhadrakālī, worshiped at a shrine in western Laṅkā. See 5.22.41 and notes. According to Apte and MW (s.v.), the term may refer to a grove or shrine at the western gate of Laṅkā or generically to any sacrificial ground. Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 62) has adopted this last meaning in his translation. See note to verse 19 below. See 6.69.23; 6.71.13; and notes. See, too, 7.25.2, where Rāvaṇa sees his son Indrajit performing sacrifices in a grove called Nikumbhilā. See S. Goldman 2006b.

"in his horse-drawn chariot" rathenāśvayujā: Literally, "with a chariot yoked to horses." Note that, at verse 8 above, Indrajit's chariot is said to be drawn by donkeys. See note to verse 8 above.

19. "the battleground" yuddhabhūmim: Although the southern commentators do not know the preceding verse, they understand that Indrajit has, in fact, gone to the place or shrine of Nikumbhilā. Thus, Ck, Ct, and Cr explain, "The term 'battleground' means 'the ground that is conducive to the oblations that bring about victory in battle, that is, the place of Nikumbhilā.' (yuddhabhūmiṃ yuddhajayasaṃpādakahomasādhanabhūmim. nikumbhilāsthānam ity arthaḥ—so Ct.)" See note to verse 18 above.

20. "to the accompaniment of sacred mantras and in accordance with the ritual prescriptions" mantravad vidhivat: Literally, "accompanied by mantras and according to the rules." Ct defines the latter term as "the method specified in the kalpa, or ritual texts (kalpoktaprakāraḥ).” Cg glosses, “in proper sequence (kramavat).” D10–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vidhivan mantrasattamaiḥ, “according to rule and with excellent mantras.”

“whose splendor was like that of Agni, eater of oblations . . . to Agni, eater of oblations” hutabhoktāraṃ hutabhuksadṛśaprabhaḥ: Literally, “to the oblation eater . . . he whose splendor was like that of the oblation eater.”

21. “offered oblations to Agni, the purifier, along with ritual offerings of parched grain accompanied by flowers and sandalwood paste” havir lājasaṃskārair mālyagandhapuraskṛtaiḥ / juhuve pāvakam: Literally, “he offered oblations to Pāvaka with offerings of parched rice accompanied by flowers and sandalwood paste.” Ct, Ck, and Cr, reading the variant satkāraiḥ, “with religious observances,” for saṃskāraiḥ, “with offerings or purificatory rites,” understand that there are two separate actions in the verse. They supply the gerund satkṛtya, “having honored or worshiped,” which they take to govern the accusative pāvakam, “fire.” According to this reading, Indrajit first worships the fire god with parched grain, flowers, etc., and then makes his oblation in the form of the goat that will be mentioned in the coming verses (see verse 23 below) (gandhamālyapuraskṛtair lājasatkārair lājaiḥ pāvakaṃ satkṛtya tatra pāvake vakṣyamāṇasaṃskārasaṃskṛtair havir vakṣyamāṇacchāgarūpaṃ juhāva—so Ct).

22. Verses 22–25 are identical with or closely parallel verses 6.67.6–9.

“Weapons served as the śarapatra grass, myrobalan wood was the kindling.” śastrāṇi śarapatrāṇi samidho ’tha vibhītakāḥ: Literally, “weapons, śarapatras, kindling, and vibhītakas.” We follow the interpretation of Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr in understanding that the first and third articles mentioned serve in the roles of the second and fourth, which are necessary elements of any sacrificial performance. The commentators make this judgment on the grounds that these substitutions are mandated in the case of black magical (abhicāra) or violent (raudra—Cm) rites (atra tv abhicāraviśeṣe tatsthāne śastrāṇi kṛtānīty bodhyam—so Cg). This interpretation has similarly been followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1354), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 211), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1670). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 239), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 210), and Pagani (1999, p. 1066) read the entire verse as a simple list, either of weapons or sacrificial requisites.

“the śarapatra grass” śarapatrāṇi: Literally, “arrow-leaves.” According to Ct, Cr, Cg, and Cm, this is a type of kuśa grass. This grass (Saccharum spontaneum) is generally used for mats and roofs and is personified together with kuśa grass (Poa cynosuroides) as one of Yama’s attendants. For some reason, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 211) translates “kuśa grass.” Typically, the sacrificial grass is spread over a stretch of ground to serve as the arena for the sacrifice. This common tall grass is used in other rites, specifically in rituals for the deceased (see Baudhāyanapitṛmedhasūtra 1.14:9 as quoted in the Śrautakośa 1.II, p. 1096). MW (s.v.) identifies śarapatra only as Tectona grandis (teak), clearly an unsuitable meaning in this context.

“myrobalan wood” vibhītakāḥ: This is the Terminalia belerica, one of the myrobalans. The tree is mentioned in the tenth book of the Ṛgveda (10.34.1), as its nuts are said to be used as dice for gambling. Pagani (1999, p. 1066) renders “de graines de vibhītaka.” Cf. 2.85.46 (passim), where the term vibhītaka is translated as “beddanut tree,” whereas the plant rendered as “myrobalan” is the āmalaka. See Brockington 1984, p. 106 and Cowen 1965, pp. 37–38. Cf. MW (s.v.).

"His garments were red" lohitāni . . . vāsāṃsi: The garments of a vedic practitioner would normally be white. The red garments are meant to be associated here with black magic. See 5.25.20, where red garments are tokens of ill omen. See 6.59.21; 6.58.46; 6.67.5; and notes. See, too, AgniP 229.14. Cf., however, the comments of Cg on 6.67.5, where he notes that the vedas specify red turbans for ṛtvik priests. On omens, see 6.4.6.

"his ladle was of black iron" sruvaṃ kārṣṇāyasam: See 6.3.12; 6.53.12; 6.55.47; and notes. Black iron, too, is considered inauspicious. See 1.57.9, where Triśaṅku's royal ornaments turn to iron when he is cursed to become a caṇḍāla. See AgniP 230.1–4. Again, a normal vedic practitioner would use a ladle made of acacia, or cutch, wood (Acacia catechu).

23. 6.60.23ab is a close variant of 6.67.7ab.

"the fire altar" agnim: All translations consulted take the term mistakenly, we believe, in its most common sense of "fire." Surely, it is the altar that is being spread with weapons and not the fire itself. Compare 1.13.22 for Vālmīki's use of agni in this sense, and see Apte (s.v. agni). One should note that the Mānavaśrautasūtra (5.1.9.17–18) prescribes the use of arrows instead of kindling sticks, samidh, in a ritual designed to gain the upper hand in a battle.

"with weapons . . . in place of śarapatra grass" śarapatraiḥ: Literally, "with śarapatras." Given the information provided in verse 22 above, we must agree with Ct and Cr, who understand that the reference here is to the weapons that are serving as the surrogate for this grass (tatpratinidhiśastraiḥ—so Cr).

"he seized the throat of a . . . goat" chāgasya . . . galaṃ jagrāha: As the commentators explain, we are to understand that Indrajit intends the goat to be the offering (homārtham iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 211) incorporates this into his translation, rendering the verse very strongly as "kindling the fire . . . he offered in it the head of a black sheep whose neck he severed." It is not clear why he takes chāga, "goat," to mean "sheep."

"pure black" sarvakṛṣṇasya: Literally, "entirely black." D9–11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead kṛṣṇavarṇasya, "black in color." The significance of a pure black goat is not made clear. However, a female black goat is used in the crematory ritual in the Āśvalāyana Gṛhyasūtra (4.2.7); see also Śrautakośa 1.II, p. 1071. The color black is associated with things that are inauspicious. See 1.57.9, where the king Triśaṅku, cursed to become a caṇḍāla, suddenly finds himself in black clothing, and 5.25.18, where Rāvaṇa is said to be wearing black garments in Trijaṭā's prophetic dream. See, too, 6.4.44; 6.23.19; and notes.

24. 6.60.24a is a close variant of 6.67.8a.

6.60.24d is a close variant of 6.67.8d.

"the smokeless fire with its huge flames displayed signs" vidhūmasya mahārciṣaḥ / babhūvus tāni liṅgāni: Literally, "of that smokeless great flamed one there were signs." The propitious signs mentioned are, as Ct, Ck, and Cr note in their comments to verse 25, undoubtedly those described in that verse. Among the translators consulted, only Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 239) makes this point explicitly.

"that betokened" yāny adarśayan: Literally, "that showed." Ct, Ck, Cr, and Cg understand that these signs had betokened victory for Indrajit [in his battles with the gods (devādiyuddhe)—Cr] in the past (yāni purā svasya vijayam adarśayan—so Ct). Compare note to 6.67.8.

25. 6.60.25 is virtually identical to 6.67.9.

"his flames swirling in an auspicious clockwise direction" pradakṣiṇāvartaśikhaḥ: Compare 5.51.28, where a similar swirling of flames is represented as an auspicious omen.

"himself rose up" svayam utthitaḥ: M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead svayam āsthitaḥ, which Cg glosses as "possessing his inherent form (svayam āsthāvān)." By this he presumably means that fire is present in its elemental form, for Cg is aware of the critical reading, of which he notes: "If we take the reading svayam utthitaḥ, it means that he rose up in the form of a man (svayam utthita iti pāṭhe puruṣarūpeṇotthita ity arthaḥ)."

26. "Foremost among those familiar with divine weapon-spells" astravidāṃ varaḥ: D5,7,9–11,T1,G, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead astraviśāradaḥ, "skilled in divine weapon-spells."

"Indrajit" saḥ: Literally, "he."

"the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā" astram . . . brāhmam: Evidently, Indrajit is preparing himself for battle through two separate but simultaneous actions. The first is his oblation to Agni, which, as will be shown in verse 28 below, endows him with the power of invisibility. The second is his invocation of the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā, which provides him with the powerful weapons with which he is able to subdue Rāma and his allies. Since he was already shown to possess the power of invisibility in his earlier encounter with Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa at sargas 6.34–35, it appears that he must periodically renew it through repeated performances of this sacrifice. See especially 6.34.39. Perhaps this is all in aid of the narrative necessity of the creation of specific windows of vulnerability on the part of Indrajit that will enable Lakṣmaṇa to finally kill him, when, as Vibhīṣaṇa informs him, he has yet to complete still another of his repeated sacrifices. See 6.71.14; 6.72.10–14; 6.74.2–6; and notes.

"his chariot" ātmaratham: Literally, "the chariot of himself." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 239), followed by Pagani (1999, p. 1067), reads this compound as if it were a dvandva in the sense of "himself and his chariot." We are not persuaded.

"all of his weaponry" sarvam: Literally, "everything [else]."

27. "was being invoked . . . was being gratified with oblations" āhūyamāne . . . hūyamāne: Literally, "was being invoked . . . was being oblated." Ct understands that it is the divinity governing the divine weapon-spell, a divinity characterized by the esoteric spell known as "trimūrtirahasya," that is, being invoked (tad astramantradaivate trimūrtirahasyalakṣaṇe kriyamāṇāvāhane). Ck understands similarly. Ct and Ck further understand that the participle hūyamāna, "being oblated," refers not to the offering made to Agni but rather to his being invoked by the mantra assigned to that previously mentioned divinity (taduddeśena tanmantreṇa pāvake hūyamāne ca sati).

"the heavens shook" vitatrāsa nabhastalam: Ct and Ck insist that we are to take the statement literally and not merely as exaggeration (nāyam arthavādaḥ).

28. "Indrajit" saḥ: Literally, "he."

"he vanished into thin air" khe 'ntardadhe 'tmānam: Literally, "he hid himself in the sky." Several of the commentators note that the simplex verb should be read as a causative governing the accusative ātmānam and that the elision of the initial ā of ātmānam is irregular. (ātmānam antardadhe 'ntardhāpayāmāsa. antarbhāvitaṇyartho 'yam. khe 'ntardadhetmānam ity atrārṣam—so Cg.)

"charioteer" -sūtaḥ: D5–7,9,10,T2,3,G1,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead -śūlaḥ, "lance."

"his form no longer perceptible" acintyarūpaḥ: Literally, "whose form was inconceivable." We understand that the term here refers to the obscurity or invisibility of Indrajit's form. The only commentator to remark on this reading, Cg, glosses, "the power of whose mantra was unimaginable (acintyamantraśaktiḥ)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 212), the only translator who has this reading, clearly renders Cg's interpretation, offering, "by virtue of the unimaginable powers that he had acquired by his spells." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -vīryaḥ for -rūpaḥ, yielding the sense "of inconceivable power."

The meter is upajāti.

Following verse 28, D1,5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of three lines [1342*]: "Then, roaring in its eagerness to fight, the rākṣasa army set out filled with horses and chariots and adorned with flags and banners.[1–2] They slaughtered the monkeys in battle with many shining arrows, ornamented and fierce in their impact, and with iron cudgels and hooks.[1][3]"

[1]"They slaughtered the monkeys in battle . . . with iron cudgels and hooks" tomarair añkuśaiś cāpi vānarāñ jaghnur āhave: This line is found in the critical apparatus for App. I, No. 39, line 1. Like 1342*, the line is known to D1,5–7,9–11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators. Without it, line 3 of 1342* remains a mere sentence fragment. The term "hooks (añkuśaiḥ)" normally refers to the pointed and hooked goads used by elephant drivers to control their mounts. Here, presumably, it is a type of weapon with a similar form.

Following 1342*, D1,5–7,9–11,S, and the texts and printed editions of all southern commentators insert a passage of forty-six lines (lines 1–34 and 43–54) of a passage of fifty-four lines [App. I, No. 39]. The north (Ś,Ñ,V,B,D2–4,8,12,13) inserts lines 1–42 following 6.83.38. The passage, or at least the forty-two lines common to both the north and the south, should properly have been included in the critical text. The passage reads as follows: "Then, on the battlefield, right before Rāvaṇa's eyes, those fearsome monkeys slaughtered the rākṣasas with mountains and trees.[1] [1–2] But then Rāvaṇi, in a rage, turned to the night-roaming rākṣasas, saying,[2] 'In your eagerness to slay the monkeys, you gentlemen must fight with your spirits high.'[3–4] Then all those rākṣasas, roaring and eager for victory, showered those fearsome monkeys with hails of arrows.[5–6] Meanwhile, Indrajit,[3] surrounded by the rākṣasas,[4] tore the monkeys to pieces[5] in battle with broad-tipped arrows,[6] iron arrows, maces, and cudgels.[7–8] Although they were being slaughtered in battle, the monkeys, armed with trees, suddenly rushed at Rāvaṇi, so fearsome to behold.[7] [9–10] Then, in a rage, immensely powerful and vastly energetic Indrajit, son of Rāvaṇa, tore the bodies of the monkeys to pieces.[11–12] Raging in battle, with a single arrow he would pierce nine, five, or seven of the tawny monkeys to the delight of the rākṣasas.[13–14] That supremely invincible hero struck down the monkeys in battle with arrows adorned with gold and shining with the splendor of the sun.[15–16] Tormented by those arrows, their limbs severed in battle, the monkeys fell like the great asuras, their hopes of victory dashed[8] by the gods.[17–18] In that battle, the enraged bulls among monkeys charged at him who was scorching them like the sun with his fearsome arrows, which resembled burning rays.[19–20] But then, tormented and drenched with blood, all the monkeys fled in all directions, their bodies torn, their wits deserting them.[21–22] But then, exerting their valor on Rāma's behalf, the monkeys, laying down their lives, turned back,[9] roaring in battle, taking up boulders for weapons.[23–24] Making a stand, the leaping monkeys showered Rāvaṇi in battle with trees, mountaintops, and boulders.[25–26] But immensely powerful Rāvaṇi, victorious in battle, parried that great and lethal shower of trees and boulders.[27–28] Then, in turn, that mighty warrior[10] broke the ranks of the monkeys in battle with arrows that shone like fire and resembled venomous serpents.[29–30] Having first pierced Gandhamādana with eighteen sharp arrows, he then, from afar, pierced Nala, who had taken his stand, with nine more.[31–32] Next, that immensely powerful warrior[11] pierced Mainda with seven arrows that tore at his vitals, and he then pierced Gaja in battle with five more.[33–34] Next, he pierced Hanumān with twenty arrows, Nala with ten, Gavākṣa with twenty-five, and Śakrajānu with a hundred. Then, having struck Dvivida with six, he pierced Panasa with ten arrows, Kumuda with fifteen, Jāmbavān with seven, Tāra with three arrows, and Vinata with eight. Then, that immensely powerful archer[12] pierced Vālin's son, Aṅgada, with eighty arrows and struck Śarabha in the chest with a single arrow. He pierced Krathana in the forehead with three arrows.[13] [35–42] He pierced[14] Jāmbavān with ten arrows[15] and Nīla with thirty. Next, he rendered Sugrīva, Ṛṣabha, Aṅgada, and Dvivida unconscious[16] with the sharp and fearsome arrows[17] he had received as a boon.[43–45] Then in a frenzy of violence,[18] like the fire at the end of a cosmic age, he harried in his rage the other[19] monkey leaders with numerous arrows.[46–47] He wrought havoc upon the hosts of the monkeys in that great battle with his swift and well-aimed[20] arrows, shining with the splendor of the sun.[48–49] When Indrajit[21] saw that the monkey army was thrown into chaos, bewildered[22] by the torrents of his arrows and drenched with blood, he was filled with the greatest delight.[23] [50–51] Then, once again, swift and immensely powerful Indrajit,[24] the strong and mighty[25] son of the rākṣasa lord, releasing a hail of arrows and a fearsome hail of other weapons, crushed the monkey army.[52–54]"

[1]"Then, on the battlefield, right before Rāvaṇa's eyes, those fearsome monkeys slaughtered the rākṣasas with mountains and trees." tatas te vānarā ghorā rākṣasāṃs tān raṇājire [1] / jaghnuḥ śailair drumaiś caiva rāvaṇasyaiva paśyataḥ [2] //: D1,5–7,9–11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators substitute, "They slaughtered the monkeys in battle . . . with iron cudgels and hooks (tomarair aṅkuśaiś cāpi vānarāñ jaghnur āhave)." This line has been discussed above in a note to 1342*. These same manuscripts, as well as V3 and the printed editions and texts of the southern commentators, omit line 2.

[2]"saying": Most uncharacteristically the direct quote in line 4 is not preceded by some form of a verb meaning to speak or say. The southern commentators supply such a verb, and we concur.

[3]"Indrajit" saḥ: Literally, "he."

[4]"surrounded by the rākṣasas" rakṣobhiḥ saṃvṛtaḥ: According to several of the commentators, we must understand that Rāvaṇi is hovering closely above the rākṣasa army (rākṣasasainyopari pratyāsannākāśadeśe sthitaḥ—so Ct); otherwise, as they note, this description contradicts verse 28, where he is said to have vanished into the sky.

[5]"tore . . . to pieces" vicakarṣa: D5,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cv, and Cm read instead vicakarta, "he cut apart or slaughtered."

[6]"broad-tipped arrows" nālīka-: Lexical sources consulted identify this variously as "an arrow, an iron arrow, a dart, or a javelin." We follow Cg, who glosses, "a broad-tipped arrow (viśālāgraśaraḥ)."

[7]"suddenly rushed at Rāvaṇi, so fearsome to behold" abhyadravanta sahasā rāvaṇiṃ ghoradarśanam: D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead abhyavarṣanta, "showered," for abhyadravanta, "rushed at," while D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read śailapādapaiḥ, "with mountains and trees," for ghoradarśanam, "fearsome to behold." Thus the text of Ct would be rendered as "they suddenly showered Rāvaṇi with mountains and trees." Ṅ,V1,2,B,D1–4,6,7,9,T2,3,G1,2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read sahitāḥ, "all together," for sahasā, "suddenly." D5,7,T1,G2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read raṇakarkaśam, "merciless in battle," for ghoradarśanam, "fearsome to behold." These variants are translated only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 212), who renders, "[the apes] . . . in a body pursued the son of Rāvaṇa, who was ruthless on the battle-field." Crā and Ck raise the interesting issue of how the monkeys could charge at Indrajit when he had become invisible. Crā explains that they rushed at the spot from which his weapons were being released (rāvaṇimuktāyudhāgamanapradeśam). Ck simply says he was perceived merely in terms of his general direction (kevalaṃ taddiguddeśamātreṇa dṛṣṭaḥ).

[8]"their hopes of victory dashed" mathitasaṃkalpāḥ: Literally, "their desire crushed." Ck, Ct, and Cr understand, "their will to fight taken away (saṃhṛtayuddhasaṃkalpāḥ—so Ck, Ct)." We follow Cg and Cm, who gloss, "their fantasies destroyed (nāśitamanorathāḥ)."

[9]"turned back" nivṛttāḥ: GPP (=6.73.39) and Gita Press (=6.73.42) print this term with an avagraha, indicating that they read anivṛttāḥ, literally, "not turning back." In this case, however, one must understand nivṛtta to mean "retreated," and the sense here would be "no longer retreating." NSP (6.73.39) shows no avagraha. Cr, who does not read the avagraha, understands, "devoid of desire for the pleasures of this world (iha lokasukhecchārahitāḥ)." G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read abhivṛttāḥ, which Cg glosses as "approaching, facing (abhimukhaṃ pravṛttāḥ)."

[10]"in turn, that mighty warrior" prabhuḥ: Literally, "lord, mighty one."

[11]"that immensely powerful warrior" mahāvīryaḥ: Literally, "immensely powerful one."

[12]"that immensely powerful archer" mahātejāḥ: Literally, "immensely powerful one."

[13]"pierced": Lines 35–42 have only three finite verbs: bibhide, "he pierced," in line 40; atāḍayat, "he struck," in line 41; and pratyavidhyata, "he pierced," in line 42. We have repeated the word "pierced" a number of times to enhance readability.

[14]"he pierced": The words have been added for readability.

[15]"with ten arrows" daśabhiḥ: Literally, "with ten."

[16]"unconscious" niṣprāṇān: Literally, "lifeless, dead." Since the following verses will make it clear that the monkeys named are not, in fact, dead, we understand the term here in the sense it appears to have at Mahābhārata 12.95.12 [Citraśāla edition] (=critical edition 12.96.12c critical apparatus), where a warrior who is niṣprāṇaḥ is listed among those who must not be killed in battle. Cr similarly glosses, "as if devoid of life (prāṇarahitān iva)."

[17]"arrows": The word has been added for readability.

[18]"in a frenzy of violence" mūrcchitaḥ (mūrchitaḥ—so crit. ed.): We believe we have selected the most contextually appropriate of the several meanings of this term. Cr and Cg gloss, "increased, grown great (pravṛddhaḥ)," an apparent reference to Indrajit's size. This interpretation is followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1673), who renders, "like the swollen fire of universal destruction." Other translators have offered variations on the meaning "befuddled," such as "transported or beside himself with rage, etc."

[19]"other" anyān: Printed editions of Ct read instead vanyān, "forest creatures."

[20]"well-aimed" sumuktaiḥ: Literally, "well-released."

[21]"Indrajit" saḥ: Literally, "he."

[22]"bewildered" mohitām: D7,9–11,M2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead pīḍitām, "oppressed, afflicted."

[23]"filled with the greatest delight" hṛṣṭaḥ . . . parayā prītyā: Literally, "delighted with supreme pleasure."

[24]"swift . . . Indrajit" indrajit tvaritaḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead paritas tv indrajit, "from all sides . . . Indrajit."

[25]"strong and mighty" balī . . . balī: Cv, Cm, and Cg remark on the apparent redundancy. As rationalized most fully by the latter two, the first occurrence of the term refers to Indrajit's physical strength (vīryavattā), while the second refers to the power he derives from the boons he has received (varadānavattā).

D5–7,9–11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators omit lines 35–42. Only Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 143) translates these lines.

29. "Emerging from his own army, Indrajit" sa sainyam utsṛjya: Literally, "having left the army, he." Ś,Ñ1,D5,7,9–11,T2,G,M2,3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read sva-, "his own," for saḥ, "he." Several of the commentators, recalling that Indrajit was said to be hovering above his troops at verse 28, understand that he left the airspace over his own army (svasainyoparibhāgam utsṛjya—so Ct).

"torrents of rain" ambu: Literally, "water."

The meter is upendravajrā.

30. "baffled by his magical illusion" māyāhatāḥ: Literally, "struck by illusion." We follow the suggestion of Cr, who glosses, "baffled (mohitāḥ)." The reference is to the fact that, although they are being shot by Indrajit, the monkeys are unable to see him and so cannot fight back effectively.

"Śakra's conqueror" śakrajit: This is yet another variant of the name Indrajit, "conqueror of Indra."

The meter is upajāti.

31. "All they could see . . . they could not see" saṃdadṛśuḥ . . . na . . . abhyapaśyan: Literally, "they saw . . . they did not see."

"raining on the monkey troops" vānaravāhinīṣu: Literally, "among the monkey armies."

The meter is upajāti.

32. "filled all the directions" sarvā diśaḥ . . . pracchādayāmāsa: Literally, "he covered all directions." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 241), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 212), incorrectly takes the phrase sarvā diśaḥ, "all directions," adverbially in the sense of "in all directions." They then must supply a verb: "qui décochait" (Roussel) and "let fly" (Shastri). These two translators understand the verb "he covered (pracchādayāmāsa)" to take as its object not the directions but the monkeys.

"with volleys of arrows" bāṇagaṇaiḥ: Literally, "with hosts of arrows." D10 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the somewhat peculiar bāṇagataiḥ, literally, "with movements of arrows." Translations that follow the text of Ct ignore this odd compound and render, simply, "arrows."

"further disheartening" viṣādayāmāsa: Literally, "he caused [them] to be despondant." Ñ2,V2,B3,D7,9–11,G1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vidārayāmāsa, "he tore or rent."

The meter is upajāti.

33. "Brandishing . . . like shining fires" vyāvidhya dīptānalasaṃnibhāni: Ñ1,B3,D5, 7,9–11,T1,G1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the participle vyāviddha-, "whirling," for the critical edition's gerund, vyāvidhya, "having brandished or whirled." D1,6,9–11,T2,3,G1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -saprabhāṇi, "with the luster of," for -saṃnibhāni, "like." Thus the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr and those manuscripts that share both variants have the compound vyāviddhadīptānalasaprabhāṇi, "having the luster of whirling and blazing fire."

The meter is upajāti.

34. "by the sharp arrows" śitaiḥ . . . -bāṇaiḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read bāṇaiḥ, "with arrows," for śitaiḥ, "sharp." This yields an obvious redundancy. B3,4,D1,7,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead śaraiḥ, "with arrows," yielding a similar redundancy. Cg and Cm, however, are aware of the problem and attempt to resolve it by saying that the word śaraḥ, "arrow," must be taken in the sense of "sharp (tīkṣṇaḥ)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 241), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 213), reads both terms nominally, understanding, "arrows and darts."

"like red-blossoming kiṃśuka trees" praphullā iva kiṃśukāḥ: Literally, "like blossoming kiṃśukas." The kiṃśuka tree (Butea frondosa; "the flame-of-the forest") is noted for its striking bright red-orange blossoms that precede its foliage in the summer. The bright red flowers inspire Vālmīki to use the tree as an object of comparison for bleeding warriors at various points in the poem (see 6.35.9; 6.55.22; 6.67.23; 6.76.28; 6.92.7; and notes). Here, however, the simile seems to be based not so much on the blood of the monkeys as on the flaming arrows that cover their bodies. Cf. 6.62.19 and note.

35. D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct omit verse 35. Most translations that follow the text of Ct therefore also omit it. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, pp. 1673–74) includes the verse and numbers it as 6.73.60. Pagani (1999, p. 1068), who follows the text of GPP, where the verse occurs unnumbered between verses 6.73.56 and 57 with the notation that it is additional in the texts of Cg and Cr, translates it as well.

36. "with arrows" śaraiḥ: Ś1,V2,B3,D7,9–12,G1,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead śanaiḥ, "slowly, gradually," which one would normally construe with the verb "clung (viviśuḥ)." Ct, however, insists that the adverb should be construed with the adjective tāḍitāḥ, "struck," yielding the sense "were gradually struck."

"they . . . clung to one another" viviśur anyonyam: Literally, "they entered one another." We follow the interpretation of Ck and Ct, who gloss, "remained clinging to one another's limbs (anyonyagātraṃ samāśliṣya [āśliṣya—Ck] tasthuḥ)." Cg and Cm construe the verb causally with "they fell (petuḥ)," glossing, "they fell on top of one another in order to cling or huddle (anyonyoparyālambanārthaṃ petur ity arthaḥ)."

37–40. "Gaja, Gomukha" gajagomukhau: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead gavayaṃ tathā, "and Gavaya."

"Jyotimukha" jyotimukham: See note to 6.47.40.

41. "fletched with burnished gold" tapanīyapuṅkhaiḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead -varṇaiḥ, which lends the compound the sense "of the color of burnished gold."

The meter is upajāti.

42. "regarded them no more seriously than showers of rain" dhārānipātān iva tān vicintya: Literally, "having considered them as if they were the falling of streams [of water]." B3,D9–11,T1,G,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read acintya, "not having thought," for vicintya, "having considered." The commentators explain that Rāma pays no heed to them because of their insignificance to him (tucchatvenāparigaṇayya—so Cr).

"turned his gaze" samīkṣamāṇaḥ: Literally, "gazing, looking." Cg understands that, relying on his own inherent nature, Rāma, significantly, gazes with the appropriate gestures at Lakṣmaṇa, who is preparing to counteract the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā (svasvabhāvāvalambanena brahmāstrapratikriyāṃ kartum udyuktam iṅgitair abhivīkṣamāṇaḥ san).

The meter is upajāti.

43. "again" punaḥ: We understand the adverb here to be an allusion to Indrajit's previous attack on Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa in sarga 35. This idea is shared by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 213). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 241) understands it to refer to a renewed attack on the monkey army, while Pagani (1999, p. 1069) and Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 64) take it to refer to Indrajit's renewed recourse to the mantra governing the brahmāstra. Other translators appear to ignore the term.

"the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā" brahmāstram: Cg understands the term to refer to the mantra governing the brahmāstra. In this he is followed by Pagani (1999, p. 1069). D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahāstram, "the great or powerful divine weapon-spell."

"fierce . . . us with arrows" ugram asmañ śaraiḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead asmāñ śitaiḥ śaraiḥ, "us with sharp arrows."

"constantly" prasaktam: We understand the term in its common adverbial sense of "constantly, incessantly." Ck, Ct, and Cr read the term adjectivally in the sense of "obtained (prāptam—Ct)," which they see as modifying -astram, "missile or divine weapon-spell." Among the translators consulted who share this reading, only Pagani (1999, p. 1069) understands the term as we do. The rest follow the commentators. D6,T2,G2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead the nominative adjective prasaktaḥ, which, in this context, would mean "intent," describing Indrajit. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 214), the only translator who consistently follows the text of Cg, appears to ignore the term.

The meter is upajāti.

44. "The great warrior" mahātmā: Literally, "the great one."

"by self-existent Brahmā" svayaṃbhuvā: Literally, "by the self-existent one."

"is hovering in the sky" kham āsthitaḥ: V3,B3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead samāhitaḥ, "intent, mentally focused."

"How is it possible to kill" kathaṃ nu śakyaḥ . . . nihantum: Cr understands Rāma's intention to be that killing a deceitful warrior, like killing a fleeing enemy, brings fault or censure upon the killer. Thus, Cr continues, Rāma is concerned with preserving his reputation as a chivalrous warrior who understands his class duty and is justifying the propriety of the later killing [of Indrajit by Lakṣmaṇa]. (etena kapaṭayoddhṝṇāṃ hananaṃ palāyanaparahananavad doṣāvaham iti rāmābhiprāyaḥ sūcitaḥ. tena vakṣyamāṇaviśasanasādṛśyaprāptiḥ svadharmajñatvapalāyanāyaiveti dhvanitam.)

"invisible" naṣṭadehaḥ: Literally, "his body destroyed." We follow Ck, Ct, Cg, and Cr, who take the term to mean "having an invisible body (adṛṣṭadehaḥ—so Cg)." For a similar use of the root $\sqrt{naś}$ to refer to invisibility, see 5.11.17 and note.

The meter is upendravajrā.

45. "the self-existent . . . Brahmā" svayaṃbhūḥ: Literally, "the self-existent one."

"who is the creator of all things . . . And" prabhavaś ca yo 'sya: Literally, "and who is the source of this." Commentators and translators vary in their understanding of this reference. Given the tenor of the passage, we are inclined to agree with Ck and Ct, who understand the reference to be to Brahmā's well-known role as the creator of the universe. These commentators further understand the conjunction "and (ca)" to indicate that he is also the destroyer of the world. (yo 'sya sakalasaṃsārasya prabhavaḥ sraṣṭā. cakārāt saṃhartā ca.—so Ct.) Cr takes Brahmā to be the progenitor of the royal lineage of Manu (manuvaṃśasya prabhava utpattikāraṇam). Cg thinks that the reference is to Brahmā's role merely as the creator of the divine weapon-spell (asyāstrasya prabhava utpattikāraṇam). Translators consulted which share this reading follow the idea of Cg, with the exception of Gita Press (1969, pp. 1674–75), which represents the view of Ck and Ct.

"inconceivable" acintyaḥ: Cg, Ct, and Ck understand the term elliptically in the sense "of inconceivable divine power (acintyavaibhavaḥ—so Ck, Ct)."

"wise Lakṣmaṇa" dhīman: Literally, "O wise one." Cg takes the term here to refer to the fact that Lakṣmaṇa knows not to be agitated in times of crisis (āpatsu na calitavyam iti jñānin). Ck and Ct understand it to refer to Lakṣmaṇa's practice of meditation on Lord Brahmā, which will enable him to endure Indrajit's arrows (yatas tvam api brahmadhyānasampannas tasmāt sahasva—so Ct). Both commentators further suggest that only as a result of the grace of the Lord [Brahmā] will Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa attain victory (evaṃ hi bhagavadanugrahād asmākam api jayo bhaviṣyati nānyathety arthaḥ—so Ct).

"you must . . . endure with me" tvam . . . mayā saha . . . sahasva: As Ct and Ck note, this attitude toward Indrajit's brāhma weapons has earlier been adopted by Hanumān (at 5.46.37–41) and by Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa (at 6.35) (bhagavato brahmaṇa ājñāyā mārutinevāsmābhir api pālanaucityenaitat sahanasyaivaucityād ity āśayenāha—so Ct). Cs believes that Rāma is saying that he alone is able to withstand Indrajit's weapons but that, through his grace, Lakṣmaṇa will be able to do so as well (mayā saha sahasvaitena tatsahane mama sāmarthyaṃ madanugrahāt tava sahanam iti dhvanyate).

The meter is upajāti.

46. "is filling all directions" pracchādayati . . . sarvā diśaḥ: Literally, "is covering all directions." Ś1,B2,3,D1,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the imperative pracchādayatu, "let him fill," for the indicative pracchādayati. In addition, D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read sarvādhikaḥ, "the greatest of all," for sarvā diśaḥ, "all directions." This adjective would then describe Indrajit. See note to verse 32 above.

"presents a sorry sight" na bhrājate: Literally, "it does not shine, look splendid."

The meter is indravajrā.

47. "and have ceased to fight or show signs either of anger or excitement," hataroṣaharṣau: Literally, "whose anger and excitement are destroyed." We follow Ck and Ct, who gloss, "whose signs of excitement and anger (-harṣaroṣau by transposition) are not manifested (aprakāśitaharṣaroṣavikārau)." D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read gata-, "gone, departed," for hata-, "destroyed."

"will . . . return to Laṅkā, the abode of the foes of the immortal gods" pravekṣyaty amarārivāsam: Literally, "he will enter the abode of the foes of the immortals." Ct and Ck extend Rāma's remarks by adding the clause "after that we will do what we have to do (paścād yad asmābhir anuṣṭheyaṃ tat kariṣyāva iti śeṣaḥ)."

"having achieved the greatest glory in battle" samādāya raṇāgralakṣmīm: Literally, "having received the foremost success in battle." Cg understands the reference to be to vijayalakṣmī, "the glory of victory." Several of the commentators take the term agra [v.l. agrya], "foremost (lit., tip)," here, to suggest that Indrajit has not achieved the power to effect the complete destruction of his foes (raṇāgryetyādinā samūlanāśāśaktiḥ sūcitā—Ct).

The meter is upajāti.

48. "At that point . . . cut down" tadā viśastau: Ct and Cg gloss, "oppressed, afflicted (pīḍitau)." Cr, however, unwilling to see the divine heroes injured, takes advantage of the sandhi with the preceding adverb to read the participle as aviśastau, literally, "uninjured," which he glosses as "appearing to be injured (hiṃsitasadṛśau)."

"the two brothers" tau: Literally, "those two."

"Having laid them low" viṣādayitvā: Literally, "having afflicted or caused to despair." G1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead vidarśayitvā, "having shown (them)." Cg glosses the simplex "having seen (dṛṣṭvā)." Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 214) follows this reading, rendering, "and seeing them in that condition."

The meter is upendravajrā.

49. "Having thus laid low" viṣādayitvā: D9,10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead niṣūdayitvā, "having slaughtered" (GPP 6.73.70 viṣūdayitvā). Translations that follow the text of Ct render this reading as "worsted, vanquished, defeated, etc."

"the city of Laṅkā, which lay under the protection of the arms of ten-necked Rāvaṇa." purīṃ daśagrīvabhujābhiguptām: Literally, "the city protected by the arms of the ten-necked one."

Following verse 49, Ś,V3,B1,D2,3,6,8–12,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr insert a passage of two lines in the indravajrā meter [1353*]: "Being praised by the yātudhānas, he reported everything in great delight to his father."

Sarga 61

1. "Then . . . had been struck down" tadā sāditayoḥ: Literally, "then . . . [those two had been] made to sink down." Ct and Ck gloss, "rendered motionless (niśceṣṭīkṛtayoḥ)." Cr takes advantage of the possible alternate word division with the preceding adverb tadā, "then," to read instead asāditayoḥ, literally, "not depressed." He glosses, "[merely] appearing to be pained (duḥkhitayor iva satoḥ)."

"the two heroes, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa" tayoḥ: Literally, "the two."

The meter is upajāti.

2. "the king of the tree-dwelling monkeys and his heroic warriors" śākhāmṛga-rājavīrān: Literally, "branch-animal-king-heroes." Cs, alone among the commentators, attempts to analyze this compound and offers two suggestions. The first, which we have followed, is to read it as a dvandva. The second is to take it according to the rule saptamī śauṇḍaiḥ (Pā 2.1.40), in the sense of "those heroes among the kings of the branch-dwelling monkeys." (śākhāmṛgarājeṣu vīrāś ceti vā. saptamī śauṇḍair iti yogabhāgāt samāsaḥ.) Translators are divided as to whether to read the compound as a dvandva (as we have) referring to both Sugrīva and his warriors or as a tatpuruṣa in the sense of "the warriors of the king[s] of the tree-dwelling monkeys." See note to 6.15.15.

"inimitable" apratimaiḥ: Literally, "unmatched, unequaled."

The meter is upajāti.

3. "Have no fear! . . . this is no time for despondency" mā bhaiṣṭa nāsty atra viṣādakālaḥ: The commentators offer a variety of explanations as to why the monkeys should not be afraid on account of the apparent disability of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. Ck and Ct offer two alternatives. According to the first, the princes are merely honoring the command of Brahmā (viz., that his weapon must be infallible) and are not, in fact, in any mortal danger (na tu prāṇapīḍāvantau). In other words, they need have no fear for Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. According to Ck's and Ct's second interpretation, the monkeys should not fear any danger at the hands of their enemies, wondering who will protect them now. (yadvā etāv avaśau viṣaṇṇāv iti yat tatra viṣaye mā bhaiṣṭa. etayor viṣaṇṇayor asmān ko vā rakṣiṣyatīti śatrubhyo bhayaṃ mā bhūt—so Ct.) Cr suggests that, since the princes only appear to have been struck down, there is no occasion for despondency. In addition, Cr claims that visible despondency and fear on the part of the monkeys over Rāma's and Lakṣmaṇa's apparent fall will only encourage and invite further attack by other enemies. (avaśāv astravaśasadṛśau sta iti śeṣaḥ. ato viśādakālaḥ khedasamayo naitena yuṣmadaudāsīnyajñāpyarāmalakṣmaṇaudāsīnyajñāne ripūṇāṃ harṣātiśayo bhavisyatīti sūcitam. tena ripvantarāṇy apy āgamisyantīti dhvanitam.) Cg and Cm, like Cr, assert that the heroes have fallen merely to show their respect for Brahmā and only appear to be cut down by Indrajit (sāditāv iva vartamānau).

The meter is upajāti.

Following verse 3, G2 and KK (numbered, in brackets, as 6.74.4) insert an additional upajāti verse [1355*]: "There Vibhīṣaṇa, who, by virtue of a boon from the creator, was uninjured[1] by that divine weapon-spell, looked about and, seeing that the army of tawny monkeys had been laid low by the divine weapon-spell of their enemy, said these words to Hanumān, who was similarly unharmed."

[1]"uninjured" āsāditaḥ: We render KK's asāditaḥ instead of the critical edition's āsāditaḥ, "reached, obtained," which is all but impossible to construe in this context and is possibly a typographical error.

4. "of unfailing force" amoghavegam: See note to 6.59.89. Ś,Ñ,V,B,D2–5,7–13,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr, as well as the printed editions of Lahore and Gorresio, read -vīryam, "power," for -vegam, "force."

"to Indrajit" tasmai: Literally, "to him."

"why is that an occasion for despondency" ko 'tra viṣādakālaḥ: Literally, "What is the occasion for despondency in this [matter]?" Ck and Ct explain that there is, in fact, no occasion for despondency as we should supply: "The two of them [Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa] will get up after a short time (kṣaṇānantaram utthāsyataḥ)."

The meter is upajāti.

5. "who had already once shown his reverence . . . heard" mānayitvā . . . śrutvā: All translations consulted invert the clausal structure of the verse, understanding that Hanumān pays his respects now, only after hearing those words of Vibhīṣaṇa. We believe that the temporal sequence of the original should be maintained and that the reference here is not to some abstract respect for Brahmā's weapon but to Hanumān's very real submission to it when Indrajit deployed the weapon against him at 5.46.34–42 (see translation and notes ad loc.). We believe that this idea is suggested by Cg, who glosses mānayitvā, "having shown his reverence," with "having [himself] remained momentarily under the power of the brahmāstra (muhūrtamātraṃ brahmāstraparavaśaḥ sthitvā)." See note to 5.46.40.

6. "any of those . . . who may still be alive" yo yo dhārayate prāṇāṃs tam tam: Literally, "whoever sustains life breaths, him."

"in the decimated army" etasmin nihate sainye: Literally, "in this stricken army." Ñ,V,B,D1,4,9–11,13,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead asminn astrahate sainye, "in this army stricken by that divine weapon-spell."

7. "and that foremost of the rākṣasas Vibhīṣaṇa" -rākṣasottamau: Literally, "and the foremost of the rākṣasas."

"during that night" rātrau: Literally, "at night." According to Ct, this reference suggests that Indrajit deployed his astra on the seventh night (presumably of the dark half of the month Bhādrāśvina) (tadā rātrāv ity anena saptamyāṃ rātrāv ayam astraprayoga iti sūcitam). See note to 6.59.106.

8–9. "that had been dropped . . . fallen" patitaiḥ . . . patitaiḥ: Literally, "fallen . . . fallen."

"oozing blood from their limbs" śravadbhiḥ kṣatajaṃ gātraiḥ: We take the instrumental gātraiḥ here as a karaṇa, or means through which the bleeding is accomplished. This reading has been adopted by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1677), Dutt (1893, p. 1359), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 215). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 243), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 214), understands gātraiḥ here to mean "severed limbs," a third article with which the ground is strewn (in addition to weapons and monkeys). Pagani (1999, p. 1070) takes the term to mean "bodies," and it is to this rather than "monkeys," that she subordinates the long bahuvrīhi compound describing the severed limbs. Thus, for her the field is strewn with bodies, weapons, and monkeys.

"and dribbling urine" praśravadbhiḥ: Literally, "oozing, flowing." All the commentators who discuss this reading take the term either in its sense of "urinating (mūtrayadbhiḥ—so Cv, Cg, and Cm)" or supply the word "urine (mūtram iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct)." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1677), Dutt (1893, p. 1359), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 215) all follow the commentators as do we. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 243), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 214), appears to ignore the term. Pagani (1999, p. 1070) attempts to subordinate it to the gouts of blood flowing from the monkeys, rendering, "des flots de sang qui ruisselaient de touts côtés," an interesting suggestion but grammatically untenable.

10–11. "And there Vibhīṣaṇa and Hanumān" vibhīṣaṇo hanūmāṃś ca: Literally, "Vibhīṣaṇa and Hanumān." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead etāṃś cānyāṃs tato vīrau, "then the two heroes [saw] these and others."

"Jāmbavān" jāmbavantam: D5,T1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead gavākṣaṃ ca, "and Gavākṣa."

"Āhuka" āhukam: Ñ2,V1,2,B2–4,D1,6,9–11,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Gorresio read instead eva ca, "and as well."

"Jyotimukha" jyotimukham: See note to 6.47.40.

12. "within the fifth part of a day" ahnaḥ pañcamaśeṣeṇa: Literally, "by the fifth remainder of the day." As the commentators note, the reference is to the fifth (and final) portion of the twelve-hour day from sunrise to sunset. The Indian day was traditionally divided into five equal sections each lasting 144 minutes (= 6 ghaṭikās of 24 minutes each) named, respectively, prātaḥ, "early morning"; saṃgava, "late morning"; madhyāhna, "early afternoon"; parāhna, "late afternoon"; and sāyāhna, "early evening." The idea in the verse is that Indrajit's rampage of slaughter takes place during the last period, or the two hours and twenty-four minutes that correspond to "early evening." This is followed by nightfall, after which Hanumān and Vibhīṣaṇa make their grisly search. According to Ct, we are to understand that it took the first four parts of the day for Indrajit to prepare the brahmāstra for use (caturbhir bhāgaiś ca brahmāstrasādhanam ity bodhyam).

"self-existent Brahmā's favorite" vallabhena svayaṃbhuvaḥ: Literally, "by the favorite of the self-existent one." The commentators and translators consulted generally understand this reference to be to the brahmāstra, i.e., Brahmā's favorite weapon. Cg notes that the term can refer either to Indrajit or to the astra. We are inclined to believe that the former is referred to here but have preserved the ambiguity of the original.

"six hundred and seventy million" saptaṣaṣṭir . . . koṭyaḥ: Literally, "sixty-seven crore." Given the astronomical numbers of monkey warriors described in earlier sargas, this number, huge though it is, would represent only a small fraction of Sugrīva's forces. See 6.17.27,30,34,36, etc.; and note to 6.19.32; 411*.

13. "Hanumān and Vibhīṣaṇa sought out" mārgate . . . sma hanūmān savibhīṣaṇaḥ: Literally, "Hanumān along with Vibhīṣaṇa searched, hunted for." Given that Hanumān and Vibhīṣaṇa have already located Jāmbavān among the wounded monkeys in verse 10 above, we agree with Ck and Ct, who gloss, "singling out (viśiṣyety arthaḥ—so Ct)." The idea, according to Ck and Ct, is that they seek out Jāmbavān because of his vast knowledge in order to ask him what strategy they should adopt (tasya bahujñatvād upāyapraśnārtham iti bhāvaḥ [Ck—iti śeṣaḥ]). Cr notes that the seeking out of Jāmbavān suggests that he is endowed with every virtue and that the two seekers have determined that, by meeting him, a good outcome will be achieved. (etena jāmbavataḥ sarvaguṇasaṃpannatvaṃ sūcitam. tena taddarśanena kalyāṇaṃ bhaviṣyaty eveti tayor niścayaḥ sūcitaḥ.)

14–15. "wise . . . showing the signs of advanced age" svabhāvajarayā yuktaṃ vṛddham: Literally, "conjoined with natural senescence and aged." We agree with Ck and Ct that the signs of senescence would be the physical signs of age, such as wrinkles, gray hair, etc. (vayaḥsvabhāvāj jarayā valīpalitādinā yuktam). Cr, on the other hand, understands the phrase to refer to Jāmbavān's natural virtues, such as fortitude, etc., as well as old age (svabhāvena svābhāvikadhairyādinā jarayā ca yuktam). We follow Cr in taking vṛddha in its sense of "advanced in knowledge or wisdom (vṛddhaṃ jñānenādhikam)." This both avoids redundancy with jarayā and supplies a motive for his being uniquely sought out for questioning.

"Vibhīṣaṇa Paulastya" paulastyaḥ: Literally "Paulastya." This patronymic is rarely used of figures other than Rāvaṇa himself.

"that you have not been mortally wounded" na prāṇā dhvaṃsitās tava: Literally, "that your life breaths have not been destroyed."

16. "uttered this speech, articulating the words only with great difficulty" kṛcchrād abhyudgiran vākyam idam vacanam abravīt: Literally, "with difficulty uttering speech, he spoke this speech." We agree with the commentators, particularly Cg, in their efforts to avoid the redundancy by taking vākyam in the sense of "sounds instrumental to the production of speech (vākyopayogi svaram—so Cg)."

"bull among apes" ṛkṣapuṃgavaḥ: See 6.4.17 and note.

17. "wounded" pīḍyamānaḥ: Literally, "being oppressed." D10 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead viddhagātraḥ, "[my] limbs pierced."

"I cannot see you" na tvāṃ paśyāmi cakṣuṣā: Literally, "I do not see you with my eye or sight."

18. "O rākṣasa, son of chaos" nairṛta: Literally, "O nairṛta." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead suvrata, "O one of strict vows, pious one."

"Vāyu Mātariśvan" mātariśvā: Literally, "Mātariśvan." Among all his many hundreds of references to the wind and the wind god in the poem, Vālmīki uses this epithet of Vāyu only four times. Cf. 3.65.13; 4.59.19 and note; and 5.56.13.

"does . . . still live" prāṇān dhārayate kvacit: Literally, "somewhere or other he supports or maintains life breaths." We agree with Cr and Cg, who note that the adverb kvacit, normally "somewhere or other," must be read here simply as a marker of interrogation (kvacid iti praśnārthakam—so Cr). It seems to function here in the sense of the similar-sounding marker of interrogation, kaccit. In fact, most northern manuscripts introduce kaccit into the passage. Some rephrase the expression and employ kaccit (Ñ2,V1,2,B2,D4), whereas V3,B1,D2,3 substitute an alternative line for 18cd in which the adverb kaccit is used.

19. "do you ignore" atikramya: Literally, "having skipped over or passed over."

"the king's sons Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa" āryaputrau: Literally, "the two sons of the noble one." See notes to 6.23.35 and 6.102.35.

"you . . . ask only about Māruti" pṛcchasi mārutim: Literally, "you inquire after Māruti."

20. "the . . . extraordinary concern" snehaḥ . . . paraḥ: Literally, "supreme affection."

21. "why I inquired only about Māruti" yasmāt pṛcchāmi mārutim: Literally, the reason for which I ask about Māruti. See note to verse 19 above.

22. "our army will survive, even if it should be massacred" hatam apy ahataṃ balam: Literally, "even though slain, the army would not be slain."

"even though we survive, we are as good as dead" jīvanto 'pi vayaṃ hatāḥ: Literally, "even though living, we are slain."

23. "of Agni Vaiśvānara" vaiśvānara-: Literally, "of Vaiśvānara." See note to 6.18.37.

24. "wise" vṛddham: Literally, "aged." See note to verses 14–15 above.

"Devotedly" niyamena: Literally, "with restraint or devotion." Cg takes the term in its sense of a formalized religious observance or gesture of piety, such as crossing the hands to touch the ears (śrotrahastasaṃsparśavyatyastahastatvādirūpeṇa saha). Ś,Ñ,V,B, D1–4,7–9,12,13,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vinayena, "with humility."

"he respectfully greeted him" abhyavādayat: Literally, "he respectfully greeted." Cg understands this to be the formal gesture of deference and respect by a junior to an elder, which includes the announcement of one's own name. This is significant in light of the fact that virtually all manuscripts fail to report any actual speech on Hanumān's part prior to the assertion, in verse 25 below, that Jāmbavān has heard Hanumān's words. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 216) incorporates this idea explicitly in his translation, "announcing himself." See ManuSm 2.120–126. See 6.115.33 and note. See, too, 5.62.1 and note.

Following verse 24, KK inserts a passage of one line [1373*], bracketed and numbered as 6.73.25ef: "Here I am, foremost of tawny monkeys. Instruct me as to what you want me to do." No translation renders this line.

25. "Although his every organ was in agony" tathāpi vyathitendriyaḥ: Literally, "although his senses were pained."

"Jāmbavān, bull among apes" ṛkṣapuṃgavaḥ: Literally, "bull among apes." D5,6,9–11,T,G1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read plavagottamaḥ, "best of leaping monkeys."

"Hanumān's words" hanumato vākyam: As noted in the previous verse, no actual words of Hanumān are recorded in the text. Cg remarks that the reference would be to the abhivādana, or formal greeting, described in the preceding verse, where Hanumān would have said, "It is I, Hanumān" (hanumān aham asmīty abhivādanavākyam).

27. "You are the monkeys' greatest friend" tvam eṣāṃ paramaḥ sakhā: Literally, "you are their greatest friend."

"Now is the moment for you to show your prowess" tvatparākramakālo 'yam: Literally, "This is the time for your prowess."

"for I can see no one else who can accomplish this" nānyaṃ paśyāmi kaṃcana: Literally, "I see none other whatsoever." The phrase is elliptical, and we have fleshed it out in keeping with the context.

28. "You must heal the arrow wounds of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa" viśalyau kuru cāpy etau . . . rāmalakṣmaṇau: Literally, "and make these two, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, arrow-free." Our translation reflects the fact that the two heroes cannot be healed simply by the removal of Indrajit's arrows but, as will be shown in the following verses, will require applications of specific medicinal herbs to heal them of their injuries.

"and thus restore the spirits" praharṣaya: Literally, "restore the spirits, encourage." We follow the interpretation of Cr, who understands that it is the healing of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa that will restore the monkey's spirits (sāditau bāṇair ācchāditau rāmalakṣmaṇau viśalyau kurv ata evānīkāni praharṣaya).

29. "the highest path" paramam adhvānam: Cg glosses dīrgham, "long," for paramam, "highest, supreme." His interpretation has been followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 217) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1678). Cr glosses, "the path that is best because it is incapable of being traveled by inferior persons (paramaṃ pāmarair agamyatvena śreṣṭham)."

"far above the ocean" upary upari sāgaram: Cg understands the adverbial phrase upary upari in its sense of "slightly above (sāgarasya samīpoparipradeśe)," citing Pā 8.1.7 (uparyadhyadhasaḥ sāmīpye) on the repetition of the term upari suggesting proximity. He thus understands that Hanumān will be skimming the waves rather than soaring through the sky. Compare 5.1.65–67, where, when crossing the sea in his quest for Sītā, Hanumān is represented as breaking through the waves with his chest.

"Himalaya" himavantam: At 6.40.29–31, Suṣeṇa proposes sending a party of monkeys to the mountains named Candra and Droṇa, which, he says, are situated in the middle of the ocean of milk, in order to secure the medicinal herbs to heal Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa of the wounds inflicted by Indrajit's divinely charged weapons. See 6.40.29–31 and notes. Cf. 6.89.14–15.

30. "You will see . . . Mount Ṛṣabha . . . and the peak of Mount Kailāsa" ṛṣabham . . . kailāsaśikharaṃ cāpi drakṣyasi: Cr believes that Hanumān is to go first to Mount Ṛṣabha and that, standing on its peak, he will be able to see Kailāsa (ṛṣabhaśikhare sthitas tvaṃ kailāsaśikharaṃ drakṣyasi). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 244), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 216), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1679) all follow Cr's interpretation. This idea is more or less followed by Pagani (1999, p. 1071). Cf. 6.40.29–31 and notes. Mount Ṛṣabha is said to be one of the twenty mountains flanking Mount Meru in the Himalayas. Note that, in his description of the geography of the four directions in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa, Sugrīva places a Mount Ṛṣabha in the midst of the ocean of milk (4.39.39). The ocean of milk is also the locus of the mountains Candra and Droṇa, which, at 6.40.31, are said to be the sources of healing herbs. D6,T2,3 insert a passage of five lines [1376*] after verse 30 in which Hanumān is instructed to go to Mount Candra and Mount Droṇa, which are located in the ocean of milk (lines 3–5). This insert appears to be an attempt to rationalize the seemingly contradictory identifications of the mountain[s] of healing herbs.

"forbidding" atyugram: Literally, "extremely fierce, formidable." We follow Ck and Ct, who understand that the peak is unapproachable because of its lions and other savage animals (siṃhādibhir duṣpraveśam). Translators who share this reading have taken the term variously to mean "horrific, inaccessible, steep, etc." V1,B3,4,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, and Cr read instead atyuccam, "extremely tall."

31. "Between those two peaks . . . the mountain of healing herbs" tayoḥ śikhayor madhye . . . auṣadhiparvatam: The reference, of course, is to Mount Ṛṣabha and Mount Kailāsa mentioned in the previous verse. See, too, 6.89.14–15 and notes.

"covered with every sort of healing herb" sarvauṣadhiyutam: Literally, "endowed with all healing herbs."

"glows with unequaled radiance" pradīptam atulaprabham: It is a commonplace in the literature that herbs, especially the medicinal herbs of the Himalayas, are luminescent. Cf. KumāSaṃ 1.10, where such herbs serve as lamps for the nocturnal love-making of the Himalayan forest folk.

32–33. "mṛtasaṃjīvaṇī, 'the restorer of life to the dead,' viśalyakaraṇī, 'the healer of arrow wounds,' sauvarṇakaraṇī, 'the restorer of a golden glow,' and the great healing herb saṃdhānī, 'the joiner of limbs' " mṛtasaṃjīvaṇīṃ caiva viśalyakaraṇīm api / sauvarṇakaraṇīṃ caiva saṃdhānīṃ mahauṣadhīm: The names of the herbs are intended to express their functions. Taken literally, the names would mean, respectively, "reviving the dead," "making arrow-less," "making golden," and "joining." We have rendered the names in keeping with the explanations offered by the various commentators. See 6.89.14–16 and notes.

The first two of these herbs, the mṛtasaṃjīvanī and the viśalyakaraṇī, are evidently the same as the healing herbs saṃjīvanī and viśalyā mentioned in a parallel context at 6.40.30 and notes. Cr notes that the first restores the dead to life by its mere touch (mṛtānāṃ saṃjīvanīṃ sparśamātreṇa saṃjīvanakartrīm) and the second makes one free from arrows by its mere touch (sparśamātreṇa bāṇarāhityasaṃpādikām). Viśalyā is identified as Delphinium denudatum, which is found in the Himalayas between eight thousand and twelve thousand feet. See note to 6.40.30.

The name sauvarṇakaraṇī is one of a series of variants found in the critical apparatus. None of the commentators shows this exact reading. However, Ñ,V1,2,B2–4,D7,11,13,G2,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct come closest, reading suvarṇakaraṇīm, literally, "making gold or producing a good color." Evidently the idea here is that the herb removes the pallor of the dead or wounded warrior and restores his lustrous golden complexion. Ct explains the name as "producing a color similar to that of gold on the body, etc. (suvarṇasamānavarṇasya dehādeḥ karaṇīm)." Cr explains, "producing a splendid color (śobhanavarṇasaṃpādikām)." Compare verse 6.40.39, where the bodies of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, who there had also been struck down by Indrajit, take on a golden luster (suvarṇe) at Garuḍa's touch. V3,B1,D1–4,9,10, and the text of Ck read instead savarṇakaraṇīm, literally, "producing the same color." Ck explains this as meaning "producing a color similar to one's previous color, that is, restoring the body's natural glow (pūrvavarṇasamānavarṇakaraṇīṃ dehakāntikaraṇīm)." Compare Ct's reading at note to 6.89.16. Ct notes this as a variant reading and provides the first part of Ck's explanation. T2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read sāvarṇyakaraṇīm, literally, "producing similarity of color," a reading close to that of Ck. Cg explains this to mean that the herb restores the original color to the body except at those places where it has lost color as a result of scarring (vraṇakṛtavaivarṇyaṃ vihāya pradeśāntarasāvarṇyaṃ karotīti sāvarṇyakaraṇī). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 217), the only translator to read this variant, renders, "restorer-of-the pigment of the skin." The text of Gorresio (6.53.38) reads svavarṇakaraṇīm, literally, "producing one's own or native color." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 68) renders, "raccende altrui . . . il natio colore."

The last of the healing herbs, saṃdhānī, is explained by Ck and Ct as "reconnecting the blood vessels of even a severed head and trunk to their previous condition (chinnaśiraḥkabandhayor api yathāpūrvaṃ nāḍīsaṃdhānakaraṇīm)." Cr explains, "reconnecting severed heads, etc., the way they were before (chinnaśiraḥprabhṛtīnāṃ yathāpūrvaṃ saṃyojikām)." Cg understands that the herb heals the skin once arrows have been removed (viśalye kṛte tvacaḥ saṃdhānaṃ karoti).

Cg, alone among the commentators, understands that the four healing herbs are to be used in a specific sequence. According to him, once the patient is restored to life by the mṛtasaṃjīvanī herb, viśalyakaraṇī is applied so that he can move about once more. Next saṃdhānakaraṇī is administered so as to heal the wounds in the skin. Finally, sāvarṇyakaraṇī is administered to restore the patient's natural complexion. (jīvanānantaraṃ saṃcārakṣamatayai viśalyaṃ karotīti viśalyakaraṇī. viśalye kṛte tvacaḥ saṃdhānaṃ karotīti saṃdhānakaraṇī. tato vraṇakṛtavaivarṇyaṃ vihāya pradeśāntarasāvarṇyaṃ karotīti sāvarṇyakaraṇī.)

34. "restore . . . to life" prāṇair yojya: Literally, "having caused them to be joined with life breaths."

"son of Vāyu, bearer of scents" gandhavahātmaja: Literally, "son of the scent-bearer." This somewhat unusual epithet of Hanumān (and of Vāyu) used here and at verses 64 and 68 below no doubt prefigures the mode in which the herbs are to be employed, for we see, at verse 67 below and again at 6.89.23,24, that these herbs function by the inhalation of their scent, or what might be termed "aromatherapy." See verses 64 and 68 below. See, too, 6.89.23,24 and notes.

35. "bull among tawny monkeys" haripuṃgavaḥ: D10 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mārutātmajaḥ, "son of Māruta."

"with a great upsurge of strength" baloddharṣaiḥ: Literally, "with thrills of strength." We agree with Cg, Ct, Cr, and Ck, whose various glosses all mean "increase, access, or upsurge of strength (balodrekaiḥ—Ct, Ck)." Pagani (1999, p. 1072) reads the compound as a dvandva, despite its plural ending, rendering, "de courage et de force."

"with its mighty currents" toyavegaiḥ: Literally, "with streams or currents of water." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vāyuvegaiḥ, "with the force of the wind."

36. "the mountain slope . . . that foremost of mountains" parvatataṭa- . . . parvatottamam: The commentators generally agree that the reference is to Laṅkā's prominent Mount Trikūṭa (see 6.2.10 and note). Cv alone identifies the mountain as Citrakūṭa. At 5.54.9, Hanumān begins his northward leap from Laṅkā to the Indian subcontinent from the summit of Mount Ariṣṭa, which is possibly a name for one of the three peaks of Trikūṭa. See notes to 5.37.49 and 5.54.9.

"crushing" pīḍayan: Hanumān's leap and destruction of the mountain parallels similar descriptions at 5.1.11–51 and 5.54.9–15.

"like a second mountain himself" dvitīya iva parvataḥ: In the descriptions of Hanumān's previous transoceanic leaps, he is said to have greatly increased his size (5.1.9–10 and 5.54.16) to make the jumps. Here, however, there is no indication of any change in Hanumān's stature. At 1382*, line 8 (see note to verse 41 below), however, Hanumān is specifically said to increase in size.

37. "caved in" niṣasāda: Literally, "it sank down, settled."

"Then . . . it was unable to bear its own weight" na śaśāka tadātmānam soḍhum: Literally, "it was then unable to endure itself." We agree with Cr, who takes ātmānam, "self, body," to mean "its own body (svaśarīram)." One could also read the sequence tadātmānam, "then . . . itself," as a compound with the sense "his body," referring to the gigantic body of Hanumān.

38. "The tremendous force of that tawny monkey caused that mountain's trees to fall" tasya petur nagāḥ . . . harivegāt: Literally, "its immovable ones fell . . . because of the impact of the tawny one." Ct and Ck explain that it is the force of Hanumān's leap [or preparations for leaping—Ck] that is referred to here (hanumata utpatana[sannāha—Ck]vegāt). Cr glosses, "because of the shaking produced by Hanumān's force (hanumadvegajanitaprakampanād dhetoḥ)." Cg calibrates the force applied by Hanumān more precisely, glossing, "through the force of the exertion of power suitable for traveling as far as the mountain of herbs, which is situated in the northern portion of the Himalayas (himavaduttarapradeśasthauṣadhiparvataparyantagamanocitaśaktyāsthānavegāt)."

"and burst into flame" ca jajvaluḥ: Cg, Ct, and Ck explain that it is the friction resulting from the force with which the trees are knocked about that causes them to ignite (parasparasaṃgharṣajāgnivaśataḥ—Ct, Ck). Cr has a similar explanation for the fire but seems to understand that it is the peaks themselves or perhaps both the peaks and the trees that burst into flame (vṛkṣā harivegād dhanumadvegajanitaprakampanād dhetoḥ bhūmau petuḥ śṛṅgāṇi ca vyakīryantāta eva jajvaluḥ parasparasaṃgharṣajanitavahninā didīpire).

39. As Ct explains, the battlefield is on Mount Trikūṭa, while Laṅkā is set on one of its peaks (trikūṭasyaiva yuddhabhūmitvāt tacchikharasyaiva ca laṅkātvāt).

40. "the gates of her buildings" -gṛhagopurā: See 6.47.32; 6.55.64; and notes. The compound can also be read as a dvandva, as some translators have done, in the sense of "buildings and gates."

"overcome with panic" trāsākulā: Cr, the only commentator to remark on this compound, glosses, "filled with terrified rākṣasas (trāsais trastai rākṣasair ākulā vyāptā)."

"seemed almost to be dancing" pranṛttevābhavat: Vālmīki has used the image of dancing elsewhere to express distress. Compare 2.35.32 and note, where the grief-stricken Daśaratha is said to seem almost to be dancing.

41. "that mountain . . . the mountainous . . . the earth" pṛthivīdharasaṃkāśaḥ . . . dharaṇīdharam / pṛthivīm: Literally, "resembling a supporter of the earth . . . that supporter of the earth . . . the earth." The poet attempts to give the verse a kinesthetic effect in his repetition of words signifying "earth." A number of manuscripts, including Ś,Ñ,V,B,D2,3,6–13,T2,3,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr, intensify this effect still further by reading the synonymous pṛthivīdharam for dharaṇīdharam.

Following verse 41, D6,T,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, and Gita Press include a passage of eight lines [1382*]. This passage appears as KK 6.74.43–46; KK (1905) 6.74.42–45; VSP 6.74.42–45; and Gita Press 6.74.42–45. GPP includes the passage, unnumbered, in brackets between its 6.74.41 and 42. "Then the majestic[1] tawny monkey ascended Mount Malaya,[2] which resembled Mount Meru or Mount Mandara and was filled with all sorts of waterfalls.[1–2] It was covered with every type of tree and creeper and was filled with red and blue lotuses in bloom. Sixty leagues in height, it was frequented by gods and gandharvas.[3–4] It was frequented by vidyādharas, hosts of sages, and apsarases. Adorned with many caves, it was crowded with hosts of various wild animals.[5–6] Terrifying all the yakṣas, gandharvas, and kinnaras there, Hanumān, son of Māruta, increased in size,[3] so that he resembled a great cloud.[7–8]"

[1]"majestic" śrīmān: M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cm, Cg, and Gita Press read instead tasmāt, "from that [i.e., Mt. Trikūṭa]."

[2]"Mount Malaya" malayaparvatam: Cg hastens to inform us that this is the mountain of that name in Laṅkā (as opposed to the well-known Malaya mountain range of southern India) (malayaparvatam ity atra laṅkāmalaya ucyate). On the existence of a Mt. Malaya in Laṅkā, see 6.55.48 and note.

[3]"increased in size" vavṛdhe: See note to verse 36 above.

Compare this passage to similar descriptions of mountains from which Hanumān leaps at 4.66.34–43; 5.1.4–28; and 5.54.9–24.

42. "fearsome" ugram: We follow Ck in taking the term adjectivally to modify mukham, "mouth." Ct reads it adverbially with nanāda, "roared," in the sense of "horribly, frightfully."

"as the gaping mare's head fire that lies beneath the sea" vaḍavāmukhavat: See 6.48.49; 6.55.118; and notes. Ct and Ck understand that Hanumān's mouth is blazing fiercely like the vaḍavāmukha fire (vaḍavāmukhavaj jājvalyamānaṃ mukham).

"terrifying the rākṣasas" trāsayann iva rākṣasān: Literally, "as if terrifying the rākṣasas." We agree with Cg and Cm, both in taking the participle trāsayan in accordance with Pā 3.2.126 (lakṣaṇahetvoḥ kriyāyāḥ) to indicate that Hanumān roars for the purpose of terrifying and in taking the comparative iva here as pleonastic (vākyālaṃkāre). As the commentators explain, Hanumān's intention is to keep the rākṣasas from making another sortie until he can return from his mission with the healing herbs (yāvad oṣadhyānayanaṃ tāvad rakṣonirgamo mā bhūd iti teṣāṃ trāsārthaṃ nanādeti bhāvaḥ—so Ct). This idea appears to be confirmed by the reference to the paralysis of the rākṣasas mentioned in the following verse.

D1,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read rajanīcarān, "night-roaming rākṣasas," for iva rākṣasān, thus avoiding the issue of the particle iva.

43. "extraordinary" adbhutam: Ś,V,B1,3,D2–4,7–12, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead uttamam, "great, outstanding."

"fiercely roaring" nānadyamānasya: The yañanta participle can be read either as an intensive, as we have done, or as a frequentative, as in the translation of Dutt (1893, p. 1361), who renders, "as he kept emitting cries."

"all the rākṣasas" rākṣasāḥ sarve: Ñ,B2–4,D1,6,9–11,T2,3,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead rākṣasavyāghrāḥ, "the tigers among rākṣasas."

"were paralyzed with fear" na śekuḥ spandituṃ bhayāt: Literally, "they were not able to stir because of fear." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read kvacit, "at all, anywhere," for the critical edition's bhayāt, "out of fear."

44. "Then . . . to Rāma" [a]tha rāmāya: Cg notes that, in order to insure the success of his mission, Hanumān offers obeisance to his chosen divinity (Rāma) (ayaṃ prārīpsitakarmasamāptaye samyagiṣṭadevatānamaskāraḥ). Compare 5.1.7, where, prior to undertaking his first transoceanic flight, Hanumān makes gestures of obeisance to Sūrya, Indra, Pavana, Brahmā, and the [great] beings (bhūtebhyaḥ). At 5.54.9ff., Hanumān omits any obeisance to the divinities. D10,11,T3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead samudrāya, "to Samudra."

"turned his thoughts" samaihata: Literally, "he wished, longed for." We follow the interpretation of Ct, who glosses, "he thought about (cintitavān)." Cr, who reads a variant, samīhata, corrects it to our reading and glosses, "he undertook, set about (akarot)."

"that vital mission" paraṃ karma: Literally, "supreme action or task."

45. "Extending his tail, which resembled a serpent, crouching down, laying back his ears, and opening his mouth, which was like the gaping mare's head fire that lies beneath the sea" puccham udyamya bhujaṃgakalpaṃ vinamya pṛṣṭhaṃ śravaṇe nikuñcya / vivṛtya vaktraṃ vaḍavāmukhābham: Literally, "having raised his serpentlike tail, having bent his back, having contracted his ears, and having opened his mouth, which was like the mouth of vaḍavā." These movements that Hanumān makes in preparation for his leap are also mentioned in connection with his earlier leap at the opening of the Sundarakāṇḍa (5.1.30–35). On the basis of the description at 5.1.32, where Hanumān is said to have "crouched down on his posterior while contracting his legs (sasāda ca kapiḥ kaṭyāṃ caraṇau saṃcukoca ca)," we believe that the poet is referring to the same action when he describes the monkey as "bending or curving his back." We have therefore translated, "crouching down." For vaḍavāmukha-, see note to verse 42 above.

Cg attempts to explain the purpose or significance of each of Hanumān's actions. The raising of his tail, he says, indicates the excess of his excitement. The bending of his back indicates the holding of his breath in preparation for leaping into the sky. The laying back of his ears is to inflame or enhance his strength, and the opening of his mouth is a sign of determination. (pucchodyamanenotsāhātireka uktaḥ. pṛṣṭhavinamanenākāśagamanānukūlaprāṇavāyunirodha uktaḥ. śravaṇanikuñcanena baloddīpanam. mukhavyādānenābhiniveśaḥ.)

"Hanumān . . . with terrifying force" saḥ . . . sa caṇḍavegaḥ: Literally, "he . . . he, whose speed or impact was fierce." Cv is the only commentator to note the apparent redundancy of the repeated pronoun. He solves the problem by taking the second occurrence as part of the compound, reading sacaṇḍavegaḥ and glossing, "with terrifying speed (caṇḍavegasahitaḥ)."

The meter is upajāti.

46. This verse echoes the elaborate description at 5.1.41–51 and the brief description at 5.54.20, where the blossoming trees of Mount Mahendra and Mount Ariṣṭa, respectively, are swept up in the wake of Hanumān's jump and then fall, respectively, into the sea or onto the ground.

"lesser monkeys" prākṛtavānarān: Literally, "ordinary monkeys." The commentators agree that this term refers not to the rank and file of the monkey army but rather to the indigenous species of the region (trikūṭavane nityavāsān—Ct). This expression was used earlier by Sītā in differentiating Hanumān from ordinary primates. See 5.34.8.

The meter is upajāti.

47. "Garuḍa, foe of serpents" bhujaṃgāri-: Literally, "the foe of serpents." The reference, as all commentators agree, is to Garuḍa.

"Mount Meru, the prominent king of the mountains" meruṃ nagarājam agryam: Commentators who share this reading are disturbed by the reference to Mount Meru, since Jāmbavān's explicit instructions to Hanumān in verses 29–31 above were to head for the Himalayas and there locate the mountain lying between Mount Kailāsa and Mount Ṛṣabha. The epithet "king of the mountains (nagarāja)" is, moreover, most frequently applied to the Himalaya (cf. KumāSaṃ 1.1). Cr resolves the seeming contradiction by saying that the Himalaya is intended by the term "Meru," since the former is so much like the latter (nagarājam ata evāgryaṃ mukhyaṃ meruṃ tatsadṛśaṃ himavantam ity arthaḥ). Cv, Cg, and Cm explain that Mount Meru is close to Mount Kailāsa (meruṃ kailāsapārśvavartinam). All three add that there is another Mount Meru that is adjacent to Himalaya (asti hy anyo himavadanantaraparvato meruḥ). Cm and Cg then offer two alternative explanations. One is that Himalaya, the king of the mountains, is called Meru because it is in the direction characterized or defined by Meru (yadvā merūpalakṣitadiśi sthitaṃ nagarājaṃ himavantam). The second is that Himalaya is called Meru because it is like Meru and so receives that secondary or metaphorical designation as in the expression "the young man is a lion." (yadvā merutulyaṃ himavantam. siṃho mānavaka itivad gauṇaprayogaḥ.) Cg offers an additional explanation to the effect that Hanumān is heading in the general direction of Mount Meru, in other words, north. (yadvā merum uddiśya jagāma. uttarāṃ diśam uddiśya jagāmety arthaḥ.) D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct avoid this entire issue by substituting śailam, "mountain," for merum.

"drawing, so it seemed, the directions in his wake" diśaḥ prakarṣann iva: Literally, "as if dragging the directions." For prakarṣan, "drawing," Cr glosses, "as if tossing aside (prakṣipann iva)," while Cg understands, "shaking (kampayan)."

The meter is upendravajrā.

48. The poet does not tell us whether the agitation of the ocean is its natural state, as described, for example, at 6.4.77–88, or is caused by the rush of wind generated by Hanumān's speed, as at 5.1.64–67. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1680), the only source to offer an opinion on this, puts in parentheses "by the wind generated by his movement."

"Then . . . tossed violently about" tadā bhṛśaṃ bhrāmita-: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tadambhasā, "by its waters," for tadā bhṛśam, "then violently."

The meter is upajāti.

49. "forests" vṛkṣagaṇān: Literally, "groups of trees." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read pakṣi-, "birds," for vṛkṣa-, "trees," lending the compound the sense "flocks of birds."

"prosperous lands" sphītañ janān: Literally, "numerous or prosperous people." Since the list otherwise only contains geographical features that are visible from high altitudes, we agree with the commentators, who gloss, "countryside, regions (janapadān)." Here, janapada should probably be taken in its sense of "countryside," as opposed to "city (pura-)," which precedes it. All translators consulted follow the commentators' suggestion here with the exceptions of Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 69), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 246), and Pagani (1999, p. 1072), who take the term to refer to people or populations.

"Hanumān, whose swiftness equaled that of his father" pitṛtulyavegaḥ: Literally, "whose speed was equal to his father's."

"flew . . . onward" jagāma: Literally, "he went."

The meter is upajāti.

50. "tirelessly" gataśramaḥ: Literally, "whose fatigue had departed." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 246) appears to misunderstand the compound, rendering, "il se fatiguait." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 217) seems to echo this in rendering, "strove."

"Then that foremost of tawny monkeys spied Himalaya, greatest of mountains." sa dadarśa hariśreṣṭho himavantaṃ nagottamam: The reading of this line is problematic. Only two of the manuscripts (M1,2) cited in the critical apparatus appear to have this precise reading. The texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, Ck, and Ct read instead dadarśa sahasā cāpi himavantaṃ mahākapiḥ, "suddenly the great monkey spied Himalaya." This reading appears to have the strongest textual support, as it is read by the vast majority of northern and southern manuscripts (Ñ,B2–4,D1,4,6,7,9–11,T,G,M3,5). Ś,Ñ,V,B,D,T1,G,M3,5 all read mahākapiḥ, "great monkey." The choice of the critical editors is difficult to understand.

Following 50ab, D5 (line 1),D6,7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines [1384*]: "Swift and heroic Hanumān, whose valor equaled that of his father, [flew on tirelessly].[1] Endowed with tremendous speed, Hanumān Māruti, tiger among monkeys, flew onward like Māruta himself,[1] making the directions resound with the sound of his passing.[2][2–3] Recalling the words of Jāmbavān,[3] Māruti, endowed with the speed of the wind[4] . . . [4]"

[1]"like Māruta himself" māruto yathā: Literally, "like Māruta." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vātaraṃhasā, "with the speed of the wind."

[2]"with the sound of his passing" śabdena: Literally, "with the sound." Although several of the translators consulted see this as a reference to the roaring of Hanumān, we see no reason that this is necessarily correct. The force of the simile seems instead to point to the rushing sound of his rapid flight, which is similar to the howling of the wind.

[3]"Recalling the words of Jāmbavān" smarañ jāmbavato vākyam: As several of the commentators note, Hanumān must recall Jāmbavān's instructions in order to prevent himself from overshooting the mountain of herbs in his tremendous speed (tadvākyaṃ smaranaṃ vegavaśād oṣadhyādiparvatam atītya gamananivṛttyārtham—so Ct).

[4]"endowed with the speed of the wind" vātaraṃhasā: We follow Cg in supplying "characterized by or endowed with (upalakṣita iti śeṣaḥ)." D7,10–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bhīmavikramaḥ, "of fearsome valor."

51. "It had . . . It was endowed with": The verse lacks a finite verb. As it stands, pādas ab must be construed with the accusative himavantam in verse 50d above. We have also added the phrase "It was endowed" to give meaning to the instrumental śikharaiḥ, "with peaks," of pāda d.

Following verse 51, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1385*] that provides the missing verbal elements: "He reached that foremost of mountains that was beautified with various trees."

52."formidable" -ghora-: D6,7,10,11,T2,3,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead -hema-, "golden."

"the hosts of the foremost gods and seers" surarṣisaṃghottama-: Literally, "the most excellent assembly of gods and seers." We follow Ct and Ck in reading the compound as a paranipāta (uttamasurarṣisaṃghair ity arthaḥ).

The meter is upendravajrā.

53. "the abode of Brahmā" brahmakośam: We follow Cg, who cites the Ratnamālā in support of his contention that the polysemic term kośa should be taken here in the sense of "house, abode (gṛhe)." Cg also understands that the divinity referred to here is the classical four-faced creator god, Brahmā. (brahmaṇaś caturmukhasya kośo gṛham. kośo 'strī kuḍmale 'rthaughe guhyadeśe 'ṇḍaśirṣayoḥ / gṛhe dehe pustakaughe peṭyām asipidhānaka iti ratnamālā.) Ct, Ck, and Cr understand the term to refer to the place of Lord Hiryaṇyagarbha, another form of Brahmā as a creator divinity. They support this claim by citing Taittirīyāraṇyaka 2.19.1 (prapadye brahma prapadye brahmakośam—"I resort to Brahmā, I resort to Brahmā's abode"). On that passage, Sāyaṇa glosses, "the world of Brahmā (brahmalokaḥ)."

Cm and Cg believe that this and all the sites mentioned in this and the following verse are the names of the ashrams Hanumān sees in verse 52. (dṛṣṭānām āśramāṇāṃ nāmāny anukrāmati sa brahmakośam ityādinā. brahmakośādīny āśramāṇi—so Cm.)

"the abode of Hiraṇyagarbha in his silver-naveled form" rajatālayam: Literally, "the abode of silver or the silver abode." Cg understands this to be a kenning for Mount Kailāsa, which is sometimes called "Silver or White Mountain (rajatācala)." This interpretation is perhaps supported by the fact that a significant number of mostly northern manuscripts read either [a]calam or girim, "mountain," for [ā]layam, "abode." Nonetheless, we believe that because Hanumān is explicitly said to spy Mount Kailāsa first in verse 55, Cg's identification is problematic. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 219) is the only translator to follow Cg's interpretation, rendering, "the silver mountain (Kailāsa)." See note to verse 55 below. This leaves us with the perhaps speculative interpretation of Ck, Ct, and Cr, who understand rajata to refer to a different form of Hiraṇyagarbha known as rajatanābhi, "having a silver navel" (hiraṇyagarbhāparamūrte rajatanābheḥ sthānam—so Ct).

"the place where Rudra loosed his arrows" rudraśarapramokṣam: Literally, "the loosing of Rudra's arrow[s]." Commentators disagree as to the precise mythological reference. According to Ct, Ck, and Cr, the term refers to the spot from which Rudra shot his arrow[s] in order to destroy Tripura (the Triple City of the asuras) (yatra sthāne sthitvā rudras tripurasaṃhārāya śaraṃ mumoca tat sthānam—so Ck, Ct). On Tripura, see note to 6.59.73. Cg believes that the reference is to Rudra's archery range, where he shoots his arrows for sport (rudraśarāḥ pramokṣyante līlārthaṃ yasmiṃs tad rudraśarapramokṣaṃ sthānam). According to Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 290, footnote 33), Cl, for whom the critical reading is a variant, glosses, "the place in which Rudra loosed his arrows for the destruction of Kāma (rudrasya kandarpanāśāya śarapramokṣo yasmiṃs tat sthānam)."

"the abode of Hayānana the horse-faced god" hayānanam: Literally, "the horse-faced one." According to the commentators, this is the abode of Hayagrīva, literally, "the horse-necked one," one of the incarnations of Viṣṇu. Cg adds that it is the place at which Hayagrīva was worshiped or propitiated (hayagrīvārādhanasthānam).

"the . . . place where Brahmā's head fell" brahmaśiraḥ: Literally, "Brahmā's head." Like Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 219), we have followed the interpretation of Cg, who believes that the reference is to the spot where Brahmā's head fell when it was cut off by Rudra [as a punishment for the creator god's incest with his own daughter] (rudranikṛttabrahmaśiraḥprakṣepasthānam). This mythic episode is narrated widely in the vedic and post-vedic literature See, for example, AitBr 3.33; ŚatBr 1.7.4.1ff., 14.4.2.1ff.; MatsyaP 3.32ff.; and BhāgP 3.12.28ff. We believe this interpretation best fits the context, with its references to spots made sacred by the dwelling or mythic adventures of significant deities. Ck, Ct, and Cr believe that the reference is to the abode of the divinity who governs Brahmā's weapon (brahmāstradevatā tatsthānam).

"the servants of Vaivasvata" vaivasvatakiṃkarān: We understand that the reference is to Yama Vaivasvata, the god of death. Cg understands that the grāmaṇīs are the servants associated with Vivasvat (vivasvatsaṃbandhikiṃkarān). Cg elaborates, "these are the grāmaṇīs [yakṣas?], etc., who serve [Yama] on the new moon day and stay here in order to rest (grāmaṇyādīn māsāntaparicārakān viśramārtham atra sthitān). Cf. note to 6.92.19. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 219) takes the patronymic Vaivasvata in the sense of its underlying form Vivasvant, an epithet of the sun. He translates, "he saw too the servents [sic] of the sun." Vaivasvata is also the name of the seventh of the fourteen Manus who preside over the cosmic ages known as manvantaras.

The meter is upajāti.

54. "He saw . . . He also saw" dadarśa: Literally, "he saw."

"the place where the vajra was presented" vajrālayam: Literally, "the place of the vajra." Cg, the only commentator to remark on this reading, explains that this is the spot where Brahmā presented the vajra to Indra (indrāya brahmaṇā vajrapradānasthānam). D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vahnyālayam, "the abode of Vahni, [the god of fire]."

"the abode of Kubera Vaiśravaṇa" vaiśravaṇālayam: Literally, "the abode of Vaiśravaṇa."

"the abode of the sun—resplendent as the sun itself" sūryaprabhaṃ sūryanibandhanam: In keeping with the tenor of the passage, we take nibandhanam in its sense of "abode, residence." Commentators offer other mythological or cosmological explanations. Thus Ct, Ck, and Cr gloss, "the place at which the [seven—Ck] suns meet ([sapta]sūryāṇāṃ yatra sthāne nibandhanaṃ samāveśas tat sthānam)." Here these commentators understand nibandhanam to mean "meeting place (samāveśaḥ)." It is because all the suns meet at this one spot that it has such a bright solar radiance according to Ct and Ck (ata eva tat sūryaprabham). Cg takes nibandhanam in its common sense of "binding, fastening," alluding to an obscure mythological episode in which, according to him, Viśvakarman bound the sun so as to place it upon a touchstone in order to please his wife, Chāyā (chāyādevīprītaye viśvakarmaṇā śāṇāropaṇāya sūryanibandhanasthānam). This interpretation is represented in the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1681). It is apparently also behind Raghunathan's (1982, vol. 3, p. 219) translation: "the place where the sun had been made to stand still." Because of this interpretation, Cg takes the adjective sūryaprabham, "resplendent as the sun itself," with vaiśravaṇālayam, "the abode of Vaiśravaṇa" (sūryaprabham iti vaiśravaṇālayaviśeṣaṇam). This interpretation is followed by both Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1681) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 219).

"the throne of Brahmā" brahmāsanam: Literally, "Brahmā's seat." We follow the first of Cg's two alternate explanations, understanding the reference to be to the throne created for Brahmā to view and be seen by the hosts of the gods (devagaṇasaṃdarśanāya kṛtaṃ brahmaṇaḥ siṃhāsanam). Cg's second alternative is that this is the place or abode of the brahmans, i.e., the seers (brahmaṇām ṛṣīṇām āsanaṃ sthānaṃ vā). D6,10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read instead -ālayam, "abode," for -āsanam, "seat," yielding the sense "the abode of Brahmā." This, however, presents a problem of redundancy in light of the reference to the brahmakośa, "the abode of Brahmā," in verse 53. Ck and Ct solve the problem by claiming that the present reference is to the four-faced form of Brahmā (caturmukhabrahmasthānam), as opposed to Brahmā in his form of Hiraṇyagarbha.

"the place of Śaṅkara's bow" śaṅkarakārmukam: Literally, "Śaṅkara's bow." We follow Cg, who says that the reference is to the place or repository of Śaṅkara's bow (śaṅkarakārmukaṃ tatsthānam ity arthaḥ). Ck and Ct name the weapon, noting that this is the place or repository of the king of divine weapons, [Śiva's bow called] Pināka (pināka-śastrarājasthānam).

"and the very navel of the earth" nābhiṃ ca vasuṃdharāyāḥ: Literally, "the navel of the bearer of wealth." This term is not common in the literature, and the commentators differ as to its referent. Ck and Ct understand it to be the abode of Prajāpati, which is known as "the navel of the earth" (bhūnābhisaṃjñaṃ prājāpatyaṃ sthānam). Cg, however, understands the reference to be to the fissure [in the earth] that marks the entrance to the underworld Pātāla (pātālapraveśarandhram). This interpretation is explicitly followed only by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1681). Dutt (1893, p. 1363) in footnote "j" offers the interpretation of Ct and Ck. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 219) translates as do we. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 246), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 218) and Pagani (1999, p. 1073), understands, "le centre de la terre."

55. "Then he saw . . . And, at last, he spied" sa . . . dadarśa: Literally, "he saw." We have broken the sentence into two syntactic units for the sake of readability.

"the prominent Mount Kailāsa" kailāsam agryam: Cg, who had understood rajatālayam, literally, "silver abode or abode of silver," which we translate as "the abode of Hiraṇyagarbha in his silver-naveled form" (see note to verse 53 above) to refer to Mount Kailāsa, is now confronted with an apparent redundancy. He explains the repetition by saying that "although Kailāsa (i.e., rajatālaya) was enumerated in the list of holy places starting with Brahmā's abode, it is mentioned again now in order to point it out in accordance with the way in which Jāmbavān had instructed [Hanumān] (brahmādisthāneṣu rajatālayam iti parigaṇitam api jāmbavadupadiṣṭaprakāreṇa darśanāya punar āha)." Ś,Ñ,V,B1,2,4,D1–4,7–12,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read ugram, literally, "fearsome, formidable," for agryam, "prominent." Translations that follow the text of Ct generally accept this sense of the word, rendering, "fierce, steep, terrible, etc." Cr, however, takes the term to be a reference to Śiva, i.e., "the fearsome one." In this he is followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1681), which renders, "Ugra (the mighty Lord Śiva)."

"the rock face of the Himalayas" himavacchilām: The exact reference here is unclear. Cv, Cg, and Cm, whom we follow, understand the reference to be to a simple geographical feature, some sort of rocky face or outcropping on the side of Mount Kailāsa (kailāsapārśve kaścic chilāviśeṣaḥ). Cv and Cm add that it is well known [from itihāsa—so Cm] that this spot is the source of the river Citraśilā. A river of this name is included in the lengthy list of rivers given by Sañjaya at Mahābhārata 6.9. The reference to this river is found in the Citraśāla edition of the Mahābhārata at 6.9.30. Ck, Ct, and Cr, however, understand the reference to be to the stone seat upon which Śiva practices his ascetic meditations (bhagavato rudrasya tapaḥsamādhipīṭham).

"and . . . Ṛṣabha" tatharṣabham: This mountain and Kailāsa constitute the two landmarks mentioned by Jāmbavān in verse 30, whereby Hanumān could locate the mountain of healing herbs. D5,7,10,11,T,G2,3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead taṃ vai vṛṣam, literally, "and that Vṛṣa or that bull." This variant has led to a difference of opinion among the commentators who share it, since the word vṛṣa, like ṛṣabha, means "bull." Ck and Ct clearly understand this to be a proper name, a variant of Mount Ṛṣabha, since they note that it was mentioned by Jāmbavān (jāmbavadupadiṣṭam). Cr, however, in keeping with his reading, noted above, of the adjective ugra to refer to Śiva, understands this to be a reference to the bull Nandi, who serves as Śiva's vehicle (vṛṣaṃ śambhor yānam). This interpretation is followed in the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1681). Dutt (1893, p. 1363) seems to confuse the two interpretations, translating, "and that bull," but noting, "which had been mentioned by Jāmbavān," despite the fact that Jāmbavān, of course, has said nothing about a bull. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 218) also tries to negotiate the two positions, translating, "and Vrisha," but noting, "the name literally means—The Bull of Shiva."

"the . . . golden mountain" kāñcanaśailam: This is apparently a description of Mount Ṛṣabha, which was clearly described as golden in verse 30 above. Most translators agree that this refers to Mount Ṛṣabha (or Vṛṣa). Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1681) follows Cr in taking Vṛṣa as Śiva's bull and clearly understands this as a reference to Mount Ṛṣabha, adding the name. Cr, whose reading and interpretation of vṛṣam eliminates Mount Ṛṣabha from the verse, as noted above, takes the term to be a bahuvrīhi compound modifying Mount Kailāsa. The sense is "Kailāsa with its mass of golden boulders (kāñcanaḥ śailaḥ śilāsamūho yasmiṃs taṃ kailāsam)." Cg notes that the term "golden mountain" was applied earlier to Mount Meru (see Cg on 6.19.13–15), and he therefore appears to understand that the same mountain is intended here. This idea is reflected in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 219), who renders, "the great mountain of gold, Meru."

"all herbs . . . herbs of healing" -sarvauṣadhi- . . . sarvauṣadhi-: We follow Cg, who distinguishes between merely luminescent herbs, for example, the tṛṇajyotiḥ (also known as the jyotiṣmatī), and the life-saving medicinal herbs, such as the mṛtasaṃjīvanī. (saṃdīptābhī rātrau jvalantībhiḥ sarvābhir oṣadhībhis tṛṇajyotirbhiḥ saṃpradīptaṃ samyakprakāśamānam. sarvauṣadhiparvatendraṃ mṛtasaṃjīvanyādisarvauṣadhiyuktaparvatendraṃ dadarśa.)

The meter is upajāti.

Following 55ab, D7 (after verse 54) and KK insert a passage of four lines in the upajāti meter [1386*] (= KK 6.74.62 bracketed): "And there he saw Vighneśvara together with Nandikeśvara, as well as Skanda, surrounded by the hosts of the gods. And that monkey of outstanding strength also saw Umā with her daughter[1] disporting herself with maidens."

[1]"with her daughter" sakanyām: The reference is obscure. The literature does not seem to know of a daughter of Umā. The possible sense "with her maidens" is obviated by the following term kanyakābhiḥ, "with her maidens." One might also separate the words sa and kanyām to yield the sense "he [Hanumān saw] the maiden [Umā]." KK avoids the problem by reading instead sudurgām, "the very unapproachable [Umā]."

56. "Hanumān, son of Vāsava's messenger, the wind god" vāsavadūtasūnuḥ: Literally, "the son of Vāsava's messenger." There is no agreement among the commentators as to why or under what circumstances Vāyu should be identified as a messenger of Indra. Explanations vary widely. Ck and Ct understand the reference to be to the role of the wind in impelling or driving Indra in the form of clouds (vāsavasya meghasvarūpiṇo devarājasya dūtaḥ prerakaḥ). Cr thinks that the reference derives from the antagonism between Indra and Vāyu after the former had struck down the young Hanumān with his vajra and, in retaliation, the wind god had inflicted (tanoti) suffering (duḥkham) on Indra. Cr takes dūta, "messenger," to mean "one who inflicts suffering" (vāsava indro 'pi dūto hanumaduddeśyakavajranipātānantarakāle paritāpito yena kiṃca vāsavasya duḥkhaṃ paritāpaṃ tanoti sa vāyur ity arthaḥ). See notes to 6.19.13–15. Cm understands that Vāyu acts as a substitute for Vāsava in driving the clouds, etc. (vāyor vāsavadūtatvaṃ vāsavādeśena meghādiprerakatvāt). Cg echoes Cm's opinion, adding that it is because of this relationship that Vāyu, acting at the behest of Vāsava, presents a splendid necklace to Rāma at the time of his consecration (6.116.60) (ata evābhiṣekasamaya indreṇa prerito hāraṃ rāmāyopāharat). Cs takes the compound vāsava- dūta- as a bahuvrīhi in the sense of "the son of him who has Vāsava for his agent, that is, his servant (vāsavo dūtaḥ proktakārī yasya saḥ tasya sūnuḥ)" but offers no explanation of the relationship.

"glowing as if with flames of fire" analaraśmidīptam: Literally, "blazing with flames of fire." The mountain is not actually on fire but merely illuminated by the phosphorescent glow of the healing herbs. D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead -rāśi-, "masses," for -raśmi-, "flames, rays."

"began to search" vicayaṃ cakāra: Literally, "he made a collection or search." The commentators make it clear that we are to take vicaya in its sense of "search," since, as the following verses indicate, Hanumān is unable actually to gather any individual herbs.

The meter is upajāti.

57. "for thousands of leagues" yojanasahasrāṇi samatītya: Literally, "having exceeded thousands of yojanas." Ct notes that the word "thousands" here should be taken by secondary meaning to indicate "many" (sahasraśabdo 'nekopalakṣaṇam). Cr understands, "many thousands of leagues (anekasahasrayojanāni)." Cs specifies, "fifty thousand leagues (pañcāśatsahasrayojanāni)." Cg remarks that this reference indicates that Hanumān is tireless (anena śramarahitatvam uktam).

58. "recognizing the purpose for which he had come" vijñāyārthinam āyāntam: Literally, "having known that a seeker was coming."

"made themselves invisible" jagmur adarśanam: Literally, "they went to non-sight."

59. "Losing patience" amṛṣyamāṇaḥ: Literally, "not enduring or tolerating."

The meter is upendravajrā.

60. "What" kim: Cr understands kim in its pejorative sense, glossing, "despicable (kutsitam)." This interpretation is represented in the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1682), which renders, "this kind of determination of yours is despicable." Ct understands, "on the strength of what do you show this kind of indifference? (evaṃprakāram etad audāsīnyaṃ kiṃbalād ity arthaḥ)."

"in your lack of compassion toward Rāghava" yad rāghave nāsi kṛtānukampaḥ: Literally, "in that you are not one who has made any compassion with regard to Rāghava."

The meter is upajāti.

61. "began to slide" calita-: Literally, "moved." All but two manuscripts (G2,3) collated for the critical edition and all printed editions consulted read instead jvalita-, "blazing, flaming." The idea is that, as indicated earlier, the violent wrenching and friction of the rocks and trees cause sparks and fire (see verse 38 above). All translations consulted render this variant. It is astonishing that, given the near unanimity of the recensions, the critical editors should have chosen this extremely weak reading.

The meter is upendravajrā.

62. "that hero, whose fearsome power was like that of Garuḍa" garuḍogravīryaḥ: Literally, "with Garuḍa's fearsome power." The simile is perhaps an oblique reference to Garuḍa's role in the similar revival of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa in sarga 40.

"the worlds, together with the gods and the lords of the gods" lokān sasurān surendrān: The collocation is unusual and awkward. It is also textually weak. Ś,Ñ2,B1,4,D1–5,8–10,12,13,T,G,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, Cr, Gita Press, Gorresio, and Lahore all read instead sasurāsurendrān, "together with the lords of the gods and asuras." Among the translators consulted, only Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 246), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 219), and Pagani (1999, p. 1073) render Ct's reading.

"creatures of the air" khacaraiḥ: Literally, "going or moving in the sky." According to Cr, this refers to the gods, etc. (devādibhiḥ).

The meter is upajāti.

63. "the sun's path" bhāskarādhvānam: Literally, "the path of the maker of light." This is the route by which Hanumān came to the Himalayas in verse 50. Cg takes the term to be a kenning for the sky or upper atmosphere (antarikṣam). Normally we render the kenning bhāskara as "the sun, bringer of light." Since, however, the poet uses the term no fewer than four times in this verse, we have avoided this for brevity.

The meter is upajāti.

64. "Holding that mountain" tena śailena: Literally, "with that mountain."

"the . . . son of Vāyu, bearer of scents" gandhavahātmajaḥ: Literally, "son of the bearer of scents." See verses 34; 68; and notes.

"in the sky" khe: In addition to the obvious interpretation shared by all the other commentators and translators consulted, Cs proposes taking kha in its sense of "sense organ," which, in this case, he takes to mean Viṣṇu's hand (khe hastātmaka indriye).

"holding aloft" uddhṛtena: Literally, "held aloft." Only two manuscripts (M1,2) appear to support this reading. The majority of the other manuscripts and all printed editions read instead arpitena, "placed." Several of the commentators add "in his hand (svakare—so Ct)." It is unclear why the critical editors chose this very weak reading.

"thousand-bladed" sahasradhāreṇa: Literally, "of a thousand edges."

The meter is upajāti.

65. "Then . . . they roared" tadā vineduḥ: Cg is evidently concerned about how the monkeys, who had been described as gravely wounded, are capable of uttering such hearty roars. He explains that we are to understand that they have all been revivified by catching the scent [of the healing herbs] from afar (anena dūrād eva gandhāghrāṇena sarve jīvitā iti gamyate). Cs has a similar idea, noting that what is suggested here is that the monkeys recover their bodily consciousness and are made whole by the mere touch of the wind (presumably blowing from the mountain of healing herbs) (vinedur anena vātamātrasparśena gātrasmṛtir arogatā ca kapīnāṃ jāta iti dhvanyate). M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead vinedur uccaiḥ, "they roared loudly."

"the rākṣasas in Laṅkā" laṅkālayāḥ: Literally, "those whose abode was Laṅkā."

The meter is upajāti.

66. "great Hanumān" mahātmā: Literally, "the great one."

"on splendid Mount Trikūṭa: śailottame: Literally, "on that best of mountains." As Cg reminds us, the reference is to a peak of Mount Trikūṭa (trikūṭaśikhare). See notes to verse 39 above.

"bowing his head in respectful salutation" śirasābhivādya: Literally, "saluting with his head." See note to verse 26 above.

The meter is upajāti.

67. "freed . . . from their arrow wounds" viśalyau: Literally, "arrow-free." See note to verse 28 above.

The meter is upajāti.

Following verse 67, D1,5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of eight lines [1396*], of which the first four are an upajāti verse: "All those heroic tawny monkeys that had been struck down, now healed of their arrow wounds and made whole in an instant by the smell of those wonderful healing herbs, awoke like sleepers when the night is over. [1–4] Ever since the tawny monkeys and rākṣasas had begun to fight in Laṅkā, the rākṣasas slain in battle by those elephants among monkeys had all been cast into the sea, as soon as they were killed,[1] on the orders of Rāvaṇa for the sake of honor.[2] [5–8]"

[1]"slain . . . as soon as they were killed" hatā hatāḥ: Literally, "slain, slain." As Ct points out, this is an example of vīpsā, "repetition," used to indicate successive or continuous action. As an alternative, several of the commentators take the sequence as a compound, hatāhatāḥ, in the sense of "slain and non-slain," to mean those who are mortally wounded. The idea here is that if they are cast into the sea, what then to say of those who are actually dead. (hatāhatā mumūrṣāvasthāḥ. kiṃ punar mṛtā iti bhāvaḥ—so Cg.)

[2]"cast into the sea . . . for the sake of honor" mānārtham . . . kṣipyante . . . sāgare: The commentators use this passage as an explanation of why the wafting fragrance of the healing herbs does not revive the slain rākṣasas along with the fallen monkeys and humans. (yathā tathā vānarāḥ pratibuddhā evaṃ rākṣasāḥ kimiti na pratibuddhās tatrāha—so Cm.) To rationalize this, the commentators offer various explanations of the term mānārtham. We follow the second explanation of Cm, who understands māna in the sense of "pride (abhimāna)," arguing that Rāvaṇa disposes of his dead so that his enemies will not think that so many of his troops have been killed (yadvā māno 'bhimānas tadarthaṃ rākṣasā bahavo hatā iti sarve jñāsyanti tadabhimānād aprakaṭanāyety arthaḥ). Ct, Cg, and Cm (first alternative) take māna, "honor," in its sense of "measure" and artha, "for the sake of," in its lexical sense of "prevention." The idea here is that Rāvaṇa, in his desire to retain his sovereignty, has had the dead rākṣasas cast into the sea to prevent Rāma's forces from measuring, that is, realizing, the extent of his losses and thus attacking the city, which would now be poorly defended. (mānārtham. arthaśabdo nivṛttivācī. śatrūṇāṃ hatarākṣaseyattājñānābhāvārtham ity arthaḥ. tatparijñāne tv avaśiṣṭabalasyālpīyastvaṃ jñātvā vānarā laṅkāṃ praviśeyuḥ. te mā praveṣṭyann ity etadartho 'yaṃ rāvaṇasyeśvarecchayā vicāraḥ—so Ct.) See note to 6.108.19, where Ct alludes to this reference as an explanation of why the slain rākśasas are not revived at the same time that Indra resurrects the fallen monkeys at the end of the war.

68. "immensely powerful" udagravīryaḥ: D9–11,G1,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -vegaḥ, "speed," for -vīryaḥ, lending the compound the sense "immensely swift."

"the son of Vāyu, bearer of scents" gandhavahātmajaḥ: Literally, "the son of the bearer of scents." This is the third use in this sarga of the relatively rare epithet "bearer of scents" for Vāyu. It seems likely that the poet uses it here because of the context in which the wafting of the scent of the healing herbs is so critical to the narrative. Vāyu's role in supporting his son's mission is thus emphasized. See verses 34; 64; and notes.

The meter is upendravajrā.

According to Ct, the revival of Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and the monkeys occurs on the eighth day of the dark half of the month Āśvina (āśvinakṛṣṇāṣṭamyām idam). See note to 6.4.4.

Sarga 62

1. "sensibly" arthyam: Literally, "significant, sensible." We follow the commentators who gloss, "not deviating from sense or sound policy (arthād anapetam—so Ct)." We read the term adverbially.

"instructing . . . as to what should be done next" vijñāpayan: Literally, "informing." We follow Ct and Cr, who understand that Sugrīva is informing Hanumān as to what needs to be done next (agre kartavyam—so Ct).

2. "the rākṣasa princes" kumārāḥ: Literally, "the young men, princes." The reference, as indicated by Cr, is to Rāvaṇa's sons who have been slain in the preceding sargas (56–59).

"will . . . be able to launch a sortie against us" upanirhāram . . . dātum arhati: There is wide disagreement among the commentators and translators consulted as to the meaning of the term upanirhāra, which apparently does not occur elsewhere in the literature. Our interpretation follows that of Cv and Cm, who understand, "issuing forth to offer battle (upaniṣkramya yuddhapradānam—so Cm)." Etymological considerations aside, we believe this interpretation best suits the context. The battle up until now has consisted largely of a series of sorties on the part of a succession of great rākṣasa champions. Now that many of these (with the critical exception of Indrajit) have been dispatched, Sugrīva assumes that Rāvaṇa will be unable to launch any more forays against the monkeys. He therefore proposes that the monkeys take the offensive and attack the city.

Cg interprets similarly, although he is uncertain as to whether the term upanirhāra refers principally to the setting out or to the fighting. Noting that verbal roots may have many meanings, he offers two interpretations. First, he says that Rāvaṇa will not be able to come out because of his despondency over the killing of his sons. Cg feels that the poet uses the term nirhāra in the sense of "the removal or disposal of corpses." Perhaps he has in mind the mention in the southern recension (see 1396* following 6.61.67 and notes) of Rāvaṇa's practice of sending out parties to dispose of the rākṣasa dead by throwing them into the sea. If so, Cg takes the term to be used in its secondary denotation, or lakṣaṇā, which may also refer prospectively to the impending "cremation" of the rākṣasas in the conflagration set by the monkeys. His second interpretation is that the word upanirhāra refers specifically to a battle offered in the course of a sortie. (upanirhāram upaniṣkramaṇaṃ yuddhāya nirgamanam iti yāvat. hataputrāditvenānutsāhād rāvaṇo na nirgamiṣyatīti bhāvaḥ. atrāgraheṇa pretaniryāpanarūḍhanirhārapadaprayogaḥ. dātuṃ kartum iti yāvat. dhātūnām anekārthatvāt. upanirhāraśabda upaniṣkramya yuddhaparo vā.)

Ck understands the term to refer to Rāvaṇa's alleged inability to defend his citadel (upanirhāraṃ pururakṣāṃ dātuṃ saṃpādayituṃ nārhati). Ct quotes the opinions of both Ck and Cm but believes that the term, in fact, refers to a cessation of hostilities (yuddhāvahāram), which, under the circumstances, Rāvaṇa will no longer be able to offer. According to Ct, others believe that by this reference we are to understand that such a cessation has occurred previously. (upanirhāraṃ yuddhāvahāram asmākaṃ dātuṃ nārhatīty arthaḥ. anenānyadā yuddhāvahāro jāta iti jñāyata ity anye.) See notes to 6.32.2–3; 6.41.8; and 6.49.33.

Cr offers, as his first explanation, the same interpretation as that of Ck. However, he adds the idea that upanirhāra also means the offering of libations of water to [Rāvaṇa's] dead sons. In the absence of his champions, Cr continues, Rāvaṇa will not be able to perform this rite nor should he be given the opportunity to do so. Cr concludes by quoting the interpretation of Cm. (kiṃca upanirhāraṃ mṛtaputrādyuddeśyakajalaṃ dātuṃ nārhati. avakāśo na dātavya iti tātparyam.)

Most northern manuscripts and the printed editions of Gorresio (6.53.3) and Lahore (6.54.2), in an apparent effort to gloss the difficult southern reading, substitute upasaṃhāram, "attack."

Translations are varied. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1684) and Dutt (1893, p. 1365) follow Ck's interpretation. Dutt, however, notes, "Upanirhāram is a contested term. Kataka [Ck] gives the sense adopted by me. Tirtha [Cm] says it means 'Rāvana cannot give battle in the open field.' According to others, it means 'He cannot offer truce to us.' " Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 220) follows Cg, Cm, and Cv, rendering, "will not be able to order a sortie." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 248), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 220), takes the phrase to mean that Rāvaṇa can no longer harm the monkeys. Pagani (1999, p. 1074) thinks that he can no longer defeat them.

3. "Bulls among leaping monkeys! Those leaping monkeys" plavañgamāḥ . . . plavagarṣabhāḥ: Literally, "leaping ones . . . O bulls among leaping ones." We follow Cr in taking the second term as a vocative and the first as the subject of the verbs santi, "they are," and abhyutpatantu (v.l. abhipatantu), "let them leap" (he plavagarṣabhāḥ ye ye . . . plavañgamāḥ santi te te . . . abhipatantu).

"are to . . . leap into Laṅkā" laṅkām abhyutpatantu: Literally, "Let them leap to Laṅkā." Cg explains, "let them leap the rampart and proceed (prākāram utplutya gacchantu)."

Following verse 3, KK (6.75.3ef), GPP (unnumbered between 6.75.3 and 4), and VSP (6.75.3ef), all within brackets, and M3 insert a passage of one line [1403*]: "Those tawny monkeys, who resembled Indra [lit., Hari] in order to burn Rāvaṇa's abode . . ."

4. "when the sun had set and the dread onset of night had come" astaṃgata āditye raudre tasmin niśāmukhe: Literally, "when Āditya had gone to the setting mountain at the frightful beginning of the night." There is a difference of opinion among several of the commentators as to the exact chronology of the current assault on Laṅkā. Ck and Ct understand that Vibhīṣaṇa and Hanumān had found Jāmbavān on the battlefield in the waning moments of the previous night (6.61.7–15). Thus, according to them, Hanumān's two round-trip flights first to retrieve and then to replace the mountain of healing herbs have taken exactly thirty ghaṭikās, or twelve hours, the length of one tropical day. This, they argue, brings us to the evening of the following day. (pūrvadivasāpararātriśeṣa ulkāhastābhyāṃ hanūmadvibhīṣaṇābhyāṃ jāmbavadanveṣaṇam. tatas tanniyogata uṣasi parvatāharaṇāya gamanam. athāharaṇaṃ punaś ca tatprāpanaṃ punarāgamanam iti triṃśadghaṭikāmadhye sarvam. tataḥ punaḥ pradoṣe hanumadādīnāṃ laṅkādāhagamanam iti katakādayaḥ—so Ct.) Cf. notes to 6.59.106 and 6.61.7,12,68 for Ct's chronology. Cg and Cm, on the other hand, believe that the reference to the setting of the sun is not a specific marker of the time of day but merely a way to indicate that it is dark. By "the onset of night," Cg further understands that the first watch (yāma) of the night is intended and that the action currently described takes place at the end of that watch, so that it is not twilight but pitch dark. (nanu pūrvam ulkāhastau tadā rātrāv ity uktam. atrādityāstamayasamaya iti gamyate. ato viruddham iti cen na virodhaḥ. āditye 'staṃgata iti prakāśābhāvoktiḥ. niśāmukha iti rātreḥ prathamayāma ucyate. raudra iti viśeṣaṇād yāmāntatvena gāḍhāndhakāratvam ucyate. hanumāṃś ca mahādbhuta- vegaśālitayā muhūrtaṃ mātreṇa prasthāyauṣadhiparvatam ānīya taṃ punas tatra nikṣipyāgatavān iti tasya vegātiśayaś ca pratipādito bhavati—so Cg.) The idea here is that, because of Hanumān's inconceivable speed (acintyavegātiśayaḥ—so Cm), he accomplishes the fetching and return of the healing herb mountain in a mere instant. Thus, rather than the twelve hours of day envisaged by Ck and Ct, Cg and Cm believe that virtually no time has elapsed since the discovery of Jāmbavān on the battlefield. Cm acknowledges the position of Ck and Ct as an alternative. Among the translations consulted, only that of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, pp. 220–21) represents Cg's thinking, rendering, "at the end of the first watch of the night, when the darkness was intense." The concern for the duration of Hanumān's flight reflects, of course, the commentators' virtual obsession with the chronology of the epic events. It also, naturally, reflects a marked division in the commentators' opinions as to how fast Hanumān actually flies. See note to 6.4.4 and Introduction, p. 17, n. 1 and p. 108. See R. Goldman 2003 and 2006b. Cf. Hopkins 1903.

5. "the sentries at the gates" ārakṣasthāḥ: Literally, "stationed at the ārakṣas." There is some disagreement among the commentators as to the precise meaning of the term ārakṣa, with the different sides citing conflicting lexicons. Ck, Ct, and Cr gloss, "gates (dvārāṇi)," and take the rākṣasas stationed there to be "the guards posted at the gates (dvārarakṣiṇaḥ)." Ct, however, notes that some unspecified commentators understand ārakṣa to mean "a garrison or army encampment (gulmam)." Cg and Cm are apparently the commentators to whom Ct is referring, as they gloss, "posted at the garrisons (gulmasthāḥ)." Cg, however, offers two alternatives: "city guards (nagararakṣiṇaḥ)" and "guardians of the fortifications (durgarakṣiṇāṃ sthānaṃ tatrasthā vā)." He cites the Ratnamālā, which defines ārakṣa as "watching, guarding (rakṣaṇam)." Cs takes ārakṣa to refer to any point that needs to be guarded, such as a gate, etc., and considers those posted at such places to be ārakṣasthas. He cites the Viśvakośa, which defines ārakṣa as "that which needs to be guarded (rakṣaṇīya)." Cf. 5.3.27; 6.3.27; 6.27.20; 6.28.31; 6.31.31; 6.45.2; 6.71.1; 6.72.5; 6.84.6; and notes.

"with their hideous eyes" virūpākṣāḥ: Ct, Ck, Cg, and Cm appear to take this epithet as a kenning for rākṣasas. See 6.22.33; 6.27.20; 6.28.31; 6.33.10; and notes.

6. "gateways" gopura-: We follow Cg and Cr, who gloss, "city gates (puradvāram)." See 6.61.39 and notes.

"towers" -aṭṭa-: According to Ct and Cr, this term refers to "a [smaller] house built on top of another house (gṛhoparitanagṛham)." Ct cites, as an alternative, Amarakośa's (2.2.12) definition: "a fortified place in front of a guardhouse (kṣaumam)." Cg cites the Amarakośa in support of his definition and elaborates, quoting an unidentified source, which defines aṭṭāḥ as "the places in which warriors inflict harm, that is, guardhouses placed in front of the ramparts (aṭṭanti hiṃsanti yodhā eṣu sthitvety aṭṭāḥ prākārāgrasthitagṛhāṇi)." Ck only cites the Amarakośa. See note to 6.33.28.

"highways. . . streets" pratolīṣu . . . cāryāsu: Ck, Ct, Cr, and Cg define these terms as "main roads and lesser roads (rathyā . . . alparathyā—so Ct)." See notes to 6.47.32.

"mansions" prāsādeṣu: Cr defines prāsāda as "a tall house (uccagṛham)." See 6.32.2 and note.

7. The two lines that constitute this verse (pādas ab and pādas cd) are juxtaposed only in the critical edition. As noted below, all southern manuscripts insert a passage of thirteen lines between them, while the northern manuscripts replace pādas cd with either rākṣasānāṃ samādīptaḥ sarveṣāṃ prāṇagardhinām ("blazing brightly [that fire burned the houses] of all the rākṣasas, who cherished their lives") [1408*] or rākṣasānāṃ samāsādya sarveṣāṃ dvārarakṣiṇām ("[that fire] reaching [the houses] of all the rākṣasa guardians of the gates [devoured them]") (Ś2,D2–4,8,12, and the Lahore edition). The critical reading seems awkward in any case, as it does not differentiate the terms gṛham, "house," and āvāsaḥ, "dwelling, residence." Once again, the critical edition has created a passage known to no manuscript tradition. See Sutherland 1992.

"including those who performed the household rites" gṛhamedhinām: Literally, "having house-sacrifices." This term, which can be loosely translated as "householder," refers more specifically to brahmans who perform the vedic rites enjoined in the gṛhyasūtras. As such, it is an interesting term to apply to the normally antibrahmanical rākṣasas. On the other hand, it may refer to an actual priestly class of rākṣasas, such as that mentioned at 5.16.2 (see ad loc. and note; and Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 65–66). The reading itself is rather weak. According to the critical apparatus, it is attested in only five manuscripts (G1,2,M1,2,5). D5,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cv, and Cm read instead gṛhagardhinām, "of those who cherish or covet their homes." D6,7,10,11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the synonymous gṛhagṛdhnunām. Cg and Ct gloss their respective variants as "householders (gṛhasthānām)." Cr understands, "of those who were particularly covetous of such objects as houses, etc. (gṛhādiviṣayakaviśeṣecchāvatām)."

Following 7ab, D1,5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of thirteen lines [1407*]: "Palaces as huge as mountains crashed to the ground. Aloe wood was consumed there, as was the finest sandalwood, along with pearls, shining jewels, diamonds, and coral.[1–3] Fine linens were consumed there, as well as shining silks, along with various woolens and golden utensils and weapons.[4–5] Trappings and ornaments of horses of all different kinds were consumed, along with the neck-chains and girths of elephants and the fine accoutrements of chariots.[6–7] The body armor of warriors and the armor of horses and elephants were burned, along with swords, bows, bowstrings, arrows, iron cudgels, hooks,[1] and javelins.[8–9] The fire there consumed woolen blankets, fly whisks, tiger skins, and abundant musk, together with mansions on every side, all adorned with pearls and jewels.[10–11] And the fire burned heaps of various missiles there. The fire, eater of oblations, consumed the decorations on houses[2] of every kind.[12–13]"

[1]"hooks" -aṅkuśa-: See note to 6.60.28, 1342*.

[2]"the decorations on houses" gṛhacchandān: Literally, "pleasant things of houses." We follow Cg and Cm, who understand these to be auspicious or apotropaic decorations such as svastikas painted on houses (gṛhacchandān svastikādigṛhavinyāsān—so Cg). D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead gṛhāṃś citrān, "variegated or lovely houses."

8–11. Verses 8–11 constitute a single sentence, which comprises a long list of the different attributes and activities of the rākṣasas whose houses are destroyed in the fire. In order to make the passage readable in English, we have broken it up into a series of smaller syntactic units, adding words such as "some" and "others" to distinguish the various groups of rākṣasas described.

"Fire, the purifier of all things" pāvakaḥ: Literally, "the purifier."

"consumed thousands of the houses . . . As the fire burned their homes: gṛhasahasrāṇi . . . adahat: Literally, "it burned thousands of houses." We have repeated the phrase, in keeping with our attempts to make the syntax manageable and the style intelligible in English. D1,2,7,9–11,G2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, Cg, Cm, and Cv read śata-, "one hundred," for gṛha-, "homes," yielding the sense "it burned hundreds of thousands [of the residents of Laṅkā]." Ct and Cs supply the word "houses (gṛhāṇi)."

"the residents . . . Some of those residents" -nivāsinām: Literally, "of those residents."

"garlands of flowers" sragdāma-: Literally, "ties of floral garlands." Our translation follows the interpretation of Cg, who glosses, "flower garlands (puṣpamālāḥ)," noting that the word dāma here refers to a necklace or a garland (sragdāmāni puṣpamālā dāmaśabdo hāraparaḥ). Cg further notes that unnamed masters have indicated that the word śragdāma refers to a floral garland made with multiple strands (sragdāmaśabdenānekasaranirmitapuṣpamālocyata ity ācāryāḥ). The critical text has an unnoted typographical error, reading sradgāma- for sragdāma-. D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read -bhāṇḍa-, "ornaments," for -dāma-, "tie, strand." See 6.64.2 and note.

"rum" sīdhu- : Prakash (1987, vol. 2, pp. 149, 205) understands that this drink is made from distilled sugarcane and dhātakī flowers. See Amarakośa 3.6.34.

"The garments of some were clutched by their lovers." kāntālambitavastrāṇām: Literally, "whose garments were clung to by lovers." Cg interprets this as a paranipāta compound, glossing, "whose lovers were clinging to garments (ālambitavastrakāntānām)." Cg suggests that this amounts to saying that the rākṣasas were given over to sexual pleasure (ratiparāṇām iti yāvat).

"went on . . . drinking" pibatām: Literally, "[of those] who were drinking." Cg takes this either as a repetition of the fact that the rākṣasas were consuming intoxicants, as indicated by the phrase "their eyes rolling from drinking rum" or as a reference to their consumption of more innocuous beverages such as milk. (pibatāṃ madyapānaṃ kurvatām. sīdhupānety atra madyapānaṃ kāryam uktam. kṣīrādikaṃ pibatām iti vā.)

"flared up again and again" jajvāla ca punaḥ punaḥ: Cg, the only commentator who understands that it is the rākṣasas rather than their houses that are being burned, notes that the fire flares up repeatedly through the infusions of their blood, marrow, and fat (punaḥ punar ity anena tadrudhiravasāsnehenādhikajvālocyate).

12–14. Verses 12–14 constitute a single long sentence, most of which consists of adjectives describing the buildings that are being burned. We have broken up the passage into smaller sentences for readability and style.

"firmly built and costly" sāravanti mahārhāṇi: Literally, "possessing strength [and] having great value." We follow Ct, Ck, and Cr for the first of these adjectives. They understand the reference to be to the state of being firmly constructed (sthirasaṃsthānavattvam—Ck, Ct)." Cg, on the other hand, citing the Ratnamālā, takes sāra in its sense of "wealth (artha)," glossing, "possessing the greatest wealth (śreṣṭhadhanavanti)."

"beautiful with their grand upper stories" gambhīraguṇavanti: Literally, "possessing profound qualities." We follow Cg here, who takes gambhīra in its sense of "a terrace or upper story of a building," glossing, "possessing large upper stories or terraces (mahātalpavanti)." Cg glosses -guṇavanti as "possessing beauty (saundaryavanti)." Ct, Ck, and Cr, however, take the compound to mean that the buildings were impenetrable because of their numerous inner enclosures, ramparts, doors, and side doors into inner chambers (anekakakṣyāprākārāntargehadvāropadvārato durgamatvalakṣaṇa-gāmbhīryavanti).

"soaring aloft with their penthouses" candraśālonnatāni: Literally, "lofty because of their moon-chambers." We agree with the commentators, who gloss, "penthouse or turret (śirogṛham)." One is tempted to read the compound as a paranipāta in the sense of "having lofty penthouses." D6,10,11,13,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -uttamāni, "foremost," for the critical edition's -unnatāni, "lofty," yielding the sense of "splendid because of [their] penthouses."

"richly furnished throughout" sādhiṣṭhānāni sarvaśaḥ: Literally, "possessing resting places everywhere." We follow the commentators. Cg takes adhiṣṭhāna in its sense of "couch seat," glossing, "furnished with beds, chairs, etc. (śayyāsanādisahitāni)." Ct similarly glosses, "furnished with couches, etc. (mañcādisahitāni)."

"echoed with the cries . . . the strains . . . and the tinkling" nisvanaiḥ . . . nāditāni: Literally, "resounding with the sounds."

"of lutes" -vīṇānām: V3,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read -varṇānām, "class, type, or sounds." This yields the sense of "[the sounds] of the [different] types or the cries of krauñcas and peacocks."

15. "at summer's end" gharmage: Literally, "in or at summer-going." This unusual term, virtually unattested elsewhere, has aroused some disagreement among the commentators and translators. Commentators are divided as to whether to take the term to refer to the hot season proper, the rainy season, which follows it, or the transitional period between the two. Although the term appears to refer to the heat of summer, that idea is seemingly vitiated by the reference to clouds and lightning, which are not a normal feature of that season. Ct and Ck appear to understand the term to refer to the period at the end of the summer when the sun goes away [presumably hidden by the monsoon clouds] (grīṣmage divākare gate). Cr seems to understand the reference to be to summer proper when the sun has gone to the condition of [maximum] heat (grīṣmage savitari satīti śeṣaḥ). Cv and Cm take the term in the sense of "that from or after which heat or summer departs, that is, as a kenning for the rainy season (gharmo 'smād gacchatīti gharmago varṣākālaḥ)." Cg cites this last position as his opening statement. He then goes on to note that others state that one should add the words "it goes in the summer (nidāghe gacchatīti śeṣaḥ)," presumably a reference to the heat. He then states that the word gharma- metonymically indicates gharmānta, "the end of summer" (gharmaśabdena gharmānto lakṣyate). Cg further points out that other commentators understand the term to mean "that which reaches up until the end of summer, that is, the beginning of the rainy season (taṃ gacchati prāpnotīti gharmago varṣādir ity apare)." Finally, Cg seems to come around to the idea that the summer is being referred to and that the simile of the blazing gateways viewed against the background of the flaming mansions is based on the superimposition of lightning-laced clouds upon the full blazing heat of summer (lañkāyāṃ dahymānāyāṃ saṃtāpe ca samantataḥ prasarati dahymānatoraṇādīni nidāghaprarūḍhasavidyunmeghatulyānīty arthaḥ). Translators offer one or another of these interpretations, i.e., summer, end of summer, beginning of the rains, or the rainy season.

Following verse 15, D1,6,7,9,11,T2,G1,M1,2,5,D10 (line 1 after 14; line 2 after 15ab),G2,3 (after 15ab), and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of two lines [1416*]: "Wreathed in flames, the houses looked like the peaks of some great mountain ablaze with a forest fire."

16. "As they were being burned alive" dahyamānāḥ: Literally, "being burned."

"in their lofty mansions" vimāneṣu: As the commentaries indicate, this term refers specifically to a seven-storied mansion or palace (saptabhūmiprāsādaḥ—so Ck, Ct). See 5.8.32; 5.10.15; 5.52.11; and notes.

"cast off all their ornaments" tyaktābharaṇasaṃyogāḥ: Literally, "who had abandoned the totality of their ornaments." The precise reason for the dying women's abandonment of their ornaments is not clear. Only Cr, among the commentators, touches on this point, claiming that they do so because they are being burned, but still the connection between the two actions is not clear. Perhaps the idea is that the ornaments have grown intolerably hot from the flames. This, at any rate, is the understanding of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1685), which translates, "having given up (all) connections with their ornaments (which were melting due to excessive heat)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 249) understands that the ornaments impeded the women's flight, but there is no evidence to support this view. Apparently interpreting saṃyoga, normally, "contact, union," in the unattested sense of "obstruction," he renders, "Jetant lá les parures qui entravaient (leur fuite)." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 221) and Pagani (1999, p. 1076). Compare 5.52.12, where Hanumān observed streams of molten metal filled with gemstones when he previously burned the city.

17. "there, engulfed in fire" tatra cāgniparītāni: M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead jvalanena parītāni, "engulfed in flames." They also transpose verses 16 and 17. This variant and order of the verses is reflected only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 222).

18. "As those mansions" tāni: Literally, "those."

"with their thickets of glowing herbs" dīptauṣadhivanāni ca: Ś2,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,6–13,T2,G1,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead dahyamānāni sarvaśaḥ, "burning on all sides," or the synonymous dahyamānāni sarvataḥ.

19. "with red-blossoming kiṃśuka trees" puṣpitair iva kiṃśukaiḥ: Literally, "with blossoming kiṃśukas." See 6.60.34 and note, where the kiṃśuka (Butea frondosa) is used in a similar image with fire. See, too, Sundarakāṇḍa App. I, No. 13, lines 16–20, at note to 5.52.12. Cf. 6.35.9; 6.55.22; 6.60.34; 6.76.28; and notes.

20. "With its elephants and horses turned loose by their keepers" hastyadhyakṣair gajair muktair muktaiś ca turagair api: Literally, "with its elephants freed by the elephant keepers and with horses freed as well." We agree with Cg that we should also supply the words, "and by horse keepers (muktaiś ca turagair apīty atrāpy aśvādhyakṣair ity adhyāhāryam)."

"with its huge creatures thrashing about" bhrāntagrāhaḥ: Literally, "whose grāhas were whirling about." The word grāha can refer either to crocodiles or more generally to any large aquatic animal. Cf. note to 5.7.6. See, too, notes to 6.3.14; 6.4.78; 6.14.21; and 6.15.6,7.

"at the end of a cosmic age" lokānte: Literally, "at the end of the world." Ct, Cg, and Cm gloss, "at the [universal] destruction (pralaye)," i.e., the universal destruction at the end of a kalpa, or cosmic age. Cr glosses, "at the time of the destruction of the world (lokanāśasamaye). See 6.114.40 and note.

21. "would encounter . . . would encounter" dṛṣṭvā . . . dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen . . . having seen."

"roaming free" muktam: Literally, "released."

"it, too, would shy away" nivartate: Literally, "it turns back."

Following verse 21, D6,7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1422*]: "And as Laṅkā burned, the vast ocean on whose waters its reflection lay looked like a sea of red water."

23. "for a distance of ten leagues" daśayojanam: Literally, "for ten yojanas." B3,D7,9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read śata-, "a hundred," for daśa-, "ten." Cf. note to 5.1.69.

24. "Meanwhile": The word has been added to mark the change of subject.

"rushed forth" nirgatān bahiḥ: Literally, "had gone outside."

25. "The shouts . . . the wailing" udghuṣṭam . . . nisvanaḥ: Literally, "shouting . . . sound." Given the context, we agree with Cr, who glosses nisvanaḥ, "sound," as "sounds of dejection or despair (dīnaśabdaḥ)."

26. "the great warriors" mahātmānau: Literally, "the two great ones."

27. The great majority of northern manuscripts omit 27cd–28ab ("he produced a thunderous sound that sowed terror among the rākṣasas. As he twanged his great bow, Rāma looked as splendid . . ."), making their inclusion in the critical text suspect.

28. See note to verse 27.

"Lord Bhava" bhagavān . . . bhavaḥ: The word bhavaḥ, literally, "being, source, origin," is a common epithet of Śiva. Ck, however, in keeping with his Brahmaite theology, appears to take the reference here to be to Brahmā in his role as the creator (bhavaḥ bhavaty asmād eva sargakāla iti bhavaś caturmukharudraḥ). Ck's explanation is ambiguous, however, since he refers to the divinity as caturmukharudra, "four-faced Rudra." Although caturmukha is a standard epithet of Brahmā, the name Rudra normally applies to Śiva. Perhaps Ck is representing the four-faced Brahmā manifesting himself as Rudra/Śiva. See note to 6.59.82.

"his bow that consists of the vedas" vedamayaṃ dhanuḥ: Literally, "the bow that is made of the vedas." The precise sense of the expression is unclear. Commentators and translators struggle to make sense of it, while some, chiefly northern, manuscripts evade the issue by substituting more transparent phrases. Ct, Ck, Cm, and Cr understand that the bow has the form of the Absolute Brahman in its audible form (śabdabrahmātmakam), or the sound of the recitation of the vedas. Although these commentaries are not very detailed, the idea seems to be that the awesome twanging of Rāma's bow recalls the resonant thrumming of the vedas or their sacred symbolic syllable om. Cf. Muṇḍakopaniṣad 2.24, where the syllable om is said to be a bow, the ātman an arrow, and brahma itself the target. Cg offers two interpretations. The first is that the bow's characteristics are mentioned in the vedas (vedoktalakṣaṇaṃ dhanuḥ). According to his second interpretation, the phrase is a reference to the fact that Śiva's glory is established through vedic passages, such as "he is clothed in an animal skin and holds the bow (or the bow Pināka) (kṛttivāsāḥ pinākīti śrutyā pratipāditamahimeti vārthaḥ)." This and similar phrases are well attested in the vedic corpus (see, for example, Kāṭhaka Saṃhitā 9.7; Lāṭyāyana Śrautasūtra 5.3.12; Nirukta 3.21; Vājasaneyi Saṃhitā 3.71; TaitS 1.8.62; ŚatBr 2.6.217; Āpastambha Śrautasūtra 8.18.9; Maitreyi Saṃhitā 1.10.4; 1.44.15; 1.10.20; and 1.60.16; etc.). Cs, citing a usage from the Mahābhārata (critical edition 8.262* line 3 = Citraśāla ed. 8.34.36) (saṃvatsaro dhanur tad vai) in which the gods make the year into Śiva's bow, argues that this is a similar, but noncontradictory, conceit (ity uktis tv ekasyāneke 'bhimānino bhavantīti na viruṇaddhi).

Among the translators who do not simply render the phrase literally, Dutt (1893, p. 1367) clearly follows the interpretation of Ck, Ct, Cr, and Cm, translating, "his bow having sounds and instinct with Brahma energy." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 222) and Pagani (1999, p. 1076) translate the phrase literally. However, both of them have notes in which they suggest that the reference is to a bow made in accordance with the prescriptions of the dhanurveda, or "science of archery." Pagani (1999, p. 1669) is particularly specific in claiming that the reference here is "undoubtedly" to the bow known as Ajagava, which is made of a combination of goat and cow horn as specified in the dhanurveda, a treatise attached to the Yajurveda. Neither translator provides any source for this claim, although we believe that in both cases it may derive from Cg's first interpretation (vedoktalakṣaṇaṃ dhanuḥ).

Following verse 28, D5–7,9–11,T1,2,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of two lines, the first of which repeats 25ab (reading nisvanam for nisvanaḥ) and the second of which is [1425]: "The sound of Rāma's bowstring drowned out[1] both [1425] the shouts of the monkeys and the wailing of the rākṣasas.[25ab]"

[1]"drowned out" ati . . . śuśruve: Literally, "it heard over." As the commentators indicate here, the middle form of the perfect must be understood passively (i.e., "it was heard over"). Cr understands, "having exceeded, that is, having surpassed, it became the object of hearing (atiśuśruve 'tikramyādharīkṛtyety arthaḥ śravaṇaviṣayo babhūva)."

29. "Those three sounds" trayam: Literally, "the triad."

30. "crashed to the ground" apatad bhuvi: Literally, "it fell on the ground." Ñ2,V1,2,B2,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead abhavad bhuvi, "it was on the ground."

31. "frantic preparations" saṃnāhaḥ . . . tumulaḥ: Literally, "tumultuous preparation." Cr explains, "unbeknownst to one another (parasparam ajñāyamānaḥ)." Cg glosses, "great, elaborate (adhikaḥ)," for tumulaḥ, "tumultuous."

32. "girded themselves for battle" saṃnahyamānānām: Literally, "of those who were girding up."

"took on the aspect of the dark night of universal destruction" raudrīva samapadyata: Literally, "became like Raudrī." The commentators agree that Raudrī is another name for Kālarātrī or Pralayarātrī (so Cg). See 6.23.15; 6.34.15; 6.58.31; and notes.

33–34. "Creeping near, you must assault the gate" āsannā dvāram āsādya: Literally, "[you] being near, having come near or attacked the gate." The phrase is awkward and ambiguous with its repetition of forms of the verb ā √sad, "to sit down, approach, attack." According to our understanding, the monkeys are being instructed first to draw near the gate (āsannāḥ) and then to assault it (āsādya), giving battle to its defenders. No other printed edition or commentator's text shares the critical reading. The southern commentators offer one or another of two synonymous variants, reading either āsannaṃ dvāram (Ct, Ck) or āsannadvāram (Cg, Cm, Cr) for āsannā dvāram. In these readings, the participle āsannam, "near," refers to the gate rather than to the monkeys. Ct interprets the phrase to mean "whichever gate is nearest to whichever monkey, having attacked that . . . (yad yasyāsannaṃ dvāraṃ tat tad āsādya)." Cr similarly understands that each of the monkeys is to attack the gate that is nearest to himself (svasvasamīpavartidvāram). Cg understands the compound āsannadvāram to refer to the door to the midmost inner chamber that is nearest to Rāvaṇa's inner apartments (rāvaṇāntaḥpurāsannamadhyakakṣyādvāram).

"no matter where he may be posted" tatra tatra vyavasthitaḥ: Literally, "positioned or assigned there and there."

"should disobey" vitathaṃ kuryāt: Literally, "he should make untrue *o*r falsify." We agree with Cg and Cm, who indicate that we should "supply the words 'my command' (macchāsanam iti śeṣaḥ)." Cr expands a bit, glossing, "your violation of [my] orders, that is, fleeing, etc. (tavājñāvighātaṃ palāyanādīty arthaḥ)." Ct glosses, simply, "should flee (palāyanaṃ kuryāt)."

35. "had approached . . . taken up" sthiteṣu . . . āsādya:Literally, "when, having approached, they stood."

36. "The violent force of the expansion of his body" tasya jṛmbhitavikṣepāt: Literally, "from the agitation or shaking of his expansion or yawning." The phrase is ambiguous and its meaning less than transparent. We are in agreement with Cg, who understands jṛmbhita- in its sense of "enlargement or expansion." He glosses the compound with "the expansion of his contracted limbs (gātravināmavistarāt)." It may even be that, like other figures in the epic such as Kumbhakarṇa (6.49.4 and 6.53.46) and Hanumān (5.1.8,172; 5.2.13; 5.35.36; 5.37.53; 5.44.24; etc.), Rāvaṇa actually increases his physical proportions as a sign of anger or readiness for action. Among the translators, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 223) alone seems influenced by this interpretation, rendering, "The fury with which he shook himself and drew himself to his full height." Other commentators and translators have understood jṛmbhita in its other sense of "yawning, gaping," which we find rather inappropriate in this context. Ct, Ck, and Cr understand that a great wind accompanied by a loud roaring proceeds from the force of Rāvaṇa's yawn, which itself is a symptom of his fear and rage (bhayakrodhajaṃ yajjṛmbhitaṃ vijṛmbhaṇaṃ tadutthavikṣepāt saśabdamahāvāyupravṛttyā—so Ct, Ck).

"for he looked like an incarnation of the wrath that fills the body of Rudra" rūpavān iva rudrasya manyur gātreṣv adṛśyata: Literally, "he looked like the wrath in the limbs of Rudra that has taken a [physical] form." Our interpretation again follows that of Cg, who explains, "Rāvaṇa appeared like wrath itself, which has taken form in the body of Rudra in his aspect as the universal fire at the end of a cosmic age (rudrasya kālāgnirudrasya gātre yo rūpavān manyuḥ sa iva rāvaṇo 'lakṣyata)." The phrase also lends itself to the interpretation offered by Ck, Ct, and Cr, that is, "the wrath that appeared in his body was like the incarnate wrath of Rudra (tasya gātreṣu rūpavān rudrasya manyur iva manyur adṛśyata—so Cr)." Ct and Ck further indicate that the limbs in which anger physically manifests itself include the furrowed brow, the eyes, the face, etc. (bhrukuṭicakṣurmukhādiṣv adṛśyata).

37. Following verse 37, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1433*]: "And at Rāvaṇa's command, Yūpākṣa, Śoṇitākṣa, Prajaṅgha, and Kampana marched forth with the two sons of Kumbhakarṇa."

38. "Roaring like a lion" siṃhanādaṃ ca nādayan: Literally, "causing a lion's roar to sound." Commentators and the translators who follow them are divided as to whether Rāvaṇa is actually roaring or urging his rākṣasas to do so as they march forth. The participle is singular, which appears to favor the first of these alternatives advanced by Ck, Ct, and Cr. Ck and Ct indicate that Rāvaṇa roars in order to frighten the monkey troops (vānarānīkabhayāya svaṃ siṃhanādaṃ nādayan kurvañ śaśāsa). On the other hand, the verse, both grammatically and contextually, seems awkward if it is the poet's intention to represent the idea put forth by Ct. In the first place, there is no iti, or quotation mark, to indicate where Rāvaṇa's direct speech ends. Moreover, it is more common in the epic for warriors to utter leonine roars when actually marching forth to confront and challenge their enemies (see verse 39 below and 6.57.49, for example). It is for these reasons, perhaps, as well as the fact that in the very next verse the rākṣasas march forth "roaring," as if in compliance with their master's order, that Cv, Cm, Cr, and Cg argue that in this verse the singular is used to indicate the plural. Thus, they understand Rāvaṇa to be ordering the rākṣasas to roar as they march forth. (siṃhanādaṃ nādayan nādayantaḥ kurvanto gacchata. nādayann ity atra vyatayo bahulam [Pā 3.1.85] iti bahuvacanaviṣaya ekavacanam—so Cg.) This interpretation has been followed only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 223). The printed texts and editions of Cg, Cm, and Cr read instead nādayan gacchatātraiva jayadhvaṃ śīghram eva ca, "[Rāvaṇa] causing [them] to roar and [saying], 'Go, here and now you must quickly conquer.' "

"the lord of the rākṣasas" rākṣaseśvaraḥ: B1,D2,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead sa mahābalān, "he . . . those immensely powerful [rākṣasas]." Translations that follow the text of Ct render this variant. G2 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead sumahābalān, "those supremely powerful [rākṣasas]."

"at once" atraiva: Literally, "right here." Cg understands the adverb in its normal sense of location, glossing, "having started from this very house (asmin gṛha evārabhya)." B3,D9–11,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read adyaiva, "right now."

39. "at his command" coditās tena: Literally, "impelled or dispatched by him."

"their weapons glittering" jvalitāyudhāḥ: Literally, "having glittering or shining weapons." Cg believes that the mention of the glittering of the weapons is to show that the rākṣasas engage in some kind of weapons training or drill in the course of their battle marches (āyudhānāṃ jvalitatvaṃ yuddhāyātrāsu śikṣāviśeṣapradarśanāt). Evidently, his thinking is that the flashing of the weapons occurs as they are waved around in training or mock combat.

Following verse 39, northern manuscripts (V3,B1,D1–3[after 1435*]) insert lines 1–8, while southern manuscripts (D5–7,9–11,S) insert a passage of nine lines [1436*]: "Then the rākṣasas[1] illuminated the sky[2] on every side with the radiance of their ornaments and their own innate splendor as did the tawny monkeys with the fires they had set.[3][1–2] And there the radiance of the moon, lord of the stars, and of the stars, as well as the brilliance of the ornaments of the two armies, illuminated the heavens.[4][3–4] And thus the radiance of the moon, the brilliance of the ornaments, and the blazing light of the heavenly bodies[5] illuminated the armies of the tawny monkeys and the rākṣasas on every side.[5–6] And the ocean, with its restless waves, shone more[6] brightly still, illuminated as far as the underworld Pātāla[7] by the glare of the half-burnt[8] houses.[7–8] With its flags and banners and its splendid swords and battle-axes [the rākṣasa army . . .].[9]"

[1]"the rākṣasas . . . their" rakṣasām: Literally, "of the rākṣasas." As the verse stands, its only subject is "the tawny monkeys (harayaḥ)" in line 2. The context requires that the nominative rākṣasāḥ, "the rākṣasas," be carried over from the preceding verse.

[2]"the sky . . . the heavens" vyoma . . . dyām: The commentators disagree as to the exact referents of these two terms. Cr understands vyoma to refer to "space (ākāśam)," while

Ct understands, "the space between the two armies (senāmadhyākāśam)." Cr, on the other hand, understands dyām to refer to "the heavens (divam)," while Cg glosses, merely, "space (ākāśam)." Ct offers no comment on vyoma, presumably understanding it to mean "sky, heavens," while he glosses dyām as "the region of space situated between the two armies (senādvayamadhyagatākāśapradeśam)."

[3]"with the fires they had set" agnibhiḥ saha: Literally, "with the fires."

[4]"as well as [the brilliance] of the ornaments of the two armies, illuminated the heavens" tayor ābharaṇasthā ca balayor dyām abhāsayat: Printed editions of the text of Ct read instead tayor ābharaṇābhā ca jvalitā dyām abhāsayat, "and the blazing splendor of the ornaments of both of them illuminated the heavens."

[5]"the blazing light of the heavenly bodies" grahāṇāṃ jvalitā ca bhā: The texts and printed editions of Cm, Cg, and Cr read instead gṛhāṇāṃ jvalatāṃ ca bhā, "and the light of the blazing houses."

[6]"more" adhikam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead dhruvam, "extremely."

[7]"as far as the underworld Pātāla" saṃsaktapātālaḥ: Literally, "having Pātāla connected." We follow the interpretation of Cg, the only commentator to share the critical reading, who glosses, "connected with or pervaded as far as Pātāla (pātālaparyantaṃ saṃsaktaḥ)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 223), the only translator consulted to have this reading, renders, "illumined to its utmost depths in Pātāla." D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read -salilaḥ, "having water that is connected [with the light]."

[8]"And . . . half-burnt" cārdhapradīptānām: D7 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead cordhvapradīptānām, "and . . . blazing up."

40–41. "various types of foot soldiers" nānāpatti-: Cg explains that the various types of foot soldiers are differentiated by their uniforms, weapons, etc. (veṣāyudhādibhedāt).

"emerged into view" dadṛśe: Literally, "it saw." Verses 40–41 contain only one verbal element, the middle perfect, which, like the similar form śuśruve at 1425* (following verse 25 above), must be read as a passive, "it was seen."

"Its darts were flashing" jvalitaprāsam: Cg again believes that this is a description of a kind of weapons drill or training practiced during the march. See note to verse 39 above. Cr understands similarly. Our text of Ck understands that the weapons are flashing or blazing because of the friction of the whetstone (śāṇagharṣaṇāt). Ct claims to be quoting Ck but understands him to attribute the flashing of the weapons to the hail of arrows (bāṇavarṣaṇāt). The critical apparatus cites Ck with the former reading (śāṇagharṣaṇāt); it then quotes Ct, who in turn quotes Ck, with the latter reading (bāṇavarṣaṇāt). The critical editors then put the former reading in parentheses with a question mark.

42–44. "The soldiers, their arms covered with golden ornaments" hemajālācitabhujam: Literally, "its [the army's] arms covered with networks of gold." As Cg points out, the soldiers' arms are bound with masses of golden ornaments (hemābharaṇajālābaddhabhujam).

"swung their battle-axes" vyāveṣṭitaparaśvadham: The normal sense of vyāveṣṭita would be something like "wound around, swathed, wrapped." We follow the commentators (Ct, Cr, Ck) who share this reading and gloss cālita-, "moved about." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead vyāmiśrita-, which normally means "mixed, intermingled." Cm glosses this reading as "polished, honed (uttejita-). Cg, however, reads vyāveṣṭita- with Ct and glosses similarly. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 224) is the only translator to follow Cm, rendering, "polished."

"They had fixed their arrows to their bows" bāṇasaṃsaktakārmukam: Cg is concerned by the apparent redundancy here, since bows were listed among the rākṣasas' weapons in verse 40 above. He argues that we should understand that the reference is to spare bows that are worn on the warriors' backs for use in the event of the breakage of the bows mentioned earlier (yat pūrvoktaṃ kārmukaṃ tadbhañge punar ādātuṃ pṛṣṭhe baddham aparam idaṃ kārmukam iti jñeyam).

"and the honey-wine of their stirrup-cups" -madhūtseka-: Literally, "the pouring of honey-wine." We follow the interpretation of Cg, who glosses, "by the imbibing of the heroes' drink (vīrapāṇasevanena)." At 4.11.36, the commentators define "the hero's drink" as a drink warriors take before battle to increase their fortitude. See 4.11.36 and note. See 5.59–60; and note to 5.59.8. See Guruge 1960, p. 149.

"Seeing" dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen." We have taken all the adjectives describing the army in verses 42–44 as modifying "the army of the rākṣasas (balaṃ . . . rākṣasānām)," the object of the gerund in 44a. Alternatively, one could construe the adjectives in verses 42–43 with the nominative balam in 41a, and several of the translators consulted have done so.

"truly terrifying" sudāruṇam: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead durāsadam, "unassailable, irresistible."

"leapt forward, roaring" saṃcacāla . . . nanāda ca: Literally, "moved about and roared." We follow Cg, who glosses, "went toward [them] (abhimukhaṃ jagāma)." Ct and Ck understand, "moved about in Laṅkā (sañcacāla laṅkāyām iti śeṣaḥ)." Translators are divided in their understanding of the sense of the verb saṃcacāla. Dutt (1893, p. 1369), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1688), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 224) all understand, as do we, that the monkey army is on the move. Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 74), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 251), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 223), and Pagani (1999, p. 1078) understand the verb in its sense of "to tremble, be agitated."

45. "a moth" patañgaḥ: V2,3,D1,3,5–12,T1,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead the plural, "moths (patañgāḥ)."

46. "With . . . iron clubs—like bolts of lightning" -parighāśani: Literally, "iron club lightning bolts." The precise sense of the compound is not clear. Among the commentators, only Cg gives any hint of an interpretation, glossing, "their iron-club-thunderbolts (parighavajram)." The use of the synonym vajra for aśani suggests here that Cg reads the compound as a metaphor in the sense of iron clubs that were like thunderbolts or like [Indra's] vajra. Given the context of the verse, with its emphasis on the radiance of the army, we understand the term to be a compound metaphor, in which the clubs are being compared to bolts of lightning on the basis of the shared characteristic of brilliance. Translators offer three interpretations. Dutt (1893, p. 1369) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1688) understand aśani to be a type of weapon and so read the compound as a type of dvandva, "iron clubs and aśanis." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 251), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 223) and Pagani (1999, p. 1078), understands that the clubs are shooting forth bolts of lightning. In other words, they read the compound presumably as a tatpuruṣa in the sense of "the lightning bolts [issuing] from their iron clubs." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 224), like us, understands a compound metaphor but sees it focusing on the force of the clubs rather than on their brilliance. He renders, "iron clubs that could strike like thunder."

"burnished from the rubbing of their arms" teṣāṃ bhujaparāmarśavyāmṛṣṭa-: Literally, "wiped by the wiping of arms." Our translation follows the interpretation of Cg (cf. Cm on v.l. vyāmiśrita at verse 42–44 above), who glosses, "polished by the constant contact of [their] arms (santatabhujasparśenottejita-)." Among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 224) follows this interpretation, rendering, "polished by constant handling." Ct and Cr understand the adjective vyāmṛṣṭa in the same way that they did the adjective vyāveṣṭita in verse 42 above, that is, as "brandished, whirled about."

The majority of northern manuscripts, all devanāgarī manuscripts, and all southern manuscripts insert, in whole or in part, a passage of six lines [1443*]. D3,5–7,9–11,13,S place 1443* immediately following verse 46. Other manuscripts present a more complicated pattern of inclusion. Since virtually all manuscripts read this passage, its omission from the critical text is curious. See Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv. "In their eagerness to fight, the tawny monkeys leapt about as if they were crazed, smashing the night-roaming rākṣasas with trees, mountains, and fists.[1–2] But as the monkeys rushed about in this fashion, the rākṣasas, fearsome to behold,[1] violently hacked off their heads with sharp swords.[2] [3–4] And rākṣasas, their ears torn off by fangs, their heads broken with fists, and their bodies smashed by the blows of boulders, staggered about.[5–6]"

[1]"fearsome to behold" bhīmadarśanāḥ: Ñ2,V1,2,B2–4,D7,9–11,13,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bhīmavikramāḥ, "of fearsome valor."

[2]"monkeys . . . violently hacked off . . . with sharp swords" teṣāṃ kapīnām asibhiḥ śitaiḥ: Literally, "of the monkeys with sharp swords." D7,9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead harīṇāṃ niśitaiḥ śaraiḥ, "of the tawny monkeys with sharp arrows."

47. D9,G1,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg precede this verse with a similar verse in which the subject and object are reversed, so that the monkeys are described as killing the rākṣasas. The critical apparatus represents this as a repetition with variations, which leads to a fair amount of confusion. The verse is found at VSP 6.75.64, KK (1905) 6.75.64, and KK 6.75.63 and actually precedes the one found in the critical edition. As the verse occurs in VSP, KK, and KK (1905), it would mean: "Then some of the most distinguished among the monkeys slaughtered the heroes of the swift rākṣasas on every side (tathaivāpy apare teṣāṃ kapīnām abhilakṣitāḥ / pravīrān abhito jaghnū rākṣasānāṃ tarasvinām //)." It should be noted that, in KK, the second verse does not immediately follow this verse (KK 6.75.63), since that text alone admits a bracketed verse (KK 6.75.64 = 1446*) in which the rākṣasas, armed with various weapons, renew their assault on the monkeys. This intervening verse (1446*) is rendered in no translation consulted. GPP prints a bracketed and unnumbered version of what it considers the second verse, between its verses 6.75.64 and 65. In its footnote, GPP identifies this verse as an extra verse found in the text of Cg. The bracketed verse, however, is not an accurate rendering of the "second verse" but rather an error-filled version of the first. It reads the nominative harivīrāḥ for the correct accusative harivīrān, "heroes among the tawny monkeys." This verse also reads sitaiḥ [sic], "white," for śitaiḥ, "sharp." The actual variations that differentiate the second verse from the first are listed in the footnotes to GPP and, when reconstructed, would read similarly to the verse as found in KK and VSP discussed and translated above. This additional verse is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 224) as "The more valiant apes attacked and slew the most powerful of the Rākshasa veterans." In keeping with the order of the verses in KK and VSP, this verse precedes Raghunathan's rendition of our verse 47.

"Then . . . began to cut down" tathaivāpi . . . jaghnuḥ: Literally, "even so, they slew." This verse follows very poorly from the one that precedes it. It appears to presuppose 1443*, where the give and take of battle has already commenced. As noted above (see notes to verse 46), that passage should probably have been included in the critical text.

48. "The warriors on both sides cursed, bit, struck down, and killed one another." ghnantam anyaṃ jaghānānyaḥ pātayantam apātayat / garhamāṇaṃ jagarhānyo daśantam aparo 'daśat //: Literally, "One slew another who was slaying. [Another] knocked down one who was knocking down. Another reviled one who was reviling. Yet another bit one who was biting." A literal translation reads rather awkwardly in English, and we have therefore paraphrased and condensed the verse in translation. The verse does not make it perfectly clear whether the actions describe mutual hostilities between sets of two combatants or whether we see warriors attacking others who are engaged in assaulting third parties. The point, of course, is to show the general chaos and confusion of the melee.

49. "One cried, 'Attack!' 'He's attacking!' said another, while still a third cried, 'I'll attack!' " dehīty anyo dadāty anyo dadāmīty aparaḥ punaḥ: Literally, " 'Give,' [said] one. Another gives. Yet another [said], 'I give.' " In keeping, perhaps, with the poet's intention of rendering the chaos and confusion that are the hallmarks of the "fog of war," this verse is elliptical and somewhat obscure, so that it is difficult to be absolutely certain as to what is taking place. It is not clear, for example, whether the combatants are calling out to their opponents, their comrades, or both. We agree with Ct and Ck in supplying the word "battle (yuddham)" to flesh out the elliptical phrases containing the verb $\sqrt{dā}$, "to give." Cv and Cg similarly supply the word "blow (praharaṇam)," so that, according to these two sets of commentators, the verb here means "fight" or "strike." But, again, whether these commands are intended as challenges to a foe or exhortations to a friend is not clear. Translators generally opt for the former interpretation, whereas we incline toward the latter.

Following Cv and Cg, we also understand an implicit quotation mark (iti) after dadāti, "he gives." This thus becomes one of the things shouted on the battlefield. Most of the translators consulted do not follow this interpretation and thus take this as a reference to someone actually striking or attacking. We tend to understand it as a shouted warning to one's comrade that one of the enemies is about to strike.

" 'Did you wound him?' 'Stand!' " kiṃ kleśayasi tiṣṭheti: Literally, "Do you harm or torment? Stand!" Again the meaning is obscure. Cv and Cg understand the question to be "Have you fatigued yourself through your exertions? (ātmānam āyāsena kiṃ kleśayasi.)" They then understand the imperative tiṣṭha, "stop, stay," to be an exhortation to the weary to rest. This interpretation appears to have been followed by most of the translators consulted, with the exception of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 224), who seems to take it as a taunting remark addressed to an enemy: "Don't you worry, just wait." It seems somewhat odd and tortured syntactically to us to take the causative of √kliś, "to be tormented," reflexively with ātmānam, "self," as Cv and Cg have, and we have therefore chosen to understand the question to be directed to an ally concerning whether he has gotten his man, as it were. We also understand an implicit quotation mark (iti) after kleśayasi, thus separating it from the imperative form tiṣṭha, "stay." We understand this latter to be directed either to a friend to hold his place in battle or, as is often the case in the epic, to a foe to challenge him not to stand and fight.

Following verse 49, D9–11,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [1448*], which construes grammatically with verse 50, adding two adjectival phrases describing the battle: "with weapons broken[1] and armor and arms abandoned.[2]"

[1]"with weapons broken" vipralambhitaśastram: Literally, "with weapons violated or deceived." The compound is obscure as none of the normal meanings of vi + pra √lambh, "to deceive, violate, trick," seems to apply convincingly to weapons. Translators who follow this reading have offered all sorts of interpretations, including "scattered about" (Dutt 1893, p. 1370), "souillés" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 251), "stained" (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 223), and "dodged" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1689). Pagani (1999, p. 1078) paraphrases, "Dans ce tourbillon d'épées."

G3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead vipralambitavastram, "with hanging or trailing garments." Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 224) renders this reading.

[2]"armor and arms abandoned" vimuktakavacāyudham: Literally, "with its released armor and weapons." Cr understands, "in which weapons had been shot into suits of armor (vimuktāni kavaceṣv āyudhāni yasmin)." This idea has been followed only by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1689).

50. "amid a welter of fists, lances, and swords" muṣṭiśūlāsisaṃkulam: Literally, "crowded with fists, lances, and swords." D13,G,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, and Cv read yaṣṭi-, "clubs," in place of muṣṭi-, "fists." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -kuntalam for -saṃkulam, "crowded." The word is obscure in this context. Its normal meanings are "the hair of the head," "a drinking cup," and "a plough." The last of these is a possible reading, since hala, or "ploughshare," is the name of a weapon mentioned occasionally (e.g., 6.59.103 and note). This is the interpretation Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 251) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 223) follow. We are inclined to understand the term as a variant of kunta, "a kind of lance, barbed dart, or spear." In this we agree with the translator of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1689). See 6.66.4–5 and note.

51. "The rākṣasas cut down the monkeys ten and seven at a time" vānarān daśa sapteti rākṣasā abhyapātayan: Although the critical apparatus does not clearly indicate this, pādas ab do not appear in the text of Ct. GPP reads it in brackets between 6.76.68 and 69. The apparatus merely notes that "B (ed.) [= GPP] reads 51cd [erroneous for bc]."

52. "cut off" ālambya: Literally, "having seized or overcome."

"whose hair and drawstrings were flying loose" visrastakeśarasanam: The critical reading is a peculiar one both textually and contextually. The critical apparatus shows minimal support for the reading -rasanam (rasanā), "rope, girdle." And its appropriateness in this context is questionable. The vast majority of manuscripts collated for the critical edition, as well as printed editions, read either -vasanam or -vastram, "clothing," at the end of this compound. The manuscript evidence is complicated. The text of Ct reads instead vipralambhitavastraṃ ca. The term vipralambhita-, as noted above (note to verse 49, 1448*), is somewhat obscure. Translators who follow the text of Ct generally understand the compound to mean "having their clothing in disorder or soiled." The printed texts of Cg and Cm read visrastakeśavasanam, "having their hair and garments flying loose."

Sarga 63

1. "In the thick of that fearsome slaughter of heroes" pravṛtte saṃkule tasmin ghore vīrajanakṣaye: Literally, "as that dense and fearsome destruction of heroic folk was going on."

"the heroic rākṣasa Kampana" kaṃpanaṃ vīram: Literally, "the hero Kampana."

2. "struck first, hitting him" tāḍayāmāsa . . . pūrvam: Literally, "he struck first."

"Aṅgada staggered" sa cacāla: Literally, "he shook or moved."

3. "powerful Aṅgada" saḥ . . . tejasvī: Literally, "he, the powerful one."

"hurled" cikṣepa: Literally, "he threw or tossed." Cg understands that we are to supply the words "at Kampana's chest (kaṃpanorasīti śeṣaḥ)."

Following verse 3, Ñ,D3–7,9–11,13,S (V1,2,B2,4 after 1456*; B3 after 1457*) insert a passage of sixty-three lines [App. I, No. 43]: "Then, when Śoṇitākṣa saw that Kampana had been slain in battle,[1] he scattered the armies of the swift monkeys and then swiftly pursued them in order to destroy them.[1][2–3] In his chariot, he swiftly and fearlessly bore down upon Aṅgada.[4] He quickly pierced Aṅgada with sharp and fierce arrows, which rent his body and looked like the fire at the end of a cosmic age.[5–6] Valorous Aṅgada, Vālin's son, was riddled with many sharp arrows of every kind.[2] Some were tipped with razors, while others were horseshoe headed. Some were made entirely of iron, while others had heads like calves' teeth or herons' feathers. Some had heads equipped with earlike blades, and others had long heads or heads like the tips of karavīra leaves.[3][7–9] Nonetheless, that powerful monkey[4] crushed Śoṇitākṣa's[5] fearsome[6] bow, chariot, and arrows.[10] But then, without hesitation, swift Śoṇitākṣa quickly grabbed his sword and shield, and leapt swiftly into the sky.[7][11–12] Mighty Aṅgada, however, springing up more swiftly still, caught him, and, wresting away his sword with his hand,[8] he roared.[13–14] Then Aṅgada, that elephant among monkeys, brought the sword down forcefully[9] on the flat surface of his shoulder[10] and slashed him diagonally from shoulder to hip.[11][15–16] Clutching that great sword and roaring again and again, Vālin's son pursued other foes in the forefront of battle.[17–18] But then, in a rage, the mighty hero Prajaṅgha, accompanied by Yūpākṣa, charged the immensely powerful son of Vālin in his chariot.[12][19–20] At the same time, the hero Śoṇitākṣa, with his golden armlets, recovered and, seizing an iron mace, charged him as well.[21–22] Standing between the two of them, Śoṇitākṣa and Prajaṅgha, that greatest of monkeys looked like the full moon between the twin stars of the constellation Viśākhā.[13][23–24] Mainda and Dvivida, who were guarding Aṅgada,[14] stood close by him, eager to watch.[15][25–26] Then, in anger, the huge, enormously powerful rākṣasas, making a supreme effort, charged the monkeys, wielding swords, arrows,[16] and maces.[27–28] A great and hair-raising battle took place between the three monkey lords, on the one hand, and the three bulls among rākṣasas, on the other, as they engaged one another.[17][29–30] The monkeys[18] tore up trees and hurled them in battle, but immensely powerful Prajañgha cut them down[19] with his sword.[31–32] Next, they pelted the chariots and horses[20] of their foes[21] with trees and mountains in battle. But immensely powerful[22] Yūpākṣa cut them down with torrents of arrows.[33–34] Meanwhile, with his mace, the valorous and mighty Śoṇitākṣa broke in half[23] the trees that Mainda and Dvivida had torn up and hurled.[35–36] Then, raising a huge sword that could rend an enemy's vitals, Prajañgha ran swiftly toward Vālin's son.[37–38] Seeing him approach, the exceedingly mighty[24] monkey lord struck him with an aśvakarṇa tree.[39–40] Then he struck his sword arm with his fist. That blow of Vālin's son caused the sword to fall to the ground.[41–42] When he saw that his sword, which resembled a cudgel,[25] had fallen to the ground, the immensely powerful rākṣasa[26] clenched his fist, which was like adamant.[43–44] Then the immensely powerful rākṣasa[27] struck the mighty Añgada, bull among monkeys, on the forehead, so that he staggered for a moment.[45–46] Coming to his senses, the powerful, valorous, and mighty son of Vālin knocked Prajañgha's head from his body.[28] [47–48] When his paternal uncle Prajañgha[29] had been slain in battle, Yūpākṣa's eyes filled with tears. His arrows expended, he swiftly descended from his chariot and drew his sword.[49–50] Seeing Yūpākṣa rushing toward him, Dvivida, hastening, struck him on the chest in anger. Then that mighty monkey[30] seized him violently.[51–52] When mighty[31] Śoṇitākṣa saw that his brother had been caught, the immensely powerful[32] rākṣasa struck Dvivida on the chest.[53–54] Then[33] the mighty monkey[34] staggered when he was struck by that rākṣasa.[35] But when the mace was raised once more, he grabbed it.[55–56] At that moment heroic Mainda, leader of the monkey troops [57] [and powerful, struck Yūpākṣa in the chest with his palm.[15*][36]] Then Śoṇitākṣa and Yūpākṣa, who were faster than the two monkeys, began to drag and throw them about violently in combat.[58–59] But mighty Dvivida ripped open Śoṇitākṣa's face with his claws and then, hurling him swiftly to the ground, crushed him.[60–61] Meanwhile, Mainda, leader of the monkey troops,[37]in a towering rage, crushed Yūpākṣa in his arms so that he fell to the ground, slain.[62–63]"

[1]Ñ2,V1,B4,D3–7,9–11,S omit lines 2–3.

[2]"with . . . arrows of every kind": The phrase has been added to facilitate breaking up the long list of the various types of arrows into manageable syntactical units.

[3]Like many of the translators consulted, we have relied on the commentators for the identification of these various types of arrows. See Glossary of Weapons. See, too, Dutt (1893, p. 1371, notes a–h).

[4]"powerful monkey" balī: Literally, "the powerful one."

[5]"Śoṇitākṣa's . . . bow" dhanuḥ: Literally, "the bow."

[6]"fearsome" ugram: G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead agryam, "splendid, magnificent."

[7]"leapt swiftly into the sky" utpapāta divaṃ kṣipram: D7,G1,2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read kruddhaḥ, "in a rage," for kṣipram, "swiftly." D3,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read tadā kruddhaḥ, "then, in a rage," for divaṃ kṣipram, "swiftly into the sky."

[8]"caught him, and, wresting away the sword with his hand" parāmṛśya . . . kareṇa tasya taṃ khaḍgaṃ samācchidya: There is a slight ambiguity as to whether to construe kareṇa, "with his hand," with the gerund parāmṛśya, "having caught," or samācchidya, "having wrested." Cr, the only commentator to address this issue, takes the former position, understanding that Aṅgada seized Śoṇitākṣa with his hand. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1690) and Dutt (1893, p. 1371) read as we do. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 225) ignores the words parāmṛśya, "having seized," and kareṇa, "hand." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 253), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 224), reads the gerunds in senses that seem inappropriate to the context. They understand parāmṛśya to mean that Aṅgada withstood the violent impact of Śoṇitākṣa's leap and kareṇa . . . samācchidya to mean that he broke the former's sword with his hand. Pagani (1999, p. 1079) follows Roussel in her reading of parāmṛśya but understands kareṇa . . . samācchidya as we do.

[9]"brought . . . down forcefully" nijaghāna: Literally, "he struck."

[10]"on the flat surface of his shoulder" tasyāṃsaphalake: The phrase is incorrectly printed in both KK (1905) (6.76.10; tasyāṃ saphalake) and GPP (6.76.10; tasyāṃ sa phalake). Commentators gloss, "on that flat or broad surface that has the form of the shoulder (aṃsarūpe phalake—Ct)."

[11]"diagonally from shoulder to hip" yajñopavītavat: Literally, "like a sacred thread." The reference is to the braided cord traditionally worn across one shoulder and under the opposing arm by initiated males of the three higher varṇas of the vedic brahmanical social system. See note to 6.68.29.

[12]The textual evidence for lines 19–20 is very complicated. The problem lies in the fact that a number of manuscripts and the printed editions of Ct, including GPP, repeat these lines, with some variations, after line 22. The critical apparatus has condensed these four verses into two, creating a version that no text or manuscript knows.

The text of GPP reads as follows:

prajaṅghasahito vīro yūpākṣas tu tato balī / (= line 19 variant)
rathenābhiyayau kruddho vāliputraṃ mahābalam // (= line 20) [= GPP 6.76.12]

Then, in a rage, the mighty hero Yūpākṣa, accompanied by Prajaṅgha, charged the immensely powerful son of Vālin in his chariot.

[lines 21–22 = GPP 6.76.13] prajaṅghas tu mahāvīro yūpākṣahito balī / (= line 19)

gadayābhiyayau kruddho vāliputraṃ mahābalam // [= GPP 6.76.14]

Then, in a rage, the mighty hero Prajaṅgha accompanied by Yūpākṣa charged the immensely powerful son of Vālin with his mace.

KK (1905) and VSP read only the first of these verses (= KK (1905) and VSP 6.76.13) but read it after line 22. KK reads both verses as its verses 6.76.13 and 14, placing verse 14 in brackets, with the notation that it is found in only one of its manuscript sources. Like KK (1905) and VSP, KK reads these verses after line 22. Translations following the text of Ct translate the sequence as indicated in GPP. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 225) follows the text of VSP.

[13]"between the twin stars of the constellation Viśākhā" viśākhayor madhyagataḥ: Literally, "placed in the middle of the two Viśākhās. Viśākhā is the sixteenth of the lunar mansions, or nakṣatras, and consists of two stars. See 6.4.45; 6.90.30; and notes.

[14]"who were guarding Aṅgada" aṅgadaṃ parirakṣantau: Cg indicates that their special concern derives from the fact that they are his maternal uncles (mātulatvād iti bhāvaḥ).

[15]"eager to watch" parasparadidṛkṣayā: Literally, "out of a desire to see one another." The compound is slightly obscure in its meaning. Commentators and translators have offered a variety of interpretations. Ck and Ct, whom we more or less follow, understand, "out of desire to witness the occasion of battle (yuddhāvasaradidṛkṣayā). This interpretation is represented in the translation of Dutt (1893, p. 1372). Cg, Cm, and Ct (second interpretation) understand, "out of a desire to know if there are any rākṣasa opponents who are a match for themselves (svānurūpapratibhaṭarākṣasajijñāsayā)." This interpretation appears to inform Raghunathan's translation (1982, vol. 3, p. 226): "who . . . were ready to take on any one of the foe who was worthwhile." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 254) and Pagani (1999, p. 1079) understand the compound to mean that the two monkeys were on the alert (Pagani) or prepared for any eventuality (Roussel).

[16]"arrows" -bāṇa-: D5,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead -carma-, "shield."

[17]"A great and hair-raising battle took place between the three monkey lords, on the one hand, and the three bulls among rākṣasas, on the other, as they engaged one another." trayāṇāṃ vānarendrāṇāṃ tribhī rākṣasapuṃgavaiḥ / saṃsaktānāṃ mahadyuddham abhavad romaharṣaṇam //: Literally, "there was a great hair-raising battle of three monkey lords who were engaged with three bulls among rākṣasas."

[18]"The monkeys" te: Literally, "they."

[19]"cut them down" praticiccheda: D3,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead praticikṣepa, "he repulsed, warded off."

[20]"horses" aśvān: D3,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sarvān, "all."

[21]"of their foes": The words have been added.

[22]"immensely powerful" mahābalaḥ: D5,T1,G1,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead niśācaraḥ, "the night-roaming rākṣasa."

[23]"broke in half" babhañja . . . madhye: Literally, "it broke in the middle."

[24]"exceedingly mighty" mahābalaḥ . . . atibalaḥ: Literally, "immensely powerful . . . exceedingly powerful."

[25]"a cudgel" musala-: G,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead utpala, "blue lotus."

[26]"the immensely powerful rākṣasa" mahābalaḥ: Literally, "the immensely powerful one."

[27]"the immensely powerful rākṣasa" mahātejāḥ: Literally, "the immensely powerful one."

[28]"mighty . . . knocked . . . from his body" kāyāt pātayāmāsa vīryavān: Literally, "the mighty one caused [it] to fall from the body." Ñ,V1,2,B2–4,D3,4,9–11,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read muṣṭinā, "with [his] fist," for vīryavān, "mighty." D5,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead khaḍgenāpātayat kṣitau, "he made it fall to the ground with the sword."

[29]"paternal uncle Prajañgha" pitṛvye: Literally, "paternal uncle." Ck clarifies by supplying the name.

[30]"that mighty monkey" balī: Literally, "the mighty one."

[31]"mighty" mahābalaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the accusative mahābalam, making the adjective modify Añgada.

[32]"immensely powerful" mahātejāḥ: D5,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead gadāgreṇa, "with the tip of [his] mace."

[33]"Then" tadā: D5,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead gadā-, "[struck by] the mace."

[34]"the mighty monkey" mahābalaḥ: Literally, "the mighty one."

[35]"by that rākṣasa" tena: Literally, "by that one."

[36]"At that moment heroic Mainda, leader of the monkey troops [57] [and powerful, struck Yūpākṣa in the chest with his palm [15*].]" etasminn antare vīro maindo vānara-yūthapaḥ / [57] yūpākṣaṃ tāḍayāmāsa talenorasi vīryavān // [15*]: The critical edition, as it has reconstructed the passage, presents us with a line [57] that is a mere sentence fragment and that cannot be construed with either the preceding or the following lines. It is found isolated in this fashion in no known version of the text. Manuscript evidence presents three variations:

1) Ñ,V1,2,B2–4,D3,4,6,7,9,13,T2,3,G1,2,M5 omit the line entirely, and this probably should have been the critical editors' choice as well.
2) D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct remedy the fragment by substituting, for the second half of the line, "He [Mainda] came near Dvivida (dvividābhyāśam āgamat)."
3) D5,T1,G3,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read an additional line [15*], completing the verse. Both lines (57 and 15*) appear as verse 6.76.32 in KK, and 6.76.31 in KK (1905) and VSP. Both lines also occur in GPP as an unnumbered verse between 6.76.31 and 32. Line 57 occurs as mentioned in 2 above. Line 15* is placed in brackets with the notation that it is an extra line found in the text of Cg. The notes make no mention of the variants found in line 57. Line 57 alone appears in 6.76.32ab in NSP. Gita Press reads a mixed verse, juxtaposing the reading of 2 above with line 15* as its 6.76.32.

Given the confused textual state of the critical edition here, we have opted to include 15* for the sake of readability, although perhaps the best textual choice would be to omit line 57 entirely.

[37]"leader of the monkey troops" vānarayūthapaḥ: D3,9–11,G2,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -puṃgavaḥ, "bull," for -yūthapaḥ, "leader."

4. "the rākṣasa troops . . . them" sā . . . camūm: Literally, "it . . . the army."

"ran headlong" jagāmābhimukhī: Literally, "it went facing."

"Kumbha, Kumbhakarṇa's son" kumbhakarṇasutaḥ: Literally, "Kumbhakarṇa's son."

Following verse 4, many northern and southern manuscripts insert, in whole or in part, a passage of four lines [1458*]. D6,7,9–11,S insert only lines 2–4: "Having determined to demonstrate his valor, he calmed them with his words.[1] Then, seeing that the army had had its champions slain by the immensely powerful leaping monkeys who had seized their opportunity,[1] the powerful and outstanding rākṣasa Kumbha[2] performed all-but-impossible feats in battle.[2–4]"

[1]"who had seized their opportunity" labdhalakṣaiḥ: See notes to 6.56.11 and 6.57.42.

[2]"the . . . outstanding rākṣasa Kumbha" utkṛṣṭam . . . rakṣaḥ . . . kumbhaḥ: We have followed Ct and Cr, who understand the three terms to be in apposition. Cr glosses, "utkṛṣṭa means 'great'; the rākṣasa is Kumbha (utkṛṣṭaṃ mahad rakṣaḥ kumbhaḥ)." Most of the translations consulted construe the adjective similarly. Although this is not completely persuasive, the only plausible alternative, which is to construe the adjective utkṛṣṭam with karma in line 4, is a bit of a syntactic stretch.

6. "as if it were a second bow of Indra, illumined by the splendor of lightning and a great rainbow" vidyudairāvatārciṣmad dvitīyendradhanur yathā: Literally, "like a second bow of Indra, possessed of luster through lightning and airāvata." The simile is not transparent. Commentators and translators read the compound vidyudairāvatārciṣmat variously. The problem is that several of the terms used are polysemic in their reference to a variety of mythological and/or meteorological phenomena associated with the divinity Indra in his capacity as an atmospheric or storm god. Particularly ambiguous here is the term airāvata. In its masculine form, the term is a proper noun referring to Indra's great white battle-elephant. Among the commentators, Ct and Ck refer to this sense of the term, appearing to understand that the name of the elephant derives from its association with Indra's bow, which is, of course, a kenning for the rainbow. The idea here is, as Ct makes clear by quoting the Vaijayantī lexicon, that airāvata is primarily the name of a long and straight type of rainbow, in other words, a natural phenomenon. (airāvato 'bhramātaṅgas tasyendradhanuṣā saṃbandhāt. indrāyudhaṃ tv indradhanus tad evarju rohitam. airāvatam ṛjudīrghendradhanus tad yuktaṃ ca. svābhāvikam indradhanur ity arthaḥ—so Ct.) Ct quotes Cm to the effect that this particular atmospheric phenomenon appears as a portent of calamity (etac cotpātakāle bhavatīty artha iti tīrthaḥ).

Cr understands the term airāvata to refer specifically to Indra's elephant and reads the simile as follows: "The arrow stands in the place of the lightning and the [large] body of the rākṣasa, in the place of Airāvata (vidyutsthānīyaḥ śara airāvatasthānīyo rākṣasadeha upamānasambandhaḥ)." This interpretation is cited in Pagani's note to the passage (1999, p. 1669).

Cg and Cm, like Ct and Ck, cite Vaijayantī to support their understanding that the term airāvata refers to the particular type of rainbow mentioned above. They read the figure as follows: "Lightning stands in the place of the bowstring, while the airāvata rainbow is the object of comparison of the bow itself (jyāsthanīyā vidyud bāṇasthānīyam airāvatam)." The meaning, according to Cm, is that Kumbha's bow had a radiance similar to that of the airāvata rainbow together with lightning (vidyutsahitairāvatasadṛśadyutimat kumbhadhanuḥ). Both Cr and Cg indicate that such a combined phenomenon is either a sign of some unusual portent or an imaginary object of comparison (airāvatādisaṃyoga utpātakāle bhavaty abhūtopamā vā—so Cg). Cm's comments are quoted by Ct as noted above. We believe that this reading of the figure, which we have followed, is supported by the simpler northern variant seen in the text of Gorresio (6.55.40): vidyudbhir āvṛtaṃ vyomni śakracāpam ivāparam, "like a second bow of Śakra, encircled by lightning in the sky."

All translators who read with the critical edition, with the exception of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 227), who renders, "the extended rainbow," understand the term airāvata to refer to Indra's elephant. See verse 35 and note.

7. "beautifully feathered . . . arrow" patriṇā patravāsasā: Literally, "with a feathered one that had feathers for its garments."

8. "who resembled a mountain peak" adrikūṭābhaḥ: Ñ,V1,2,B,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read trikūṭābhaḥ, "who resembled Mount Trikūṭa."

"lost his footing" vipramuktapadaḥ: Literally, "whose feet were released." Ck and Ct understand that Dvivida has splayed or stretched his feet (prasāritaṃ padaṃ yena saḥ). Cr understands that his feet were stumbling (praskhalite pade pādau yasya saḥ). Cg glosses, "with feeble footsteps (śithilapadavinyāsaḥ)."

"dazed and twitching" sphuran . . . vihvalaḥ: Literally, "trembling . . . dazed." D9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the participle vihvalan, "shaking, trembling," for the adjective vihvalaḥ, "dazed."

10. "The immensely powerful Mainda" mahābalaḥ: Literally, "the immensely powerful one."

11. "tipped with a splendid arrowhead" sumukham: Literally, "having a fine tip."

"the immensely powerful rākṣasa" mahātejāḥ: Literally, "the immensely powerful one."

13. "two . . . had fallen" patitau: D7,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mathitau, "crushed or afflicted."

"who stood with bow drawn" udyatakārmukam: Literally, "whose bow was drawn or raised."

14. "As Aṅgada rushed upon him . . . him" tam āpatantam: Literally, "him, who was rushing."

"iron shafts" āyasaiḥ: Literally, "with things [made] of iron." See 6.3.12; 6.53.12; 6.55.47; and notes. See, too, 5.39.11; 5.51.38; and notes.

"with javelins" tomaraiḥ: We normally translate this term as "iron cudgels," but the nature of the trope here requires one to take the term in the second of the senses that Dikshitar (1944, p. 107) assigns to it, i.e., "javelins." See 6.58.10 and note. Cg glosses, "with elephant goads (aṅkuśaiḥ)." The context, however, seems to be more of a battle in which warriors attempt to stop a charging elephant with spears rather than one in which an elephant keeper seeks to goad or prompt his mount. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 255), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 226) and Pagani (1999, p. 1081), reads the term outside the simile, understanding that Kumbha throws, in addition to his arrows, three spears at Aṅgada, but this seems an improbable reading.

15. "various" vividhaiḥ: Ñ,V1,2,B2,4,D4,7,9–11,G, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bahubhiḥ "many."

"their tips honed to razor sharpness, their cutting edges keen" akuṇṭhadhārair niśitais tīkṣṇaiḥ: The sequence of adjectives is somewhat puzzling, since all three mean "sharp." Cg exploits the polysemy that characterizes many Sanskrit lexemes to avoid the apparent redundancy. He glosses akuṇṭhadhāraiḥ, literally, "of unblunted edges," with "whose tips were not broken (abhagnāgraiḥ)"; niśitaiḥ, "honed," with "excellent (utkṛṣṭaiḥ)"; and tīkṣṇaiḥ, "sharp," with "made of iron (ayomayaiḥ)." For this last gloss, he cites the Ratnamālā, which lists loha, "iron," among the meanings of tīkṣṇa (tīkṣṇaṃ gare mṛdhe loha iti ratnamālā). See note to 6.2.14.

16. "Kumbha's" tasya: Literally, "his."

17. "all those trees" tān sarvān: Literally, "all of them." The context and the grammar demand, as Cr and Cg note, that we supply the word "trees (tarūn—so Cr)."

"everything that was thrown by Vālin's son" vāliputrasamīritān: Literally, "hurled by Vālin's son."

18. Following verse 18, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1464*]: "His blood began to flow and both his eyes were blinded."

19. "with one hand . . . with the other" pāṇinā . . . ekena . . . pāṇinā: Literally, "with a hand . . . with one hand."

Following verse 19, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1466*]: "Pressing it down, trunk and all, with his chest and grasping it firmly with his hand, he bent it down a little way and then tore it up, as might an elephant.[1]"

[1]"as might an elephant" yathā gajaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahāraṇe, "in the great battle."

Ct and Cr, probably in anticipation of verse 20, where the tree is compared to Indra's flagstaff, understand that, through the various actions described here, Aṅgada, after bending down the slender trunk, strips the tree of its leaves and smaller branches (sūkṣmaśākhāṃ kiṃcid avanamyonmamātha niṣpatraṃ kṛtavān—so Ct). This idea is reflected in a number of translations that follow the commentary of Ct. Ck, however, thinks that the monkey first spreads the tree together with its branches across his chest, then, with one hand, bends its delicate trunk and then releases it (saskandham enaṃ sālam urasi neveśyaikena kareṇa saṃparkasūkṣmaśākhāṃ kiṃcid avanamyonmamātha taṃ samut[?]sṛjat [sic]).

20–21. "even as he was about to . . . hurl that tree . . . Kumbha cut him down" tam . . . vṛkṣam . . . samutsṛjantam . . . ciccheda: Literally, "he cut down him who was releasing the tree." The two verses, as they stand in the critical edition, appear to collapse the normal sequence of actions in this type of encounter. Almost invariably the rākṣasa cuts down the weapon flung by a monkey before striking his opponent with his arrows. The use of the present participle samutsṛjantam, "releasing," and the lack of any reference to the tree's flying through the air or being struck down have led us to read the verbal adjective inceptively. The context of 21cd and following makes it very clear that it is Aṅgada himself who has been struck down. D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the finite samutsṛjata (corrected by Ct and Cr to samudasṛjata). This variant allows one to read the two verses as separate syntactic units and to supply the expected object vṛkṣam, "tree," for the verb ciccheda, "he cut," in verse 21, where no explicit object is given. This explanation is given by Ct and Cr. This reading, however, leads to a serious contextual problem, for if only the tree has been hit, why then does Aṅgada collapse in agony and faint? Cr explains as follows: "He, that is Kumbha, with seven arrows cut down the tree [the word being supplied]. It is for that very reason that Aṅgada, his weapon in the form of a tree having been cut down, was agonized. It is for that reason, in turn, that he fell and fainted. (sa kumbhaḥ saptabhir bāṇaiś ciccheda vṛkṣam iti śeṣaḥ. ata eva sa cheditavṛkṣarūpāyudho 'ṅgado vivyathe. ata eva papāta mumoha ca.)" As improbable as this explanation, in which so formidable a warrior-hero as Aṅgada collapses and faints at the loss of a tree, may seem, it has been largely adopted by translators who follow the text of Ct and Cr. Ck, who reads with Ct, is evidently disturbed at this improbability and claims that it is instead the endlessly repeated battles that have caused Aṅgada to suffer as described and that we must add words to this effect (abhīkṣṇaṃ vivyatha iti punaḥ punaḥ kriyamāṇena yuddheneti śeṣaḥ). This explanation, too, is far from convincing.

"In great agony" vivyathe 'bhīkṣṇam: Literally, "he was greatly pained."

22. "in agony" vyathitam: Ñ2,V2,B2,3,D9–11,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead patitam, "fallen."

"drowning as it were in the ocean" sīdantam iva sāgare: Literally, "as if sinking in the sea." D6,9–11,T2,3,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the accusative sāgaram for the critical text's locative sāgare, which yields the rather awkward sense of "like a sinking ocean." Translators who follow the text of Ct have generally understood the reference to be to the ebbing tide or the calming of the waves. In either case, the reading is poor and the interpretation unconvincing.

23. "had been gravely wounded" vyathitam: Literally, "pained, agonized."

24. "who stood with bow drawn" udyatakārmukam: See note to verse 13 above.

27. "as a barrage of trees might stop a rushing stream" nageneva jalāśayam: Literally, "like a body of water by something immovable (naga)." We agree with Cg and Ct, who gloss jalāśayam, normally, "pond, ocean," in the sense of "stream or current of water (jalapravāham)." The precise sense of the word naga, literally, "that which does not move," is uncertain here, since the term serves as a kenning for both "mountain" and "tree." Ct chooses the former alternative and in this is followed by all translators consulted who share this reading. They understand the term to refer to either a mountain or a rock ("a barrage of stones" [Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 228]). Cr and Cg take the term in the latter sense. Cg, moreover, suggests that the word "tree" here refers to a mass of trees (vṛkṣaughaparo 'yaṃ śabdaḥ), and we have followed his suggestion. Perhaps the reference is to a logjam or a wooden dam.

28. "that mass of arrows" bāṇacayam: Ś2,Ñ,V,B,D2–5,8–13,T1,G1,3,M3, and all printed editions consulted read -patham, "path or range," for -cayam, "mass."

"get past it" ativartitum: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the improbable api vīkṣitum, "[unable] even to see." Translators who follow the text of Ct struggle with this awkward reading, often adding some verb with the sense of "to transgress or get past" in order to make sense of the otherwise opaque simile.

"the ocean, the great reservoir of the waters" mahodadhiḥ: Literally, "the great receptacle of waters."

29–30. "he stepped in front of Aṅgada" aṅgadaṃ pṛṣṭhataḥ kṛtvā: Literally, "having placed Aṅgada at his back." Translators understand the sense of this phrase variously. Dutt (1893, p. 1375) understands that Sugrīva actually takes Aṅgada on his back, but this seems unreasonable as such a burden would materially impair Sugrīva's ability to fight. Furthermore, for the remainder of the sarga, there is no reference to Aṅgada being on Sugrīva's back. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 256) and Pagani (1999, p. 1082) understand the phrase to mean that Sugrīva leaves Aṅgada behind or abandons him. This, too, seems improbable. Our understanding is that Sugrīva, seeing that the monkey troops have failed to rescue Aṅgada and anticipating that Kumbha will now administer the coup de grâce to his fallen nephew, interposes himself between Aṅgada and Kumbha to shield the former as he launches his own attack. This idea is evidently shared by Cg, who, after quoting the phrase, remarks, "the sense is that otherwise he [Kumbha] would kill [Aṅgada] (anyathā hanyād iti bhāvaḥ)."

"Sugrīva . . . he . . . rushed swiftly upon Kumbha in battle" abhidudrāva vegena sugrīvaḥ kumbham āhave: Ś2,Ñ,V,B1–3,D1–4,8–13,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead abhidudrāva sugrīvaḥ kumbhakarṇātmajaṃ raṇe, "Sugrīva rushed upon Kumbhakarṇa's son in battle."

"roaming the mountain slopes" śailasānucaram: Cg is of the opinion that ranging the mountain slopes makes elephants especially powerful. He supports this claim by citing a verse from Kālidāsa's Abhijñānaśākuntalam (2.4) in which an especially powerful character is likened to a mountain-ranging elephant. (śailasānucaratvenātibalam. giricara iva nāgaḥ prāṇasāraṃ bibhartīti kālidāsokteḥ.)

31. "The immensely powerful Sugrīva . . . and" ca mahābalaḥ: Literally, "the immensely powerful one . . . and." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sa mahākapiḥ, "the great monkey."

"huge mountains" mahāśailān: D6,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the redundant mahāvṛkṣān, "huge trees."

"aśvakarṇas, dhavas" aśvakarṇān dhavān: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead aśvakarṇādikān, "aśvakarṇas, etc."

32. "But with his sharp arrows" niśitaiḥ śaraiḥ: Literally, "with sharp arrows." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead svaśaraiḥ śitaiḥ, "with his own arrows that were sharp."

"majestic" śrīmān: D6,7,T2,3,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cr, Cm, and Cg read instead śīghram, "quickly."

33. "Completely riddled" ācitāḥ: Literally, "heaped up." We agree with Cg, who glosses, "completely covered with no gaps (sarvato nīrandhratayā vyāptāḥ)." D7,9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead arditāḥ, "afflicted, broken."

"with sharp arrows by that fierce and celebrated marksman, Kumbha" abhilakṣyeṇa tīvreṇa kumbhena niśitaiḥ śaraiḥ: V3,D5,9–11,T1,3,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr omit this line [= 33ab]. Cg, who reads the variant abhilakṣeṇa, is the only commentator to have and note this reading. He glosses, "by him whose targets are approached [i.e., hit] (abhigatalakṣyeṇa)." See 5.46.28 and note.

"hundred-slayers" śataghnayaḥ: Earlier in the epic the commentators have described this as a kind of spiked defensive weapon placed along a city's ramparts. Here Cg, the only commentator to remark on the term, explains, "types of weapons covered with spikes (śaṅkucitā āyudhaviśeṣāḥ)." This interpretation is incorporated into the translations of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 229) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1695). See notes to 1.5.11 and 6.3.12. Compare 5.2.19; 5.3.30; and 5.41.14, where the śataghnī appears to be a hand-held weapon.

35. "snatching away" sahasā . . . ākṣipya: Literally, "having violently seized."

"as lustrous as the bow of Indra" indradhanuḥprabham: The bow of Indra, of course, also serves as a kenning for the rainbow, an allusion made explicit in the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1695). See verse 6 and note above.

36. "Then . . . Sugrīva . . . he . . . bore down upon" avaplutya tataḥ: Literally, "then having leapt down." It is not clear from what position Sugrīva is leaping down, since nothing in the previous passage has shown him leaping upward. The commentators are silent on this point. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1695), alone among the translations consulted, attempts to rationalize the expression. The translator, presumably on the basis of his own imagination, indicates that in the preceding verse Sugrīva had leapt up on Kumbha's chariot to grab his bow and now leaps down from it. He translates, "speedily leaping down from the chariot." Evidently he reads the adverb tataḥ, "then," in the sense of "from that." Printed editions of Ct (GPP 6.76.69 and NSP 6.76.69) read dhanuḥ, "bow," for tataḥ. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"who now resembled an elephant with broken tusks" bhagnaśṛṅgam iva dviṗam: Literally, "[who was] like an elephant whose tusks were broken." The simile, no doubt, refers to a breaking of Kumbha's bow in the previous verse.

37. "Your chivalry and your majesty are shared only by Rāvaṇa himself." saṃnatiś ca prabhāvaś ca tava vā rāvaṇasya vā: Literally, "modesty and majesty belong either to you or to Rāvaṇa." We follow the commentators in understanding the expression to mean either that Kumbha's virtues are equal to those of Rāvaṇa (Cg) or that, among rākṣasas, they belong only to these two individuals (Cr, Ct, Ck). We render saṃnatiḥ, "modesty, humility," in keeping with the suggestion of Cm and Cg (first alternative), who gloss, "decorous behavior among the rākṣasas (rākṣaseṣu vinayaḥ)." Cg amplifies, explaining that the seeming oxymoron "rākṣasa decorum" derives here from Kumbha's favorable treatment (i.e., sparing) of the monkeys Aṅgada, Dvivida, and Mainda, even though they have slain his kinsmen—Kampana, Prajaṅgha, Yūpākṣa, and Śoṇitākṣa (kampanaprajaṅghayūpākṣaśoṇitākṣamārakāṇām aṅgadamaindadvividānāṃ nirākaraṇād rākṣasaprāvaṇyoktiḥ).

38. "Peer of Prahrāda, Bali, Indra the slayer of Vṛtra, Kubera, and Varuṇa" prahrādabalivṛtraghnakuberavaruṇopama: Literally, "O you who are comparable to Prahrāda, Bali, the slayer of Vṛtra, Kubera, and Varuṇa." D4,7,9,11,S read the phonological variant prahlāda-, "Prahlāda," for prahrāda, "Prahrāda."

Only Cs among the commentators attempts to explain the bases for the choice of these particular mythological figures as objects of flattering comparison. He claims: 1) Prahrāda (v.l. Prahlāda) and Bali are included since, as grandfather and grandson—excluding the representative of the intervening generation, viz., Hiraṇyakaśipu—their mention suggests that Kumbha's fame or glory is greater than that of his father (Kumbhakarṇa); 2) Indra, in his role as the slayer of the demon Vṛtra, is mentioned as an object of comparison for the ability to kill one's enemies; and 3) Kubera and Varuṇa serve as models for wealth and unassailability, respectively. (pitrapekṣayā kīrtir adhiketi vaktuṃ pitāmahapautrayoḥ prahlādabalyor grahaṇam. vairisaṃhāre vṛtraghnopamā. dhanikatvāpradhṛṣyatvayoḥ kuberavaruṇopamateti jñeyam.)

"though you are mightier still" balavattaraḥ: D7,9–11,T3,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the accusative balavattaram. In this variant, Kumbha's father, Kumbhakarṇa, is the one whose strength is extolled. D5,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead the adverb balavṛttataḥ. Cg glosses, "in the exercise of strength (balavyāpāreṇa)."

39. "The thirty gods . . . a single-handed" ekam . . . tridaśāḥ: Literally, "one . . . thirty." We believe the idea here is that Kumbha is represented as able to single-handedly hold off the massed ranks of the gods. Translators consulted have tended to take the term ekam to mean "sole" or "only."

"lance in hand" śūlahastam: T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead cāpahastam, "bow in hand."

"worldly cares" ādhayaḥ: Literally, "mental [as opposed to physical] afflictions."

Following verse 39, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1477*]: "Display your valor, wise rākṣasa,[1] as I observe your feats.[2]"

[1]"wise rākṣasa" mahābuddhe: Literally, "O you of great intelligence."

[2]"as I observe your feats" karmāṇi mama paśyataḥ: Literally, "as I see actions." D10,11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read paśya ca, "and witness," for paśyataḥ, "as [I] see." This yields the sense "witness [my] feats."

40. "Your paternal uncle Rāvaṇa" pitṛvyas te: Literally, "your paternal uncle."

"the gift of a boon" varadānāt: See note to 6.28.28–29.

"conquered the gods and dānavas . . . while Kumbhakarṇa did so through his own enormous strength" sahate devadānavān / kumbhakarṇas tu vīryeṇa sahate ca surāsurān: Literally, "he conquers the devas and the dānavas . . . but Kumbhakarṇa conquers the suras and asuras by strength." Ct indicates that, by mentioning the respective means by which Kumbha's seniors have achieved their conquest, Sugrīva is suggesting that Kumbha conquers by virtue of both of these powers (tvaṃ tūbhābhyām ity arthaḥ).

41. "Indrajit's" indrajitaḥ: Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 228) mistakenly renders "[equal] to Indra."

"archery" dhanuṣi: Literally, "in respect to the bow." As Cr notes, we must understand the term to refer to the science of archery (dhanurvidyāyām).

42. "all beings" bhūtāni: Literally, "beings."

"the great . . . clash in battle" mahāvimardaṃ samare: The words vimarda and samara overlap in their ranges of meaning in the sense of "war, combat." Some of the commentators have attempted to differentiate the terms. Thus, Cr glosses vimardam as "battle (yuddham)" and samare as "on the battlefield (saṃgrāmabhūmau)." Cg glosses mahāvimarda as "the great blow[s] (mahāprahāram)."

"like that between Śakra and Śambara" śakraśambarayor iva: The legendary battle between Indra and the demon Śambara is recorded as early as the Ṛgveda (1.54; 1.130; 1.112.14; 1.51.6; 3.47; 7.18; etc.). See 6.57.7 and notes.

43. "missiles" astra-: In many contexts, we translate this term as "divinely charged weapons or divine weapon-spells." In this case, however, there is no suggestion that Kumbha is using anything other than normal, earthly weapons. See Introduction, p. 112.

45. "Kumbha had first been flattered, but now, at the contemptuous words of Sugrīva" tena sugrīvavākyena sāvamānena mānitaḥ: Literally, "honored by that contemptuous speech of Sugrīva." The line is both syntactically and semantically difficult, and the commentators have struggled to rationalize it. Our translation follows the suggestion of Cr, who understands the participle mānitaḥ, "flattered, honored," to be part of an emboxed elliptical sentence with the sense "Kumbha had been honored." Cr's reasoning is that Kumbha at first had felt flattered by Sugrīva's words "You have performed an unparalleled [feat]" (verse 43) but now, upon hearing his insulting words "It is only out of fear of incurring censure that I have not killed you thus far" (verse 44), his martial ardor blazes up. (sāvamānenopālambhān na hato 'sītyādyavamānasahitena sugrīvavākyena kṛtam apratimam ityādinā mānitaḥ satkṛtaḥ kumbho 'bhavad iti śeṣaḥ.)

Cg and Cs, on the other hand, understand all of Sugrīva's words of praise to be ironic or deceptive. Thus, Cg explains, "the meaning is that he was insulted by the ironic praise (bahumānena vyājenāvamānita ity arthaḥ)." Cs understands that Kumbha is being "praised" with a speech that merely outwardly takes the form of praise while within it lies a core of contempt (sāvamānenāntaravamānagarbheṇa bahiḥstutirūpeṇa vākyena mānitaḥ).

Following verse 45, Ñ1,D4–7,9–11,S (Ñ2,V1,2,B,D13 after 1480*) insert a passage of ten lines [1481*]: "Then Kumbha seized Sugrīva with both arms, and the two of them began to breath heavily again and again like elephants covered with rut fluid. Locked in each others limbs, they dragged[1] each other about, releasing, in their exhaustion, smoky flames from their mouths.[1–4] The earth caved in under the blows of their feet, while the ocean, Varuṇa's abode, was agitated, its waves rolling wildly.[5–6] Then Sugrīva, hurling Kumbha upward, made him fall swiftly into the salt sea so that he saw the bottom[2] of that reservoir of waters.[7–8] The fall of Kumbha hurled the mass of water upward so that it rose on every side like the Vindhya mountains or Mount Mandara.[9–10]"

[1]"they dragged" karṣantau: Literally, "[those two] dragging." V1,2,D10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead gharṣantau, "rubbing, grinding."

[2]"so that he saw the bottom" darśayan . . . talam: Literally, "showing [him] the surface." The expression and its variant darśayan . . . sthalam (GPP, NSP) are slightly ambiguous. All translators consulted, with the exception of Raghunathan, understand, as do we, that this is a euphemism for sending Kumbha to the bottom of the sea. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 230) appears to read the expression in the context of the following verse, where the waters are splashed out of the seabed. He thus renders, "[hurled him into the sea] . . . exposing its floor." Crā (ascribed to Cg in GPP) understands the reference to be not to the bottom of the sea but to dry land, i.e., the seashore. He claims that, in describing Sugrīva's feat of hurling the enormous Kumbha a hundred leagues from the summit of Mount Trikūṭa into the sea at Laṅkā's shore, the passage is intended to illustrate the monkey's immeasurable power (śata-yojanavistīrṇatrikūṭaśikharamadhye yudhyan sugrīvaḥ kumbhaṃ laṅkādvīpatale lavaṇāmbhasi pātayāmāsety abhidhānāt sugrīvasyāparimeyabalavattā dyotyate).

46. "hurled himself upon" abhipadya: Literally, "having attacked." G1 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead abhipātya, "having thrown down." Ś2,B3,D1,3–5,7–12,T3,G2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead abhipatya, "having attacked."

"that had the force of a thunderbolt" vajravegena: Literally, "having the force or speed of the vajra." Ñ2,B2,D4,6,7,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vajrakalpena, "like the thunderbolt, adamant, or the vajra." See 6.64.20 and note.

47. "His skin" tasya carma: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead tasya varma, "his armor." In a note, Pagani (1999, p. 1669) has taken this extremely weak reading as a reference to the monkeys' sudden acquisition of military equipment in the second part of the war. See 6.64.17 and note.

"and his blood poured out" saṃjajñe cāsya śoṇitam: Literally, "and his blood was produced." Ñ1,D4,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read bahu susrāva, "much [blood] flowed," for saṃjajñe cāsya.

"had penetrated to the bone" pratijaghne 'sthimaṇḍale: Literally, "it struck in the circle of bones." The reference is probably to the rib cage. Commentators differ in their interpretation of this phrase. Ct, whom we follow, glosses the verb pratijaghne as "struck against (pratihataḥ)." Cr understands that the fist gains force or momentum within Sugrīva's bony structures (sugrīvāsthisamūhe pratijaghne vegavattāṃ prāpa). Cg glosses as does Ct but understands the sense to be that the fist was ineffective against Sugrīva's bones (mogho babhūvety arthaḥ). Dutt (1893, p. 1377), perhaps taking his cue from Cr, renders, "and the impetus of that blow broke Sugrīva's bones." On the other hand, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 230), following Cg's lead, renders, "the force of the blow was spent when it reached the bones."

48. "briefly" muhuḥ: Literally, "for a moment." D9–11,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahat, "great, huge."

"like the flame that arises on Mount Meru when it is struck by lightning" vajraniṣpeṣasaṃjātajvālā merau yathā girau: Literally, "like the flame arising from the pounding of the vajra on Mount Meru." Cg understands the reference not to be to a forest fire produced by a lightning strike but rather to the mythological incident in which Indra is said to have cut off the wings of the mountains (see 5.1.46,80 and notes; and notes to 5.55.18). The fire, according to Cg, would have arisen at that time from the friction of Indra's weapon, the vajra (vajranispeṣasaṃjātendreṇa pakṣacchedakāle vajrasaṃghaṭṭajanyety arthaḥ).

Following verse 48, D7,G2 (after 48c), and KK, in brackets (=6.76.88ef and unnoted by the critical apparatus), insert a passage of one line [1483*], which repeats the mention of the flames arising from the force of Kumbha's fist.

49. "Although Sugrīva . . . had been struck there" sa tatrābhihataḥ . . . sugrīvaḥ: Literally, "struck there, Sugrīva." Ct suggests that the adverb tatra, "there," means "on the chest (urasi)."

"he clenched his fist" muṣṭiṃ saṃvartayāmāsa: We agree with Cg, who takes the verb to mean "he made (cakāra)." Most of the translators consulted also take the verb here to mean "to clench or double." Cr, on the other hand, takes the verb to mean "whirled about or swung (bhrāmayāmāsa)." This interpretation appears to have been followed by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 257) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 229), who understand that the monkey raised his fist. Cr's interpretation, perhaps, informs Pagani's rendition: "renvoya un coup de poing" (1999, p. 1083). See 6.64.15 and note.

"as hard as adamant" vajrakalpam: Literally, "like the vajra." See note to 46 above.

50. "which, radiant with a thousand rays of light, was as brilliant as the sun's orb" arciḥsahasravikacaṃ ravimaṇḍalasaprabham: V1,2,D11,G2, and (pace the critical apparatus) printed editions of Ct and Cr read the line as a single compound, yielding the translation "as brilliant as [v.l., having the splendor of] the sun's orb, shining with its thousand rays." The critical text's reading, -saprabham, "as brilliant as," is marked as uncertain. Ś2,Ñ,V2,3,B1,3,4,D1–4,6–8,12,13,T2,3,G2,M5 read -saṃnibham, "resembling," while V1,D9–11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead -varcasam, "[having] the splendor of." One should recall that Sugrīva is the son of the sun god, Sūrya.

Following verse 50, Ñ,V1,2,B2–4,D4–7,9–11,13,S insert a passage of two lines [1484*]: "Violently struck[1] by that blow, Kumbha was stunned. He then collapsed like fire, the purifier, when its flames have been extinguished."

[1]"struck" -tāḍitaḥ: Ñ,V1,2,B2–4,D4,10,13,T1,G1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead -pīḍitaḥ, "oppressed, crushed."

51. "the red planet Mars" lohitāṅgaḥ: Literally, "the red limbed one." As suggested by Pagani (1999, p. 1669), the choice of the planet Mars here is no doubt intended to suggest the demon's bloody body.

"somehow . . . from the heavens" ākāśāt . . . yadṛcchayā: Literally, "from the sky by chance." Ck and Ct understand the adverb yadṛcchayā, "by chance, accidentally," to mean "because of its subjection to fate (daivādhīnataḥ)." This interpretation has been followed by all translations consulted, with the exception of Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 82), who renders, "spontaneamente." Ck understands the figure to be an abhūtopamā, that is, "a simile with a nonexistent or imaginary object of comparison."

52. "the body of Sūrya, lord of cows, when he was vanquished by Rudra" rudrābhipannasya yathā rūpaṃ gavāṃ pateḥ: Literally, "like the form of the lord of cows, who was overcome by Rudra." Most of the commentators gloss gavāṃ pateḥ, "of the lord of cows," with "of Sūrya (sūryasya)." Cv glosses, "of Pūṣan (pūṣṇaḥ)." The epithet no doubt derives from Pūṣan's role in the ṚV as the guardian of cattle. (See ṚV 6.54.7,10; and Keith 1925, vol. 35, p. 107.)

According to a story at Vāmanapurāṇa 5.10–18, Sūrya, homologized here with Pūṣan, attempted to stop Rudra, who was on a rampage after being cursed by Brahmā. Rudra seized and whirled Sūrya around by his arms, which became shortened and bloodied in the process. Rudra then threw Sūrya to the ground. The falling of the bloodied and mangled body to the ground is the basis for the simile. See Pagani 1999, p. 1669, who mentions this story but provides no reference.

Since the polysemic term go, here rendered as "cow," can also mean, among many other things, "rays of light," one could also understand the kenning to mean "lord of light or lord of rays," i.e., the sun.

53. "tremendous" adhikam: Normally, the word means "great still, more," and some translators render it in this sense.

The meter is upajāti.

2–3. "That hero" vīraḥ: D5,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead dhīraḥ, "brave, resolute."

"bound with garlands of flowers" sragdāmasaṃnaddham: Literally, "bound with the ties of garlands." Ck understands, "bound with garlands, such as pearl necklaces, etc. (hārādisragbhiś ca sannadham)." Cv and Cg render, "bound with masses of garlands (sragjālanaddham—so Cv; sraksamūhanibaddham—so Cg)." Cr explains, "ornamented with strings of garlands (srajāṃ dāmabhiḥ sannaddham alaṃkṛtam)." See 6.64.8–11 and note.

"stamped with the sign of five fingers" dattapañcāṅgulam: Literally, "[to which] five fingers are given." The expression is obscure, and the commentators are divided as to its meaning. We follow the interpretation of Cv, Cg, and Cm, who understand, "stamped with a seal in the form of five fingers and colored with sandalwood, saffron, etc. (candanakuṅkumādinārpitapañcāṅgulamudrāmudritam—so Cg)." This interpretation is further supported by Cl, as reported in Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 292), who glosses, "having a mark of five fingers placed on top of it (uparidattapañcāṅgulacihnam)." Gorresio believes that the meaning of the term is that the club bears an impression of the mark of five fingers by which the rākṣasa grasps it. This interpretation is followed in the translations of Raghunathan and Gorresio. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 231), however, understands by the term aṅgula, "finger," a measure of distance. He renders, "stamped with a seal five finger-breaths [sic] in width." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 82) renders, "che avea al di sopra un marchio di cinque dita." Cg offers a second interpretation, whereby the compound can be read adverbially to modify the verb ādade, "he took up," with the sense of "in such a way that he grasped it with five fingers (dattapañcāṅgulaṃ yathā tathādade)." This interpretation may have inspired the translation of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 259), who renders, "prit par la poignée." Ct, Ck, and Cr understand quite differently, glossing, "having ligatures of wrought iron measuring five aṅgulas (pañcāṅgulapramāṇā dattāḥ kālāyasapaṭṭabandhā yasmiṃs tam—so Ct)." An aṅgula is a measure of distance equaling eight yavas, or "barleycorns," roughly half an inch. This interpretation is followed in the translations of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1698) and Dutt (1893, p. 1377). See notes to 6.3.12; 6.53.12; and 6.55.47. Pagani (1999, p. 1084) appears to take the expression simply as an indication of the size of the weapon, rendering, astonishingly, "longue de cinq pouces." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 229) ignores the compound entirely.

"a lordly mountain" nagendra-: D3,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahendra-, "Mount Mahendra."

4. "like . . . in battle" -samaṃ raṇe: The word raṇe, "in battle," is marked as uncertain in the critical text. D6,T2,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead tadā, "then." D7,9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead [śakradhavaja]samaujasam for [śakradhvaja]samaṃ raṇe, yielding, "whose splendor was equal to [that of Śakra's flagstaff]."

"Brandishing it" tam āvidhya: Cr glosses, "having firmly grasped (dṛḍhaṃ gṛhītvā)."

5–6. "the golden necklace" niṣkeṇa: See 6.53.22 and note.

"burnished" mṛṣṭābhyām: D1,4,9–11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead citrābhyām, "splendid, variegated."

"resembled a storm cloud replete with thunder, lightning, and rainbow" yathendradhanuṣā meghaḥ savidyutstanayitnumān: Literally, "like a cloud possessing thunder with lightning and with Indra's bow." Cg explains the basis for the simile in some detail. He argues that Nikumbha's mace plays the role of the rainbow, his ornaments, that of lightning, and his roaring in the previous verse, that of the thunder. Thus, he argues, the upameya, or the subject of comparison (i.e., Nikumbha), is in no way defective. (indradhanuḥsthāne parighaḥ. vidyutsthāne bhūṣaṇāni. vinanādeti pūrvaślokokto vinādaḥ stanayitnusthāna iti nopameyanyūnatā.) See note to 6.63.35.

7. "The tip of that . . . iron club could smash the lair of the winds in the sky." parighāgreṇa pusphoṭa vātagranthiḥ: Literally, "the knot of the winds was burst by the tip of the iron club." The expression is somewhat obscure. We follow the commentators, who generally understand the term vātagranthiḥ to refer to the vātaskandha, the source of the seven bands of atmospheric winds (vātagranthir āvahādisaptavātaskandhaḥ—so Cg). The idea here, as suggested by Ct and noted by Dutt (1893, p. 1378), is that the length of Nikumbha's club (etena parighasya dairghyam uktam—Ct) is so great that it can extend into the sky and there destroy the nexus from which the seven named winds (āvaha, pravaha, etc., see MBh 12.229.26–27) emanate (vātagranthir āvahādisaptamahāvāyūnāṃ saṃdhiḥ). Cr understands similarly. The nexus of the winds (vāyuskandha) is described in the Bṛhatsaṃhitā of Varāhamihira at 80.24. In the Bālakāṇḍa (1.46.4), Diti begs of Indra that her shattered fetus should become the vātaskandhas, or the seven winds of heaven. (See 1.46.4 and note.) Some translators, including Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 259), Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 82), Pagani (1999, p. 1084), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 230), appear to take the reference to be to an actual incident in which Nikumbha had attacked and smashed the winds. Pagani, in her note to the passage (p. 1670), takes this interpretation so far as to view Hanumān's impending victory over Nikumbha as a kind of revenge for the wrong done to his own father (Vāyu) by Nikumbha with his iron club. The term vātaskandha may also refer to the nexus of the internal winds, or breaths, prāṇa, etc., so that the whole expression could be seen as a circumlocution for "lethal or deadly."

"that huge warrior's" mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "of the great one." We agree with the commentators, as well as Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1698) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 231), in taking the epithet to refer to Nikumbha's enormous size. Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 82) and Pagani (1999, p. 1084) understand the adjective to describe a moral quality in the sense of "noble or magnanimous." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 230) and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 259) omit the term.

"It blazed" prajajvāla: Commentators understand that the subject of this verb can be either Nikumbha himself or the tip of his iron club (parigha). (prajajvāla nikumbha iti śeṣaḥ. parighāgrabhāga iti vā—so Ct.)

8–9. "The whirling of . . . iron club seemed to set the very sky spinning" -āghūrṇaṃ bhramatīva nabhastalam: Literally, "whirled . . . by the iron club, the surface of the sky spins as it were." Cg understands that the word parigha, "iron club," is used in a secondary sense to refer to the wind generated by the weapon (atra parighaśabdena tadvāta upalakṣyate). Given this reading, Cg understands that the heavens are actually set spinning and that, therefore, the word iva, "as if" (translated above as "seemed"), is to be taken as a vākyālaṃkāra.

"the heavenly city of Viṭapāvatī" nagaryā viṭapāvatyā: Literally, "with the city Viṭapāvatī." The commentators are divided as to the precise reference of this uncommon name. Ct and Ck, in an apparent effort to maintain parallelism between the two cities mentioned and the two kinds of mansions, understand that this is the name of the city of the gandharvas. Given the apparent parallelism between the two cities and their respective mansions, we follow this interpretation and understand that the mansions of the gandharvas are in Viṭapāvatī. Cg, Cm, and Cr take the reference to be to the city of Alakā, which is normally associated with Kubera and the yakṣas. Cm's opinion is quoted by Ct. See 5.3.4 and note.

"the celestial city of Amarāvatī with all its mansions" saha caivāmarāvatyā sarvaiś ca bhavanaiḥ saha: Pādas 8cd are omitted by B2,D9–11,13, and the printed editions of Ct.

10. "With his iron club and ornaments for his flames" parighābharaṇaprabhaḥ: Literally, "whose iron club and ornaments were [his] radiance." Given the tenor of the extended metaphor, we agree with Ct, Ck, and Cg (second alternative) in taking the compound as a bahuvrīhi, whose literal meaning would be "having the iron club and ornaments for his radiance." Cg's first explanation, which is not very different, is that Nikumbha shines by virtue of his club and ornaments. (parighenābharaṇaiś ca prabhātīti parighābharaṇaprabhaḥ. yadvā parighābharaṇāny eva prabhā yasya sa tathā.)

"his rage for kindling" krodhendhanah: D5–7,T,G2,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead kapīnāṃ saḥ, "he . . . of the monkeys." Cg, the only commentator to remark on this variant, understands that we are to construe the phrase with the adjective durāsadaḥ, "unapproachable," in pāda a, thus giving the passage the sense "he [Nikumbha] was unapproachable by the monkeys." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 231), the only translator consulted to follow this reading, has a seemingly confused rendition, translating, "[the lustre of the club and jewels] seemed to blind the monkeys."

"when it blazes forth" utthitaḥ: Literally, "sprung up, arisen."

11. "frozen with fear" na śekuḥ spandituṃ bhayāt: Literally, "they were unable to stir out of fear." Cg, alone among the commentators, attempts to explain why the rākṣasas should be afraid of Nikumbha. He reasons that they would be thinking that, since such powerful warriors as Prajaṅgha, etc., had already been slain, what point would there be in so relatively weak a figure as Nikumbha even attempting to fight. Their fear, then, derives from their anticipation of Nikumbha's anger should they express this view (prabaleṣu prajaṅghādiṣu hateṣu durbalair bhavadbhiḥ kim arthaṃ yuddhāya prayatnaḥ kṛta iti nikumbhaḥ kupyed iti rākṣasānāṃ bhayaṃ veditavyam).

"thrusting out his chest" vivṛtyoraḥ: The verb vi $\sqrt{vṛ}$ can mean either "to expand, unfold" or "to expose, make manifest." Like Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 231), we agree with Cg, who glosses vistārya, "having expanded," in taking the former meaning, since it is consonant with the situation for Hanumān to thrust out his chest as a sign of courage and defiance. Other commentators gloss, "having made manifest (prakāśya—Ct, Ck)." This is followed by most of the translators, who understand that Hanumān is baring his breast. We find this unpersuasive, since, in Vālmīki, at least, the monkeys are not normally shown as wearing clothing.

12. "mighty Nikumbha . . . of mighty Hanumān*: balī balavatas tasya*: Literally, "the mighty one . . . of that mighty one."

13. "adamantine" sthire: Literally, "firm, hard, unyielding." This is perhaps an allusion to Hanumān's adamantine body and invulnerability to weapons. See, for example, 4.65.25–26; 5.1.175 and note; and 7.36.11–21. See, too, Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 43, 53–57; and 1994.

14. "And . . . staggered" cacāla ca: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead na cacāla, "he did not stagger, was unshaken." Ś2,Ñ,V2,3,B1,2,4,D1–4,7,8,12,G1,2,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read the variant vicacāla (M1,2, saṃcacāla), "staggered," which is rendered in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 231).

15. "by that iron club" tena: Literally, "by that." We believe that the reference is to the immediate antecedent, the club, although it could also be interpreted to mean "by him," i.e., by Nikumbha.

"tightly" balena: Literally, "strongly, powerfully."

"clenched" saṃvartayāmāsa: We understand the verb in the sense in which it is understood by Cg, who glosses, simply, "he made (cakāra)." Cr, however, glosses, "he swung (bhrāmāyāmāsa)." See note to 6.63.49.

16. "the forceful, immensely powerful, and mighty monkey" mahātejāḥ . . . vīryavān . . . vegavān: Literally, "the immensely powerful one, the mighty one, and the forceful one." As is often the case with Vālmīki, the adjectives are roughly synonymous but cumulative in their effect. See note to 6.2.14.

"drove" abhicikṣepa: Literally, "he hurled."

17. "skin" carma: D1,3,7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead varma, "armor." Cf. 6.63.47 and note.

"That fist sparked flames that resembled lighting bursting forth." muṣṭinā tena saṃjajñe jvālā vidyud ivotthitā: Literally, "by that fist, a flame was produced like lightning springing up." D7,9–11,G2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cg read meghe, "in a cloud," for jvālā, "flame."

19. "frighteningly" bhīmam: Ck and Ct note that it is the monkeys who are frightened (kapīnāṃ bhayaṃkaraṃ yathā bhavati tathety arthaḥ). Cr notes that the sound is a triumphal shout (vijayaśabdaḥ). Cg adds that the rākṣasas cry out in their delight at the seizure of Hanumān (hanumadgrahaṇaharṣād iti bhāvaḥ).

20. "as he was being carried off" sa . . . hriyamāṇaḥ: Dutt (1893, p. 1379) mistakenly derives the participle from the root √hrī, "to be ashamed," rendering, "being thus put to shame."

"by Kumbhakarṇa's son" kumbhakarṇātmajena hi: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead hanūmāṃs tena rakṣasā, "Hanumān . . . by that rākṣasa."

"that had the force of a thunderbolt" vajravegena: As elsewhere, D7,9–11, 13,T2,G1,2,M3,5, and the texts of the southern commentators read instead vajrakalpena. Cf. 6.47.37; 6.57.87; and notes. See 6.63.46 and note.

22. "Exerting all his strength" paramāyattaḥ: Literally, "exerting himself supremely."

"that powerful monkey" vīryavān: Literally, "the powerful one." D6,9–11,T2,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead vegavān, "possessing speed or force."

"with tremendous force" vegena: Literally, "with force."

23. "Nikumbha's neck . . . Hanumān . . . tore off the huge head of the rākṣasa, who was shrieking" śirodharām . . . utpāṭayāmāsa śiro . . . nadato mahat: Literally, "[locking] the neck . . . he tore off the huge head of him who was shrieking."

"horribly" bhairavam: The term can be read either as an adjective modifying "head (śiraḥ)" or, as we have done, as an adverb modifying the participle "shrieking (nadataḥ)."

24. "between the . . . armies of Daśaratha's son and the rākṣasa lord" daśarathasuta-rākṣasendracamvoḥ: D6,7,11,T2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, Cg, and Cm read -sūnvoḥ, "sons," in place of -camvoḥ, "armies," lending the compound the sense "between the [two] sons of Daśaratha and the rākṣasa lord." Commentators understand this reading to refer to the content of the following two sargas (65 and 66), which describe the battle between Rāma and the rākṣasa Makarākṣa, the son of the rākṣasa lord Khara. (rākṣasendrasūnuḥ kharasuto makarākṣaḥ. anena vakṣyamāṇopakṣepaḥ—so Ct.) Cs, who reads the variant, offers an idiosyncratic interpretation in opposition to that of Ct and Cm, according to which the term daśarathasuta- is made, by lexical manipulation, to stand for the son of the wind, i.e., Hanumān, and the son of the rākṣasa lord, Nikumbha. Thus, Cs regards this verse as a summation of the present sarga rather than as a foreshadowing of the following two. (daśarathasutarākṣasendrasūnvor daśasu dikṣu ratho gamanam apratihataṃ yasya tasya vāyoḥ. rathaḥ syāt syandane kāye caraṇe cety viśvaḥ. suto hanumān rākṣasendrasūnur nikumbhaḥ tayoḥ.)

The meter is puṣpitāgrā.

According to Cv, the deaths of Kumbha and Nikumbha conclude the ninth day [of the battle] (kumbhanikumbhavadhena navamam ahas samāptam). See note to 6.4.4.

Following verse 24, Ñ1,D5–7,9–11,T,G,M1–3,M5 (following verse 23), and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of four lines [1491*]: "Once life had departed from Nikumbha, the leaping monkeys bellowed in delight. The directions resounded, the earth seemed to shake, and the heavens seemed to split asunder.[1] But terror entered the host of the rākṣasas."

[1]"seemed to split asunder" paphāleva: D6,9–11,T, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead papāteva, "seemed to fall."

The meter is bhujaṅgaprayāta.

1. Cg uses the occasion of the beginning of this sarga as the basis for a brief retrospective on the chronology of the battle. He offers two chronologies. According to the first, the action of this sarga takes place on the morning of the tenth lunar day [of the dark half of Phālguna/Caitra]. According to the second, we are now in the night of the tenth lunar day, which has been an extremely eventful day. According to Cg, the morning witnessed the deaths of Kampana and Prahasta (6.46), the breaking of Rāvaṇa's crown (6.47), and the awakening and subsequent slaying of Kumbhakarṇa (6.48–55). In the afternoon, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were bound by Indrajit's brahmāstra (6.60), while the night witnesses Rāma's and Lakṣmaṇa's release from the brahmāstra (6.61), the burning of Laṅkā (6.62), and the deaths of Kumbha (6.63), Nikumbha (6.64), Yūpākṣa (6.63.3, App. I, No. 43), Śoṇitākṣa (6.63.3, App. I, No. 43), Prajaṅgha (6.63.3, App. I, No. 43), Kampana (6.63.3), and Makarākṣa (6.66). Why Cg mentions the death of Kampana in both the morning and the evening is not clear. (prathamapakṣe 'yaṃ daśamyāṃ prātaḥ. dvitīyapakṣe tu daśamyāṃ prātar ārabhya kampanavadhaprahastavadharāvaṇamukuṭabhaṅgakumbhakarṇaprabodhatadvadhāḥ. athāparāhne brahmāstrabandhaḥ rātrau tanmokṣalaṅkādahanakumbhanikumbhayūpākṣaśoṇitākṣaprajaṅghakampanamakarākṣavadhāḥ.) See note to 6.4.4.

"Nikumbha had been slain and Kumbha struck down" nikumbhaṃ ca hatam . . . kumbhaṃ ca vinipātitam: Cs is curious as to why the two events are mentioned at the same time, when Kumbha had been slain previously (in sarga 64). He reasons that one should think of Nikumbha in the earlier connection as well, either because he was so powerful or because his death was not much separated from that of Kumbha. (yady api kumbhavadhaḥ prāg iti kumbhaṃ nikumbhaṃ ceti vaktavyam. tathāpi nikumbho 'tibalavān iti vātyavyavahito nikumbhavadha iti vā nikumbhagrahaṇaṃ prāg iti mantavyam.)

2. "large-eyed Makarākṣa" viśālākṣaṃ makarākṣam: The epithet is no doubt chosen to echo the name makarākṣa (literally, "crocodile-eyed"). See notes to 6.14.3; 6.57.17; etc.

4. "the proud . . . hero" śūro mānī: Ś2, Ñ2,V1,B1–3,D1–4,8–12,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead the compound śūramānī, "regarding himself as a hero."

"the . . . night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming one." Printed editions that follow the text of Ct (Gita Press 6.78.4; NSP 6.78.4; and GPP 6.78.4) read instead the accusative niśācaram, in which case the sense would be that Makarākṣa replied to the night-roaming rākṣasa, i.e., Rāvaṇa.

"courageous" dhṛṣṭaḥ: As Cr points out, the sandhi makes it impossible to determine whether the intended adjective is dhṛṣṭaḥ, "courageous," or hṛṣṭaḥ, "happy, excited"

(hṛṣṭo makarākṣaḥ . . . dhṛṣṭa iti chedo vā). Although we believe the context better suits the former, most of the translations consulted read the latter.

6. "quickly" tvarāt: Most commentators gloss the somewhat unusual masculine ablative with the regular feminine instrumental tvarayā, "in haste." Cs does the same but offers a characteristically recherché alternative explanation, according to which the term is the vocative of a compound epithet with the sense "going quickly." This would be addressed to the commanding officer, "O Speedy One." (tvarayā atatīti tvarāt. tasya saṃbuddhiḥ.)

8. "mounted it" āruroha: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the inferior samāhūya, "having summoned, invited." This reading makes little sense contextually. Only Dutt (1893, p. 1380), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 261), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 230) attempt to render it.

9. "as my vanguard" purastān mama: Literally, "before me."

10. Cm, following his normal devotional strategy, understands that the real meaning of the verse is to be ascertained only by supplying the particle vinā, "without, excluding," so that the hidden sense is that Makarākṣa has been instructed to kill only the monkeys while sparing Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. (ahaṃ rākṣasarājenetyādiślokadvayasya prātītikārthaḥ spaṣṭaḥ. vastutas tu—ahaṃ rāvaneṇa rāmalakṣmaṇau hantum adyājñapto yady api tathāpi lakṣmaṇaṃ rāmaṃ vineti śeṣaḥ. vānarān vadhiṣyāmīti saṃbandhaḥ.) See note to 6.27.4.

11. "the tree-dwelling monkey" śākhāmṛgam: Literally, "the branch [dwelling] animal." See 6.15.15.

12. "hurling my lance" śūlanipātaiḥ: Literally, "with casts or descents of the lance(s)."

"that has assembled here" samprāptām" Literally, "arrived." Ñ2,V2,D7,G1,2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, Cr, and Gorresio read instead the nominative singular masculine samprāptaḥ, in which case the adjective modifies Makarākṣa himself, with the sense of "as soon as I get there."

13. "formed themselves into a column" samāhitāḥ: Literally, "assembled."

14–15. "with their great fangs" daṃṣṭriṇaḥ: Literally, "possessing fangs."

"yellow eyes" piṅgalekṣaṇāḥ: The adjective piṅgala can also describe a reddish or reddish-brown color. Cf. 6.59.11 and note.

"those heroes" te . . . śūrāḥ: D6,9–11,T2,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read krūrāḥ, "cruel, fierce," for śūrāḥ. M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read sarve, "all," for śūrāḥ.

"roared like bull elephants trumpeting" mātaṅgā iva nardantaḥ: Literally, "bellowing or roaring like elephants."

"those huge rākṣasas" mahākāyāḥ: Literally, "having large bodies."

"marched forth" abhijagmuḥ: B2,D5,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead abhijaghnuḥ, "they beat, slew, or attacked." Of the translations that generally follow the text of Ct, only Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 262) and, after him, Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 232) appear to render this awkward reading. They understand the verb idiosyncratically to mean "to shout," construing it closely with the adjective hṛṣṭāḥ, "excited, happy," in 15c, understanding that the rākṣasas are shouting with joy.

"the earth" vasuṃdharām: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead nabhastalam, "the sky." Among the translations consulted, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 262), and, after him, Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 232) render this reading, construing it with their reading of abhijaghnuḥ discussed above to represent their understanding that the rākṣasas shake the vault of heaven with their joyful cries.

16. "bherī drums" -bherī- See note to 6.17.31–33.

"clapped their upper arms, and roared out their battle cries" kṣveḍitāsphoṭitānām: See note to 6.4.23–24. See, too, 6.47.8; 6.77.16; 6.78.51; and notes.

17. For similar passages listing inauspicious omens, see 6.26.21–30; 6.31.3–12; 6.41.30–34; 6.45.31–37; 6.53.41–45; 6.83.32–34; 6.94.14–27; and notes.

"from the hand of Makarākṣa's charioteer" karāt tasya . . . sāratheḥ: Literally, "from his charioteer's hand." Cg reads the sequence karāttasya instead as a paraniṗāta compound (for āttakarasya) to which he ascribes the sense "whose hand was under his control (vaśīkṛtakarasya)." He further glosses this as "deft-handed (laghuhastasya)."

"and" caiva: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead daivāt, "because of fate."

18. "robbed of their strength" vikramavarjitāḥ: The compound is ambiguous. The word vikrama- can refer here either to "strength, valor, energy" or to the "steps, gait, or paces" of the horses. The commentators and the translators who follow them (Dutt 1893, p. 1381; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 233; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 232; and Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1701) choose the latter interpretation. According to their understanding, the horses abandon the splendid or various gaits they have previously displayed. Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 85), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 262), and Pagani (1999, p. 1086) choose the former. We tend to agree with the latter group since the reading of the commentators appears to be slightly redundant with the reference to the "halting steps" of the horses in pāda c.

"Moving along with halting steps, despondent, they proceeded with tearful faces" caraṇair ākulair gatvā dīnāḥ sāśramukhā yayuḥ: These are all common omens predicting the defeat or downfall of a hero. See 6.26.23; 6.83.33; 6.94.26; and notes.

19. "a harsh and fearsome wind, filled with dust" pravāti pavanaḥ . . . sapāṃsuḥ kharadāruṇaḥ: See 6.4.41; 6.41.33; 6.43.8; 6.45.35; 6.53.44; 6.65.19; and notes.

21. "seasoned in combat" yuddhakauśalāḥ: Literally, "skilled in battle."

"They raced onward, roaring" paribabhramur nadantaḥ: D5,T1,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead paritaḥ samunnadantaḥ, "roaring on all sides." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead muhus te, "they [raced onward] for a while," for nadantaḥ, "roaring."

"crying out, 'Here I am!' 'Here I am!' " aham aham iti: Literally, " 'I! I!' " The idea seems to be that the rākṣasa warriors are announcing their presence on the battlefield in the hope of engaging their foes.

The meter is puṣpitāgrā.

Sarga 66

1. "the bulls among monkeys" vānarapuṃgavāḥ: D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read -yūthapāḥ, "troop leaders," for -puṃgavāḥ, "bulls."

3. "the former with blows of trees and hails of boulders, the latter with volleys of lances and blows of iron clubs" vṛkṣaśūlaniṗātaiś ca śilāparighapātanaiḥ: Literally, "with descents of trees and lances and with descents of boulders and iron clubs." Although neither of the translators who follow this reading—Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 86) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 234)—reflects this, clearly the poet intends to maintain, through the parallel construction, the distinction between the monkeys, who fight with natural objects, and the rākṣasas, who use a full armory of formal weapons. D9–11,T1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read gadā-, "mace," for śilā-, "boulders," which tends to break up the parallelism of the construction.

4–5. "the night-roaming rākṣasas, who prowl in the darkness" niśācarāḥ . . . rajanīcarāḥ: Literally, "night-roamers . . . night-roamers." Although the translators consulted generally gloss over the apparent redundancy of the two synonymous terms and collapse them, the repetition has not gone unnoticed by some commentators. Our interpretation follows that of Cr, who takes the term niśācarāḥ as a descriptive adjective in the sense of "who are fond of feeding at night" and rajanīcarāḥ as a kenning or synonym for rākṣasas (niśāyām eva bhojanaśīlā rajanīcarā rākṣasāḥ). Cg's text reads the nominative plural apare, "other [night-roaming rākṣasas]," in pāda 5b, for the instrumental plural aparaiḥ, "with other [weapons]." This enables him to understand that two groups of rākṣasas are described, each using a different set of weapons.

"with . . . lances" -śūla-: D5–7,9–11,T,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead -khaḍga-, "swords."

"with . . . swords" -khaḍgaiḥ: D5–7,9–11,T,G2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead -kuntaiḥ, "with barbed darts." See note to 6.62.50.

"with . . . iron cudgels" -tomaraiḥ: See note to 6.58.10.

"with . . . volleys of arrows" bāṇapātaiḥ: M3 and VSP read instead nirghātaiḥ. The term is left untranslated in Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 234). The apparatus of GPP records the variant nikhātaiḥ, which it ascribes to Cg. This variant is not attested in the critical apparatus. See below for a discussion of these terms.

"with . . . nirghātas, and other weapons as well" nirghātaiś cāparais tathā: Literally, "with nirghātas and others as well." This phrase can also be rendered as "and with other nirghātas as well." The exact sense of the term nirghāta, normally, "hurricane, thunderbolt, calamity," is not clear in this context. Ct and Cr understand the term to refer to a kind of mechanical weapon that makes a loud noise like a thunderbolt (nirghātās tadvanmahādhvanayo yantrāyudhaviśeṣāḥ—so Ct). Ck reads nipātaiḥ for nirghātaiḥ but gives the same gloss as Ct, leaving us to infer that, like Cv, he understands the term nipāta in the same sense as aśani, "thunderbolt" (nipātair aśanaiḥ—so Cv). Cm and Crā note simply that this is the name for a type of weapon (nirghātasaṃjñakāyudhaviśeṣaiḥ—so Cm). Cg reads the variant nikhātaiḥ, for which he glosses, "a type of weapon (āyudhaviśeṣaiḥ)." He does, however, note the critical reading, glossing it as aśanaiḥ, "with thunderbolts, vajras, or missiles." Gorresio, following his commentator Cl, who glosses prahāraiḥ, "with blows" (misprinted as prahāiaiḥ [1858, vol. 10, p. 292, n. 42]), translates, "con colpi," and understands the reference to be to the blows of all weapons listed (p. 87). Gorresio further notes that if one takes the term in its usual and obvious sense (along with his reading āyasaiḥ, "iron," for our aparaiḥ, "others"), one gets the meaning "with storms of iron (con bufere de ferro)."

6. "panicked" saṃbhrāntamanasaḥ: Literally, "their minds bewildered."

7. "the rākṣasas . . . The rākṣasas" rākṣasāḥ . . . rākṣasāḥ: The verse has but a single finite verb and thus appears to be a single sentence. Several of the commentators, however, note that such a sentence would contain the glaring redundancy of repeating the subject, "rākṣasas." They propose two solutions to this problem. Cv, Crā, Cm, and Cg propose supplying an additional finite verb, babhūvuḥ, with the sense "they were, they became," of which the second occurrence of the word rākṣasas would be the subject and the adjective jitakāśinaḥ, "having a victorious air," the predicate. We have followed this suggestion. Cr provides a somewhat forced interpretation whereby the first occurrence of the term must be read as a kind of lakṣaṇā with the sense of "possessing many rākṣasas." His idea is that the two terms together mean "rākṣasas who possess, i.e., command, many rākṣasas." The two terms then both refer to the rākṣasa officers (rākṣasāḥ bahurākṣasavanto rākṣasāḥ). This interpretation has been followed only by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1702), which translates, "ogres, who were followed by (many more) ogres." Other translators collapse the two terms.

"in their excitement" hṛṣṭāḥ: Literally, "excited." Here, as at 6.65.4, the sandhi makes it possible to read either dhṛṣṭāḥ, "courageous," as Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 86) has done, or hṛṣṭāḥ, as we and other translators have done (Dutt 1893, p. 1382; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 234). We have chosen this latter interpretation because of the repeated mention in the text of the characters roaring in excitement. V,B3,D9–11,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead dṛptāḥ, "proud, arrogant."

"took on an air of victory" jitakāśinaḥ: Literally, "having the appearance of victory." See 6.42.9–10 and note.

8. "stopped . . . in their tracks" vārayāmāsa: We take the verb in its regular sense of "to check, block, ward off." Cr, however, glosses, "he covered (ācchādayāmāsa)."

9. "had been stopped in their tracks" vāritān: See note to verse 8 above.

10. "Stay where you are" tiṣṭha: Literally, "Stand!"

"I challenge you to single combat" mayā sārdhaṃ dvandvayuddhaṃ dadāmi te: Literally, "I give you dual combat with me." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read bhaviṣyati, "there will be," for dadāmi te, "I give to you."

"I shall rob you of your life" tyājayiṣyāmi te prāṇān: Literally, "I shall cause you to abandon [your] life breaths."

See note to verse 12 below for a discussion of Cm's devotional reading of this passage.

11. "back then" tadā: Literally, "then." The event referred to is described at Araṇyakāṇḍa 27–29.

"Therefore, when" yat: Literally, "since, wherefore."

"I think" smṛtvā: Literally, "having remembered or recalled." D6,7,9,T1,2,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead dṛṣṭvā, "having seen."

"the author of that foul deed is standing right before me" madagrataḥ svakarmastham: D10,11,G3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read tad- for mad-, "me." Ct and Ck and the translators who follow their text, interpret this to mean "since that day (taddināditaḥ)." This variant has some bearing on the interpretation of the compound svakarmastham, which is somewhat obscure in its connotation and allows for a variety of readings. Given the critical reading, the adjective must unambiguously refer to Rāma, although its meaning is subject to debate on the part of the commentators. Cr understands that Rāma is described as being engaged in his own proper activity, that is, that he is intent on killing the rākṣasas (svakarmaniratam rākṣasavadhaparāyaṇam ity arthaḥ). Cv and Cg understand that Rāma should be the appropriate object (karma) of the action of killing, that is, he should be killed just as he killed Makarākṣa's father [Khara]. (svakarmasthaṃ vadhakarmasthaṃ. yathā pitā hatas tathā vadhyam ity arthaḥ.) Cg offers, as a second alternative, "practicing actions that are in keeping with the code of the kshatriya class (kṣātradharmakarmānutiṣṭhantam)." Ct and Ck understand, "you who were the agent of the action that took the form of killing [my] father (pitṛvadharūpakarmakartāraṃ tvām)." Cs, reading tadagrataḥ, takes, as his first interpretation, the adjective to refer not to Rāma but to Makarākṣa's father, Khara. According to this interpretation, the term would mean "devoted to the law of the rākṣasas (rākṣasadharmaniratam)." The idea here is that Khara was minding his own business when he was murdered by Rāma. Among the translators consulted, only Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 87), who, however, reads anāgasam, "innocent, guiltless," in place of madagrataḥ, takes the adjective to refer to Khara, rendering "che non avea colpa e stava intento al suo ufficio." Cf. ManuSm 10.1, where the term svakarma- is used to refer to the activities proper to the various varṇas, or social classes. Crā, Cm, Cg, as a third alternative, Cv, as a second alternative, Cs, as a second alternative, and Ct, quoting Cm and his variant madagrataḥ, break up the sequence svakarma, normally, "one's own actions," into su+a+karma, "extremely improper action." This is the interpretation that we, along with the majority of the translators consulted, have followed. Dutt (1893, p. 1382) ignores the commentators and the -stham, rendering, "thy action."

"my rage redoubles" roṣo 'bhivardhate: Literally, "anger grows."

See note to verse 12 below for a discussion of Cm's devotional reading of this passage.

12. "My whole body is burning fiercely" dahyante bhṛśam aṅgāni . . . mama: Literally, "my limbs are burning fiercely." As Cg, Ck, and Ct suggest, Makarākṣa's anguish is caused by his failure to avenge himself on Rāma earlier, for revenge would have eased his anguish (tadānīm eva dṛṣṭaś cet pratikāreṇa tāpaḥ śāmyed ity arthaḥ—so Cm, Cg).

"evil-minded" durātman: It is perhaps this epithet that inspires Cm to offer an alternative inner devotional meaning for Makarākṣa's words up until this point. According to this interpretation, Makarākṣa's threat to kill Rāma in verse 10 is really an entreaty for Rāma to stay and kill Makarākṣa with his arrows in single combat. In the present verse, Cm offers a heavily forced reading of the epithet, durātman, taking it as an epithet of praise in the sense of "one whose heart is essentially compassionate even for evildoers (duṣṭeṣv apy ātmāntaḥkaraṇaṃ dayāsāraṃ yasya he rāghava)." Cm reads verses 11 and 12 as a single sentence, the sense of which is that Makarākṣa failed to see Rāma, who, before killing him, killed his father, who was devoted to evil deeds, and that is why Makarākṣa did not die at Rāma's hands at that time. As a result of his failure to be killed at that time, Cm goes on, Makarākṣa's anger, manifested in the burning of his limbs, has grown. (tasmāt tvaddhastavadhābhāvād iti śeṣaḥ. aṅgāni dahyante roṣaś cābhivardhata iti saṃbandhaḥ.)

"back then" tasmin kāle: Literally, "at that time." As several of the commentators point out, the reference is to the time that Rāma killed Makarākṣa's father, Khara, as described at 3.29.24–28.

13. Cm subjects this verse to his familiar devotional reading. He understands its purport to be that Rāma, who is the Lord of the universe, is sought by all creatures, starting with Brahmā, as eagerly as a deer is by a hungry lion. Thus, Makarākṣa has been desperately longing for the sight of Rāma and cannot describe his good fortune at having found him. (siṃhasya siṃhasadṛśasya kṣudhārtasya tvaddarśanaṃ kadā bhaviṣyatīti kṣudhayārtasya mṛga iva mṛgyate brahmādibhir iti mṛgaḥ sarveśvaro 'ta evetaraḥ prapañcātīto 'ta eva kāṅkṣitaḥ. brahmādibhir iti śeṣaḥ. etādṛśas tvaṃ diṣṭyā madbhāgyena darśanaṃ prāpto 'si. ato madbhāgyaṃ kiṃ varṇyata iti bhāvaḥ.)

"I find you here right before my eyes" darśanam . . . mama tvaṃ prāptavān iha: Literally, "you have come here to my sight."

"I have been as desperate to catch you as a famished lion is a deer." kāṅkṣito 'si kṣudhārtasya siṃhasyevetaro mṛgaḥ: Literally, "you are desired as is some other animal by a lion oppressed by hunger." Several of the commentators understand that the phrase itaro mṛgaḥ means an animal other than a lion (siṃhetaramṛgamātram—so Ct).

14. Cm characteristically reverses the sense of this verse. According to his reading, Makarākṣa is saying that he himself will go to the realm of Yama through the force of Rāma's arrows, while Rāma will rejoin those heroes, Sugrīva, etc., who will not have been slain by Makarākṣa. (tvayā bāṇavegenādya pretarāḍviṣayaṃ gato bhaveyam iti śeṣaḥ. ato man matsakāśād ye śūrāḥ sugrīvādayo 'nihatās taiḥ saha sameṣyasīti sambandhaḥ.)

"to the realm of Yama, king of the dead" pretarāḍviṣayam: Literally, "to the realm of the king of the departed." Cr, the only commentator to treat this term, glosses, "you will enter the range of sight of Yama (yamasya viṣayaṃ dṛṣṭipathaṃ prāptas tvam)."

"you shall meet the heroes" śūrāḥ saha tais tvaṃ sameṣyasi: Literally, "the heroes . . . you shall meet with them." V2,3,B1,3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read vasiṣyasi, "you shall dwell [with]," for sameṣyasi, "you shall meet."

15. "the two of us" tvāṃ māṃ caiva: Literally, "you and me alone."

16. "in the midst of this great conflict" mahāhave: Literally, "in the great battle." D3,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead raṇājire, "on the battlefield."

"give battle" vartatāṃ yudhi: Literally, "proceed in battle." Cg and Cm supply the third person polite pronoun bhavān, "you sir," to agree with the third person imperative. D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read the neuter singular nominative or accusative mṛdham, "battle," which can then serve as the subject of the verb, with the sense of "let the battle proceed."

"skilled" abhyastam: Literally, "practiced."

"even your bare hands" bāhubhyāṃ vā: Literally, "or with your two arms."

17. "this speech of the endlessly talkative Makarākṣa" makarākṣavacaḥ . . . uttarottaravādinam: Literally, "[had heard] the words of Makarākṣa . . . [spoke] to the one who talked on and on."

Following verse 17, B1,2,D5–7,9–11,S insert, while Ś2,Ñ,V,B3,4,D1–3,8,12,13 continue after 1506*, a passage of two lines [1503*]: " 'Why do you boastfully utter all these vain words, rākṣasa, which so ill befit you? You cannot be victorious on the field of battle without a fight, merely on the strength of your words.' "

The reasoning of the critical editors in omitting this verse is unclear. It occurs in all manuscripts consulted for the critical edition except for Ś1 and D4.

18. "fourteen thousand rākṣasas" caturdaśa sahasrāṇi rakṣasām: Rāma kills the fourteen thousand rākṣasas at Araṇyakāṇḍa 23.

"Triśiras, Dūṣaṇa, and the one who was your father" pitā ca yaḥ / triśirā dūṣaṇaś cāpi: Rāma slays Triśiras at 3.26.16–17, Dūṣaṇa at 3.25.7–10, and Khara, Makarākṣa's father, at 3.29.24–28.

19. "their sharp beaks and fangs and their hooked claws" tīkṣṇatuṇḍanakhāṅkuśāḥ: Literally, "with sharp beaks and claw-hooks." We have rendered the word -tuṇḍa-, "beak, mouth, snout," here as "beaks and fangs," so as to accurately characterize the jackals mentioned in the list of scavengers. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 264), followed by

Pagani (1999, p. 1087), appears to take the metaphorical term aṅkuśa, "hook, goad," here to mean "fangs."

Following verse 19, Ś2,Ñ,V,B1,3,4,D1–4,7–9,12,13,G1,2,G3 (after verse 20) insert a passage of two lines [1506*]: "Then, their mouths dripping with blood and their wings bloody, the birds will disperse in great delight by land and air in all directions." The verse appears in the text and translation only of Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 88 = Gorresio's edition 6.58.30). However, Dutt (1893, p. 1382), in a footnote, observes that it is found "in all N.W.P. texts, and in one or two texts published in Bengal." He provides a synopsis of its meaning.

20. "When Rāma had addressed him in this fashion" evam uktas tu rāmeṇa: Literally, "but thus addressed by Rāma." D7,9–11,G1–3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead rāghaveṇaivam uktas tu, "addressed in this fashion by Rāghava." The critical apparatus mistakenly prints rāghaveṇaim for rāghaveṇaivam.

"Khara's son, the night-roaming rākṣasa" kharaputro niśācaraḥ: Ś2,D2,7–12,G1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read makarākṣaḥ, "Makarākṣa," for kharaputraḥ, "Khara's son," while D7,9–11,13,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read mahābalaḥ, "of great strength," for niśācaraḥ, "night-roaming rākṣasa." The resulting vulgate reading would then mean "mighty Makarākṣa."

21. "with a hail of his own arrows" śaravarṣeṇa: Literally, "with a shower of arrows."

"the golden-fletched arrows" rukmapuṅkhāḥ: Literally, "having golden fletching."

"by the thousand" sahasraśaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead suvāsasaḥ, "well-clothed," that is, "beautifully feathered" (compare 6.63.7). Only Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 264) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 233) render the variant, understanding it to mean that the arrows are richly adorned with jewels.

23. "of their bowstrings striking their armguards" jyātalayoḥ: Literally, "of the bowstring and the armguard." The technique of archery, it seems, precludes taking the term tala in its sense of either "hand" or "palm," as has been done by some translators (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1703 and Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 235). The term tala is also used to indicate the leather armguard used by archers to protect the forearm from the blows of the bowstring. It has been taken in this sense by Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 88), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 264), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 233), and Pagani (1999, p. 1088). The text does not make it clear as to whether an armguard or gauntlet is intended. One should note, however, that, in the Bālakāṇḍa, when Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa set out on their journey with Viśvāmitra, they are described as wearing "wrist and finger guards." See 1.21.8 and note. Compare 6.67.25; 6.76.2,24; 6.81.26–27; and notes. See, too, 6.77.30, 1701*, where several of the commentators explicitly take the term in the sense of "armguard (jyāghātavāraṇam)." Cf., too, n. 4 to App. I, No. 9, following notes to verse 6.13.5.

"The deafening sound" svanotkṛṣṭaḥ: We follow Cg, the only southern commentator to remark on this word. He glosses, "outstanding among sounds (svaneṣūtkṛṣṭaḥ)." Cm notes that the sound emitted by the bow is the sound of the bowstring (dhanurguṇasvanaḥ). D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead svano 'nyonyam. This has been interpreted by Ct and Ck to mean that the sounds of the two bows mingled with each other (anyonyaṃ dhanurmuktaḥ svano 'nyonyamiśraḥ—so Ct). Cr understands that the sound was heard mutually, i.e., by Rāma and Makarākṣa (dhanurmuktaḥ svano 'nyonyaṃ śrūyate). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 264) and Pagani (1999, p. 1088) follow Ct in understanding that the sounds of the two bows are commingled.

Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1703) follows Cr, while Dutt (1893, p. 1383) idiosyncratically understands the two references to sound in the verse (śabdaḥ and svanaḥ) to be to "the outcry of the heroes" and "the twang of the bows," respectively.

"then" tadā: B3,D4,9,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead a second, and therefore redundant, particle iva.

24. "assembled in the sky" antarikṣagatāḥ: Literally, "[were] located in the sky."

25. "As they pierced each other's bodies" viddham anyonyagātreṣu: Literally, "[There was] a piercing in each other's limbs."

28. "the rākṣasa's" rakṣasaḥ: Ś2,Ñ,V1,2,B2,4,D1–3,6,8–13,T2,3,G1,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead saṃyuge, "in battle."

"the chariot-horses" rathāśvān: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. The critical editors provide numerous variants for the reading, most of which have similar meanings. D9 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead hatvā aśvān [with hiatus], "having slain the horses."

29. "the . . . rākṣasa . . . took his stand on the ground" atiṣṭhad vasudhāṃ rakṣaḥ: D5,10,11,T1,G3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead tat tiṣṭhad vasudhāṃ rakṣaḥ, "that rākṣasa standing on the ground."

Following verse 29, D7,10,11,G1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr insert a passage of three lines [1508*]: "That huge and terrifying lance was Rudra's gift, so difficult to obtain.[1] Blazing fiercely in the sky, it seemed like a second weapon of universal destruction.[2] Upon seeing it, all the gods fled, terror stricken, in every direction."

[1]"difficult to obtain" duravāpam: Most of the translators consulted understand the term here to mean "hard to grasp, seize, or steal."

[2]"a . . . weapon of universal destruction" saṃhārāstram: Literally, "divine weapon-spell of destruction." Presumably this is the weapon Rudra uses in his role as universal destroyer.

This passage is absent from most manuscripts of the text of Cg and from VSP. It appears, however, in brackets in KK (6.79.33), with the notation that it is found in seven of the manuscripts collated for that edition.

30. "blazing" prajvalantam: Cr understands the participle to have a causative sense, glossing, "burning up enemies (parān prajvālayat)."

"in that great battle" mahāhave: Ś2,V,B1,2,4,D1–3,5–12,T,G1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead mahātmane, "at great [Rāghava]."

31. "But . . . with three arrows" bāṇais tu tribhiḥ: D1,7,9,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead bāṇaiś caturbhiḥ, "with four arrows."

33. "the great beings, stationed in the sky" bhūtāni . . . nabhogatāḥ: Cv and Cg explain the apparent disagreement in gender by citing Pā 7.139 (supāṃ suluk), which allows for the substitution of declensional endings in certain cases. Cr, however, understands that two classes of beings are mentioned: the terrestrial divinities, such as the goddess Pṛthivī, etc., and the celestial gods (bhūtāni pṛthivyādidevā nabhogatā devādayaś ca). No doubt the reference is to the great assemblage of supernatural beings mentioned in verse 24 above.

"of wondrous deeds" adbhutakarmaṇā: D7,9–11,G1,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead akliṣṭakarmaṇā, "tireless in action."

34. "Halt! Stay right where you are!" tiṣṭha tiṣṭha: Literally, "Stand! Stand!"

35. "Seeing Makarākṣa rushing toward him" taṃ dṛṣṭvā patantam: Literally, "having seen him rushing or flying."

"the divinely charged weapon of Agni, the purifier" pāvakāstram: Literally, "the astra of Pāvaka." It seems apparent here that Rāma is deploying one of the many divine weapons at his disposal. Some translators, however, understand, simply, "a fiery or flaming arrow."

37. "Then, when . . . harried by Rāma's arrows" rāmabāṇārditās tadā: D3,7–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead rāmabāṇabhayārditāḥ, "afflicted with the fear of Rāma's arrows."

38. "like" iva . . . yathā: Only Cg among the commentators consulted remarks on the redundancy of the two synonymous particles. He notes that they join to yield the same single meaning (dve apy avyayapade saṃbhūyaikārtham evācakṣāte).

The meter is puṣpitāgrā.

The commentators disagree as to the timing of Makarākṣa's death. Ct, the commentator who is generally most concerned with dating the events of the battle, claims that the event takes place before midnight on the night of the ninth [of the dark half of the month of Āśvina] (navamyāṃ pūrvarātre 'sya vadhaḥ). See note to 6.61.7, etc. Cm (and Cg implicitly) understand that Makarākṣa's death takes place on the tenth lunar day [of the dark half of the month of Phālguna/Chaitra] (daśamyāṃ makarākṣavadhaḥ). Cg (as alternate opinion) and Cv understand that Makarākṣa's death marks the completion of the tenth day [of battle] (makarākṣavadhena daśamam ahaḥ samāptam—so Cv). See note to 6.4.4.

Sarga 67

1. "victorious in battle" samitiṃjayaḥ: This stock epithet is perhaps somewhat ironic in the present context. A number of translators render it in the sense of "who had up until now or generally been victorious."

Following 1ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1513*]: "Seized with tremendous anger, he gnashed his teeth. Then, furious, he brooded as to what he should do."

2. "you must slay" jahi: Literally, "kill." Cm, while acknowledging the manifest meaning (prātītikārthaḥ) of the verse, argues, characteristically, that there is an inner meaning. This meaning, he claims, is brought out if we read the imperative of the root √han, jahi, "kill," as an irregular imperative of the root √hā, "to abandon (jahīhi)." The idea here is that Rāvaṇa is really telling Indrajit that, although he may have defeated Indra, he has no chance of killing the humans Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa and so had better leave them alone. The sense, he continues, is that, since they are unconquerable, he should abandon all hope of victory. (balādhikas tvaṃ saṃyuge 'dṛśyo dṛśyamāno vā sarvathendraṃ dṛṣṭvā jayasi tathāpi mānuṣāv api rāmalakṣmaṇau saṃyuge vadhiṣyasi kim. na vadhiṣyasi. atas tau jahi tyaja. ohāk tyāge iti dhātoḥ. tayor asādhyatvāt tajjayaviṣayāśāṃ tyajeti bhāvaḥ.) Cf. 6.59.52 and note.

4. "the purifying sacrificial fire" pāvakam: Literally, "the purifier."

5. "rākṣasa women, bearing red turbans" raktoṣṇīṣadharāḥ striyaḥ . . . rākṣasyaḥ: According to Ct and Ck, these women are sacrificial attendants (homaparicārikāḥ). Cg and Cr note that they bring the turbans for the officiating priests to wear (ṛtvigdhāraṇārthaṃ raktoṣṇīṣāṇy ānayantya ity arthaḥ). Cg further substantiates this idea by quoting a vedic passage in which ṛtvik priests are described as wearing red turbans (lohitoṣṇīṣā ṛtvijaḥ pracarantīti śruteḥ). A number of the translations consulted understand that the women themselves are wearing the turbans. We find this unlikely. Pagani thus renders, "coiffées de turbans rouges" (1999, p. 1089). In her note to this passage (p. 1670), she indicates that the commentators understand the rākṣasa women to be carrying out the duties of the sacrificers ("Ces rākṣasī au turban rouge font, d'après les commentaires, office de sacrifiants"). This, however, as noted above, is not quite correct. See 6.60.22 and notes, where red garments are associated with black magic. Cf. 6.58.45–46; 6.59.21; and notes, where red garlands appear inauspicious. Cf. AgniP 229.14, where red garments, garlands, etc., betoken ill when seen in dreams. Cf. 6.15.2; 6.106.2–3 and notes.

6. At 6.60.22–25, Indrajit performs virtually the identical sacrifice before proceeding into combat with the monkey army and Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa.

6.67. 6 = 6.60.22. See notes to that passage.

7. 6.67.7ab is a close variant of 6.60.23ab.

6.67.7cd = 6.60.23cd. See notes to that verse.

8. 6.67.8a is a close variant of 6.60.24a.

6.67.8bc = 6.60.24bc. See notes to that verse.

6.67.8d is a close variant of 6.60.24d.

"When kindled and fed the oblation of rice-gruel" caruhomasamiddhasya: Literally, "kindled with the oblation of caru." D6,7,9–11,T,G (T1,G3 read cāru),M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read śara- for caru-, lending the compound the sense "fed the oblation of śara leaves or arrows." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read the variant found at 6.60.24.

"betokening victory" vijayaṃ darśayanti: Cm argues that the signs point to victory or success with respect only to the oblation and that there will be no victory [for Indrajit] in battle. Therefore, Cm concludes, we are to understand that the only victory for the rākṣasas will be for the survivors to make it back to Laṅkā. (śarahome vijayaṃ darśayanti. anyatra yuddhe vijayo nāsti tathāpi jīvataḥ punar laṅkāpraveśa eva jaya ity avagantavyam.) Ct echoes this last point. See note to 6.20.24.

9. 6.67.9 is virtually identical to 6.60.25. See notes to that verse.

10. "and thus gratified the gods, dānavas, and rākṣasas" tarpayitvātha devadānavarākṣasān: Ct and Ck are, naturally, disturbed at the idea of offering vedic sacrifices to demonic beings. Ct and Ck understand that the rākṣasas are those to whom black magical rites are to be offered (abhicārayāgīyān iti śeṣaḥ).

"Indrajit mounted" āruroha: Literally, "he mounted."

"which could be rendered invisible" antardhānagatam: Literally, "gone to invisibility." Given the description of the chariot in the following verses, we are to understand that the chariot is not yet invisible, but, as the commentators note, it has the capacity to become invisible (antardhānaśaktiyuktam—so Cg). Compare note to verse 15 below.

*11. "and a mighty bow fastened in place, that magnificent chariot looked splendid" āropitamahācāpaḥ śuśubhe syandanottame: The reading syandanottame in pāda d, and, indeed, both pādas c and d themselves, are poorly attested. The line is not known to Ś,Ñ,V2,3,B1–3,D1–4,8,12,13, or to either of the printed editions that represent the northern recension. Since it is almost entirely lacking in the north, it should have probably been excised from the critical text. Of the southern manuscripts, D5–7,T2,3,G,M, as well as the texts and printed editions of Cr, Cg, Cm, and Cv, read the nominative singular syandanottamaḥ for the critical edition's locative syandanottame. Only four manuscripts, D9–11,T1, three of them devanāgarī, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read with the critical edition. Given this textual situation, we have emended in favor of the former reading, which makes better textual and contextual sense than that of the critical edition. Translations that follow the text of Ct are confronted with a certain awkwardness. They resolve the issue in one of two ways. They may take the compound āropitamahācāpaḥ to mean "with a great strung bow" and take the compound to modify Indrajit, who then is described as looking splendid on his magnificent chariot (so Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 266; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 235; and Pagani 1999, p. 1089). The idea that the bow is already strung is contextually awkward in light of verse 20 below, where Indrajit is said to first string the bow. Or, like Dutt (1893, p. 1385), they may take the even more farfetched position that the bow itself is the subject of the clause ("and a huge bow, set with sharp arrows, appeared beautiful on that excellent car").

12. "with motifs of arrows, moons, and half-moons." śaraiś candrārdhacandraiś ca: Literally, "with arrows and with moons and half-moons." D6,7,9–11,T2,3,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read mṛgaiḥ, "with deer or wild animals," for śaraiḥ, "with arrows." We agree with the commentators who understand that these are painted or embossed motifs. (mṛgair mṛgākārapratimābhiḥ. candraiś candrākāraiḥ. ardhacandrai racanāviśeṣaiḥ—so Cg.)

13. "a . . . conch" -kambuḥ: The commentators who remark on this verse are unanimous in understanding the term to refer to a bracelet or circlet (valayaḥ) for which meaning they cite Amarakośa 3.3.116. All but one of the translations that render this verse follow this interpretation, understanding either that the flag has a golden ring emblazoned on it or is encircled with golden bracelets. The most common meaning of kambuḥ, however, is "conch shell." Given the prominence of this article as an auspicious battle trumpet in the epics, we believe it is more probable that it would be represented on a battle flag than would a ring. Pagani is the only translator to share our belief (1999, p. 1089). The term kambuḥ can also mean "elephant," which is yet another possibility in this context, as animals are often used as images on such battle standards. Compare, for example, Arjuna's well-known epithet kapidhvaja, or Śiva's epithet ṛṣabhadhvaja.

"lapis" vaidūrya-: This could also be translated as "cat's-eye beryl" or "emerald." Cat's-eye beryl is traditionally said to be found on a mountain in Sri Lanka (Mt. Vidura). Vaidūrya is sometimes translated as emerald, which is a green variety of beryl. Lapis lazuli comes largely from the mountains of Afghanistan (in the region of the Kokca River). See Mayrhofer 1956–1980, vol. 3, pp. 267–68 and Apte (s.v.). See, too, notes to 3.30.9; 4.13.5–8; and 5.5.1.2–3. Cf. 6.1.12; 6.3.13; 6.7.45; 6.15.2; 6.17.2; 6.52.12; 6.90.5–7; 6.109.22–27; 6.116.42; and notes.

14. "And protected as he was by the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā, as brilliant as the sun" tena cādityakalpena brahmāstreṇa ca pālitaḥ: The appearance of the two occurrences of the conjunctions ca and the instrumental pronoun tena has led two of the translators consulted to understand that Indrajit is protected by something in addition to the brahmāstra. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 236) appears to view the battle standard described in the previous verse as the additional article, rendering, "protected by it and by the possession of the Brahmāstra, which shone like the sun." The translator of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1706), however, renders, "protected by that chariot, effulgent as the sun, as well as by the missile presided over by Brahmā." See 6.10.36 and note.

15. "mantras peculiar to the rākṣasas" rākṣasair mantraiḥ: Literally, "with rākṣasa mantras." According to Ct, Cg, and Cm, the term refers to magical spells invoking the demoness of chaos, Nirṛti (nirṛtidevatākaiḥ—so Cg, Cm). Cr explains, "mantras that are well known exclusively to the rākṣasa race (rākṣasakulamātraprasiddhair mantraiḥ)."

"able to render himself invisible" antardhānagataḥ: Literally, "gone to invisibility." We follow Cv, Cg, and Cm, who explain that the reference is merely to Indrajit's capacity to become invisible and that therefore there is no contradiction with verse 17 below, where he actually vanishes. Compare note to verse 10 above.

16. "those two false forest ascetics" mithyāpravrajitau vane: Literally, "the two wandering vainly in the forest." Cr, the only commentator to address this phrase, understands, "those two, i.e., Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, who wandered to, that is, came into, the forest to no purpose (mithyā nirarthaṃ yau vane pravrajitāv āgatau tau rāmalakṣmaṇau)." He has been followed by most of the translators consulted, with the exception of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 237), who, like us, understands the phrase to mean "false or fraudulent ascetics." He renders, "those two pseudo-ascetics who roam the forest." Our understanding, we believe, is in keeping with the rākṣasas' constant jibe against the heroes as false ascetics and follows the interpretation of Cs, who glosses, "fraudulent renunciants (kapaṭaviraktācārau)." See, for example, 5.18.25.

"a great victory in battle" jayam . . . raṇādhikam: Literally, "victory, that is battle-great." The adjective presents a slightly unusual syntax. D6,9–11,T2,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the facilior raṇe 'dhikam, "great [victory] in battle." D7,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cm offer an alternative facilior, raṇārjitam, "earned or garnered in battle."

17. "Once I have cleared the earth of monkeys" kṛtvā nirvānarām urvīm: Literally, "having made the earth monkey-free. Ñ1,V3,B1,3,D1–4,7,9–11,13,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read adya, "this very day," for the gerund kṛtvā, "having made." This reading presents a syntactic difficulty that the commentators resolve in one of two ways. Cr simply instructs us to supply the gerund kṛtvā, "having made (kṛtveti śeṣaḥ)." Ct inserts the gerund kṛtvā into his gloss. Cg, however, makes urvīm, "the earth," the object of the finite verb karisye, "I will make or do," in pāda c, yielding the sense "having slain Rāma along with Lakṣmaṇa, I will clear the earth of monkeys." This stratagem, however, leaves the accusative prītim, "delight," in pāda c, ungoverned by any verb. To remedy this, Cg proposes that we understand an adverbial phrase, "in regard to the pleasure (prītiṃ prati), which he then glosses as "with reference to the pleasure (prītim uddiśya)."

"and slain Rāma along with Lakṣmaṇa" hatvā rāmaṃ salakṣmaṇam: Cm characteristically finds a way to read this verse in the context of the preceding verse by inverting its manifest meaning. As elsewhere, he exploits the lexical option of understanding the root √han, normally, "to strike or kill," in the sense of √gam, "go or approach." He thus can understand the gerund hatvā in the sense of "having approached," when it refers to Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, and as "having slain," when it refers to the monkeys. According to him, the real meaning is that Indrajit plans to kill the monkeys, sparing Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. (raṇe salakṣmaṇaṃ rāmaṃ hatvā gatvā vane yau mithyā pravrajitau rāmalakṣmaṇau vineti śeṣaḥ. āhave hatvā vānarān iti śeṣaḥ.) Ct appears to take umbrage at this explanation. Without mentioning its author, he remarks, "a forced commentary offered out of an intention of praising Rāma is quite false because the poet and the one who recites his composition have no such intention. (rāmastutiparatayā kleśena vyākhyānaṃ tad vṛthaiva. kaveḥ kavinibaddhavaktuś ca tathā tātparyābhāvād iti.) See note to 6.27.9.

"I will have given my father the greatest delight." karisye paramāṃ prītim: Literally, "I will make supreme pleasure." As Cg indicates, we must carry over the word "father" [from verse 16 above] (pitur ity ādhyāhāraḥ). Ct similarly supplies the word.

"he became invisible" antaradhīyata: Cr notes that the meaning here is that Indrajit desisted from speaking (vacanād upararāmety arthaḥ).

18. "fierce . . . pitiless" tīkṣṇa- . . . tīkṣṇaḥ: Literally, "sharp . . . sharp."

"Indrajit . . . foe of Indra" indraripuḥ: Literally, "the foe of Indra."

19. "As they prepared to unleash" sṛjantau: Literally, "releasing." Ct, Cg, and Cm gloss the future participle srakṣyantau, and we believe, given the context, that they are right to read the present participle here inceptively.

"they resembled three-headed cobras" nāgau triśirasāv iva: Commentators differ both as to the basis for and the type of this figure. Ck, Ct, and Cr understand that the image is derived from the appearance of the quiver and bow on either side of each hero's head. They all take the figure to be an utprekṣā (tūṇīdhanuḥsambandhāt triśiraso nāgatvotprekṣā—so Ct). (See Gerow 1971, pp. 131ff.) Cg sees no reference to weapons but rather to the broad and elevated arms and head characteristic of great men (rāmalakṣmaṇayor mahāpuruṣalakṣaṇapṛthulonnatabhujaśiraskatvaṃ dyotyate). He understands the figure to be a dṛṣṭānta. (See Gerow 1971, p. 199.) Cs understands that the heroes have on one side a quiver and on the other the tip of their bows, with their heads rising between the two. Cs offers an alternative understanding of the figure, taking the term nāga, "cobra," in the sense, permitted by the Viśvakośa, of "cloud," in which case we are to envisage three-headed storm clouds about to release showers of rain. (triśirasau ekatra tūṇy aparatra cāpakoṭir madhye śiraś ceti triśirasāv ity arthaḥ. nāgau sarpau. toyaṃ sṛjantau nāgau meghau triśirasau cet tāv iva sṛjantāv iti vā. nāgaḥ krūrācāreṣu toyada iti viśvaḥ.) This trope is also used to describe Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa at 1.21.7, where the commentators offer a variety of similar but not identical explanations of the image. Some of them suggest that the heroes wear two quivers (see note to 1.21.7). In our opinion, the figure is neither an utprekṣā nor a dṛṣṭānta but rather what the alaṃkāraśāstrins would define as an utpādyopamā in which the upamāna (in this case the three-headed cobra) does not, in fact, exist (see Gerow 1971, pp. 151–52). Cf. abhūtopamā, where the upamāna is hypothetical but generalized (Gerow 1971, p. 149).

20. "inundated them" saṃtatāna: Literally, "he covered." The verse provides no direct object for the verb. Printed editions of Ct read saṃtatān iṣudhārābhiḥ, which is difficult, if not impossible, to construe. The critical apparatus, however, indicates that the text of Ct reads saṃtatāra, "he traversed," which also, if it is not simply a misprint, makes little sense here. Ct's explanation is that we are to understand the verb in the sense of "he filled" and then supply the words "all directions." (saṃtatān [sic] pūrayāmāsa. sarvā diśa iti śeṣaḥ.) Among the translations, only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1707), which reads with the critical edition, incorporates this idea, rendering, "covered the quarters."

"as, with a downpour, might a storm cloud charged with rain" parjanya iva vṛṣṭimān: Literally, "like a cloud charged with rain." The term parjanyaḥ, here rendered as "cloud," can equally well refer to Parjanya, the rain god, and several translators have taken it thus. Given the adjective vṛṣṭimān, "charged with rain," however, it seems preferable to understand the term in its generic sense of "cloud or storm cloud." See 6.18.9–10; 6.116.9–10; and notes. Cf. 6.94.15 and note.

21. "In his chariot, he flew up into the sky" sa tu vaihāyasaṃ prāpya sarathaḥ: Literally, "he, having reached the sky together with his chariot." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead sa tu vaihāyasaratho yudhi, "possessing an aerial chariot, in battle."

22. "Beset on every side" parītau: Literally, "surrounded, overwhelmed."

"invoked a divine weapon-spell" divyam astraṃ pracakratuḥ: Literally, "those two made or activated a divine weapon-spell." We agree with the interpretation of Cr, who glosses "the invocation of their mantras (divyam astraṃ tanmantrābhimantraṇam)" for divyam astram, "divine astra."

23. "who resembled gods" surasaṃkāśau: D9,11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read the instrumental plural sūryasaṃkāśaiḥ, "resembling the sun," which would then modify śaraiḥ, "with arrows," in pāda d.

"did not so much as graze Indrajit" tam . . . naiva pasparśatuḥ: Literally, "those two did not touch him."

24. "he had created dense darkness" dhūmāndhakāram . . . cakre: Literally, "he made smoky darkness." As several of the commentators note, Indrajit accomplishes this by means of his supernatural powers of illusion (māyā). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 267), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 236), and Pagani (1999, p. 1090) all read the compound as a dvandva, in the sense of "smoke and darkness."

"so as to obscure the heavens" pracchādayan nabhaḥ: Literally, "covering the sky." We agree with Cg and Cm, who understand the present participle here to indicate cause or purpose (hetau śatṛpratyayaḥ—so Cg).

"shrouded in a murky fog" nīhāratamasāvṛtaḥ: Literally, "enclosed by fog-darkness." D5–7,T, and the texts and printed editions of Cm, Cg, and Cr read instead the plural -tamasāvṛtāḥ, in which case the adjective would modify diśaḥ, "directions," instead of Indrajit. Only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1707) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 237) render this variant.

"make it impossible to see in any direction" diśaś cāntardadhe: Literally, "he disappeared the directions." As several of the commentators point out, we must read the simplex here as a causative: "he caused [the directions] to disappear (antardhāpayāmāsa—so Ct, Cr)."

25. "the sound of his bowstring striking his armguard" jyātalanirghoṣaḥ: See 1.21.8 and note; and notes to 6.66.23; 6.76.2,24; and 6.77.30, 1701*.

"his chariot wheels and horses' hooves: nemikhurasvanaḥ: Literally, "the sound of wheel rims and hooves."

"as he darted to and fro" caratas tasya: Literally, "of him who was moving."

26. "With his torrent of iron arrows . . . let loose a veritable and prodigious downpour of arrows" śaravarṣam ivādbhutam . . . vavarṣa . . . nārācaśaravṛṣṭibhiḥ: Literally, "with a shower of iron arrows, he showered, as it were, a wondrous shower of arrows."

The figure is rather awkward in that it compares a shower of iron arrows to a shower of arrows. Ñ,V3,B2–4,D4,5,9–11,13,T1,G1,2,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read śilāvarṣam ivādbhutam, "like a prodigious hailstorm or like a prodigious shower of stones," for śaravarṣam ivādbhutam, "as it were, a wondrous shower of arrows." This reading is not only superior from a rhetorical point of view but is well supported textually.

"the great-armed warrior" mahābāhuḥ: Literally, "the great-armed one." The identity of the warrior is not specified. Because there has been no explicit change of subject since verse 24, where Indrajit covers the sky with darkness, and because the weapons mentioned here, nārācas, "iron arrows," are the same as those belonging to Indrajit at verse 18, it seems clear to us, as it does to most of the translators consulted, that the warrior described here must be Indrajit. On the other hand, Cr clearly identifies the warrior here as Rāma. In this he is followed only by Pagani (1999, p. 1090).

"dense and blinding darkness" ghanāndhakāre timire: The phrase is somewhat redundant, as its literal meaning is "in the dark, dense darkness." The commentators explain in various ways that the intended meaning is "pitch or blinding darkness (ghane nibiḍe 'ndhakāre dṛṣṭyupaghātake timire tamasi—so Cr)."

27. "who had been granted a boon" dattavaraḥ: Ñ,V,B1,2,4,D1–4,6,7,10,11, T2,G1,2,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the instrumental plural dattavaraiḥ, which would then modify the arrows rather than Indrajit. Although in this reading the syntax of the compound is rather muddled, the sense must still be that the arrows were given to Indrajit as a boon. In any case, it is probable that the verse refers to the various boons of weapons, spells, and skill that Indrajit is said to have acquired from Brahmā. See 6.36.10 and note.

29. "arrows" patagāḥ: Literally, "flying ones." This noun normally refers to birds, flying insects, or the sun. As Ck suggests, however, here we have to understand the word in the sense of "arrows (patagā bāṇāḥ)."

30. "afflicted" pīḍyamānau: Literally, "being afflicted." D6,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead dīpyamānau, "blazing, burning."

"those shafts" tān iṣūn: Literally, "those arrows."

"as they rained down" patataḥ: Literally, "falling, flying."

31. "in any direction from which" yataḥ . . . tatas tataḥ: Literally, "from which . . . to whichever." The idea here seems to be that, since Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa can neither see nor hear Indrajit, they can retaliate only by aiming along the trajectory of his incoming arrows.

"raining down" nipatitān: Literally, "falling or flying down."

32. "whose divinely charged weapons flew swiftly" laghvastraḥ: Literally, "whose astras were light or agile." Ñ2,V1,B2,4,D3,6,7,9,10,T2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the accusative dual laghvastrau, which would then describe Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. Cr, who reads this variant, explains, "whose divinely charged weapons moved great distances in a short time (laghūny alpakālena bahudūraṃ pracalanaśīlāny astrāṇi yayos tau)."

33. "with those finely made . . . arrows" susaṃhitaiḥ: Literally, "with those well put together [things]." The referent, "arrows," has been supplied. Ñ1,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead susaṃhataiḥ, "compact, dense."

"like twin kiṃśuka trees covered with crimson blossoms" puṣpitāv iva kiṃśukau: Literally, "like two blossoming kiṃśukas." The kiṃśuka tree (Butea frondosa), with its red blossoms, is frequently used as an object of comparison for heroes covered with the blood of their own wounds. Cr, however, proposes here that it is the arrows themselves and not the wounded heroes that resemble kiṃśuka blossoms, because they are made of gold and smeared with the blood of the many creatures they have previously slain (suvarṇamayatvena nihatabahujanturudhirāktatvena ca śarāṇāṃ kiṃśukapuṣpopamā). See 6.35.9; 6.55.22; 6.62.19; 6.76.28; and notes. See, too, note to 6.30.26, App. I, No. 18, lines 27–30, n. 2. Cf. 6.54.11.

34. "No one could follow Indrajit's movements, nor could anyone discern" nāsya veda gatiṃ kaścin na: Literally, "no one knew his path nor." Ñ2,V1,B2,D5,10,11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read vega[gatiṃ], "swift movements," for veda gatim.

"Nothing whatever of his could be discerned as if he were the sun hidden behind a dense mass of clouds." na cānyad viditaṃ kiṃcit sūryasyevābhrasaṃplave: Literally, "nor was anything else whatever known as of the sun in a mass of clouds." D7,9–11,G2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead asya, "of him," for anyat, "other," in pāda c. GPP (6.80.35) reads na nāsya. Although this all-but-meaningless double negative is noted in the critical apparatus as belonging to B (GPP), it is almost certainly a typographical error peculiar to GPP. NSP reads cāsya with the critical edition. See 6.37.11; 6.67.36; 6.93.15; 6.95.24; 6.101.36; and notes. See, too, 6.99.24, 3132*, lines 7–8, and n. 4.

35. "robbed of their life breaths" gatāsavaḥ: Literally, "their life breaths gone."

36. "the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā" brāhmam astram: Nowhere does the poem make clear how or when Lakṣmaṇa acquired the spell governing this ultimate weapon. One may note, however, that Lakṣmaṇa is said to use this divine weapon-spell to kill Kumbhakarṇa at Mahābhārata 3.271.16. See note to 6.55.124.

37. "Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks" lakṣmaṇaṃ śubhalakṣaṇam: This is yet another of the alliterative etymological epithets of which Vālmīki is so fond. See 6.14.3; 6.71.20; 6.73.5; 6.75.16; 6.79.1; 6.89.4; and notes. See also R. Goldman 1984, p.105.

"all the rākṣasas of the earth" rakṣāṃsi pṛthivyām: Literally, "the rākṣasas on the earth." On the issue of the extermination of all the rākṣasas, see R. Goldman 2006.

38. Rāma here is exercising his familiar role as a teacher and upholder of the norms of brahmanical civilization in reminding Lakṣmaṇa of the rules of chivalrous combat as laid out in the nītiśāstras. The idea, as Ct and Ck explain it, is that the deployment of the brahmāstra would be a violation of the rules of chivalry, since it would inevitably destroy the six named categories of rākṣasas who had ceased to fight. Moreover, these commentators add, it would result in the (most undesirable) death of Vibhīṣaṇa along with the rest of his race. (ayudhyamānatvādiṣaṭprakārāṇām api sarvarakṣauddeśena brahmāstrasaṃdhāne vadho bhavati na tu tad yujyata ity arthaḥ. antato vibhīṣaṇasyāpi nāśaprasaṅga ity āśayaḥ—so Ct.)

"A foe": The referent has been added.

"is fleeing, or is caught off guard" palāyantaṃ pramattaṃ vā: Given the context, it is almost certain that we are to understand the adjective pramatta in its sense of "careless, negligent, off guard." Ñ2,V1,B2,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead palāyamānaṃ mattaṃ vā, "is fleeing, or drunk."

39. "mighty warrior" mahābala: Literally, "O one of great strength." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahābhuja, "O great-armed one."

"let us strive" yatnaṃ kariṣyāvaḥ: V1,3,B1,3,D1,2,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the first person singular yatnaṃ kariṣyāmi, "I will strive," for the first person dual.

"Let us summon" ādekṣyāvaḥ: Literally, "we shall instruct or command." The verb ā √diś is used similarly at Mahābhārata 3.163.33 in the sense of employing or invoking a divine weapon-spell. Cg and Cm, the only commentators to remark on the term, gloss, "we shall employ (prayokṣyāvaḥ)."

40. "if . . . could but see" dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen." Cr explains that the sense here is that Rāma is suggesting his own extraordinary ability to accomplish the unprecedented (etena svasyāghaṭitaghaṭanāpaṭīyastvaṃ sūcitam). Ct believes that the reference is an allusion to the episode in the Rāmopākhyāna in which, after Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa have been cured of the wounds inflicted by Indrajit, Vibhīṣaṇa presents them with magical water that has been brought by a yakṣa from King Kubera himself. This water, when applied to the eyes of Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and the monkey warriors, enables them to counteract the illusory power of Indrajit and see him. Ct quotes Mahābhārata 3.273.10–12 to support his claim.

"they could then overpower and slay" balāt . . . nihaniṣyanti: Literally, "they will forcibly kill."

41. For a similar idea, see 6.47.122, where Rāma tells Rāvaṇa that there is no place for him to hide.

"no matter where he may hide" evaṃ nigūḍho 'pi: Literally, "even though he be hidden in this fashion." Cr raises the question of how Indrajit is to be killed if, after being revealed, he should once again become invisible. He argues that this verse answers this question, in that Rāma's statement suggests his own ability to see everything and the fact that his arrows are both sentient and unstoppable (etena svasya sarvadarśitvaṃ bāṇānāṃ cetanatvam avyāhatagatitvaṃ ca sūcitam).

"robbed of his life breaths" gatāsuḥ: See note to verse 35 above.

42. "the great hero . . . the great man" mahātmā . . . -pravīraḥ . . . mahātmā: No commentator who shares the critical reading remarks on the redundancy of using the word mahātmā, "great," twice in a single sentence. We have attempted to soften the redundancy by breaking the verse into two sentences. D9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read mahārtham, "of great significance," in place of the first occurrence of the term. This adjective refers not to Rāma but to his speech (vacanam).

"urgently began to contemplate how to kill" vadhāya . . . tvaritaṃ nirīkṣate: Literally, "he swiftly seeks in order to kill." The expression is somewhat elliptical. Cg fleshes it out, glossing, "he pondered a means [for killing] (upāyaṃ cintayati sma)." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1709) appears to incorporate this suggestion, reading the adverb tvaritam, "urgently," as an adjective modifying the supplied term upāyam, "means." He renders, "began to reflect on the speedy means."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila with a hypometric pāda a.

1. According to Cr, this verse suggests that Indrajit is terrified of Rāma and, further, that this then suggests that Rāma is understood to be the Supreme Being (paramātmā) by the vedic passage found at Taittirīyopaniṣad 2.8.1 (Taittirīyāraṇyaka 8.8.1, etc.), where the vedic gods are said to act in fear of the ātman. (etenendrajito bhītatvaṃ sūcitam. tena rāmasya bhīṣāsmād vātaḥ pavata ityādiśrutigamyatvaṃ sūcitam.) Cm and Cg remark that the third syllable of the verse, the syllable ya of vijñāya, represents the nineteenth syllable (yáḥ) of the Gāyatrīmantra (ṚV 3.62.10), which they believe is mapped onto the text of the Rāmāyaṇa. Cg adds that this therefore marks the completion of eighteen thousand verses of the text. See note to 6.1.1.

"when Indrajit realized" vijñāya: Literally, "having realized." The critical text provides no explicit subject.

"what great Rāghava had in mind" manas tasya rāghavasya mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "the mind or thoughts of great Rāghava." Ct and Ck suggest that Indrajit is thinking, "He surely intends to kill me with the power of his divine astras (divyāstrabalena sarvathā māṃ jighāṃsatīti jñātvā)."

2. "that immensely lustrous hero" mahādyutiḥ: Literally, "the one of great luster." D6,7,9–11,T2,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead [a]tha rāvaṇiḥ, "now, Rāvaṇi."

"those courageous rākṣasas" rākṣasānāṃ tarasvinām: As Ct, Cg, and Cm point out, the reference is to the great fallen rākṣasa warriors, such as Kumbhakarṇa, etc.

3. "through the western gate" paścimena dvāreṇa: Cg notes that, if Indrajit plans to demoralize Rāma and his forces by displaying the illusory form of Sītā prior to his visiting the Nikumbhilā grove to perform a sacrifice for the sake of invincible weapons, he must display it to Hanumān, the only one among the monkeys who would be able to recognize her. Hanumān is, of course, stationed at the western gate (6.28.27) (sītāsvarūpābhijñāsyānyasyābhāvād dhanumate māyāṃ darśayituṃ paścimadvāreṇa nirgata ity āha). Ct, in his comment on the following verse, argues that Indrajit uses the western gate because he is intending to go first to the Nikumbhilā grove, where he performs his black magical rites (6.69.23). Recall that the grove is thought to be on the western side of Laṅkā. Cf. notes to 5.22.41; 6.60.18–19; 6.69.23; and 6.71.13.

4. "perceiving" dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen." Cg notes that, since Indrajit has exited by the western gate, he could not possibly see Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa (who are stationed at the northern gate [6.28.30]) (paścimadvāraniṣkrāntasya rāmalakṣmaṇadarśanāsambhavāt). He therefore glosses vicintya, "having realized [that] or having thought." Keeping in mind Cg's caution here, we have rendered, "perceiving," to minimize the visual element.

"his power of magical illusion" māyām: We follow Ct and Cg, who gloss, "the power to confuse others (paravyāmohakarīṃ śaktim)."

5. "in the midst of his vast host" balena mahatāvṛtya: Literally, "having surrounded with a large army." The syntax of the clause is somewhat unclear, as no explicit object of the gerund is indicated. Cg appears to understand the gerund as indirectly linked to the locative rathe, "on his chariot," in pāda a. He explains, "having surrounded [his chariot] with the army that was present. We are to supply the word yukte, 'connected'; the sense being that he placed 'Sītā' in his chariot, which was provided with (yukte) [an army]. (āvṛtya sthitena balena. yukta iti śeṣaḥ. yukte rathe sītāṃ sthāpya.)"

"he made as if to kill her" tasyā vadham arocayat: Literally, "he chose or preferred her killing." Our translation is based on the fact that Indrajit does not actually "kill" the illusory Sītā until verses 28–29 below.

6. "that very evil-minded rākṣasa" sudurmatiḥ: Literally, "that very evil-minded one."

"displaying every intention of killing Sītā" hantuṃ sītāṃ vyavasitaḥ: Literally, "resolved to kill Sītā."

7. "from the city" nagaryāḥ: V3,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead sarve te, "all those [monkeys]."

9–10. Compare this passage with the elaborate and highly poetic description of Sītā at 5.13.18–36. Pagani (1999, p. 1670), in a footnote to this passage, argues that this description has two purposes: 1) to express Sītā's sorrow through her aspect of mourning; and 2) equally to demonstrate her fidelity to Rāma by maintaining the air of an ascetic that she bore in the forest, thus guaranteeing her chastity. In fact, it merely demonstrates Indrajit's skill in replicating Sītā as she appears in her desolation.

"now much worn" parikliṣṭa-: Literally, "fatigued, troubled." Ct and Cr gloss, "soiled (malinam)," and most of the translations consulted follow this interpretation. Only Pagani (1999, p. 1092) appears to agree with us that the reference is to the worn or threadbare character of the phantom Sītā's garment. Compare 5.13.20, where Sītā's garment is described as kliṣṭa-, "worn."

"unwashed" amṛjām: Ck, Ct, and Cr understand the term to mean that Sītā was devoid of the embellishment of such things as unguents, etc. (udvartanādisaṃskārarahitām—so Ct). Cm takes the reference to be exclusively to the absence of unguents, while Cg sees the term as referring to Sītā's lack of either unguents or ornaments. See 5.13.20 and note, where Sītā is described as lacking ornaments, which may lend some credence to Cg's alternative explanation. Compare, too, 6.102.7 and note. See also S. Goldman 2000.

11. "After observing her closely for a moment and concluding that she was indeed Maithilī" tāṃ nirīkṣya muhūrtaṃ tu maithilīm adhyavasya ca: Literally, "having observed her, Maithilī, for a moment, he formed a resolution." Hanumān is able to recognize Sītā because she is in the same desolate state in which he had encountered her in the Sundarakāṇḍa. See 5.5.13 and notes.

Following 11ab, Ñ2,V1,B2,4,D5–7,9,T,G2,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg insert, while Ś1,B3,D8,10–12,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct substitute for 11cd, a passage of one line [1537*]: "For he had seen Janaka's daughter not long before."

Following either 11ab or 1537*, Ñ2,V,B1,2,4,D1–3,5–7,9,T,G2,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, and Gorresio (after 9cd) insert a passage of one line [1538*]: "Having seen Maithilī in the chariot, dejected, her body smeared with dirt . . ."

12–13. "Sītā" sītām: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead dīnām, "dejected."

"in the clutches of the rākṣasa lord's son" rākṣasendrasutāśritām: Literally, "dependent on the son of the lord of the rākṣasas."

"thought, 'What does he mean to do?' Then, after voicing this concern" abravīt . . . kiṃ samarthitam asyeti cintayan: Literally, "he said . . . thinking, 'What is his intention?' " The syntax of the two verses is rather awkward. The finite verb abravīt in 12a appears to float independently of any actual direct address or direct object, which is extremely rare in the epic. Commentators propose two alternative constructions. The first, which we have more or less followed, is that of Ct, Ck, and Cg. Their idea is that we read the quotation marker iti to govern both the participle cintayan, "thinking," and the finite verb abravīt, "he said" (kim asya samarthitam abhipretam iti svayaṃ cintayan san vānarān praty api kiṃ samarthitam asyety abravīt—so Ct). In this way, we understand that Hanumān first entertains his thought and then voices it to his monkey companions. Cr resolves the problem by taking the participle cintayan not in the sense of "entertaining a specific thought" but in its sense of "brooding, worrying" (cintayañ cintāṃ prāptaḥ sann asyendrajitaḥ kiṃ samarthitam abhipretam ity abravīd vānarān pratīti śeṣaḥ). His idea is that Hanumān is worried at the sight of Sītā and then utters his rhetorical question. Neither solution seems ideal to us.

14. "he seized . . . by the head" mūrdhni . . . parāmṛśat: Literally, "he grasped or touched on the head." As Ct and Cr point out, Indrajit actually seizes Sītā by her hair (keśapāśe). This understanding is borne out in verse 16 below. The idea seems to be that Indrajit pulls up the head of the phantom Sītā by the hair in preparation for cutting off her head. Several of the translators consulted understand that Indrajit touches or rubs Sītā's head with his sword or brandishes it over her head, but this seems unlikely in the context. On the theme of seizing someone by the hair in the epics, see Hara 1986. D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead akarṣayat, "he dragged," for parāmṛśat.

15. "Rāvaṇi" rāvaṇiḥ: D7,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead rākṣasaḥ, "the rākṣasa."

16. "Sītā seized by her hair" gṛhītamūrdhajām: Literally, "her whose hair was seized."

Following 16cd, B4,D5–7,9–11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert, while Ñ2,B2,3 insert following verse 15, a passage of one line [1541*]: "Seeing Rāma's beloved queen, lovely in every limb . . ."

17. "You have seized her braid" keśapakṣe parāmṛśaḥ: Literally, "You have grasped or touched on the wing or side of the hair." Several of the commentators cite Amarakośa 1.6.98, where pakṣa is listed among other terms whose meaning is "a bunch or tuft [of hair]" (pāśaḥ pakṣaś ca hastaś ca kalāpārthāḥ kacāt pare—so Cg). The reference is, no doubt, to the single braid Sītā is said to wear during her captivity. The phantom Sītā would, of course, replicate her appearance. See 5.18.8 and note; and 5.24.32.

"you . . . whose mind has sunk to this" yasya te matir īdṛśī: Literally, "you, of whom there is such a thought."

18. "Lowest of the low!" kṣudra: Literally, "lowly or insignificant one." Cg glosses, "small- or mean-minded (alpabuddhe)."

"Criminal!" pāpaparākrama: Literally, "O [you] whose valor is evil." We follow Cg, who glosses, "whose valor is evil, that is, unrighteous (pāpo 'dharmyaḥ parākramo yasya)." Ct glosses, "O deceitful or dirty fighter (kūṭayodhin)."

19. "Taken from her home, her country, and the arms of Rāma" cyutā gṛhāc ca rājyāc ca rāmahastāc ca: Literally, "fallen from the house and the kingdom and the hand of Rāma." Cg takes the repeated conjunction ca, "and," to suggest additional elements associated with the items mentioned. Thus, he takes "home" to include Sītā's servants, "country" to include the army, and "Rāma's hand" to refer to Rāma as Sītā's protector. The idea, he suggests, is that the absence of all these things precludes the possibility of their having offended Indrajit. (gṛhāt svasadanāt. cakārāt paricārakebhyaś ca. anena bandhumukhād aparādhakaraṇaṃ nāstīty uktam. rājyād rājyopakaraṇāc ca. anena senāmukhena nāparādha ity uktam. rāmahastād rakṣakahastāc ca. tanmukhād apy aparādhaprasaktir nāstīty uktam.)

"that you should want to kill her" yad enāṃ hantum icchasi: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read haṃsi nirdaya for hantum icchasi, yielding the sense "that you strike or slay her, O pitiless one."

20. "If you kill" hatvā: Literally, "having killed."

"you will certainly die soon" na ciraṃ jīviṣyasi kathaṃcana: Literally, "there is no way you will live long."

"through this deed, for which you would deserve to die" vadhārhakarmaṇānena: Commentators who analyze this sequence break it into a vocative, vadhārha, "O you who deserve to be killed," and karmaṇā anena, "by this action." Printed editions, however, do not separate vadhārha from karmaṇā, as their editors would normally do if they read with the commentators. Translations consulted follow the reading of the commentators, with the exception of Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 93) and Pagani (1999, p. 1093), who read the sequence as we do.

"For . . . you would fall into my clutches" mama hastagato hy asi: Literally, "For you are gone into my hands."

21. "once you have lost your life and passed on to the next world" jīvitam utsṛjya pretya: Literally, "having given up life, having passed away." Cg and Cm understand that the reference is to the acquisition of the special body in which one suffers the torments of hell (yātanāśarīraṃ prāpya—so Cg, Cm). The yātanāśarīra is described at Manusmṛti 12.16.

"those worlds reserved for those who kill women" ye ca strīghātināṃ lokāḥ: Literally, "and the worlds that belong to killers of women." See note to 1.24.11 and R. Goldman 1982.

"that are despised even by others who deserve death at the hands of all men" lokavadhyaiś ca kutsitāḥ: Literally, "condemned by those who are to be killed by people." The expression is somewhat ambiguous, and the commentators differ in their interpretations. Ct and Ck understand the term lokavadhya to refer to criminals such as thieves, who, although they themselves may merit execution, still shun the worlds reserved for killers of women, which are extremely unpleasant (ye lokavadhyaiś corādibhir api kutsitā atiduḥkhitayā parihṛtāḥ). Cr believes that the expression refers to perpetrators of the cardinal sins listed in the dharmaśāstras, who are to be executed by all men. His idea is that even such profound evildoers despise the worlds set aside for killers of women and, by extension, the killers of women themselves. (lokānāṃ sarvajanānāṃ vadhyair mahāpāpibhir apīty arthaḥ. ye kutsitās tair api ye gantuṃ neṣyanta ity arthaḥ.) This interpretation would seem to be out of keeping with the tenor of the dharmaśāstras in which the killing of women is generally regarded as an upapātaka, a lesser crime (ManuSm 11.66), than those regarded as mahāpātakas, or cardinal sins (ManuSm 11.54). Perhaps the idea here is similar to what we see in the contemporary penal system, where those who kill especially vulnerable people, such as children, are often held in contempt even by other murderers. See note to 1.24.11 and R. Goldman 1982.

D6,7,M3, and the printed edition of KK (6.81.23) read the locative plural lokavadhyeṣu, "among those who deserve to die at the hands of men," for the instrumental plural lokavadhyaiś ca of the critical edition, yielding a sense quite similar to that of the critical reading. VSP (6.81.24) and the texts and printed editions of Cv, Cg, and Cm read instead lokavadhaiṣu, which these commentators analyze as the vocative loka- vadhya, "O you who deserve death at the hands of people," and eṣu, "among these," which they take to be an elliptical reference to the fourteen contemptible worlds [i.e., hells] reserved for killers of women (he lokavadhya! eṣu caturdaśalokeṣu strīghātināṃ ye kutsitā lokās tān—so Cg). This variant and interpretation are represented only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 240), who renders, "O wretch that deserve death at the hands of all the world, you shall die and go to that world, most execrated of all, to which go murderers of women!"

22. "wielding weapons" sāyudhaiḥ: Literally, "along with weapons." Cg, evidently concerned lest we think that the monkeys carry military armaments, glosses, "along with means of killing (sahananasādhanaiḥ)," letting the generic term suggest the claws, fangs, trees, and stones with which the monkeys typically fight.

23. "Indrajit . . . drove back" nyavārayat: Literally, " he drove back." We agree with Cr, who understands Indrajit to be the subject of the finite verb and who suggests supplying his name. Cm, on the other hand, takes the rākṣasa army to be the subject. In this he is followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1389) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 240).

"with his army" anīkena: M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead anīkaṃ tu, which, as Cm notes, makes the rākṣasa army the subject of the finite verb (see above).

"fearsomely swift" bhīmavegānām: D6,7,9–11,T2,3,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bhīmakopānām, "fearsome in their anger."

"the immensely powerful army . . . as it rushed onward" āpatantaṃ mahāvīryaṃ tad anīkam: Ct, Ck, and Cm understand that the use of the masculine participle āpatantam to modify the neuter anīkam is the result of an irregularity in the epic language. Our translation follows them in understanding that the monkey army is the sole object of the verb "he drove back." Cg, however, in glossing anīkaṃ ca, "and the army," appears to take mahāvīryam to be a masculine adjective modifying Hanumān. The sense would thus be "He drove back the immensely powerful one [Hanumān] and his army . . . as they rushed onward."

26. Cm notes that, while the explicit meaning of the verse is clear, the inner meaning can be extracted by supplying the adjective āśritām, "resorted to," to modify imām, "her," construing the phrase with Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. In other words, according to Cm, Indrajit is saying that he will kill Sītā, who has resorted to Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, as well as Hanumān and Vibhīṣaṇa [but not the heroic brothers]. (imām ity asya. prātītikārthaḥ spaṣṭaḥ. vastutas tu lakṣmaṇaṃ rāmaṃ cāśritām iti śeṣaḥ. imāṃ hatvā tvāṃ cānāryaṃ vibhīṣaṇaṃ ca haniṣyāmīti saṃbandhaḥ.) See note to 6.27.10.

27. "Now as to what you said . . . I would respond that" yad bravīṣi: Literally, "what you say." We follow Cg and Cr, who understand: "The [elliptical] sentence should be completed in this way: 'In that you say, "She is not to be killed," now hear the response.' (na hantavyeti yad bravīṣi tatrottaraṃ śṛṇv iti vākyaśeṣaḥ—so Cg.)"

"one must do whatever causes pain to one's enemies" pīḍākaram amitrāṇāṃ yat syāt kartavyam eva tat: Some of the commentators attempt to place Indrajit's extremely Machiavellian view within the boundaries of the discourse of the dharmaśāstras. Ct and Ck understand that one is obliged to do even sinful or proscribed things if they harm one's enemies (śatrūṇāṃ yat pīḍākaraṃ tat pāpam api kartavyam eva), while Cr argues that Indrajit's statement suggests that the deed he is about to commit does not fall within the definition of the crime of killing a woman (etena strīvadhadoṣasya nāyaṃ viṣaya iti sūcitam).

Following verse 27, D7,G1, (and presumably the text of Cr) insert a passage of two lines [1552*]: "Why did Rāma kill Tāṭakā earlier? So, I shall kill Rāma's queen, the daughter of Janaka." Indrajit's effort to justify his actions as recompense for Rāma's having killed a woman has little textual support. It is, however, discussed by Dutt in a footnote (1893, p. 1390).

29. "Hacked in two from her shoulder to her hip" yajñopavītamārgeṇa chinnā: Literally, "cut along the path of the sacred thread." The idea, as the commentators suggest in various ways, is that Indrajit cuts the illusory Sītā along the line that would be traced on someone wearing the yajñopavīta, or sacrificial thread, which normally is worn by high-caste men over the left shoulder and hanging to the right hip under the right arm (ManuSm 2.63). Pagani (1999, p. 1093) understands, "Coupée en deux . . . à la manière dont on coupe le cordon du sacrifice." But surely this is mistaken. See note to 6.63.3, App. I, No. 43, lines 15–16 and n. 11.

30. "that woman" tām . . . striyam: Ś,Ñ2,B,D1,2,7,8,12, and the texts and printed editions of VSP, KK, and Gorresio read svayam, "by himself," in place of striyam, "woman."

"Rāma's woman, whom I have slaughtered in my wrath" mayā rāmasya . . . imāṃ kopena ca niṣūditām: Literally, "her of Rāma, slain by me through anger." D7, 9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead priyāṃ śastraniṣūditām for kopena ca niṣūditām, yielding the sense "Rāma's beloved, slain with [my] weapon."

Following verse 30, D5–7,9–11,T2,3,G1,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [1553*], which continues Indrajit's speech: "Vaidehī has been slaughtered. Your efforts have been in vain."

32. "As he withdrew to the safety of his own forces" tad durgaṃ saṃśritasya tu: Literally, "of him who had taken recourse to an inaccessible place." The exact sense of the word durgam, "inaccessible place, fortress, citadel," is far from certain here. The commentators are of two minds. Ct and Ck understand the reference to be to an inaccessible location in the form of Indrajit's own flying chariot (khecararatharūpam). Most of the translators who follow the text of Ct understand some variation of "aerial citadel." Dutt (1893, p. 1390), who translates, "the castle," adds, in a footnote, "the castle built by Indrajit by means of his illusory power in the air." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1712) combines both the literal meaning and Ct's interpretation, rendering, "(aerial) chariot, which was actually difficult of access (for others)." Cg and Cm, on the other hand, understand the term durga to refer to a protective formation of rākṣasa troops that encircle Indrajit (vyūhīkṛtarākṣasapariveṣṭanarūpam). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 240), alone among the translators consulted, renders this interpretation, translating, "protected as he was on all sides by his forces." Given that no mention is made of Indrajit rising up into the sky in his chariot before the renewed commencement of hostilities in the next sarga, we are inclined to agree with this latter interpretation.

33. "thoroughly delighted . . . in profound dejection" hṛṣṭarūpaṃ . . . viṣaṇṇarūpāḥ: We follow the commentators in taking -rūpa in both cases as the suffix rūpap, in the sense of "to a great degree" (praśaṃsāyāṃ rūpap [Pā 5.3.66]—Ck, Ct).

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

1. "those bulls among monkeys" vānararṣabhāḥ: D7,9–11,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vānarā bhṛśam, "monkeys . . . intensely," yielding the sense "the monkeys [ran] as fast as they could."

"glancing back toward Indrajit" vīkṣamāṇāḥ: Literally, "looking." We follow Cm and Ct, who supply the phrase "at Indrajit (tam indrajitam)." Some translators construe the participle with the phrase diśaḥ sarvāḥ in pāda c, yielding the sense "glancing about in all directions."

2. "scattered" vidravataḥ pṛthak: Literally, "fleeing separately."

"called out to them" tān uvāca: Literally, "he said to them."

3. "Where now are all your heroics?" śūratvaṃ kva nu vo gatam: Literally, "Where indeed has your heroism gone?"

4. "Follow close behind me" pṛṣṭhato 'nuvrajadhvaṃ mām: Ś1,D10,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the negative particle na, "not," instead of the upasarga [a]nu-, yielding the peculiar sense "do not go behind me." Ct, the only commentator to have this reading, ignores it. Translators who follow the text of Ct propose a variety of meanings, such as "do not turn your back on me," "do not turn your back on the enemy," etc.

"to run away" nivartitum: Literally, "to turn back, withdraw."

5. "wise" dhīmatā: D5,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead vānarāḥ, "the monkeys."

"the monkeys were highly indignant" susaṃkruddhāḥ: Literally, "[they were] enraged." Presumably the monkeys are indignant at Hanumān's taunts about their cowardice. D5,7,G1,2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Cg read instead the redundant susaṃhṛṣṭāḥ, "greatly excited or greatly delighted." This reading is rendered only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 241), who translates, "their spirits revived."

7. "wreathed in flames" arciṣmān: Literally, "possessing flames." The idea, evidently, is that the monkeys represent flames encircling the fire that is Hanumān.

8. "like Yama, who brings time itself to an end" kālāntakayamopamaḥ: See note to 6.21.26.

9. "and . . . the great monkey" ca mahākapiḥ: D7,9–11,13,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahatā kapiḥ, "with tremendous [rage], the monkey."

"hurled . . . boulder" pātayac chilām: The point at which Indrajit and his chariot become visible is not made clear. At 6.67.39–40, Rāma appears to suggest that the use of divine missiles might render Indrajit visible to the monkeys, but there is no indication that this has actually happened. Evidently, we are to understand that Indrajit had made himself and his chariot visible in order to perpetrate the illusion of killing Sītā in sarga 68, and there is no indication that he has subsequently returned to invisibility.

10. "the chariot" rathaḥ: D7,9, and the texts and printed editions of GPP and NSP read instead the accusative ratham, which is impossible to construe in the passive construction of the verse. The critical apparatus marks this reading with the word sic. No commentator addresses this reading.

"well out of range" sudūram: Literally, "very far away."

11. "Failing in its purpose" vyartham udyatā: Literally, "raised up in vain." We follow Ct, who glosses, "deployed in vain (vyarthaṃ prayuktā)." Cs, looking ahead to verse 12, notes that there is a difference of opinion as to whether the discharge of the boulder has indeed been totally useless, since, in that verse, its fall wreaks havoc among the ranks of the rākṣasas. We agree with him that the futility of Hanumān's act refers only to his failure to achieve its intended purpose, the destruction of Indrajit and his chariot.

"It split open the earth and buried itself." viveśa dharaṇīṃ bhittvā: Literally, "having split the earth, it entered [the earth]." Pagani, alone among the translators consulted, reads the gerund bhittvā irregularly as intransitive, rendering, "se brisa," but this is not persuasive either on grammatical or contextual grounds.

12. "But in falling, it wrought havoc among the rākṣasa host." patitāyāṃ śilāyāṃ tu rakṣasāṃ vyathitā camūḥ: Literally, "But when the stone had fallen, the army of the rākṣasas was afflicted."

"Indrajit" tam: Literally, "him." We follow Cr in understanding the reference here to be to Indrajit (tam indrajitam). Indrajit, in any case, is the most recent, plausible masculine antecedent for the pronoun. (See verse 11 above.)

Following 12ab, D5–7,9–11,S (except T1) insert a passage of one line [1561*]: "The rākṣasas were completely crushed by that stone as it fell."

13. "Arming themselves" udyatāḥ: The adjective is somewhat ambiguous in the present context. It can mean "active, diligent, persevering, prepared, etc." We tend to agree with Ct and Cm, who suggest that we supply the gerund "having seized (gṛhītvā)," which would then govern the accusatives "trees and mountain peaks (drumān . . . giriśṛṅgāṇi ca)." They then understand the line to mean "having seized [trees and mountain peaks], they became ready for battle (gṛhītvā yuddhārtham udyatā babhūvur ity arthaḥ)." See note to 6.70.6.

"hurled . . . into the midst of their enemies" cikṣipur dviṣatāṃ madhye: D5,T2,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read instead kṣipantīndrajitaḥ saṃkhye, "they hurled [trees and mountain peaks] at Indrajit in battle." Here we follow Cg, who glosses the genitive indrajitaḥ with indrajitaṃ prati "toward Indrajit." D9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the accusative indrajitam, "at Indrajit."

Following verse 13, Ś,Ñ1,V2,B3,D4–13,T2,3,G,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators and Lahore insert a passage of two lines [1562*]: "Releasing a great hail of trees and boulders, the leaping monkeys slaughtered their enemies and bellowed forth their various cries."

14. "powerfully . . . by the immensely powerful" mahāvīryaiḥ . . . vīryāt: Literally, "by the immensely powerful ones from power." Ñ2,V1,B2,D7,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read mahābhīmaiḥ, "very fearsome," for mahāvīryaiḥ.

"writhed" vyaveṣṭanta: Literally, "they twisted, turned." Ś1,Ñ,V1,B2–4,D5,7–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vyaceṣṭanta, "they rolled."

16–17. "he displayed his valor" dṛṣṭavikramaḥ: Literally, "he whose valor was visible or apparent." D10,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead dṛḍhavikramaḥ, "he whose valor was firm or unyielding."

"mallets" kūṭa-: Ñ2,V1,2,B2,D10,11,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the redundant śūla-, "lances."

"The monkeys, in turn, slew his followers in battle." te cāpy anucarāṃs tasya vānarā jaghnur āhave: A number of southern and northern manuscripts and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Gorresio, and Lahore read instead te cāpy anucarās tasya vānarāñ jaghnur ojasā [Gorresio, Lahore—āhave as in the critical edition], "and with their strength [in battle—Gorresio, Lahore], his followers slaughtered the monkeys." This variant is rendered in the translations of Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 95) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 242).

18. "With sāla trees, complete with trunks and branches" saskandhaviṭapaiḥ sālaiḥ: The sāla tree is the Vatica robusta or Shorea robusta. V3,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead suskandhaviṭapaiḥ śailaiḥ, "with excellent trunks and branches, and with mountains or boulders."

19. "There is no point in defeating this army." na naḥ sādhyam idaṃ balam: Literally, "This army does not have to be defeated by us."

20. "struggling" viceṣṭantaḥ: Literally, "moving about, exerting ourselves."

"sacrificing our lives" tyaktvā prāṇān: Literally, "having abandoned or sacrificed [our] life breaths."

21. "Let us first report" vijñāpya: Literally, "having reported."

22. "calmly and deliberately" śanaiḥ śanair asaṃtrastaḥ: Literally, "slowly, slowly, unafraid."

23. "Hanumān was heading back to where Rāghava waited" hanūmantaṃ vrajantaṃ yatra rāghavaḥ: Literally, "Hanumān going to where Rāghava [was]."

"to the Nikumbhilā shrine" nikumbhilām: According to Ct, the reference is to the shrine, sanctuary, or sacred grove dedicated to the goddess Nikumbhilā. Ct adds, as an alternative, that it may refer to a [sacred] banyan tree (nikumbhilāṃ caityaṃ tadākhyādevālayaṃ vaṭavṛkṣaṃ vā). See 6.72.13 and note. According to several commentators, Nikumbhilā is said to be the name of a manifestation of Bhadrakālī worshiped at a shrine in western Laṅkā. See notes to 5.22.41; 6.60.18–19; and 6.71.13. See Rao 1914, vol. 1, pp. 356–58. According to Ct, this visit of Indrajit to Nikumbhilā's shrine takes place on the morning of the tenth day (daśamyāṃ pūrvāhne nikumbhilāgamanam). See note to 6.66.38, where Ct identifies the death of Makarākṣa as occurring before midnight on the night of the ninth [of the dark half of the month of Āśvina]. See note to 6.4.4. See, too, S. Goldman 2006b.

"to the sacred fire, purifier of all things" pāvakam: Literally, "to the purifier."

Following 23ab, D5–7,9–11,T2,3,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [1568*]: "Eager to offer sacrifice, that evil-minded one went to the Nikumbhilā shrine."

24. "The sacred fire, purifier of all things" pāvakaḥ: Literally, "the purifier."

"as . . . the rākṣasa poured oblations of blood into it" rakṣasā . . . hūyamānaḥ . . . homaśoṇitabhuk: Literally, "the eater of oblation-blood as it was being offered oblations by the rākṣasa." We follow Cg in reading the compound homaśoṇita- as a paranipāta for śoṇitahoma-, "oblations of blood," as in verse 25 below. D6,T2,3,G2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read māṃsa-, "flesh," for homa-, "oblation," yielding the sense "eater of flesh and blood." The sinister nature of Indrajit's sacrifice is evident from the sanguinary nature of the oblations. Normally blood would never be involved in a vedic sacrifice. Compare the Bālakāṇḍa passage (1.18.5), where Viśvāmitra reports to Daśaratha the defiling of his own sacrifices by the blood and flesh poured on the altar by the rākṣasas Mārīca and Subāhu.

25. "oblations of blood" homaśoṇita-: See note to the previous verse for Cg's reading of the compound.

"that fierce fire" sa tīvrāgniḥ: D10,11,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators (pace critical apparatus) read instead sutīvro 'gniḥ, "a very fierce fire." According to Ct, the intensity of the fire is indicative of the impending destruction of the rākṣasas (sutīvro 'gnī rakṣovipatsūcakaḥ).

26. "in accordance with the sacrificial injunctions" vidhānavat: D5,7,9–11,T2,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead vidhānavit, "who knew the sacrificial injunctions."

"who knew what was and was not proper conduct, stood around in their vast troops" vyatiṣṭhanta . . . mahāsamūheṣu nayānayajñāḥ: Our interpretation follows the commentary of Ct, who glosses nayānayajñāḥ, "who knew what was and was not proper conduct" with "who knew what was in accordance with the śāstras and what was not (śāstrīyāśāstrīyavidaḥ)." We understand that the phrase refers to the rākṣasas' knowledge of proper ritual performance, which makes them a knowing and appreciative audience for Indrajit's sacrifice. Ct, Ck, and Cr take the term samūheṣu, which we have rendered as "in their vast troops," to mean "in battles (yuddheṣu)," a sense for which we can find no lexical support. They construe this term with nayānayajñāḥ, to yield the sense "who knew what was and was not to be done in battles (yuddheṣu . . . kṛtyākṛtyatattvajñāḥ—so Ct and Ck)." All translations consulted that have this verse follow the interpretation of Ct, etc., with the exception of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 242), who reads the verse as we do, taking, however, samūha in its other closely related lexically supported sense of "large numbers."

The meter is upajāti with a hypermetric pāda b.

3. "lord of the apes" ṛkṣapate: See note to 6.4.17.

4. "With the words, 'So be it' " tathety uktvā: Literally, "having said, 'So be it.' " Ś,Ñ2,V1,2,B1,2,D2,3,8,12,13,G3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead tathoktas tu, "addressed in this fashion."

5. "on the road" pathi: D9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tadā, "then."

"fresh from battle" kṛtasaṃgrāmaiḥ: Literally, "who had given battle."

"breathing hard" śvasadbhiḥ: Literally, "breathing, panting, or sighing." Ct, Ck, and Cr understand that the monkeys are sighing in their grief born of recalling the murder of Sītā (sītāvipattismṛtijaduḥkhān niśvasadbhir ity arthaḥ—so Ct, Ck). We believe it is more probable that the poet wishes to express the exhaustion of the troops coming from the front.

6. "all ready for battle" udyatam: Literally, "prepared or ready." See note to 6.69.13.

7. "With his army of tawny monkeys" tena harisainyena: V2,B1,D2–6,9–11,G1,2,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read saha, "together with," for hari-, "tawny monkeys." Ct and Ck take this term to indicate that the army of apes is included. Ck adds, "and with the army of apes as well (ṛkṣasainyenāpi saha)." Ct appears to make this same comment. However, in both printed editions of Ct's commentary consulted (GPP and NSP), his gloss reads rākṣasasainyenāpi saha, "and with the army of rākṣasas as well." This seems to make little sense in the context and is probably the result of a coincidental typographical error in both editions.

"the illustrious Hanumān" mahāyaśāḥ: Literally, "the illustrious one."

9. "When I saw her like that" tāṃ dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen her."

"devastated" udbhrāntacittaḥ: Literally, "of whirling or distracted mind."

12. "unbearable" asahyaṃ ca: D5,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead anāsādyam, "unapproachable." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead asaṃhāryam, "irrepressible, unquenchable."

13. "both rational and meaningful" hetvarthasaṃhitam: We agree with the commentators, who gloss hetu as "logical argument (upapatti)" and artha as "purpose or meaning (prayojanam)," and read the compound as a dvandva. Thus, Ct glosses, "replete with logical argument and a particular purpose (upapattyā viśiṣṭaprayojanena ca sahitam)." Cg offers, however, an alternative reading of the compound as a karmadhāraya, with the sense "having a logical meaning or substance" (heturūpo 'rtho 'bhidheyo hetvārtha iti vā).

14. "the practice of righteousness . . . it is truly pointless" dharmo nirarthakaḥ: Literally, "dharma has no purpose." Depending on the precise force of the different aspects of Lakṣmaṇa's argument in this and the following verses, we have translated the terms dharma and adharma, normally "righteousness" and "unrighteousness," respectively, in a variety of ways. We refer to "righteousness" and "unrighteousness" when the abstract concepts are addressed; "the practice of righteousness" and "the practice of unrighteousness" when the reference appears to be to a mode of conduct; and "the force of righteousness" and "the force of unrighteousness" when the reference is to the power of such practices to affect one's condition and fate in this world and the next.

Not unexpectedly, all the commentators consulted have something to say about Lakṣmaṇa's agnostic views. Ct and Ck understand the thrust of Lakṣmaṇa's argument to be that because dharma is unable to protect one from calamities, it is truly pointless. It is, therefore, not one of the principal ends of mankind. Instead, we should rely principally on our own strength. (tvadāśrito dharmo 'narthebhyas trātuṃ na śaknoti yatas tasmād asau nirarthakaḥ. prādhānyena puruṣārtho na bhavati—so Ct). Cr remarks that, because the expected effects of dharma (i.e., protection) are not evident, dharma itself must not exist (etena kāryābhāvāt talliṅgakānumānāsiddhyā tadgamyadharmasyābhāvaḥ sūcitaḥ). Cv argues that Lakṣmaṇa's agnostic position derives from his perception of the calamity that has befallen his righteous elder brother and the success of the unrighteous Rāvaṇa (anena prakāreṇa nityaṃ dharmānusthāyino jyeṣṭhasyānarthadarśanān nityam adharmikasya rāvaṇasyārthadarśanāc ca). Cg, like Cr, argues that Lakṣmaṇa's position is that the failure of righteousness to protect Rāma is proof that, like the proverbial rabbit's horn, it simply does not exist, a position that, Cg continues, Lakṣmaṇa has been urging on Rāma from the time he acceded to his father's wishes back in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa. Unlike Cv, however, Cg extends the argument for nonexistence to include adharma as well, since the practice of evil has not kept Rāvaṇa from [accomplishing] his goals. (nirarthako 'vastubhūtaḥ. apramāṇika iti yāvat. śaśaviṣāṇavat kevalavyavahāramātrāvalambano dharmo 'narthebhyo vyasanebhyas trātuṃ vyasanāni nivārayituṃ na śaknoti . . . adharmo 'pi nirarthakaḥ san rāvaṇam arthebhyo na nivārayituṃ śaknoty ity arthaḥ.) Cm offers two explanations for Lakṣmaṇa's heresy. His first is that Lakṣmaṇa completely loses his faith in dharma, since his mind has been clouded by the enormity of the disaster that has befallen Rāma in the form of Sītā's apparent death (sītāvadharūpaduḥkhapradarśanāc ca svayaṃ vyasanāsātiśayena kaluṣitāntaḥkaraṇaḥ san dharma eva nāstīty āha). Cm's second, and more moderate, explanation is that, although Lakṣmaṇa actually understands the validity of dharma and adharma, he [temporarily] denies it in his overwhelming distress and in his anger at having been prevented from using the brahmāstra. (yadvā lakṣmaṇo dharmādharmayor hitāhitasādhanatvaṃ jānann api sītāhananaśravaṇajaśokākrāntacittaḥ sann anavaratadharmasevinā raghunāthena . . . brahmāstraprayoganivāraṇeṇa krodhāviṣṭaḥ san dharmādharmayor arthānarthahetutvaniyamaṃ nirākaroti.) In the end, Cm is uncertain whether to understand the term nirarthaka, "pointless," to mean that dharma is genuinely an empty concept (anupādeya) or whether it is merely incapable of being demonstrated (niṣpramāṇakaḥ). Cs's explanation is similar to those of the other commentators. However, he does offer an alternative inner meaning (āntarañgikabhāvapakṣaḥ), whereby Lakṣmaṇa is, in fact, affirming the power of dharma to save one from calamity (tathā hy anarthebhya evaṃvidhebhyo dharmas tvāṃ trātuṃ śaknoti yataḥ sa na nirarthaka iti). Most of the commentators agree that Rāma's righteous character is demonstrated by his having obeyed his father's instructions, while his control of his senses is proven by the fact that he entertained no evil thoughts toward Kaikeyī and Daśaratha for having deprived him of his rightful inheritance. Several of the commentators document their claims with quotations from various parts of the Rāmāyaṇa.

"the path of virtue" śubhe vartmani: Literally, "on the good or auspicious path." Cm glosses, "the path of righteousness (dharmamārge)," while Cs offers, "the path ordained in the vedas (vedavihite . . . mārge)."

15. "the force of righteousness . . . it does not exist" dharmaḥ . . . nāsti: Literally, "dharma does not exist." What Lakṣmaṇa means here is not that there is no such thing as a concept or code of dharma but that its practice has no real force or effect on the fortunes of those who either submit to it or violate it. Ct paraphrases Lakṣmaṇa's position, saying that only directly perceptible things actually exist. He then steps a bit outside the normal role of the commentator to take issue with this argument, which he equates, oddly enough, with what he terms the "Buddhist" position, that there is no rebirth. Ct's rejection of what is actually Lakṣmaṇa's statement of the cārvāka, or materialist, view is that the imperceptibility of an object does not mean that it does not exist, as in the case of such creatures as piśācas, etc. (sthāvarāṇāṃ jāñgamānāṃ ca paśvādirūpāṇāṃ bhūtānāṃ darśanaṃ sukhāparokṣadarśanaṃ yathāsti tathā dharmo nāsti. asāmarthyād anadhikārāc ca tasmād dharmaḥ sukhasādhanatvavyāpto neti me matiḥ. janmāntarādikaṃ nāsty eveti bauddhamateneyam uktiḥ. na hi taṃ vinā jāyamānasyāpi tatkaraṇakatvam iti bhāvaḥ. yat tu yathā sthāvarādīnāṃ darśanāt tatsattā tathā dharmasya darśanābhāvād dharmo nāstīti vyācakṣate tan na. yogyānupalambhasyaivābhāvasādhakatvāt. dharmasya ca piśācādivad ayogyatvāt.) Cs quotes Ct, whom he criticizes on the grounds that his argument is derived from the doctrine of the cārvākas, an argument he also associates with Cm. Cs then provides an alternate inner interpretation of the verse, according to which Lakṣmaṇa's position is merely a pūrvapakṣa, and that, in fact, over time, dharma becomes manifest. He does this in part by reading the sequence dharmas tena nāstīti me matiḥ—which we translated as "since . . . that force of righteousness . . . it is my opinion that it does not exist"—as dharmas te na nāstīti me matiḥ, which he interprets to mean "it is my opinion that with respect to you dharma does not not exist (i.e., does exist) (dharmas te tvadviṣaye na nāstīti me matiḥ)."

See note to verse 14 above.

16. "This thing called 'righteousness' " ayam arthaḥ: Literally, "this matter."

"is not demonstrable in the same way that moving and fixed objects are" yathaiva sthāvaraṃ vyaktaṃ jaṅgamaṃ ca tathāvidham / na . . . tathā yuktaḥ: Literally, "is not proven in the way that a fixed object is manifest and a moving one of the same sort." There is a significant difference of opinion between the two groups of southern commentators as to the precise meaning of the terms vyaktam and yuktaḥ. According to Ck, Ct, and Cr, we are to understand the term vyaktam to mean that it is "manifest that animate and inanimate creatures who are not governed by dharma and adharma are, nonetheless, perfectly happy. (yathā yasmāt sthāvaraṃ vyaktaṃ dharmaprasaktirahitam api sukhīti vyaktam. tathāvidhaṃ sthāvaravad dharmānadhikṛtaṃ jaṅgamaṃ paśvādy api sukhīti vyaktam—so Ct.) For these commentators, this statement, therefore, is part of Lakṣmaṇa's logical refutation of the existence of any force of dharma, which is accomplished by the refutation of negative concomitance (vyatireka) between righteousness (dharma) and happiness. These commentators then understand the adjective yuktaḥ—which we have rendered as "demonstrable" and view as modifying arthaḥ, "matter"—to mean "connected with" and to modify tvadvidhaḥ, "[a person] like you [Rāma]." They thus understand the adjective elliptically to mean "wholeheartedly connected with or practicing dharma (sarvātmanā dharmayuktaḥ—Ct, Ck)." According to these commentators, the phrase beginning with "a person like you (tvadvidhaḥ)" serves to refute the positive concomitance (anvaya) between dharma and happiness. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1716) and Dutt (1893, pp. 1393–94) follow this interpretation. Our interpretation, along with those of the other translators, is more or less in accordance with that of Cv, Cm, and Cg, for whom vyaktam and yuktaḥ mean "perceived by direct perception" and "perceptible," respectively (vyaktaṃ pratyakṣata upalabdham . . . yuktaḥ . . . pratyakṣaḥ—so Cg)." Cm separates the two halves of the verse more clearly than the other commentators. For him, the first half merely demonstrates the imperceptibility or supersensory quality (atīndriyaḥ) of dharma but does not prove its nonexistence, since other things that are beyond the range of the senses are known to exist. The second half of the verse, for Cm, serves as a refutation of the existence of dharma since, even though it might be imperceptible to the senses, its effect, in the form of happiness, should be demonstrable. (nanv apratyakṣamātreṇa dharmanirāso nopapadyate. atīndriyasyāpi vastunaḥ sadbhāvād ity āśaṅkya bādhakatarkeṇa nirākaroti tvadvidha iti. atīndriyo 'pi dharmo yadi syāt tarhi tvadvidho na vipadyate. na caivaṃ tasmān nāsti dharma ity arthaḥ.)

"Otherwise, a person like you would not experience such suffering" tvadvidho na vipadyate: Literally, "one such as you does not experience misfortune."

17. "By the same token . . . Rāvaṇa would go" rāvaṇaḥ . . . vrajet: Literally, "Rāvaṇa would go."

"real" bhūtaḥ: Like most of the commentators, we understand this to mean "really effective, true, etc." Thus, for example, Cr understands, "obtaining its own fruit or results (svaphalaprāpakaḥ)," while Cm glosses, "real or true (satyaḥ)."

"hell" narakam: Cg, Cr, and Cm do not take the term in its literal sense of a place of punishment in the afterlife, understanding it rather in the sense of hellish suffering in this world, that is, "suffering leading to hell (narakaprāpakaduḥkham—so Cr)" or simply "calamity (vyasanam—Cm, Cg)." This interpretation makes a certain amount of sense, in that it both maintains the parallelism between Rāma and Rāvaṇa and avoids bringing into the discussion an unseen and unverifiable supernatural consequence of evil that would tend to run against the tenor of Lakṣmaṇa's rationalist argument.

See note to verse 14 above.

18. "can it be true that one obtains felicity through the practice of righteousness and that suffering arises from the practice of unrighteousness" dharmeṇopalabhed dharmam adharmaṃ cāpy adharmataḥ: Literally, "One obtains dharma through dharma and adharma from adharma." Given the tenor of the passage, one must understand that Lakṣmaṇa is uttering a rhetorical question concerning the normative connection between the practice of dharma and happiness, on the one hand, and the practice of adharma and suffering, on the other. Certainly Cg, at least, understands that we are to take the verb upalabhet, "one obtains," ironically (kākuḥ) and instructs us to read the sentence with the sense of "do you really believe that one obtains . . .? (upalabheteti manyase kim ity arthaḥ)." This appears to be the commentators' interpretation. However, none of the printed editions of the texts of the commentators contains the sequence of lines as it appears in the critical edition. Many southern manuscripts insert an additional half verse following 18ab; see below, 1573*. In this textual sequence, the word yadi, "if," from line 1574* (see below), is to be construed with 18cd, according to Ct, which makes 18cd a hypothetical statement, "If it were true that one obtained felicity through the force of righteousness, etc." The text of Gorresio apparently tries to rationalize the ambiguity of our reading by substituting the variant: "I obtain unrighteousness through righteousness, and righteousness through unrighteousness (dharmenopalabhe 'dharmam adharmeṇāpi dharmatām)." This is rendered by Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 97) as "io scorgo la virtù confuse col vizio ed il vizio colla virtù." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 294) notes, however, that the commentator on his text, Cl, interprets the passage rather differently. Cl's gloss is similar to that of the southern commentators. He glosses, "I see unrighteousness, that is, the misery produced by unrighteousness, arising from righteousness, and righteousness, that is, the happiness arising from righteousness, produced by unrighteousness (dharmeṇādharmatām adharmajanyaṃ duḥkham adharmeṇa dharmaṃ dharmajanyaṃ sukham upalabhe paśyāmi)." Gorresio concludes his note with a strange meditation on how Lakṣmaṇa's nihilistic position, which is found in two or three other passages in the epic, is a reflex of the theory of māyā, in that it negates the idea of any substantial essence in the concepts of justice and injustice, virtue and vice. These doctrines, which Gorresio characterizes as "sad and deplorable (tristi e deplorabili dottrine)," are, he suggests, inherent in the pantheism of brahmanical India.

See note to verse 14 above.

Following 18ab, D6,7,9–11,T2,3,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of all southern commentators insert a passage of one line [1573*]: "Righteousness thus becomes unrighteousness and the two are mutually contradictory."

Following verse 18, D5,7,9–11,T2,3,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of all southern commentators insert a passage of one line [1574*], which, according to Ct, has to be read with 18cd (see above): "If it were true [that one obtained felicity through the practice of righteousness and that suffering arises from the practice of unrighteousness], the suffering associated with unrighteousness would then befall those who link themselves to unrighteousness."

19. "Now, if those people who were averse to unrighteousness would thereby experience the felicity arising from the practice of righteousness, that is, if those who conducted themselves righteously would experience happiness, then they would receive their just deserts." yadi dharmeṇa yujyeran nādharmarucayo janāḥ / dharmeṇa caratāṃ dharmas tathā caiṣāṃ phalaṃ bhavet //: The verse, like many in this passage, is repetitive, elliptical, and ambiguous. Our interpretation borrows substantially from the commentators. A literal, if not entirely lucid, rendering of the verse might be: "If people who did not take pleasure in unrighteousness were to be linked with righteousness and if there were righteousness for those who behaved righteously, then that would be their fruit." See note to verse 14 above.

20. "these two concepts are meaningless" etau nirarthakau: Literally, "these two are without purpose."

See note to verse 14 above.

21. This verse, too, is obscure and textually problematic. Lakṣmaṇa's basic argument, as most of the commentators agree, is that dharma and, for that matter, adharma are transient and cease to have any effect almost instantaneously. They can therefore have no lasting effect in terms of future lives, etc. According to several of the commentators, acts of dharma, like other punctual actions, endure only for three instants (presumably of origination, operation, and cessation) and then cease to exist in the fourth. (pāpakarmāṇaḥ puruṣā yady adharmeṇa kriyāśarīreṇa vadhyante tadā kriyāyās trikṣaṇāvasthāyitvāc caturthakṣaṇe svata eva vadhakarmaṇā nāśakriyayā hato naṣṭo 'dharmaḥ svayaṃ hato 'san bhūtvā kaṃ hantavyaṃ vadhiṣyati—so Ct.)

The critical reading is particularly awkward in that the first half of the verse speaks of evildoers destroyed by adharma, while in the second half it is dharma that is destroyed by that act of destruction. With the exception of KK (6.83.22), the printed texts of the southern commentators (GPP, NSP, VSP, and Gita Press) read the sequence vadhakarmahato dharmaḥ in pāda c, "the force of righteousness would also be destroyed by the very act of destruction," as vadhakarmahato 'dharmaḥ, "the force of unrighteousness would also be destroyed by the very act of destruction," (GPP, NSP) or vadhakarma hato 'dharmaḥ (VSP and Gita Press), which is understood similarly by the commentators who share it. These variant readings have the advantage of maintaining a more intelligible parallelism between the two halves of the verse. According to the critical apparatus, the reading adharmaḥ belongs to the texts of Cr, Cm, Cg, Ck, and Ct, but not to that of Cv, who, they claim, reads with the critical edition. An examination of a transcript of a manuscript of Cv (p. 104) used by the critical editors, however, calls that reading into question. In any case, as several of the commentators note, the mention of either dharma or adharma should be taken as an upalakṣaṇa, or metonomy, to include the other. Cr attempts to improve the parallelism by arguing that, as an alternative, one could read the sequence vadhyante pāpakarmāṇaḥ, "evildoers perish," as vadhyante 'pāpakarmāṇaḥ, "non-evildoers, i.e., virtuous people, perish." This interpretation parallels the reading of virtually all the northern manuscripts, including the editions of Lahore and Gorresio, which substitute puṇyakarmāṇaḥ, "doers of pious deeds," for pāpakarmāṇaḥ. Unless we assume, as noted above, that the term dharma refers to the whole system of dharma and adharma, the critical edition's reading of dharmaḥ in pāda c is awkward at best. Northern manuscripts and printed editions that share this reading avoid the difficulty by substituting adharmeṇa for vadhakarma- in pāda c, yielding the sense "destroyed by adharma."

See note to verse 14 above.

22. "Or if we are to understand" atha vā: Literally, "or or on the other hand." The context requires us to understand that Lakṣmaṇa is advancing a hypothetical argument.

"that it is because of fate . . . fate" vihitena . . . vidhiḥ: Literally, "by what is ordained . . . fate." It seems clear to us that the two terms are intended to be synonymous here, and most of the translators consulted undersand them both to mean "destiny" or "the decree of destiny." Ct appears to understand vihitena to mean "the superior force, belonging to another, produced from the performance of [a particular part of] an ordained ritual, such as the śyena, etc. (vihitaśyenādyanuṣṭhānajātiśayenānyadīyena)." Ck understands similarly. This interpretation appears to be the basis upon which Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1717) renders, "by recourse to a (malevolent) ritual prescribed in the scriptures . . . the destiny (alone) that is engendered by the aforesaid ritual." Cr, similarly, takes the terms to refer to wrongful acts characterized by the superior force created by ordained ritual acts (vihitena kriyānirmitena kenacid atiśayarūpādiviśiṣṭenādharmeṇa . . . vidhir vihitakarmajanitasvarūpaviśeṣaviśiṣṭa eva pāpena karmaṇā). Cg understands vihitena and vidhiḥ to refer to a divinity (devatā). Cm, whom we follow, understands the terms to refer to fate (daivam).

See note to verse 14 above.

23. "the results . . . are imperceptible" adṛṣṭapratikāreṇa: Literally, "having unseen retribution." We follow Cm, who glosses, "the results of which are invisible (apratyakṣaphalena)."

"the highest good" param: Our interpretation follows that of Cg, Cm, and Cv, all of whom gloss, "the highest good (śreyaḥ)." Ct, Ck, and Cr understand the term to refer to the enemy, that is, the object of violence mentioned in the previous verse. Among the translators consulted, this interpretation is followed only by Dutt (1893, p. 1994) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1717).

See note to verse 14 above.

24. "If there really were such a thing as the power of virtue" yadi sat syāt: Literally, "if virtue were to exist." We follow Cr in understanding the phrase to mean "if virtuous action existed in such a way as to produce results (yadi sat satkarma syāt phaladāyakatvena vidyeta)."

"such a calamity" īdṛśam: Literally, "such [a thing]."

"the power of virtue does not exist" san nopapadyate: Literally, "virtue is impossible." Cm and Cg understand from the context of pādas cd that Lakṣmaṇa is stating that only evil truly exists (asad eva bhavatīty arthaḥ—so Cg).

25. "is merely auxiliary to manly effort" balam . . . anuvartate: Literally, "follows strength." The idea here, as expressed by the commentators, is that dharma may indeed exist but only as a weak force, incapable of producing results on its own. It must therefore rely on the human effort of those it favors. (ata eva klībaḥ kātaraḥ svataḥ kāryakaraṇāsamarthaḥ. dharmo balam anuvartate kāryotpādane pauruṣam apekṣata ity arthaḥ—so Cg.) The sentiment is thus similar to that expressed by the proverb "Heaven helps those who help themselves."

"blurs all distinctions" hṛtamaryādaḥ: Literally, "whose boundaries have been removed." Although the commentators tend to understand that dharma lacks the capacity to produce happiness or other results on its own, we believe that the context supports the idea that dharma is inherently unable to distinguish, in terms of its results, between those who practice it and those who do not.

"should . . . be ignored" na sevyaḥ: Literally, "is not to be practiced."

26. "merely auxiliary to manly effort" balasya . . . guṇabhūtaḥ: Literally, "is a subordinate element of strength."

"when it comes to effective action" parākrame: Literally, "in valor or endeavor." Our interpretation follows that of Cg, who glosses, "with respect to effective means of accomplishing one's object (kāryasādhane viṣaye)." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read instead the instrumental plural parākramaiḥ. Ct and Ck gloss, "with efforts (prayatnaiḥ)," and construe it with the phrase dharmam utsṛjya, "having abandoned dharma," in pāda c. This interpretation is followed by Dutt (1893, pp. 1394–95), who renders, "then carefully forsaking virtue." Other translators who follow the text of Ct interpret similarly, although they take the term in its sense of "valorous action." Cr construes the term with balasya, "effort," in pāda a, understanding, "of effort that is characterized by valorous actions (parākramair upalakṣitasya balasya)."

"abandon it" dharmam utsṛjya: Literally, "having abandoned dharma."

"devote yourself to manly effort, just as you now do to righteousness" vartasva yathā dharme tathā bale: Literally, "act with respect to strength as with respect to dharma." We flesh out the elliptical statement as the commentators suggest.

See notes to verse 14 above.

27. "then why is it that you would not imprison our father, who acted both untruthfully and cruelly toward you" anṛtas tvayy akaruṇaḥ kiṃ na baddhas tvayā pitā: Although several of the commentators shy away from the idea of Lakṣmaṇa talking about imprisoning the old king, this idea is fully in consonance with his angry speech at Ayodhyākāṇḍa 18. In fact, southern manuscripts and texts of that passage have him explicitly propose imprisoning and even executing Daśaratha (see note to Ayodhyākāṇḍa 18.15.458* = GPP 2.21.12). D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, Cr, and Gita Presss (6.83.28cd) read instead anṛtaṃ tvayy akaraṇe kiṃ na baddhas tvayā vinā. This reading is awkward and difficult to construe intelligibly. The commentators who share it and the translators who follow them struggle to make sense of it. Ct and Ck understand the passage to mean: "Are you [Rāma] not bound (baddhaḥ) by that promise, i.e., Daśaratha's [initial] promise to consecrate his eldest son Rāma despite the king's [subsequent] baseless (akaraṇe) falsification (anṛtam) [of that promise] through which he [Daśaratha] became separated from you (tvayā vinā) i.e., died? (tvayā satyavacanaṃ pitṛvacanāṅgīkārarūpasatyaparipālanaṃ dharmo 'nuṣṭhīyata iti cet tadā tvayi jyeṣṭha uktasyābhiṣekavacanasyākaraṇe yadanṛtaṃ rājñaḥ prāptaṃ tenānṛtena rājā tvayā vinā bhūtaḥ. mṛta iti śeṣaḥ. atas tena rājño 'bhiṣekakaraṇarūpasatyena tvaṃ baddhaḥ kiṃ na.)" Some variations of this theme are represented in the translations that follow Ct. Ck defends this reading staunchly against those who read with the critical edition (i.e., Cm, Cg), claiming that they chose the latter facilior reading simply to make it easy on themselves (svayojanasaukāryānusāreṇānyo 'pāṭhīt paraḥ). Ct quotes Ck's view on the absolute authenticity of his reading (sarvatra pāñktaḥ pāṭha iti katakaḥ). Ct then goes on to quote Cm but rejects his reading (= critical edition) on cultural grounds because of the incompatibility of imprisoning one's own father with the notion of honoring his commands. (tad ayuktam. pitṛbandhanasya satyavacanaparipālanarūpatvābhāvāt.) Cr notes the variant reading of Cm but rationalizes it by breaking up the sandhi so that we must read three qualifiers of dharma—anṛtaḥ, "false"; akaruṇaḥ, "pitiless"; and apitā, "not your father." Cs notes Ct's variant reading and repeats Ct's quotation and critique of

Cm, rejecting that critique as "inconsistent (asaṃgatam)" on the basis of the absence of any intention [on Rāma's part] of imprisoning his father (tasya pitṛbandhana eva tāt-paryābhāvāt).

28. "if either righteousness or human effort were to be practiced exclusively" yadi dharmo bhavet bhūta adharmo vā: Literally, "if either dharma or adharma were truly to exist." The commentators suggest that the term adharma may be understood here either in its usual sense as the opposite of dharma, i.e., "unrighteousness," or as "human effort (pauruṣam)" (adharmo dharmād anyaḥ pauruṣaṃ tad vā—so Ct). In the context of Lakṣmaṇa's exhortation of Rāma to abandon his passive dependence on dharma and to take manly action, we believe the latter alternative is best here. We also follow the commentators in understanding the phrase bhaved bhūtaḥ in the sense of "to be principally or exclusively practiced (syāt prādhanyenānuṣṭheyaḥ—so Ct)." See 6.58.40 and note.

"then the wielder of the vajra, Indra of the hundred sacrifices, would not have first slain a sage and then performed a sacrifice" na sma hatvā muniṃ vajrī kuryād ijyāṃ śatakratuḥ: Literally, "the wielder of the vajra, Śatakratu, having first slain a sage, would not perform a sacrifice." The commentators unanimously understand the reference to be to the story, well known in the vedas, epics, and purāṇas, in which Indra slays the treacherous purohita of the gods, Viśvarūpa Triśiras, son of Tvaṣṭṛ. In most versions of the story, Indra dissipates the sin of brahmahatyā he has incurred through this act, not through sacrifice but by distributing his guilt among various willing recipients. The commentators may be conflating this story with its immediate sequel in which Indra kills Vṛtra, who was created by Tvaṣṭṛ to avenge his son's death. In that episode, Indra frees himself of guilt through the performance of a vedic sacrifice, in some versions the aśvamedha. See 6.58.40; 6.116.81; and notes.

29. "When either human effort or righteousness is practiced exclusively, it destroys a person" adharmasaṃśrito dharmo vināśayati: Literally, "dharma relying on adharma destroys." We agree with all the commentators in understanding the word adharma here once again to refer to pauruṣa, "manly or human effort." See note to verse 28. The commentators fall into two schools of interpretation with regard to this enigmatic utterance. Cv, Cg, and Cm, whom we follow, understand the statement in the context of the preceding argument, which they see as holding for the practical application of either dharma or pauruṣa or both as circumstances require. As Cm and Cg put it, "both dharma and adharma destroy their agent when they are exclusively practiced in isolation from each other (niyamena pṛthak pṛthag anuṣṭhīyamānau dharmādharmau vināśayataḥ kartāram ity arthaḥ)." In the following verse, Ct ridicules this position (see note to verse 30 below). Ck and Ct understand the sentence quite differently, taking it to mean "dharma, when it is reliant upon adharma, that is, combined with human effort, destroys one's enemy (adharmasaṃśritaḥ pauruṣayukto dharmo ripuṃ vināśayati—so Ct)." Cr appears to understand the phrase in both of these senses. Translators who render the text of Ct, with the exception of Shastri, follow his interpretation. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 244), idiosyncratically, interprets the sentence to mean "If righteousness gives birth to unrighteousness, it must perish."

30. "Such is righteousness according to my way of thinking" mama cedaṃ matam . . . dharmo 'yam iti: Literally, "and this is my opinion, 'this is dharma.' " According to the interpretation of Cg and Cm, the reference here is to Lakṣmaṇa's final argument that dharma is something to be practiced optionally according to the demands of time and place (idaṃ yāthākāmyenobhayacaraṇaṃ yad ayam eva dharma iti mama matam ity arthaḥ—so Cm). Ct takes violent exception to this interpretation as Cm expressed it in his commentary on the previous verse. Ct paraphrases Cm's position and says, "it is to be ridiculed by scholars (tat tūpahasanīyam eva vyutpannair ity alam)."

"my poor brother" tāta: Our interpretation follows that of Cg, who cites the Ratnamālā for the use of the term tāta in the sense of a person deserving of pity or in the sense of one's father. (he tātānukampya. tāto 'nukampye pitarīti ratnamālā.)

"you cut off righteousness at its root" dharmamūlaṃ tvayā chinnam: Literally, "the root of dharma was cut by you." As the commentators point out, the root of dharma is political power and wealth (artha), which Rāma renounced when he relinquished the throne. (dharmasya mūlaṃ karaṇam artharūpam. tadā prāptakāle rājyam utsṛjatā tvayā chinnam—so Cg.)

31. This verse is well known and occurs in numerous versions throughout the literature. See, for example, MBh 12.8.18. See Sternbach 1965–1967, p. 220 (no. 27), pp. 407–8 (no. 79).

"all righteous actions" kriyāḥ sarvāḥ: Literally, "all actions." The force of the context in which artha, "wealth, power," is defined as the root of dharma (dharmamūla) suggests that the phrase here refers only to righteous actions. Ck and Ct understand the actions mentioned here to be of two types: spiritual actions, such as yoga, and secular activities that are conducive to pleasure (yogapradhānā bhogapradhānāś ca). Ct goes on to note that the former are performed without desire (niṣkāmatayā kṛtāḥ), whereas the latter are engaged in out of desire (sakāmatayā kṛtāḥ). Cg defines the actions as such virtuous deeds as sacrifice, charity, etc. (yajñadānādikriyāḥ). Cm simply understands that the actions are those that are the root or basis of dharma (dharmamūlabhūtakriyāḥ).

"from wealth" arthebhyaḥ: The commentators, with whom we agree, understand the term to refer to the wealth extracted from various sources and various places by a king. Cg is the most specific in describing this wealth as that which is extracted in the form of a tax of one-sixth that is levied in order to protect the people (prajāpālanāya pradeyaṣaḍbhāgakarapradhānādikāraṇāt).

"drawn and amassed from different sources" vivṛddhebhyaḥ saṃvṛddhebhyas tatas tataḥ: Literally, "increased and augmented from there and there." The two participles are overlapping in their meanings. D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read pravṛddhebhyaḥ, "expanded, augmented," for vivṛddhebhyaḥ. V2,3,D6,7,10,11, T2,3,G1,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read saṃvṛttebhyaḥ, "collected, heaped up," for saṃvṛddhebhyaḥ. In addition, many northern manuscripts (Ś,Ñ,V1,B2,4,D8,12) read samṛddhebhyaḥ, "increased." Given the division of readings, especially among the southern manuscripts, the critical reading of saṃvṛddhebhyaḥ should probably be considered doubtful.

"just as rivers flow from the mountains" parvatebhya ivāpagāḥ: Literally, "like rivers from mountains." Cg understands the simile to suggest that this means that a king's charitable and other expenditures are to be made out of accumulated interest, without the expenditure of capital (parvatebhya ity upamānena mūladhanavyayam akṛtvaivārthamūlatayā dānādikriyāḥ kāryā ity uktam). The idea is that while the rivers flow from the mountains, the mountain itself remains undiminished.

32. "and so becomes powerless" alpatejasaḥ: Literally, "of little power or energy." Ś,D9–11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead alpacetasaḥ, "foolish, of little intelligence."

"all his righteous actions" kriyāḥ sarvāḥ: See note to verse 31 above.

"cease to flow" vyucchidyante: Literally, "they are cut off or terminated."

33. "will come to crave them" sukhakāmaḥ: Literally, "possessing desire for pleasure."

"dire consequences" doṣaḥ: Literally, "fault, disadvantage, evil." Ct, Ck, and Cr understand the reference to be to the harsh punishments, such as beating and imprisonment, [which would be inflicted upon someone who attempts to acquire wealth unlawfully] (doṣas tāḍanabandhanādirūpaḥ—so Ct). Most translators consulted understand the term to refer to evil, guilt, crime, etc.

34. This verse, too, is well known and occurs in numerous versions throughout the literature. See, for example, MBh 12.8.19. See Sternbach 1965–1967, p. 214 (no. 16), pp. 408–9 (no. 80).

"A rich man has" yasyārthās tasya: Literally, "of whom there is wealth, of him [there is]..."

"is considered learned" sa ca paṇḍitaḥ: Literally, "and he is a learned man."

35. The verse is well known and occurs in numerous versions throughout the literature. See, for example, MBh 12.8.19. See Sternbach 1965–1967, pp. 408–9 (no. 79).

"highly fortunate" mahābhāgaḥ: D9–11,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the inferior mahābāhuḥ, "great-armed."

36. "I cannot imagine... what led you to such a decision" yena buddhis tvayā kṛtā: Literally, "on account of which you made your decision." The clause is highly elliptical, and we follow the commentators in supplying the phrase "I cannot imagine." Thus, Ct glosses, "I do not know the expedient (guṇa) by which you made up your mind with respect to abandoning wealth. (tvayā yena guṇena buddhir arthaparityāgaviṣayā kṛtā. taṃ na jāna iti śeṣaḥ.)"

37. "righteousness, pleasure, and profit" dharmakāmārthāḥ: Literally, "dharma, kāma, and artha." Like Cr, we understand the compound to be a dvandva referring to the three elements of the trivarga that collectively comprise all good things of this world. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the compound as a tatpuruṣa and gloss, "[who possesses] those goals (arthāḥ), that is, purposes (prayojanāni) that take the form of dharma and kāma (dharmakāmarūpā arthāḥ prayojanāni—so Ct)."

39. The verse is ambiguous and elliptical. Our translation more or less follows the interpretation of Ct, Ck, and Cr, who understand that Lakṣmaṇa is comparing Rāma to the righteous but impoverished ascetics who suffer hardships in this world.

"Those who wander about practicing righteousness" yeṣām... caratāṃ dharmacāriṇām: Literally, "of those practitioners of dharma who move about or practice." The phrase seems both redundant and elliptical, and the commentators have different opinions as to how to deal with the participle caratām. Ct and Ck supply the word dharmam, "righteousness," as the object of the participle, yielding the redundant sense of "practitioners of dharma who practice dharma." They attempt to soften the redundancy by glossing "ascetics (tāpasānām)" for dharmacāriṇām. Cr has a similar interpretation, although he reverses the terms slightly, explaining, "practitioners of dharma and so therefore practitioners, that is, people who practice asceticism (dharmacāriṇām ata eva caratāṃ tapaḥ kurvatāṃ janānām)." Cg and Cm, who follow Cv, attempt to avoid the redundancy by taking the phrase yeṣām... caratām as an anādare ṣaṣṭhī and not in apposition with dharmacāriṇām. They then understand the participle to construe as an accusative plural (carataḥ). This they gloss as vidyamānān and supplement the ellipsis with the word arthān. The phrase, then, according to them, refers to those things of value that the practitioners of dharma disregard. (yeṣāṃ caratām ity anādare ṣaṣṭhī. yeṣāṃ caratāṃ yāṃś carato vidyamānān arthān anādṛtya dharmacāriṇām—so Cg.) Cs cites an unidentified lexical source to the effect that the root √car can have the senses of "movement or eating (gatibhakṣaṇayoḥ)." He then takes gati, "movement," in its secondary sense of "knowledge," glossing caratām as "of those who possess knowledge (jñāninām)," which he construes as an adjective modifying dharmacāriṇām. This he then understands to refer to people such as seers. As an alternative, Cs proposes taking the root √car in its sense of bhakṣaṇa, "eating," in which case he sees the participle as referring to those who eat, that is, the rākṣasas. The sense of the passage then, according to him, is that Rāma lacks the resources through which practitioners of righteousness destroy the rākṣasa people (caratāṃ bhakṣayatāṃ rākṣasānām ayaṃ loko jano dharmacāriṇāṃ teṣāṃ yebhyo naśyati te 'rthās tvayi na dṛṣyanta iti vā).

"lose everything of value in this world" naśyaty ayaṃ lokaḥ: Literally, "[their] world is destroyed or perishes." We follow the majority of the commentators, who understand lokaḥ, "world," to stand for the pleasures of this world (aihikasukham—so Cr, Cg, Cm).

"Those things of value" arthāḥ: Literally, "wealth."

"the heavenly bodies" grahāḥ: Like the commentators, we understand the term in its common sense of the nine planets, including the five planets visible to the naked eye (Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn), the sun, the moon, Rāhu, and Ketu.

40. "when you were living in exile" tvayi pravrajite: G2,M2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, Cv, and Ck read instead tvayi pravrājite, "when you were banished."

41. "with feats of valor" karmaṇā: Literally, "by an act or feat." We agree with Ct, Ck, and Cr, who gloss, "by [my own] heroism or valor ([sva]pauruṣeṇa)."

Following verse 41, Ś,Ñ2,V1,B,D5–12,S insert a passage of two lines [1585*]: "Arise, long-armed tiger among men, firm in your vows! My mighty brother, do you not realize that you are the Supreme Spirit?[1]"

[1]"My mighty brother, do you not realize that you are the Supreme Spirit?" kim ātmānaṃ mahātmānaṃ mahātman nāvabudhyase: Literally, "do you not, great one, recognize your soul as the great soul?" D5,10,11,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read a second accusative, ātmānam, for the vocative mahātman, "great one." The commentators interpret the terms differently from one another. Ct understands mahātmānam to mean "the Supreme Spirit (paramātmānam)," thus understanding the half verse to mean: "Do you yourself not understand your self to be the Supreme Spirit?" Cg understands similarly but takes mahātmānam in the sense of "having a great intellect (mahābuddhim)" and the second occurrence of the term ātmānam to refer to the Supreme Spirit (paramātmānam). His interpretation would then be: "Do you not know yourself to be the wise Ātman, the Supreme Spirit?" Cg further argues that the inner meaning of the half verse is that Rāma has no reason for grief (tasmād bhavataḥ śokakāraṇaṃ nāstīti hṛdayam). Cr, the only commentator to read with the critical edition, understands, "O great-souled one! How is it that you do not know yourself, that is, the supreme nature of the self, to be the great spirit that sets all things in motion? By this is suggested that by your will alone all things come into existence. (he mahātman mahātmānaṃ sarvapravartakam ātmānaṃ svasvarūpaṃ kuto nāvabudhyase. tavaivecchayā sarvaṃ jātam iti sūcitam.)"

It is not clear to us why the critical editors have relegated this verse to the apparatus, despite the fact that it is well represented in all recensions. The verse is particularly interesting in that it is one of the few passages in the central books of the epic in which explicit allusion is made to Rāma's status as the supreme divinity. See 6.107.10 and notes.

42. "I have arisen" ayam . . . uditaḥ: Literally, "this one is arisen." Ct and Ck gloss, "zealously engaged, ready (udyuktaḥ)," while Cg offers either "zealously engaged (udyuktaḥ)" or "sprung up, born (utpannaḥ)." Cr understands the expression to refer not to Lakṣmaṇa himself but to his entire discourse on the subject of wealth, which he narrated in order to please Rāma and dispel the grief produced by hearing all the various [bad] news (priyārthaṃ vividhavṛttāntaśravaṇajanitaśokāpanodapūrvakaṃ tava prītyutpattyartham ayam arthābhāvādir udito mayā kathitaḥ). Cm offers two different explanations of the verse. In the first, he glosses uditaḥ as "sprung up, born (utpannaḥ)," in the sense that he, Lakṣmaṇa, was born to assist Rāma (tvanniyojitakāryaṃ kartum evāham utpanna ity arthaḥ). In the second, he glosses, "I narrated (uktavān asmi)," referring to Lakṣmaṇa's recent deconstruction of dharma and adharma (ayam ahaṃ dharmādharmakhaṇḍanarūpam artham udita uktavān asmi).

"to aid you" tava . . . priyārtham: Literally, "for the sake of pleasing or favoring you." Cm acknowledges this sense but offers an alternative in which he takes the prior member of the compound to be the feminine adjective priyā, "beloved," referring to Sītā. In this interpretation, Lakṣmaṇa is offering to act for the sake of Sītā, in the sense that he plans to destroy Laṅkā in order to avenge her murder (tava priyārthaṃ tava priyā yā sītā tadarthaṃ sītānidhanapratikārārthaṃ laṅkāṃ vinipātayāmīty arthaḥ).

"I shall . . . completely level" vinipātayāmi: Literally, "I shall cause to fall down or I shall destroy."

The meter is puṣpitāgrā.

Sarga 71

1. "consoling" āśvāsayāne: Commentators, some of whom read the widely distributed variant āśvāsamāne, note the irregular form and provide the correct form, āśvāsayamāne. Cg, who reads with the critical edition, is still disturbed by the tenor of Lakṣmaṇa's remarks and observes that Lakṣmaṇa's words [critiquing dharma and adharma] were uttered out of affection for his brother and are not an expression of the highest truth. (anena pūrvoktavādā bhrātṛvātsalyāt tadāśvāsanārthāḥ. na tu paramārthā ity uktam.)

"after having stationed the troops at their proper posts" nikṣipya gulmān svasthāne: As several of the commentators note, the reference is to the detachments of the monkey troops posted at the four gates of Laṅkā (gulmān svasthāne pūrvāditattaddvāre nikṣipyāvasthāpya—so Ct). Normally the term gulma refers to a military encampment. Cg understands that Vibhīṣaṇa had gone out to make sure that the troops were carrying out their duties (svakāryakaraṇārtham). Cf. 6.3.27; 6.27.20; 6.28.31; 6.31.31; 6.45.2; 6.62.5; 6.72.5; 6.84.6; and notes. See, too, 5.3.27 and note.

2. "Surrounded by his four valiant ministers" vīraiś caturbhiḥ sacivair vṛtaḥ: D6,7,9–11,T2,3,G1,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read abhisaṃvṛtaḥ, "completely surrounded," for sacivair vṛtaḥ. According to this reading, the word vīraiḥ, "valiant," must be read in its nominal sense of "heroes." See 6.11.3 and note for the four ministers who accompany Vibhīṣaṇa.

"he resembled the leader of a herd surrounded by bull elephants" mātaṅgair iva yūthapaḥ: Literally, "like a herd leader by bull elephants." D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the instrumental plural yūthapaiḥ for the nominative singular yūthapaḥ. In this reading the term must be read in apposition to mātaṅgaiḥ, in the sense of "by elephant herd leaders."

3. "the great Rāghava" mahātmānaṃ rāghavam: Cg observes that the patronymic Rāghava here must refer to Lakṣmaṇa, since Vibhīṣaṇa first appears to spy Rāma in the following verse. (atra rāghavapadaṃ lakṣamaṇaparam. uttaraśloke rāmadarśanasya vakṣyamāṇatvāt.) We believe that Cg is probably correct since, in any case, Vibhīṣaṇa would likely see the seated Lakṣmaṇa before seeing the supine Rāma, who had collapsed in the previous sarga (6.70.10–13). Among the translators consulted, only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1720) explicitly follows Cg's suggestion.

"saw . . . that the monkeys' eyes were awash with tears" vānarān . . . dadṛśe bāṣpaparyākulekṣaṇān: Literally, "he saw the monkeys whose eyes were overwhelmed with tears."

4. "the great Rāma Rāghava" rāghavam . . . mahātmānam: Literally, "the great Rāghava." See note to verse 3 above.

"who lay dazed in Lakṣmaṇa's lap" moham āpannaṃ lakṣmaṇasyāṅkam āśritam: Literally, "[him who] had entered a stupor [and] rested in Lakṣmaṇa's lap."

5. "deeply chagrined" vrīḍitam: Literally, "embarrassed."

"What's wrong" kim etat: Literally, "What [is] this?"

6. "Lakṣmaṇa . . . said these words" uvāca lakṣmaṇo vākyam idam: D5,7,9–11, T1,G1,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead the somewhat awkward lakṣmaṇovāca mandārtham, literally, "Lakṣmaṇa spoke [words] of unhappy import." Commentators note that the sandhi is irregular. Commentators and translators struggle with the adjective mandārtham. Cr explains, "from which comprehension of meaning is slow (mandena śainair artho 'rthabodho yasmāt tat)." Cg glosses, "of little import (alpārtham)." Translators who follow the text of the southern commentators differ widely in their renderings of the phrase. Dutt (1893, p. 1397) translates, "pregnant with dire import"; Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 277), "peu réfléchi"; Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 245), following Roussel, "impetuous"; Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1720), "terse"; Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 246), "briefly"; and Pagani (1999, p. 1098), "d'une voix faible."

7. "Upon hearing Hanumān report" śrutvā . . . / hanūmadvacanāt: Literally, "having heard from Hanumān's speech."

"on the spot" iha: Literally, "here." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read iti for iha. The particle serves as a quotation mark since those versions read the nominative phrase hatā . . . sītā, "Sītā has been slain," for the accusative phrase hatām . . . sītām.

8. "cut Saumitri off even as he was speaking" kathayantaṃ tu saumitriṃ saṃnivārya: Literally, "preventing Saumitri, who was speaking." Cg notes that Vibhīṣaṇa interrupts Lakṣmaṇa because he already understands the whole matter for himself (madhye nivāraṇoktiḥ sarvasya vṛttāntasya svenāvagatatvāt).

"said these deeply meaningful words to the barely conscious Rāma" puṣkalārtham idaṃ vākyaṃ visaṃjñaṃ rāmam abravīt: M3 and the texts of Cv, Cg, and Cm omit this half verse (8cd). Printed editions of Cg include it but note that it is additional. Among the translators, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 246), who follows the text of Cg, omits the half verse. We render visaṃjñam, normally, "unconscious," in its other sense of "dazed, confused, semiconscious." It is clear from the context and from the opening verses of the following sarga that Rāma is not completely unconscious, although he is in a kind of stupor from the shock of hearing about Sītā's apparent death.

9. "as would be the drying up of the ocean" sāgarasyeva śoṣaṇam: Cr and Cs remind us of the well-known epic and purāṇic legend wherein the sage Agastya drinks up the ocean in order to deprive various demons of a hiding place. Cr claims that the reference in the verse indicates that the legend was not well known at the time of the Rāmāyaṇa story (etena tatkāle agastyakartṛkasāgaraśoṣaṇaṃ na prasiddham iti dhvanitam). Cs, however, understands the simile to imply that the drying up of the ocean is impossible absent the tremendous power of such towering figures as Agastya, etc. (sāgarasya śoṣaṇam agastyādisamāveśābhāvadaśāyāṃ yathāyuktaṃ tathedam ayuktaṃ manye). See MBh 3.103; PadmaP, Śṛṣṭikhaṇḍa 19.186; etc.

10. "the plans . . . for Sītā" abhiprāyam . . . sītāṃ prati: Literally, "intention with regard to Sītā." Ct, Cr, and Cs indicate that Vibhīṣaṇa is referring to Rāvaṇa's vow never to give up Sītā, even should it cost him his own life (tadabhiprāyaṃ sarvanāśe 'pi sītā na tyājyety evaṃrūpaṃ jānāmi ca—so Ct).

"He would never countenance her murder" na ca ghātaṃ kariṣyati: Literally, "and he will not effect [her] killing."

12. The precise sense of Vibhīṣaṇa's words is hard to determine. The tenor of his argument is either that Rāvaṇa would have no reason to kill Sītā or that Indrajit would have had no means of doing so. The general idea seems to be that no one can so much as see Sītā, much less kill her. Such is the interpretation of most of the commentators and translators. Ct comments as follows: "Moreover, Sītā is impossible to see by anyone by any means. In any case, why would he kill her after having abducted her? With this idea in mind, he utters the verse beginning, 'Neither by conciliation, etc.' (kiṃca sītānyena kenāpi kenāpy upāyena draṣṭum evāśakyā, kutas tasyāharaṇapūrvaṃ vadha ity āha naiva sāmneti)." Cs takes violent exception to Ct's comments here. He quotes his entire statement, claiming that Nāgojibhaṭṭa (Ct) should be satisfied with having brought down the level of discourse here to that of a person who, having heard the entire Rāmāyaṇa recited twelve times, wants to know what the relation is between Rāma and Sītā (nāgojibhaṭṭena samagraṃ rāmāyaṇaṃ dvādaśavāraṃ śrutavataḥ sītāyā rāmasya ca ko 'nubandha iti praśnanītir upārjiteti santoṣṭavyam)." Cf. Cs's comments to 6.96.12.

"But no one can so much as get a glimpse of her" sā draṣṭum api śakyeta naiva: Literally, "she is impossible to see."

"conciliation, sowing dissension, bribery . . . much less through violence" sāmnā . . . bhedena . . . dānena kuto yudhā: Following Cg, who glosses "coercive force (daṇḍena)" for yudhā, "through battle," we have the classic set of the four political expedients (upāyas) alluded to earlier in contextually more transparent settings. See 6.9.8; 6.51.11–13; 6.59.28; and notes. Cf. notes to 6.31.48–49.

"any other means" anyena kenacit: Literally, "by any other." Cg (implicitly) and Cm (explicitly) break up the expression so that anyena refers to "magical or delusive means (māyopāyena)" and kenacid to "another person." Cs refers similarly to means such as deception, etc. (vañcanādyupāyena). Cr takes the reference to be to any other person.

13. "After deluding the monkeys" vānarān mohayitvā: According to Ct and Ck, this refers to the illusion of cutting Sītā in half (māyāmayasītācchedaneneti śeṣaḥ).

"the rākṣasa Indrajit" sa rākṣasaḥ: Literally, "that rākṣasa."

"the shrine known as Nikumbhilā" caityaṃ nikumbhilāṃ nāma: This is the sanctuary or sacred grove where Indrajit habitually performs the rites that give rise to his magical powers. Compare 5.22.41; 6.60.18; 6.69.23; and notes.

Following 13ab, D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr insert a passage of one line [1591*]: "You must know, great-armed warrior, that that daughter of Janaka was illusory." The line appears in all published editions of the southern recension consulted. It appears as 6.84.13cd in NSP, GPP, and Gita Press. In KK it appears in brackets, unnumbered between 6.84.12 and 13, and it is relegated to a footnote in VSP.

15. "dear boy" tāta: Ñ,V2,3,B1–3,D1,2,4–6,9–11,13,T1,G1,2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators and all printed editions read instead tatra, "there."

"in his desire to undermine the monkeys' valor" vighnam anvicchatā . . . vānarāṇāṃ parākrame: Literally, "by him who is seeking an obstacle with respect to the valor of the monkeys." Ct and Ck understand that Indrajit is anticipating the monkeys' exerting their valor to create an obstacle to his sacrifice (vānarāṇāṃ parākrame sati yāgasya vighnam anvicchatānusaratā saṃbhāvayatā). This interpretation has been followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1397) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1721). Ct's interpretation is similar to the sense of the northern variant as expressed in the text of Gorresio (6.63.15):

tena havyanimittaṃ tu nūnaṃ māyā pravartitā /
vighnam anicchatā tatra vānarāṇāṃ parākrame //

Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 101) translates: "Colui di certo per virtù d'un sacrificio produsse sue arti di magìa, non volendo che i Vānari facessero qui ostacolo alla sua forza."

"before he completes his sacrifices" yāvat tan na samāpyate: Literally, "so long as that is not completed."

16. "this baseless grieving that has overcome you" imam . . . mithyāsaṃtāpam āgatam: Literally, "this false grief that has come."

17. "along with us and the leaders of the troops" asmābhiḥ saha sainyānukarṣibhiḥ: The phrase is slightly ambiguous. In the first place, it is not perfectly clear whether we are to take the pronoun asmābhiḥ in apposition with sainyānukarṣibhiḥ in the sense of "with us leaders of the troops." Given the context of this and the following sarga, it seems to us that asmābhiḥ should be taken separately to refer to Vibhīṣaṇa and his four ministers. The term anukarṣin appears to be unattested elsewhere in the sense of "leader," literally, "one who drags or attracts." Indeed, the root $\sqrt{kṛṣ}$ in a military context normally refers to violent or hostile action, as in the common epithet śatrukarṣaṇa, "dragger of foes." The commentators offer slightly different explanations of the term, but all have the basic meaning of "marshals" or "officers." Ct and Ck explain, "those who, having taken the entire army, march (sarvasenāṃ gṛhītvā gacchadbhiḥ)," which they then take in apposition with asmābhiḥ, glossing, "with us, the leaders (asmābhiḥ pradhānaiḥ)." Cr glosses, "those who make the army march (senāṃ cālayadbhiḥ)." Cg and Cm gloss, "protectors of the troops, i.e., officers (sainyapālaiḥ)."

18. "that rākṣasa can be killed" vadhyo bhaviṣyati: Literally, "he will be killable."

19. "sharp and pitiless" niśitās tīkṣṇāḥ: The two terms overlap in their semantic range in the sense of "sharp, whetted." The word tīkṣṇa, here "pitiless," however, has a wider range of meanings, including "harsh, fierce, cruel, etc."

"made swift by the feathers of birds" patripatrāṅgavājinaḥ: Literally, "swift through the limbs, that is, the feathers, of feathered ones." The compound is somewhat awkward. We follow Cg and Cm, who explain, "the feathers of the feathered ones are the wings of birds; their limbs are the flight feathers; by means of them [the arrows] are made swift (patripatrāṇi pakṣipakṣāḥ, teṣām aṅgāṇi barhāṇi, tair vājino vegavantaḥ)."

"like birds of prey" patatriṇa ivāsaumyāḥ: Literally, "like rapacious or inauspicious birds." Several of the commentators give the adjutant stork (kaṅka) as an example. It should be noted, however, that the term kaṅka may also refer to the heron, whose feathers, we believe, are frequently mentioned in the text as those used to fletch arrows. See, for example, 6.35.12; 6.42.4; 6.67.29; and notes.

"Indrajit's blood" śoṇitam: Literally, "blood." As Ct notes, we need to understand that it is Indrajit's blood that is to be drunk (indrajita iti śeṣaḥ).

20. "you must send forth" saṃdiśa: Literally, "instruct or command." We follow the suggestion of Ct and Cr, who gloss, preṣaya, "dispatch, send."

"Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks" lakṣmaṇaṃ śubhalakṣaṇam: This is yet another example of the alliterative etymological epithets of which Vālmīki is so fond. See 6.14.3; 6.67.37; 6.73.5; 6.75.16; 6.79.1; 6.89.4; and notes. See also R. Goldman 1984, p. 105.

"just as might Indra, the wielder of the vajra, send forth that weapon" vajraṃ vajradharo yathā: Literally, "as [does] the vajra-bearer, the vajra."

21. "So issue your orders" tvam atisṛja . . . vāṇīm: Literally, "you must release your speech." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read vajram, "the vajra," for vāṇīm, "speech." To make sense of this reading, Ct and Cr, and the translators who follow them, are compelled to supply, in emulation of the preceding verse, the word "lakṣmaṇam," giving the half verse the sense "send forth Lakṣmaṇa . . . as does mighty Indra, the vajra."

"for the smashing of the citadels of the asuras" asurapuronmathane: The texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead divijaripumathane (diviripor—so Cr), "for the destruction of the enemies of the heaven-born [gods]." D7,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read the similar amararipor mathane, "for the destruction of the enemy of the immortals." Gorresio's edition (6.53.22) reads asuravaronmathanāya, "for the destruction of the foremost of the asuras."

The meter is puṣpitāgrā.

22. "he would become invisible in battle" bhavaty adṛśyaḥ samare: Literally, "he becomes invisible in battle." It is not clear why Indrajit, having earlier (6.35.10; 6.38.17; 6.60.29,44; and 6.67.24) been invisible to his enemies in battle, should now need to accomplish yet another ritual to attain the same condition. It would seem that, like the powers attained through ascetic practice, this one diminishes with use and must be periodically renewed.

"grave peril" saṃśayo mahān: As Ct and Cs note, we are to understand the term saṃśayaḥ, "peril, danger, doubt," in the sense of "mortal danger (prāṇasaṃśayaḥ)."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila with a hypometric pāda a.

Sarga 72

1. "of Vibhīṣaṇa" tasya: Literally, "his."

2. "in the presence of the monkeys" kapisaṃnidhau: Cr understands the reference to be to a single monkey, viz., Hanumān (kaper hanumataḥ sannidhau).

"who sat beside him" upāsīnam: Literally, "seated." Ct and Ck gloss, simply, "standing or located nearby (samīpasthitam)."

3. "Lord of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos" nairṛtādhipate: Literally, "overlord of the nairṛtas." Recall that, despite the fact that Rāvaṇa's regime has yet to be toppled, Rāma has consecrated Vibhīṣaṇa as king of the rākṣasas (6.13.7–9 and notes).

"Please repeat what you intended to say." brūhi yat te vivakṣitam: Literally, "say what was desired to be said by you."

5. "to station the troops at their proper posts" gulmaniveśanam: Literally, "the encampment of the troops." Cf. 5.3.27; 6.3.27; 6.27.20; 6.28.31; 6.31.31; 6.45.2; 6.62.5; 6.71.1; 6.84.6; and notes.

7. Compare verse 6.71.16 and notes.

"illustrious hero" mahāyaśaḥ: Literally, "O one of great renown." D7,9,10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahāprabho, "O great lord."

8. "this baseless grief that has overcome you" mithyāsaṃtāpam āgatam: See verse 6.71.16 and notes.

"which serves only to delight your enemies" śatruharṣavivardhanī: Literally, "increasing the delight of the enemy."

10. "in order to confront Rāvaṇi . . . and kill him: saṃprāpya hantuṃ rāvaṇim: Literally, "having encountered to kill Rāvaṇi." Ñ1,B3,D4,7,10,11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the participle saṃprāptam, "arrived," for the gerund saṃprāpya, the subject of which becomes Indrajit instead of Lakṣmaṇa.

11. "full-drawn bow" dhanurmaṇḍala-: Literally, "bow-circle."

"shall slay" hantum: Literally, "to kill." We are forced to read the infinitive as a finite verb. This awkward reading shows surprisingly few variants in the critical apparatus.

12. "Through the boon of self-existent Brahmā, acquired by virtue of his asceticism" tapasā varadānāt svayaṃbhuvaḥ: Literally, "through asceticism from the giving of a boon of the self-existent one." See 6.36.10 and note.

"that hero" tena vīreṇa: Literally, "by that hero." D12,G2, and the text of Cm read instead tena vīryeṇa, "by that strength or heroism."

"will obtain" prāptam: Literally, "has obtained." It appears that Ct is correct in asserting that Indrajit is only to receive directly from the sacrificial fire these boons, namely a chariot yoked to horses that can go wherever he wishes as well as the brahmaśiras weapon-spell from the propitiated Brahmā upon the completion of his sacrifice at the shrine of the goddess Nikumbhilā in which he is presently engaged (tena vīreṇendrajitā tapasā prītasya svayaṃbhuvo varadānān nikumbhilāyāṃ devīhome samāpte kāmaturaṅgayukto ratho brahmaśiro 'straṃ cāgneḥ sakāśāl lapsyate). Ck notes that the brahmaśiras, or divine "Brahmā's head" astra, is different from the brahmāstra, or "the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā" (brahmaśiro 'straṃ brahmāstrād anyat). Indrajit had received the latter in the course of his performance of an earlier rite at 6.60.24. Ct further indicates that, by the terms of Brahmā's boon, the possession of this weapon will make Indrajit invulnerable to Lakṣmaṇa but that he will only be able to use it once (tavāvadhyatvaṃ sakṛtprayogaparyantam iti varadānād brahmaśiro 'straṃ prāptam). See 5.36.26 and note, where Indrajit is also said to possess the brahmāstra. Compare

7.25.7–13, where Indrajit (Meghanāda) receives boons, including the brahmāstra, from Paśupati upon the successful completion of seven vedic rites. See 6.36.10 and note. Cf., too, MBh 10.14.17, where Aśvatthāman invests a reed with the power of the brahmaśiras astra.

"chariot-horses" turaṅgamāḥ: Literally, "those who go swiftly." This is a common kenning for horses. Crā, Cm, and Cg understand that here the word "horses" indicates, by metonymy, a chariot as well (turaṅgamaśabdo rathasyāpy upalakṣaṇam). Ct understands similarly.

"that can take him wherever he desires" kāmagāḥ: Literally, "going according to wish or desire."

Following verse 12, D5–7,9–11,T1,2,G,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of two lines [1605*]: "They say that he has already gone to the Nikumbhilā grove together with his army. If he should arise having completed his sacrifice,[1] then you can consider us all as good as dead."

[1]"having completed his sacrifice" kṛtaṃ karma: The syntax is defective here. One must supply either the gerund kṛtvā, "having performed," as Ck and Ct suggest, or a second finite verb, syāt, "it might be." As Cg suggests, this would lend the phrase the sense "if the sacrifice should be completed."

13. "that cunning warrior" dhīmataḥ: Literally, "wise one."

"Should an enemy ever strike" yo ripuḥ . . . hanyāt: Literally, "which[ever] enemy may strike."

"before you can reach the Nikumbhilā grove and there complete your oblation into the fire" nikumbhilām asaṃprāptam ahutāgnim . . . tvām: Literally, "you who have not reached Nikumbhilā and not made oblation to the fire." Ct, Cg, and Cm understand that the reference to Nikumbhilā here is specifically to the roots of a particular banyan tree of that name where Indrajit is to perform his sacrifice (nikumbhilākhya-nyagrodhamūlasthānam—so Cg). See 6.69.23 and note. This specification is rendered in the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1723), "while you have not (yet) reached (the foot of the banyan tree known by the name of) Nikumbhilā." These commentators make this identification, no doubt, because, as noted by Cg, Indrajit will be shown performing his sacrifice at the foot of a fearsome-looking nyagrodha tree (6.74.3,6). Ct and Ck note that this is the sacrificial ground consecrated to the goddess Mahākālī of whom, we are to understand, Nikumbhilā is an epithet (tadyāgabhūmiṃ mahākālīkṣetraṃ tadākhyanyagrodhamūlarūpam—so Ct). See 5.22.41 and note. See, too, 6.69.23; 6.74.3,6 and notes. Cr understands the verse to provide for two contingencies: 1) Indrajit fails to reach Nikumbhilā and thus fails to perform his sacrifice, and 2) he reaches it but fails to complete his sacrifice (nikumbhilām asaṃprāptaṃ tadgamanarahitam akṛtāgniṃ[v.l. for ahutāgniṃ] tatra gate 'pi kṛtāgnirahitaṃ vā). Ct explicitly indicates that the intended sacrifice is one associated with sorcery (abhicārahomam).

"he shall compass your death" sa te vadhaḥ: Literally, "he [will be] your death." The commentators explain the term vadhaḥ, "death," here to mean "killer (mārakaḥ—so Cg, Cm)." Cm claims that this conditional boon is explained in accordance with the terms under which it was granted to Indrajit in the Uttarakāṇḍa. The relevant passage there (7.25.10–12), however, makes no reference to this condition. It also shows

Indrajit receiving his boons from Paśupati, normally an epithet of Śiva, rather than unambiguously from Brahmā.

Following 13cd, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1606*]: "Such was the boon,[1] great-armed warrior, that was granted by the lord of all the worlds.[2]"

[1]"the boon" varaḥ: Cg is the only commentator to question the use of the term "boon" in connection with this dire prediction. He explains it by saying, "even though it seems to be a curse, we are to understand it as a boon because of its implication that, if Indrajit is able to reach the Nikumbhilā grove and complete his sacrifice without hindrance, he will become impossible to kill (yady apy etac chāpavacanam iva pratibhāti tathāpi nikumbhilāprāptihomayor vighnābhāve 'vadhya iti paryavasānād vararūpatvaṃ draṣṭavyam)." We have found no passage in Vālmīki's Rāmāyaṇa where Brahmā actually makes this stipulation. See 6.36.10 and note.

[2]"by the lord of all the worlds" sarvalokeśvareṇa: The commentators agree that the reference is to Brahmā, although it should be noted that Indrajit receives the more positive boons from Paśupati as a reward for his sacrifices at 7.25.10–12.

14. "you must depute mighty Lakṣmaṇa" taṃ diśasva mahābalam: Literally, "you instruct that one of great strength." D6,7,9–11,G1,2,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read the upasarga sam- for the masculine accusative pronoun tam, "that one." The elimination of the pronoun creates an ambiguity in which the compound mahābalam can also be taken in the neuter to mean "a large army." This interpretation has been followed, in fact, by Dutt (1893, p. 1399) and Pagani (1999, p. 1101). D6,7,T2,3,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead the vocative mahābala, "O mighty one," leaving no explicit object at all. Cg and Cm seek to remedy this deficiency by supplying the phrase "someone from among us (asmāsu kaṃcit—so Cg)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 248), the only translator to follow this reading, attempts to have it both ways, rendering, "therefore, O Rama of the immense strength, bid Saumitri slay Indrajit."

"you can consider . . . to be as good as dead" hataṃ viddhi: Literally, "know as dead."

15. "Well do I know" jānāmi: Literally, "I know."

"truly valorous hero" satyaparākrama: Literally, "O one whose valor is truth." Cf. 6.26.4.

"that fierce warrior" raudrasya: Literally, "of the fierce or savage one."

17. "behind a dense mass of clouds" abhrasaṃplave: Literally, "in a flood of clouds." Ct and Cm gloss, "in a mass of clouds (meghasamūhe)," while Cg glosses, meghāvaraṇe, "in a cloud cover."

19–20. "skilled though he may be in the power of illusion" māyābalaviśāradam: Literally, "skilled in the power of illusion." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -samanvitam, "endowed with," for -viśāradam, "skilled."

21. "And Vibhīṣaṇa, the great night-roaming rākṣasa" mahātmā rajanīcaraḥ: Literally, "great roamer of the night."

"who knows this country intimately" abhijñas tasya deśasya: Literally, "a recognizer of the region." V3,B3,4,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read abhijñātasya, while D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read māyānām for deśasya. The reading of Ct, abhijñātasya māyānām, "of the master of illusion," is both awkward and obscure, since it is difficult to know how to construe the genitive phrase. The three translators who follow this reading are forced to supply the ellipsis. Thus Dutt (1893, p. 1400) renders, "in this engagement with that one skilled in illusion." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 280) offers, "(pour tomber) sur ce maître en connaissances magiques." Shastri (1959 vol. 3, p. 248), closely following Roussel, renders, "in order that thou mayest fall upon that master of illusion." D9, the text and commentary of Cr (despite the footnote of GPP, p. 2505), and the text of Gita Press (6.85.23) have a mixed reading, i.e., abhijñas tasya māyānām, "the knower (i.e., Vibhīṣaṇa) of his (i.e., Indrajit's) illusion." This is rendered only in the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1724).

22. "of fearsome valor . . . extraordinary" anyad bhīmaparākramaḥ: Literally, "another [bow] . . . [Lakṣmaṇa] of fearsome valor." We believe the context supports the less common sense of the word anya, i.e., "unusual, different, extraordinary." This idea appears to be shared by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 280 ["spécial"]) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 248 ["rare"]). Ck, Ct, and Cr take the term in its more common sense of "other, another." Cr observes that the bow is different from the one Lakṣmaṇa had taken up earlier (pūrvagṛhītāpekṣayā bhinnam). Ct and Ck believe that this different bow is one obtained through the grace of the gods (devānugrahaprāptaṃ param—so Ct). This use of the term is followed in the translations of Dutt (1893, p. 1400), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1724), and Pagani (1999, p. 1101). M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read atyadbhutaparākramaḥ, "[Lakṣmaṇa] of marvelous valor," for the critical edition's reading of anyad bhīmaparākramaḥ. This reading, which eliminates the problem of interpreting anyat, is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 249), who translates,"Lakshmana of the marvelous prowess armed himself with his great bow."

23. "and golden bow" hemacāpadhṛk" Literally, "bearing a golden bow." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vāmacāpabhṛt (v.l. -dhṛt). We take the adjective vāma- in its common sense of "splendid, beautiful" and thus understand the compound to mean "bearing a beautiful bow." Ct, however, takes the term, somewhat awkwardly in our opinion, in its other sense of "left" and understands the compound to mean "bearing a bow in his left hand (vāmahastena cāpabhṛt)." This interpretation has been followed by all translations based on the text of Ct, with the exception of Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 248), who ignores the compound entirely.

25. "will strike that fierce warrior and tear his body to pieces" tasya raudrasya śarīram . . . vidhamiṣyanti hatvā tam: Literally, "having struck him, [they] will destroy the body of that fierce one." The textual evidence for the critical reading is somewhat weak. Northern manuscripts (Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,8,12,13) substitute a somewhat different verse 1611*, which is similar in meaning and reads the gerund bhittvā, "having split," while a number of southern manuscripts (D7,9–11,G3,M3,5), as well as the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators, read bhittvā, "having pierced," for the critical edition's hatvā, "having struck or slain." Gorresio's edition (6.64.26) drops the gerund entirely. A number of translators (Dutt 1893, p. 1400; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 249; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 280; and Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 248) appear to ignore the fact that the masculine pronoun tam cannot be construed with the neuter śarīram, "body."

26. "he" saḥ . . . saḥ: Literally, "he . . . he." Commentators who share this reading (Cv, Crā, Cg, and Cm) are greatly exercised by the unusual repetition of the pronoun.

They rationalize it by stating that, although there is no distinction of subjects here, there is a distinction between the actions of speaking and going (asaty api kartṛbhede kriyābhedam āśritya sa iti dviruktiḥ. sa evam uktvā sa yayāv iti nirvāhaḥ—so Cg). Some southern manuscripts substitute evam uktvā tu, "but having spoken in this fashion," for sa evam uktvā, thus avoiding the repetition. This is the reading of Ct and Ck, while Cm notes it as the proper (samyak) reading. Northern manuscripts and printed editions avoid the problem, reading instead a variant (1612*).

27. "his elder brother's" guroḥ: Literally, "of the elder."

28. "his mission blessed" kṛtasvastyayanaḥ: Literally, "having had the svastyayana performed." The svastyayana is a blessing or benediction performed to avert evil at the beginning of a journey or undertaking. Rāma's journeys to the forest in the Bālakāṇḍa and Ayodhyākāṇḍa are preceded by such blessings by his parents. See 6.83.7 and notes. Compare 1.21.2 and 2.23.2.

29. "Then . . . followed Lakṣmaṇa" tadā lakṣmaṇam anvagāt: D7,9–11,M2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead lakṣmaṇaṃ tvaritaṃ yayāu, "went swiftly [after] Lakṣmaṇa." Ct glosses anuyayāu,"he followed," for yayau, " he went."

30. "Jāmbavān, king of the apes" ṛkṣarāja-: Literally, "king of the ṛkṣas." This is Vālmīki's most common epithet for Jāmbavān, whose name we add, following Cr. See 6.4.17 and note.

"which was stationed along the way" pathi viṣṭhitam: Literally, "situated on the road." As Ct points out, this would be the detachment of Jāmbavān's troops that Hanumān had stationed at the gate of Laṅkā when he departed to report the news of the apparent slaying of Sītā (hanumatā sītāvadhavṛttāntanivedanārtham āgamanasamaye dvārarakṣārthaṃ pathi sthāpitam ity arthaḥ). See 6.70.3–6.

31. "Saumitri, delight of his friends" saumitrir mitranandanaḥ: This is yet another epithet that plays on the etymology of a character's name. See 6.67.37; 6.71.20; 6.74.7; and notes.

32. "that master of illusion Indrajit" māyāyogam: Literally, "he whose mode of practice was illusion." We follow Ct, who understands, "he whose mode of practice was the means to victory in battle through magical illusion alone (māyāyogaṃ māyayaiva yogo yuddhajayopāyo yasya tam indrajitam—so Ct). Cr understands similarly.

"according to the decree of Brahmā" brahmavidhānena: The reference, as Cg and Cm note, is to Brahmā's boon, whereby Indrajit can only be killed if he fails to reach the Nikumbhilā shrine and there complete his sacrifice (nikumbhilām asaṃprāptam ityādinoktabrahmavaradānaprakāreṇa). See verse 13 above. See, too, 6.36.10 and note.

Following verse 32, D5–7,9–11,T1,2 (line 1),3,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of two lines [1620*]: "The valiant son of the king, together with Vibhīṣaṇa, heroic Aṅgada, and the son of Anila . . ."

33. "as into a vast darkness" timiram iva: Literally, "like darkness."

"and abounded in great chariot-warriors" vipulaṃ mahārathaiś ca: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B3, 4,D1,2,9,11,12,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the repeated adjective gahanam, "thick," for the critical edition's vipulam, "vast, abounding." All the translations consulted that share this verse render mahārathaiḥ as "with great chariots." Only Dutt (1893, p. 1401), in a footnote, observes that the term can also refer to "chariot warriors." We believe that this is more likely here, as the term is most commonly used in the epics in this sense. See, for example, 6.60.3; 6.80.6; 6.81.18; 6.83.8; 6.84.15; and notes. Cf. 6.77.36.

The meter is puṣpitāgrā.

Sarga 73

1. "Rāvaṇa's younger brother Vibhīṣaṇa" rāvaṇānujaḥ: Literally, "Rāvaṇa's younger brother."

"instrumental to the achievement of their own ends" arthasādhakam: Literally, "productive of ends." We follow the commentators, who understand that the reference is to Rāma's purposes (rāmārthaniṣpādakam—so Cr).

Following verse 1, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1621*]: "Let the monkeys, armed with trees,[1] at once engage that army of the rākṣasas, dark as a storm cloud, which has come into view."

[1]"armed with trees" pādapāyudhaiḥ: D7,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ca śilāyudhaiḥ, "and armed with boulders."

2. "to annihilate . . . once it has been annihilated" bhedane . . . bhinne: Literally, "in breaking . . . once broken."

3. "Indra's thunderbolt" indrāśani-: See 6.53.13 and note.

4. "so unrighteous and adept in magical illusion" māyāparam adhārmikam: We follow the suggestion of Ct in breaking the sequence into māyāparam, literally, "devoted to magical illusion," and adhārmikam, "unrighteous." Cm breaks the sequence up differently (māyā-parama-dhārmikam), understanding the compound to mean "who is perceived as if he were supremely righteous [by virtue of magical illusion] (paramadhārmikavat pratīyamānam)." Cs acknowledges Ct's analysis as an alternative but first suggests the somewhat obscure meaning "bearing a superb bow by means of illusion (māyayā paramadhanurdhāriṇaṃ vā)."

5. "Lakṣmaṇa, of auspicious marks" lakṣmaṇaḥ śubhalakṣaṇaḥ: This is another of Vālmīki's etymological epithets (see 6.71.20; 6.67.37; and notes). Cg takes the epithet here in a contextually relevant sense to mean "endowed with the characteristics of accepting the essence of his friends' advice (suhṛdvacanasāragrāhitvalakṣaṇayuktaḥ)." See 6.14.3; 6.67.37; 6.71.20; 6.75.16; 6.79.1; 6.89.4; and notes. See also R. Goldman 1984, p. 105.

"in the direction of the rākṣasa lord's son" rākṣasendrasutaṃ prati: Literally, "at or toward the rākṣasa lord's son." Several of the commentators, notably Cv, Cm, Ct, and Ck, attempt to address the question of how Lakṣmaṇa could shoot at Indrajit when the latter is invisible. Their idea is that Lakṣmaṇa showers the rākṣasa army with arrows in the hope of striking Indrajit (tatprāptim uddiśya tatsenāyāṃ vavarṣa ity arthaḥ—so Ct, Cm). This interpretation is represented in the translations of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 250) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1726). Other translators understand that Lakṣmaṇa is simply shooting at Indrajit.

6. "tree-dwelling monkeys" śākhāmṛgāḥ: Literally, "branch-animals." See note to 6.15.15.

"armed with huge trees and mountains" drumādrivarayodhinaḥ: Literally, "fighting with excellent mountains and trees." D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead drumapravarayodhinaḥ, "fighting with excellent (i.e., large) trees." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm substitute -nakha-, "claws," for the critical edition's -vara-, "excellent," lending the compound the sense "fighting with trees, mountains, and claws."

7. "for their part" ca: Literally, "and."

"fought back . . . with upraised" udyataiḥ samavartanta: D7,10,11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead abhyavartanta samare, "they attacked or fought back in battle."

9. "hidden from view" āvṛtam: Literally, "covered, enveloped."

10. "at the monkeys, the rākṣasas" te rākṣasā vānareṣu: Ś2,Ñ,V,B,D2–4,8,10–13,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead rākṣasā vānarendreṣu, "the rākṣasas, at the foremost of monkeys."

11. "By the same token, the monkeys struck" tathaiva . . . vānarāḥ / abhijaghnuḥ: Literally, "in the very same way, the monkeys struck."

"the bulls among rākṣasas" rākṣasarṣabhān: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sarvarākṣasān, "all the rākṣasas."

12. "as they were being slaughtered" vadhyamānānām: B3,D7,10,11,T1,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead yudhyamānānām, "[of the rākṣasas] who were fighting [with the monkeys]" or "[of the rākṣasas] who were being fought [by the monkeys]."

13. "unassailable Indrajit" durdharṣaḥ: Literally, "the unassailable one."

14. "Emerging from the shadow of the trees" vṛkṣāndhakārān niṣkramya: The reference, as several commentators note, is to the [densely forested] Nikumbhilā tract (nikumbhilākṣetrīyāt—so Ct). See 6.72.13,14; 6.74.3,6; and notes. Ct, in his effort to keep track of the action of the epic chronologically, observes that Indrajit's emergence from the grove occurs on the evening of the tenth [lunar day of the month] (idaṃ niḥsaraṇaṃ daśamyāṃ sāyāhne—so Ct). See note to 6.4.4.

"the rākṣasa" sa rākṣasaḥ: Cg reads the sequence as sarākṣasaḥ and understands it as a bahuvrīhi compound in the sense of "along with the rākṣasas (rākṣasasahitaḥ)." D10 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read susaṃyatam, "well-equipped [chariot]," for rākṣasaḥ, "rākṣasa."

15. "Resembling a mass of black collyrium" kṛṣṇāñjanacayopamaḥ: M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead kālameghasamaprabhaḥ, "resembling a black storm cloud."

"his eyes and face an angry red" raktāsyanayanaḥ: Literally, "whose face and eyes were red." The reddening of the eyes is a stereotypical sign of anger for the epic poets.

"that cruel rākṣasa" krūraḥ: Literally, "the cruel one." D10,11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the variant bhīmaḥ, "fearsome." Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–3,8,12,13,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead kruddhaḥ, "angry, enraged."

"with his fearsome bow and arrows" bhīmakārmukaśaraḥ: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,8,12,13,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read -dharaḥ, "bearing," for -śaraḥ, "arrows," lending the compound the sense "bearing a fearsome bow."

16. "Indrajit" tam: Literally, "him."

17–18. "But at that moment" tasmin kāle tu: The syntax of the passage—wherein Hanumān lifts a tree and then seems to attack the rākṣasas with many trees—makes the temporal sequence of events here somewhat unclear. We follow the suggestion of Cg, who understands that Hanumān first uses the single tree to rip through the enemy forces and subsequently uses multiple trees to knock them out (ādāv ekaṃ vṛkṣam udyamya nirdahan san paścād bahubhir vṛkṣais tad rakṣobalaṃ niḥsaṃjñaṃ cakārety anvayaḥ).

"took up" udyamya: Literally, "having raised." D2,5,10,11,G1,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead arujat (D5,M1,2, ārujat), "he broke [off]."

"tore through" nirdahan: Literally, "burning, consuming."

19–20. "wreaking . . . destruction upon them" vidhvaṃsayantam: Literally, "wreaking havoc, destroying."

"unleashed a hail of weapons" avākiran: Literally, "they showered or covered." Like most translators, we follow the suggestion of Cr, who glosses, "they hurled weapons (śastrāṇi prākṣipan)."

"bearers of sharp lances . . . with their lances, swordsmen with their swords, javelin-wielders with their javelins, and spearmen with their spears" śitaśūladharāḥ śūlair asibhiś cāsipāṇayaḥ / śaktibhiḥ śaktihastāś ca paṭṭasaiḥ paṭṭasāyudhāḥ: Literally, "those bearing sharp lances with lances, those with swords in hand with swords, those with javelins in hand with javelins, and those armed with spears with spears." Cg observes that we are to understand that the various warriors, skilled in the various weapons mentioned, showered them down [upon Hanumān] (śitaśūladharā ityādiviśeṣaṇena yeṣāṃ yeṣv astreṣv atyantapāṭavam asti tais te 'vākirann iti gamyate).

21–23. "the mountainous monkey . . . Hanumān, in a towering rage" parvatopamam . . . saṃkruddhaḥ: Literally, "him who was comparable to a mountain . . . He, who was enraged."

"with . . . barbed darts" kuntaiḥ: See note to 6.52.50. Ś2,Ñ,V,B2,4,D4,8,12,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead cakraiḥ, "with discuses."

"hundred-slayers," śataghnībhiḥ: See 6.3.12 and note. Here the weapon is of the type that is thrown.

"short javelins" bhiṇḍipālaiḥ: See note to 6.32.30.

24. "destroyer of his enemies" amitraghnam: D10,11,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead asaṃtrastam, "undaunted, fearless."

25. "Drive" yāhi: Literally, "go."

"if we do not deal with him" upekṣitaḥ: Literally, "ignored, neglected."

27. "swords . . . scimitars" khaḍgān . . . -asi-: Both terms are normally rendered as "sword." In this case, however, we have used "scimitar" for asi to avoid redundancy. D6,M5, and the text of Cg read paṭṭasāṃś ca (paṭṭiśāṃś—D6), "and spears," for paṭṭasāsi-, thus avoiding the possible redundancy. This variant is rendered in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 251). Several other translators drop the second reference to swords.

28. "parrying" pratigṛhya: The precise sense of the gerund here is not clear. Unlike Cr and most translators, who understand the verb in its common senses of "to receive or seize," we understand the term in its sense of "to resist or oppose," since there is no evidence in this passage that the weapons have actually found their mark and wounded Hanumān or that he has taken hold of them. Cr, the only commentator to deal with the issue, glosses, "receiving the weapons on his chest (śastrāṇi . . . urasi gṛhītvā)."

29. "Come and fight" yudhyasva: Literally, "Fight!"

"you will not escape with your life" na jīvan pratiyāsyasi: Literally, "you will not go back living."

30. "If you want to engage me in single combat" yadi me dvaṃdvam: Literally, "if single combat of [i.e., with] me." We follow the commentators, who flesh out the elliptical clause by supplying the verb dadāsi, "[if] you give."

"with your bare hands" bāhubhyām: Literally, "with two arms."

"If you can sustain" sahasva: Literally, "Endure!"

"you will prove to be the best of the rākṣasas" tvaṃ rakṣasāṃ varaḥ: Literally, "you are the best of the rākṣasas."

33. "foe-piercing" śatruvidāraṇaiḥ: D7,9–11,T1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read -nivāraṇaiḥ, "turning back, repelling," for -vidāraṇaiḥ, "piercing."

"incomparable in their workmanship" apratimasaṃsthānaiḥ: Literally, "having incomparable form or construction." Ck and Ct gloss, "having incomparable form or appearance (anupamasvarūpaiḥ)." Cr offers, "characterized by parts that are devoid of comparison (upamārahitāvayavaviśiṣṭaiḥ)." Cg glosses, "of incomparable construction, that is, having the shape of karavīra leaves, etc. (anupamasanniveśaiḥ karavīrapatrādyākāraiḥ)." Compare note to 6.63.3, App. I, No. 43, lines 7–9.

"utterly lethal" jīvitāntakaraiḥ: Literally, "life-ending."

34. "by that terror to his foes, Vibhīṣaṇa" vibhīṣaṇenārivibhīṣaṇena: Literally, "by foe-terrifying Vibhīṣaṇa." The poet plays on the etymology of Vibhīṣaṇa's name. See note to verse 5 above.

"great Lakṣmaṇa" mahātmā: Literally, "the great one."

"unassailable Indrajit" durāsadam: Literally, "the unassailable one." Ñ,V,B1,2,4, D4,5,T1,G1,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead nadantam, "bellowing, roaring."

The meter is upajāti, with a hypermetric pāda d. The variant reading of Cg—nadantam, for durāsadam—mentioned above, was no doubt intended to regularize the meter.

Sarga 74

1. "in great excitement" jātaharṣaḥ: Literally, "in whom excitement was generated." The commentators differ slightly as to the cause of Vibhīṣaṇa's excitement. Ct and Ck understand that Vibhīṣaṇa is delighted in the realization that, as a result of the noncompletion of his sacrifice, Indrajit will now surely die in accordance with Brahmā's prophecy (yāgāsamāptyā brahmavacanād avaśyaṃ mariṣyatīti saṃtuṣṭaḥ). See notes to 6.72.12,13,32. Cr understands that he is excited at the prospect of Lakṣmaṇa's victory (lakṣmaṇavijayasamayaprāptyā prāptānando vibhīṣaṇaḥ).

2. "a vast grove" mahad vanam: As the commentators remind us, this is the Nikumbhilā grove, or the grove connected to the Nikumbhilā shrine (nikumbhilāsambandhivanam—Cr). See 6.60.18 and note.

"the sacrificial ground" tat karma: Literally, "that rite." Since the sacrifice is not actually proceeding at this time, we follow the commentators, who understand the reference to be to the site of the homa offering rather than to the rite itself (homakarmasthānam—so Ct).

3. "a . . . banyan tree" nyagrodham: Cr understands this to be Nikumbhilā's banyan tree (ficus indicus) (nikumbhilāvaṭam). See notes to 6.69.23; 6.72.13; and verse 6 below.

4. "to malignant spirits" bhūtānām: Literally, "of beings." In the context of Indrajit's abhicāra, or black magical ritual, we believe the term refers to ghosts or associated malignant spirits or both. Ct and Ck understand that the reference is to the hosts or class of beings or spirits in whom the passionate and turgid qualities, that is, the rajas and tamas guṇas, predominate (rajastamaḥpradhānabhūtagaṇānām). Compare 6.4.14; 6.47.9; 6.59.12; and notes.

5. "is able to bind and slay his enemies in battle with his splendid arrows" nihanti samare śatrūn badhnāti ca śarottamaiḥ: Literally, "he slays enemies in battle and binds with excellent arrows." The reference to binding is, no doubt, to Indrajit's ability to ensnare his foes with such weapons as his serpent-arrows. See sarga 35.

6. "with your keen arrows" śarais tīkṣṇaiḥ: Literally. "with keen arrows." Ñ,V1,B2,4,D9,10,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read dīptaiḥ, "blazing, shining," for tīkṣṇaiḥ, "keen."

"before he returns to that banyan tree" tam apraviṣṭaṃ nyagrodham: Literally, "him, who has not entered the banyan tree." The idea, as several commentators suggest, is that Indrajit, who has come out of the Nikumbhilā grove in response to the attack of Hanumān, must now be stopped before he can return there and complete his sacrifice. According to Cm, once Indrajit reaches the shelter of the banyan's roots, he becomes invincible (nyagrodhamūlapraveśe duḥsādhyo bhavatīti bhāvaḥ). The commentators and probably the poet have in mind that a single nyagrodha tree often forms a grove of its own through the production of aerial roots that descend from the tree's branches. See notes to 6.69.23; 6.72.13; and verse 3 above.

7. "Saumitri, delight of his friends" saumitrir mitranandanaḥ: The epithet is chosen because it echoes the final syllables of Lakṣmaṇa's matronymic. See 6.72.31 and notes.

8. "At that, Indrajit" sa . . . indrajit: Literally, "he, Indrajit." We follow the suggestion of Ck and Ct that it is the sound of Lakṣmaṇa's bowstring that attracts Indrajit (lakṣmaṇadhanuḥśabdaṃ śrutvā tatra pratinivṛtta iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct).

9. "immensely powerful Lakṣmaṇa" mahātejāḥ: Literally, "the immensely powerful one." Although Indrajit's speech will be initially directed to Vibhīṣaṇa, we agree with the unanimous opinion of the commentators that the reference here is to Lakṣmaṇa.

"Give me a fair fight" samyagyuddhaṃ prayaccha me: Literally, "Offer me proper battle." We are inclined to agree with Cg's suggestion that Lakṣmaṇa is asking Indrajit to fight him without recourse to illusion or supernatural means (amāyāyuddham).

10. "resolute" manasvī: The term can also mean "wise, intelligent," and some of the translators consulted render it in this fashion. We, however, follow the interpretation of Cg, who glosses, "firm or steady minded (dṛḍhamanaskaḥ)."

"challenged in this fashion" evam uktaḥ: Literally, "thus addressed."

"turned his gaze" dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen."

11. "in our House" iha: Literally, "here." Given the context, we are inclined to agree with the reading of Ck, Ct, Cm, and Cr, who understand that the reference is to the rākṣasa race or the ruling Paulastyan dynasty (iha rākṣasīyāsmatkule—so Ct). Several of the translators consulted also follow this line of interpretation. Cg alone takes the reference to be geographical, glossing, "in Laṅkā (laṅkāyām)."

"rākṣasa" rākṣasa: Cg believes that the term is used ironically here to suggest that Vibhīṣaṇa fails to perceive his kinship with Indrajit (rākṣasety anena sājātyam api na dṛṣṭavān asīti vyajyate).

"your son" putrasya: Because relationships in traditional India are as much generational as lineal, Indrajit can reasonably regard himself as the "son" of [his uncle] Vibhīṣaṇa. Cf. 6.77.13.

12. "loyalty to your kind" jātiḥ: Literally, "race, caste, kind, species." Ck and Ct gloss, "pride in one's kind or race (jātyabhimānaḥ)." Cs, more specifically, glosses, "the rākṣasa race (rākṣasajātiḥ)."

"sound judgment" pramāṇam: Literally, "valid means of judgment." We follow the commentators, who generally understand that the term refers here to one's judgment as to the boundary between what ought and ought not to be done (kartavyākartavyamaryādākāraṇam—so Ct). Cs understands Indrajit to be saying that Vibhīṣaṇa lacks the judgment that should inform him that there is no refuge for someone who opposes or obstructs his elder (pramāṇaṃ jyeṣṭhavirodhena virodhyāśrayo na sampādya iti pravedayat pramāṇam).

14. "this glaring difference" mahad antaram: Literally, "the great difference or distinction."

"How can one even compare" kva . . . kva: Literally, "where [on the one hand] is . . . [and] where [on the other hand] is . . . ?"

"despicable servitude to one's enemy" nīcaparāśrayaḥ: The sequence is somewhat ambiguous and lends itself to at least four interpretations. The first, offered by Ct and Ck, sees the sequence as a kind of paranipāta compound having the sense "despicable through having recourse to one who is an enemy by birth, conduct, etc. (janmakarmādinā yaḥ paras tadāśrayaṃ prāpya nīco nīcaparāśrayaḥ. mayūravyaṃsakāditvāt samāsaḥ—so Ct.)" The second interpretation reads the sequence as a karmadhāraya compound and takes nīca-, "lowly," as modifying only the lexeme para-, "enemy, stranger." This yields the sense "dependence on despicable enemies." This interpretation has been followed in the translations of Dutt (1893, p. 1405) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 252). A third interpretation is that espoused by Cr, in which the adjective nīca is seen not as part of the compound but as a vocative directed to Vibhīṣaṇa, in the sense of "wretched, vile, or lowly one." This reading (indicated by a break between the words in Lahore 6.66.14 and Gorresio 6.66.14) is followed by Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 108) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1730). We, however, agree with Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 286), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 252), and Pagani (1999, p. 1105) in taking the adjective nīca, "despicable," to modify the compound -parāśrayaḥ, "recourse or servitude to an enemy."

15. Following verse 15, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1648*]: "Whoever deserts his own side and defects to that of his enemies will, in the end, be killed by the latter, once his own side has been annihilated."

Following 1648*, D7,G2,3,M1,2, and KK (6.87.17–18 in brackets) insert a passage of five lines [1649*] in which Indrajit continues his denunciation of his uncle. These lines are not rendered in any translation consulted.

16. "no kinsman other than you" svajanena tvayā: Literally, "by you, a kinsman." We follow the commentators in fleshing out this elliptical phrase. Ct, Cr, Ck, Cg, and Cm all explain, "the meaning is 'by none other' (nānyenety arthaḥ)." Cv understands similarly. Cg suggests, as an alternative, that we break the sequence up as svajane na tvayā [śakyam], yielding the sense "by you [your harshness, etc.] should not have been demonstrated with respect to your kinsmen, that is, it is inappropriate. (yadvā svajane viṣaye tvayā na śakyaṃ na kartavyam. anucitaṃ kṛtam iti bhāvaḥ.)"

"callousness" paruṣam: Literally, "harshness." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead pauruṣam, "heroism, manliness, human effort."

17. "why do you disparage me" kim . . . vikatthase: Literally, "Why do you disparage?"

"as if you knew nothing" ajānann iva: Literally, "as if not knowing."

18. "impudent speech" pāruṣyam: Literally, "harshness."

"out of respect for me" gauravāt: Literally, "out of gravity or seniority." The commentators note that Vibhīṣaṇa is worthy of Indrajit's respect either because he is his elder or because he is a hero. (pitṛvyatvagauravam āśritya madviṣayaṃ pāruṣyaṃ tyaja. yadvā śūro 'ham iti gauravād dhetor yatpāruṣyaṃ tat tyaja—so Ct.)

"my nature is not that of the rākṣasas. Instead, I share the better nature of virtuous men." guṇo 'yaṃ prathamo nṝṇāṃ tan me śīlam arākṣasam: Literally, "this is the foremost quality of men; therefore my conduct is not that of a rākṣasa." The phrase is somewhat obscure. Our translation has been influenced somewhat by the commentators, who understand guṇa here in the sense in which it is used in Sāṃkhya philosophy. They argue that Vibhīṣaṇa ascribes to himself the pure sattvaguṇa, which thus distinguishes him from other rākṣasas, who are confined to rajas and tamas. (prathamo guṇaḥ sattvam. arākṣasaṃ rajastamaḥprakṛtirakṣakuladurlabham—so Ct.) Several of the commentators also suggest that by the term nṝṇām, "of men," we are to understand "of virtuous men (sajjanānām—so Cm)."

19. "Otherwise, how could a brother, even one of radically different character, reject his brother?" bhrātrā viṣamaśīlena kathaṃ bhrātā nirasyate: Literally, "How is a brother cast out by a brother with a different character?" The precise sense of this phrase is unclear. At first glance it appears that Vibhīṣaṇa is complaining about his rejection by Rāvaṇa, but the context does not support such an interpretation. Our translation follows the interpretation of Cm, the only commentator to remark on the critical reading, who understands the question to be: "Otherwise, how could a brother, i.e., Rāvaṇa, be rejected, i.e., be injured, by a brother who is different in character from Rāvaṇa (anyathā viṣamaśīlena rāvaṇaśīlād vilakṣaṇaśīlena bhrātrā katham ayaṃ bhrātā rāvaṇo nirasyate hiṃsyate)?" This is quoted by Ct. D2,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the nominative viṣamaśīlo 'pi for the critical edition's instrumental viṣamaśīlena. This yields the sense: "How is a brother of different character rejected by his brother?" Ct justifies his reading by claiming that the reading viṣamaśīlena, which he sees as modifying Vibhīṣaṇa, would have the inappropriate sense that Vibhīṣaṇa regards himself as having a perverse character and thus is indeed cruel and intent on unrighteousness (bhrātā viṣamaśīleneti pāṭhe dāruṇakarmā dharmāratir aham). He does, however, acknowledge the variant reading and quotes Cm.

Following verse 19, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines [1654*]: "One who rejects a person of evil intention, whose conduct has lapsed from righteousness, attains felicity, just as does a person who casts a venomous serpent from his hand.[1][1–2] And they say that a person of evil conduct—one who engages in the theft of another's property[2] or rapes another man's wife—is to be shunned as is a burning building.[3–4]"

[1]"a person who casts a venomous serpent from his hand" hastād āśīviṣaṃ yathā: Literally, "like a venomous serpent from the hand."

[2]"one who engages in the theft of another's property" parasvaharaṇe yuktam: D6,T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead hiṃsā-parasvaharaṇam (-haraṇe—M3, Cg), "theft of another's property and injury."

21–22. "unremitting hostility" vairitvam: Literally, "hostility." We follow the commentators, who understand that Rāvaṇa's hostility is of long duration or constant (dīrgha—so Ct, Ck; baddha—so Cg, Cm).

"these crimes and defects" ete doṣāḥ: Literally, "these flaws or faults." See verse 23 below and note.

"perversity" pratikūlatā: Ck and Ct take this term as a specific reference to Rāvaṇa's often-demonstrated habit of setting his mind against those who offer him beneficial advice (hitavaktṛṣu pratikūlabuddhitā—so Ct). This interpretation is reflected in the translation of Dutt (1893, p. 1406), who renders, "running amuck of counsel." Cm understands, "hostility to the well-being of others (paraśreyodveṣitvam)," while Cg and Cr gloss, "engaging in forbidden behavior (viruddhācaraṇam)."

23. "because of these crimes and defects" doṣair etaiḥ: Literally, "by these flaws or faults." See verses 21–22 above and note.

"Neither . . . nor . . . nor . . . shall long endure" na . . . asti: Literally, "is not."

24. "whelp" bālaḥ: Literally, "boy."

25. "Your death is at hand this very day." adya te vyasanaṃ prāptam: Literally, "today your destruction has arrived."

"What can you say to me now" kim iha tvaṃ tu vakṣyasi: Literally, "What will you say to that?" B2,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read instead yan māṃ paruṣam uktavān, "since you have addressed me harshly." Ck, Ct, and Cr take this inferior reading to suggest that Indrajit's impending doom is the direct result of his impertinence toward Vibhīṣaṇa (yan māṃ paruṣam uktavāṃs tvaṃ purā tasmāt te 'dya vyasanaṃ prāptam—so Ct).

26. "the two Kākutsthas" kākutsthau: Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B,D1–4,8–13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the singular kākutstham, which would then be a reference to Lakṣmaṇa alone.

"you will not escape with your life" na śakyaṃ jīvituṃ tvayā: Literally, "you will not be able to live."

"with Prince" naradevena: Literally, "with the god among men." The compound is normally a kenning for "king."

"you will accomplish the purpose of the gods" devatākāryaṃ kariṣyasi: Literally, "You will do the work of the gods." Commentators are divided as to the precise meaning of the phrase here. Ck, Ct, and Cr, whom we have followed, understand, "you will satisfy or please the gods," glossing "satisfaction (saṃtoṣam)" for kāryam, "work." Cm glosses, "you will do the appointed work of the gods in the form of serving as Yama's messenger (yamadūtarūpadevatādiṣṭakāryaṃ kariṣyasi)." What this means, he goes on to say, is that Indrajit will be a servant of Yama's messenger (yamadūtakiṃkaro bhaviṣyasīti yāvat). Cg takes Cm's interpretation as his first alternative but offers Cv's as his second, i.e., that Indrajit will suffer the torments of hell (narakayātanānubhavaṃ vā).

27. "So demonstrate all the power you can muster." nidarśaya svātmabalaṃ samudyatam: Literally, "Cause your own elevated strength to be seen." It is also possible to read the imperative irregularly as the ātmanepada, making the sequence nidarśayasva + ātmabalam. This would avoid the seeming redundancy between sva- and ātma-, both of which mean "one's own." The commentators who share this reading are silent on the division of the words. The critical edition and VSP (6.87.31) do not separate the sequence nidarśayasvātmabalam while KK (6.87.33) does so. D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the gerund nidarśayitvā, "having demonstrated," in place of the imperative. In this reading, the object can only be ātmabalam, thus eliminating the possibility of the redundant svātma-.

Cr, the only commentator to remark on the adjective samudyatam, which we render as "all . . . you can muster," glosses, "increased (pravṛddham)."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Sarga 75

1. "replied" abravīt: Literally, "he said." It is unusual in Vālmīki for a speech not to follow immediately upon a verb introducing it. Here, however, the speech begins only in verse 5, after having been introduced a second time with the verb uvāca, "he said," in 4a.

"swiftly" vegena: B3,D6,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead the somewhat redundant krodhena, "with rage or anger."

2. "ornate" tu samalaṃkṛte: Literally, "and well ornamented." D1,2,6,7,9–11,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead susamalaṃkṛte, "very well ornamented."

"yoked to black steeds . . . he resembled Kāla, the ender of all things" kālāśvayukte . . . kālāntakopamaḥ: Literally, "[in the chariot] yoked to black horses . . . [he who was] like Kāla, the ender." Undoubtedly the poet chooses his words for their echoing effect. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 288), however, appears to understand both occurrences of the term kāla to refer to "time or the god of death." Thus, he translates the first compound as "attelé des chevaux de Kāla." In this odd interpretation, he is followed by Pagani (1999, p. 1106), who repeats Roussel's phrase verbatim. She then adds a note (1999, p. 1671) in which she argues that the term kāla in the sense of Death is repeated in the verse in order to emphasize Indrajit's terrifying and lethal character. In any case, the god of Death (Yama) is normally not associated with horses. If he has any animal for his vāhana, it is usually the buffalo. The verse has no expressed finite verb. See 6.21.26 and note.

"with his sword and other weapons raised" udyatāyudhanistriṃśaḥ: Ct and Cr note the seeming anomaly in the compound in which a type of weapon, a sword, is mentioned along with the generic term for weapons. They explain this as in the example of the gobalīvardanyāya, "the maxim of the cattle and the bull," in which one of a class may be mentioned separately for emphasis, etc. (udyatāny āyudhāni nistriṃśaḥ khaḍgaś ca yasya gobalīvardanyāyena—so Cr). Ct ascribes this position to "others (anye)." Ck, whom Ct also quotes, tries to avoid redundancy by taking nistriṃśaḥ, "sword," in the adjectival sense of "pitiless," thus lending the compound the sense of "pitiless with his upraised weapons (udyatāyudho nistriṃśo nirghṛṇaś cety arthaḥ)." Cs, who mentions both interpretations, regards the interpretation of Ct and Cr as an act of desperation (agatikāgatiḥ; literally, "recourse of those who have no recourse").

3–4. "fearsome . . . fingering" bhīmaṃ parāmṛśya: Literally, "fearsome . . . having touched gently." Cf. verse 14 below and note, where the verb is used in its other sense of "drawing a bow." Ś2,Ñ,V1,2,B,D3,4,8–13,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bhīmabalo bhīmam, "fearsome [bow]...[he] of fearsome power." Translations that follow the text of Ct render this variant. Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 110), who reads this variant, appears to omit the adjective bhīmabalaḥ from his translation. Cf. 6.91.9–12 and note.

Virtually all manuscripts collated for the critical edition (with the apparent exception of B1,D1–3,13) insert one or more lines between verses 3 and 4, thus making the transition established in the critical edition suspicious. Ś2,Ñ,V1,2,B2–4,D4,8,12 insert a passage of two lines [1659*], which has Indrajit "gazing (saṃprekṣya)" before he speaks, while D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of three lines [1660*]: "Mounted in his chariot, the mighty and well-adorned bowman, destroyer of his foes,[1] gazed at the adorned younger brother of Rāghava,[2] who, seated on Hanumān's back, was as resplendent as the sun on the mountain where it rises."

[1]"destroyer of his foes" amitraghnaḥ: M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead the accusative amitraghnam, making the epithet refer not to Indrajit but to Lakṣmaṇa.

[2]"the...younger brother of Rāghava" rāghavasyānujam: D6,7,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead the nominative rāvaṇasyātmajaḥ, "the son of Rāvaṇa."

5. "try to ward off" vārayiṣyatha: Literally, "you [all] will ward off or oppose." Cg, the only commentator to remark on this reading, understands Indrajit to use the verb ironically or mockingly (sāpahāsoktiḥ). Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B2–4,D1–5,7,8,10–13,T2,3,G2,M5, the printed editions of Gorresio and Lahore (6.66.6), and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead dhārayiṣyatha, "you will endure or sustain."

6. "will scatter your limbs, as the wind might a heap of straw" vidhamiṣyanti ...tūlarāśim ivānalaḥ: The phrase and the simile are ambiguous in meaning. The primary meaning of vi √dhmā (dham) is "to blow, blow away, or scatter." The problem is that the most common meaning of anala is "fire," and most of the translators, perhaps in accordance with the interpretation of Cg, who glosses, "will burn (dhakṣyanti)," give it this sense. However, the word anala can also refer to the wind, and, like Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 288), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 253), and Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 110), we lean toward the notion that the image is that of straws scattered by a strong wind. The alternate interpretation, however, is entirely possible. A second ambiguity involves the interpretation of the term tūla-, which, aside from the meaning we have selected, can also mean "cotton," lending the compound tūlarāśiḥ the sense of "a pile or bale of cotton." Among the translators consulted, only Pagani interprets the term as we do, rendering, "une meule de foin." The text of Gorresio (6.66.7) disambiguates the matter by substituting the term tṛṇa-, "grass or straw," for tūla-.

7. "mangled by sharp arrows, lances, javelins, broadswords, and iron cudgels" tīkṣṇasāyakanirbhinnāñ śūlaśaktyṛṣṭitomaraiḥ: The syntax of the line is defective in that the dvandva compound in the instrumental either must construe awkwardly with the final member of the tatpuruṣa compound (i.e., -nirbhinnān, "mangled,") or somehow be made to construe with the subject of the sentence (i.e., the implicit aham, "I"). Like Cg and the majority of the translators consulted, we have chosen the first alternative, as it seems more probable that Indrajit would be attacking with all his weapons rather than carrying some and attacking with others. Ct proposes an alternative, arguing that we should supply the term upalakṣitaḥ, "characterized by," so that we understand Indrajit to be describing himself as armed with the various weapons mentioned in the compound. This interpretation has been explicitly followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1732) and appears also to underlie the translation of Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 110). Ct's suggestion is probably a response to his text, which, as noted below, reads sāyaka, "arrows," twice, a reading that, in the first interpretation, would be unquestionably redundant.

"javelins, broadswords, and iron cudgels" -śaktyṛṣṭitomaraiḥ: D9,T1,2,G, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead -śaktyasṭitomaraiḥ. Cg explains this as irregular sandhi for śakti-yasṭi, "staves [and] clubs." This variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 254), who offers, "javelins, shafts, and tomaras." As noted above, D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the redundant -sāyakaiḥ, "arrows," for -tomaraiḥ, "iron cudgels."

8. "like a thundering storm cloud" jīmūtasyeva nadataḥ: Despite the obvious and repeated basis for the simile in the cloud's sending forth showers of rain or hail, Cg insists that the illustration here is confined to the thundering noise [of the cloud, on the one hand, and of the rumbling chariot or the bellowing Indrajit, on the other] (jīmūtasyeti nādamātre dṛṣṭāntaḥ).

"with my deft hands" kṣiprahastasya me: Literally, "of me, whose hands are deft."

Following verse 8, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines [1661*]: "A while ago, during the night battle,[1] I struck the two of you and your followers unconscious to the ground with my arrows, which are like the thunderbolts of Śakra.[2] [1–2] So I think that you either must have forgotten that, or else, clearly, you are bound for the abode of Yama,[3] since you present yourself to do battle with me, who, in my rage, am like a venomous serpent.[3–4]"

[1]"during the night battle" rātriyuddhe: See sarga 35.

[2]"like the thunderbolts of Śakra" śakrāśanisamaiḥ: D7,9–11,G1,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead vajrāśanisamaiḥ, "like the vajra or the thunderbolt." With the exception of Pagani (1999, p. 1106), translators who follow the text of the southern commentators render this variant. In rendering, "semblables au foudre d'Indra," Pagani is following the critical text. See 6.55.43 and note.

[3]"clearly, you are bound for the abode of Yama" vyaktaṃ vā yamasādanam: Literally, "Yama's abode is manifest." The phrase is elliptical. Commentators who share this reading (Cv, Cg, and Cm) flesh it out in various ways. Cv understands that Yama's abode is now visible [for Lakṣmaṇa] (prakāśitaṃ dṛṣṭigocaram). Cm understands yamasādanam to mean "attainment of the world Yama, which is manifest in the sense that it is at hand [for Lakṣmaṇa] (yamasādanaṃ yamalokaprāpanaṃ vyaktaṃ prakāśaṃ sannihitam)." Cg offers two explanations. The first is similar to that of Cm, while, according to the second, the word sādanam should be understood as "abode (sadanam)" through its derivation with a suffix that does not alter its meaning. (yadvā sādanaṃ sadanam. svārthe 'ṇpratyayaḥ.) D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read yāto yamakṣayam, "[you have] gone to the abode of Yama." Ct and Ck explain the participle in accordance with Pā 3.4.71 as inceptive, the sense being "you are about to depart for Yama's abode." (ādikarmaṇi ktaḥ. yamakṣayaṃ yamagṛhaṃ prayātum upakrānto 'si—so Ct and, similarly, Ck.) Cr proposes supplying "you will be [gone to] (bhaviṣyasi)." Line 3 is virtually a repetition of 6.76.11.

9. "Lakṣmaṇa" lakṣmaṇaḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead rāghavaḥ, "Rāghava."

"his face displayed not the slightest sign of fear" abhītavadanaḥ: Literally, "having an unfrightened face." Our interpretation follows that of Cg, who glosses, "whose face was devoid of any alteration due to fear (bhayavikṛtiśūnyavadanaḥ)."

10. "The fulfillment of the goals of which you boast is not so easy to accomplish" uktaś ca durgamaḥ pāraḥ kāryāṇām . . . tvayā: Literally, "the far shore of the actions stated by you is difficult to reach."

"He alone is truly wise" sa buddhimān: Literally, "he is wise." Cg and Cr understand that the inference to be drawn here is that Indrajit is a fool (ato durbuddhir asīty arthaḥ). Cm, evidently trying to move the discourse from the intellectual to the heroic, glosses, "capable, powerful (samarthaḥ)."

11. "You are utterly incapable of accomplishing this feat. In fact, no one can accomplish it." sa tvam arthasya hīnārtho duravāpasya kenacit: Literally, "You are deficient in purpose with regard to a purpose that is not to be accomplished by anyone."

"Yet after merely boasting about it" vaco vyāhṛtya: Literally, "having uttered speech." Ś,Ñ1,V2,B3,D1–3,8,10–13,T3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read vācā, "by [mere] words," for vacaḥ, "speech."

12. "on that other occasion" tadā: Literally, "then." The allusion is to the battle during which Indrajit earlier incapacitated Rāma and his allies (sarga 35).

14. "drew" parāmṛśya: Literally, "having drawn." See verses 3–4 above and note, where the verb is used in its sense of "gently stroking or fingering."

15. "venomous as serpents" sarpaviṣopamāḥ: Literally, "like the venom of serpents." This is an unusual variant of the more common āśīviṣopamāḥ, "like venomous serpents." See, for example, 6.58.18 and 6.67.39.

"cascaded upon him" petuḥ: Literally, "they fell." Ck and Ct understand the verb to mean that the arrows are thwarted by Lakṣmaṇa's armor and so fall, presumably, harmlessly (kavacenāhatā iti śeṣaḥ). Similarly, Cg and Cm propose adding the words "to the ground (bhūmau)." This notion appears to inform many of the translations consulted. We, however, find it implausible in light of the following verses where Lakṣmaṇa is unambiguously shown to be wounded by these arrows.

16. "exceedingly powerful in their striking force . . . pierced" atimahāvegaiḥ . . . vivyādha: Cg, alone among the commentators, perhaps anticipating the compound atividdhāṅgaḥ, "his body riddled [with arrows]," in the following verse, proposes that we take ati as an upasarga separated from, but construing with, the finite verb, vivyādha. This would yield the sense "completely or thoroughly pierced." Such a separation (vyavahitaprayoga), common in the vedas, is permitted by Pā 1.4.82 (quoted by Cg) but is extremely rare, to say the least, in epic poetry. See note to 6.55.20.

"Saumitri of auspicious marks" saumitrim . . . śubhalakṣaṇam: The epithet is almost invariably used in conjunction with the name Lakṣmaṇa for its echoing effect. It is rare to see it used otherwise. See 6.14.3; 6.67.37; 6.71.20; 6.73.5; 6.79.1; 6.89.4; and notes.

See also Goldman 1984, p. 105. An epithet of this type used with the epithet Saumitri is mitranandana as at 6.74.7; 6.72.31; and notes.

17. "drenched in blood" rudhireṇa samukṣitaḥ: Cr has a difficult time accepting the idea that Lakṣmaṇa has been wounded. He understands the verse to be saying, "Struck by those arrows, he was suffused with a red color arising from his anger (tāḍitaśarīro 'ta eva rudhireṇa krodhahetukāruṇyavarneṇa samutthito vyāptaḥ)." See note to 6.35.9.

18. "what he had done" ātmanaḥ karma: Literally, "his own feat or action."

"he drew near" adhigamya: Literally, "having approached." We understand the gerund here in its sense of "to approach or draw near." In this we are at odds with Cg, the only commentator to remark on this reading, who takes it in its other common sense of "having grasped or understood." He glosses, "perceiving its effectiveness (phalavattvena dṛṣṭvā)." This interpretation appears to be followed only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 255), who collapses the gerunds prasamīkṣya, "having seen," and adhigamya, to render, "seeing his hits were telling." Ñ2,D5–7,9–11,T1,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead abhigamya, which, less ambiguously, means "having approached or having faced."

19. In his characteristic fashion, Cm offers a thoroughgoing alternate inner interpretation (vāstavārthaḥ) of this and the following three verses, according to which Indrajit is really praising Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa and referring to his own impending doom. See note to 6.27.4.

20. "flocks of kites" śyenasaṃghāḥ: See notes to 6.31.11 and 6.87.39–40. Cf. Dave 1985, pp. 242–43.

"as you lie lifeless" tvāṃ gatāsum: Literally, "you whose breath is gone."

21. "ever ignoble Rāma, a warrior in name only" kṣatrabandhuḥ sadānāryaḥ: Literally, "kinsman of the kshatriyas [and] ever non-āryan." The term bandhu, "kinsman," at the end of a compound is often used pejoratively to indicate someone who shares the name but not the ideal characteristics of a particular social class. A number of manuscripts (D6,9–11,T2,3,G2,3,M3) and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead kṣatrabandhuṃ sadānāryaṃ, in which case the two adjectives refer to Lakṣmaṇa rather than Rāma.

22. "Yes, he will soon see you" tvām: We follow the commentators, who suggest bringing down, as it were, the verb drakṣyati, "he will see," from the previous verse.

"sprawled on the ground" bhūmau: Literally, "on the ground."

"your armor cut to pieces" viśastakavacam: Ñ,V1,B2,3,D5,6,9–11,T1, the printed edition of Gorresio (6.67.24), and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead visrastakavacam, "with armor stripped off or slipped away."

23. "perfectly reasonable" hetumat . . . atyartham: Literally, "excessively logical." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead arthajñaḥ, "who understood the sense or meaning [of words]." The variant adjective would then modify Lakṣmaṇa.

Following verse 23, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1665*]: "Stop boasting of your power,[1] you fool, you rākṣasa of cruel deeds.[2] Why go on prattling like this? Prove your valor through valorous action![3]"

[1]"Stop boasting of your power" vāgbalaṃ tyaja: Literally, "Give up the power of [mere] words." We agree with Cr, who understands the phrase to mean that Indrajit's words are "without basis (nirarthakam etat)."

[2]"of cruel deeds" krūrakarman hi: M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead krūrakarmāsi, "you are one of cruel deeds." Ct and Ck understand the compound to refer to Indrajit's use of devious strategies in fighting (kūṭayuddhavyāpārakartaḥ).

[3]"Prove your valor through valorous action!" saṃpādaya sukarmaṇā: Literally, "Bring [this] about through good action." Cr, whom we follow, glosses, "carry out the accomplishment of your words (svoktasiddhiṃ kuru)."

25. "man-eater" puruṣādana: V1,B2,D6,T2,3,G1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead puruṣādhama, "lowest of men," a reading that is contextually somewhat odd in that Indrajit is, of course, not a man. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 255), who translates the text of Cg, evades the issue by rendering, "vile creature." For some reason, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 289), who consistently reads the text of Ct, perhaps misunderstanding the compound or working from a text that shares the reading of Cg, renders, "le dernier des guerriers." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 255) once again follows Roussel's lead. Among several other variations on this compound, the text of Gorresio (6.67.28) avoids the problem by reading rākṣaṣādhama, "lowest of rākṣasas."

26. "sank" nicakhāna: Literally, "he dug or buried." D7,10,11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vijaghāna, while D9,T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read nijaghāna. Both verbs have the sense "he struck."

"arrows" śarān: Ñ,V1,D6,T,G1,2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead śitān, "sharp," which then modifies nārācān, "iron arrows," avoiding the redundancy.

Following verse 26, Ñ,V1,2,B,D4–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1668*]: "Fletched with splendid feathers,[1] those arrows, blazing like serpents, glowed in the chest of the rākṣasa, son of chaos, like the rays of Savitṛ.[2]"

[1]"Fletched with splendid feathers" supatravājitāḥ: The commentators, perhaps finding the compound redundant, prefer to take -vājitāḥ in the sense of "swift." Most of them understand that it is the splendid fletching that lends the shafts their speed (so Ct, Ck, Cg, Cm; supatraiḥ saṃjātavegāḥ—so Cg).

[2]"Savitṛ" savituḥ: See note to 6.57.20, and compare note to 6.93.27, App. I, No. 65, lines 19–20.

28. "immensely fearsome" mahābhīmaḥ: M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead tadā bhīmaḥ, "then, a fearsome . . ."

"between those two lions—man and rākṣasa" nararākṣasasiṃhayoḥ: Literally, "of the two man and rākṣasa lions."

"each eager to kill the other" parasparavadhaiṣiṇoḥ: Ñ2,D6,7,9–11,T3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read -jayaiṣiṇoḥ for -vadhaiṣiṇoḥ, lending the compound the meaning "each eager to defeat the other."

29. "For both" ubhau hi: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vikrāntau, "[those two] valorous."

"both were extremely heroic, and both were skilled in every weapon and divine weapon-spell" ubhāv api suvikrāntau sarvaśastrāstrakovidau: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct omit this line.

30. "The two great heroes" mahāvīrau: D3,7,9–11,G1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read tadā, "then," for mahā-, "great."

"like two planets in the heavens" grahāv iva nabhogatau: It is a commonplace of traditional Indian astrology to regard two planets visually aligned with each other as in conflict. On the mutual hostility attributed to planets in Indian astrology, see Pingree 1978, p. 230. See, too, 6.78.18 and note.

31. "For . . . the two" hi tau: D5,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead [ivā]bhītau, "fearless or undaunted."

"Bala and Vṛtra" balavṛtrāv iva: Bala or Vala, like Vṛtra, is a demonic foe whose death at the hands of Indra is recounted in several hymns of the Ṛgveda (Bala—2.11.19; 2.12.3; 2.15.8; 3.51.18; 8.14.8; etc.; Vṛtra—1.32; 2.11.18; 2.19.4; 2.20.7; etc.). Several of the commentators are uncomfortable with this identification, since it effectively compares Lakṣmaṇa to a demon. Ct asserts that, by Bala, we are to understand Indra. Cm similarly understands that the word "Bala" refers to Indra in his guise as Purandara, "the smasher of citadels." This epithet is apparently deemed apposite since the demon Bala/Vala in the Ṛgveda is represented as inhabiting a fortified cave or citadel (2.12.3 and 8.14.8). Cg attempts to rationalize the identification by arguing that the term "Bala" is a kind of shorthand for Indra's epithet Balaśatru, "foe of Bala." (balaśabdo balaśatrv indraparaḥ. nāmaikadeśe nāmagrahaṇāt.) Cf. note to 6.46.39. See, too, notes to 6.55.123 and 6.97.21.

32. "the two lions—man and rākṣasa" nararākṣasasiṃhau: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read -mukhyau, "foremost of," for -siṃhau,"lions [among]." See note to verse 28 above.

33. "the two champions—man and rākṣasa" nararākṣasottamau: Literally, "the two best of the men and the rākṣasas."

"with torrents and hails of arrows" śaraughavarṣeṇa: Literally, "with an arrow-flood-shower." Cg thinks we should understand the compound śaraugha-, "floods of arrows," also as part of the simile of the storm clouds in the sense of "floods of water." He claims that the word śara means "water" in this context, basing his argument on the use of the term in its secondary sense, as in the term śaradhiḥ, "receptacle of waters, i.e., ocean." (śaraugho meghapakṣe jalaughaḥ. śaraśabdo hi jalavācī, śaradhir iti samudra-paryāyāt.) This interpretation is reflected in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 256).

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Ś,D8,10–12, the texts of Ct, Ck, and Cr, and the editions of NSP and Gita Press omit this verse. This verse and 1669* (see below) do, however, appear unnumbered, in brackets, between verses 6.88.36 and 37 of GPP.

Following verse 33, D5–7,9,S (except G3) insert a passage of four lines [1669*]: "Gaining strength in battle, the two immensely powerful warriors, skilled in battle, fierce with their arrows and swords, and wielding sharp weapons, unceasingly slashed at each other[1] in that great battle, just like Śambara and Vāsava.[2]"

[1]"slashed at each other" āvivyathatuḥ: Literally, "those two were pained." Following the printed editions of KK (6.88.40) and VSP (6.88.40), we emend the critical reading to the more contextually apposite āvivyadhatuḥ, "those two pierced or cut." It appears likely that the critical edition's reading is a typographical error, as its apparatus shows no variant of āvivyadhatuḥ, the reading of all manuscripts consulted for KK. In fact, the critical apparatus shows only one variant (D9), āvidhya dhanur, "brandishing the bow." The reading of KK and VSP is also attested in GPP.

[2]"just like Śambara and Vāsava" śambaravāsavopamau: See note to 6.63.42.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Ck not only omits these two verses (CE 6.75.33 and 1669*) but criticizes them as redundant and interpolated. He notes that they serve to introduce an improper sarga break. He claims that the division of sargas here, which some manuscripts follow, is incorrect because there is no change of topic, as the battle between Lakṣmaṇa and Indrajit simply continues. (atra madhye punaruktaṃ ślokadvayaṃ prakṣipya sargam avacchindanti. puraḥ paścād ubhayos tumulaṃ yuddham eva kevalaṃ vartate na kiṃcid arthāntaraṃ prakaraṇāntaram. ato 'yukto 'vacchedaḥ.) Ct accepts Ck's position and paraphrases his comments, while Cs notes that this is merely one textual tradition (saṃpradāyaḥ). This textual issue is a matter of dispute between commentators aligned with Ct and Ck, on the one hand, and those aligned with Cv, Cg, and Cm, on the other. The latter unanimously mark a sarga boundary after the critical edition's verse 1669*, and this division is followed in the printed texts of KK and VSP. GPP, NSP, and Gita Press, however, continue with the same sarga (6.88 in their calculation) up until the end of sarga 76 of the critical edition. Translations are also divided on this issue, although the alignment with the textual traditions is not as obvious. Raghunathan naturally follows the sarga break of Cg. Roussel, Gita Press, and Pagani follow that of Ct. Dutt and Shastri, who normally follow Ct, nonetheless show a sarga break after the critical edition's verse 32.

Sarga 76

1. See note to 6.75.33 for a discussion of the division of the sargas in various editions.

"an arrow" śaram: Ñ,V1,2,B1,D1–3,7,9–11,13,G1,2,M, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read instead the plural śarān, "arrows."

2. "son of Rāvaṇa" rāvaṇātmajaḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead rākṣasādhipaḥ, "the rākṣasa lord."

"the slapping . . . against . . . armguard" jyātalanirghoṣam: Literally, "the sound of the bowstring and armguard." We agree with Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 112), who, alone among the translators consulted, understands the term tala in its technical sense of the leather armguard worn on the left forearm of an archer to protect it from the blows of the bowstring. Another possible meaning for tala is the forearm itself. However, in light of 1.21.8, Rāmāyaṇa archers appear to use armguards when shooting (see 6.66.23 and note). Other translators either take the term in its sense of "the palm of the hand" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1735 and Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 256) or ignore it altogether, believing that the reference is only to the sound or twanging of the bowstring.

3. "observing the downcast face of the rākṣasa, son of Rāvaṇa" taṃ viṣaṇṇamukhaṃ dṛṣṭvā rākṣasaṃ rāvaṇātmajam: Literally, "having seen that the rākṣasa, Rāvaṇa's son, was one whose face was despondent." B1,D2,3,5,13,T1,G1,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead vivarṇa-, "pale," for viṣaṇṇa-, "despondent, downcast."

"absorbed in battle" yuddhasaṃsaktam: V1,2,B4,D4,9–11,G1,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read -saṃyuktam, "engaged in." Ct, Cm, and Ck explain the compound as meaning "endowed with the frenzy that is conducive to battle (yuddhajanakaharṣayuktam—so Ct, Cm)."

4. "unpropitious signs on the person of this son of Rāvaṇa" nimittāni . . . asmin rāvaṇātmaje: Literally, "portents in or on this son of Rāvaṇa." Given the context, we must agree with the commentators that this refers to the inauspicious signs, such as the dejected expression, etc., mentioned in the previous verse. On omens, see 6.4.6 and note.

5. "like flames of fire" agniśikhopamān: Ñ,V1,2,B2–4,D4,7,9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead āśīviṣopamān, "like venomous serpents," a reading that is distinctly redundant in light of the simile in the second half of the verse.

"sharp" niśitān: B2,3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead viśikhān, "arrows." This variant is redundant in light of śarān, "arrows," in pāda b.

"engorged with venom" viṣolbaṇān: Literally, "abundant or powerful with venom." This may be best seen as a paranipāta for ulbaṇaviṣān, "with abundant or powerful venom." Ñ,V1,2,B1,2,4,D1–3,5,6,13,T,G3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead mahāviṣān, "with powerful or abundant venom."

6. "Indrajit was . . . stunned" abhavan mūḍhaḥ: Literally, "he was stunned."

7. "But he regained consciousness after a moment. And, his senses fully restored" upalabhya muhūrtena saṃjñāṃ pratyāgatendriyaḥ: D10,11,T1, and texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck omit these two pādas (ab).

"that hero" vīraḥ: Ñ,V1,2,B,D1–4,7,9–11,13,G1,2, the texts and printed editions of Ct, and the printed edition of Gorresio read instead ājau, "in battle."

8. "Indrajit" saḥ: Literally, "he."

9. "Have you completely forgotten" kiṃ na smarasi: Literally, "Do you not remember?"

"in our first encounter" yuddhe prathame: Literally, "in the first battle." The reference is to the battle in which Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were bound with Indrajit's serpent-weapons (6.35).

"in battle" yudhi: M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead bhuvi, "on the ground," yielding the sense "[bound, you writhed] on the ground."

"writhed in bondage" nibaddhaḥ . . . viceṣṭase: Literally, "bound, you writhe." Ct understands viceṣṭase here in its other sense of "you act." He glosses, "you engage in shooting arrows, etc. (śarapātādi karoṣi)." Apparently, Ct's idea is that Indrajit is questioning how Lakṣmaṇa dares to offer him battle now, after having been so easily defeated earlier. Several of the translations (Dutt 1893, pp. 1409–10; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 290; and Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 256) follow this interpretation.

10. The verse is closely paraphrased by 1661*, lines 1–2. See notes to 6.75.8.

"like the thunderbolts of Śakra" śakrāśanisamaiḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B2–4,D1–4,7–13,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vajrāśanisamaiḥ, "like the vajra or the thunderbolt." See 6.55.43 and note.

11. Pādas ab virtually repeat line 3 of 1661*. See notes to 6.75.8.

12. "Now stand your ground!" tiṣṭhedānīṃ vyavasthitaḥ: Literally, "Now stand resolved, firm." Cr glosses, "your mind resolved, take your stand (dṛḍhamatiḥ san tvaṃ tiṣṭha)." Cs similarly glosses "resolved to give battle (yuddhārthaniścitaḥ)" for vyavasthitaḥ, "resolved, firm." Cs goes on to suggest that, by using this expression, Indrajit indicates that he will show himself to Lakṣmaṇa and not resort to the stratagem of invisibility as he did in their first encounter (anena pūrvavad antardhānaṃ nāstīti sūcyate). Of course, given that Indrajit's sacrifice has been interrupted, we are, in any case, to understand that he is perhaps no longer given the option of cloaking himself in invisibility.

13. "Hanumān" hanūmantam: Recall that it is Hanumān's assault on the rākṣasas that first distracts Indrajit from his sacrifice. He begins a battle with the monkey at 6.73.17–30, which is inconclusive and is broken off by the intervention first of Vibhīṣaṇa and then of Lakṣmaṇa.

14. "his frenzy redoubled in his fury" krodhād dviguṇasaṃrabdhaḥ: Literally, "doubly furious out of rage." Cg explains that Indrajit feels twice as much anger toward Vibhīṣaṇa as he does toward Lakṣmaṇa and the rest (lakṣmaṇādiviṣayaroṣāpekṣayā vibhīṣaṇaviṣaye dviguṇaṃ kupita ity arthaḥ).

15–16. "his face betraying not the slightest sign of fear" abhītavadanaḥ: Literally, "whose face is unafraid."

"saying": Unusually, the poet fails to provide a verb introducing a direct quotation. We have supplied one.

17. "inconsequential" laghavaḥ: Ck, Cm, and Ct take the adjective to mean "[tender or delicate] like garlands of flowers (puṣpamālāvat—so Cm, Ct)."

"Indeed, they feel quite pleasant." sukhā hīme: Literally, "For, they [are] pleasant." Cm and Ct understand this to mean that they cause no pain (na tu kleśadā ity arthaḥ). Cr glosses, "giving pleasure to your enemies (ripūṇāṃ sukhapradāḥ)."

18. "if they desire victory in battle" samare jayakāṅkṣiṇaḥ: D7,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the redundant yuddha-, "battle," for jaya-, "victory."

"And, speaking in this fashion, he showered him with hails of arrows." ity evaṃ taṃ bruvāṇas tu śaravarṣair avākirat: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ity evaṃ taṃ bruvan dhanvī śarair abhivavarṣa ha, "and speaking in this fashion, that bowman showered him with arrows."

19. "Indrajit's armor" kavacam: Literally, "armor."

"all adorned with gold" hemabhūṣitam: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,7–13,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Lahore (6.68.18), and Gorresio (6.68.19) read instead kāñcanaṃ mahat, "golden [and] heavy [armor]."

"like a constellation falling from the sky" tārājālam ivāmbarāt: Literally, "like a cluster or mass of stars from the sky."

20. "so that he resembled a mountain bristling with trees" prarūḍha iva sānumān: Literally, "like an overgrown mountain." Our translation, like that of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 257), follows the interpretation of Cg, who glosses, "having full-grown trees (prarūḍhavṛkṣaḥ)." The image is suggested by the idea of the mountainous body of Indrajit from which the vast iron arrows of Lakṣmaṇa are protruding. Cm, who shares this reading, glosses, "he was immobilized (niścalo babhūva)," evidently taking the participle prarūḍha in its sense of "deeply rooted (prarūḍhamūlaḥ)." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead pratyūṣe bhānumān iva, "like the bright-rayed sun at dawn." This image, according to Ct, Ck, and Cr, derives from the redness of the blood flowing from Indrajit's wounds (kṣatajaraktavarṇatvād iti bhāvaḥ). The image is repeated at verse 31. See 6.76.31 and note.

Following verse 20, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines [1672*]: "Then, in a rage, Rāvaṇa's son pierced heroic[1] Lakṣmaṇa, of fearsome valor,[2] with a thousand arrows in combat.[1–2] Thus, Lakṣmaṇa's heavy, celestial[3] armor was cut to pieces. They chased each other all around with constant attack and counterattack.[3–4]"

[1]"heroic" vīram: D7,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the nominative vīraḥ, "hero, heroic one," which makes the epithet apply to Indrajit rather than Lakṣmaṇa.

[2]"of fearsome valor" bhīmavikramam: D9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead the nominative bhīmavikramaḥ, which makes the compound describe Indrajit rather than Lakṣmaṇa.

[3]"celestial" divyam: Cr claims that the armor was given to Lakṣmaṇa by the gods (devair dattam ity arthaḥ). The epic makes no mention of this.

21. Following verse 21, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of nine lines [1674*]. Virtually all northern manuscripts insert lines 1, 3–5, and 7 of 1647*, while a number of them add line 6. All editions consulted, with the exception of Lahore, show this insertion in full or in part. Why the editors of the critical edition chose to excise these passages from the critical text is unclear. Lines 8–9 are repeated as verse 33 below. "For a very long time, the two great heroes, both skilled in the arts of war, riddled each other with sharp arrows.[1–2] Fearsome in their valor and striving each for his own victory, they were riddled with masses of arrows, their armor and battle standards cut to pieces.[3–4] Gushing hot blood like two waterfalls gushing water, they released fearsome hails of arrows that made a horrific din, just as two black storm clouds in the sky heralding universal destruction[1] might send forth torrential rains.[5–7] A long time[2] elapsed while they were thus engaged in combat, but neither of them turned his face from combat or felt any weariness.[8–9]"

[1]"just as two black storm clouds . . . heralding universal destruction" nīlayoḥ kālameghayoḥ: The term kāla- in the compound can also mean "black," and some translators have apparently taken it in this fashion. Such a reading, however, is redundant with the adjective nīla, "dark blue, black." We are therefore inclined to agree with Cr, who offers, as his first explanation, "destroying the worlds (lokavighāṭakayoḥ)," thus taking kāla in its sense of "time or doom." Cr notes also that one can understand the reference to be to clouds during the monsoon (varṣākālikayor vā). Translators consulted are divided as to whether to take these merely as rain clouds or something more devastating. Dutt (1893, p. 1411) translates, "like . . . black clouds at Doomsday," and notes, "the commentator says the word means 'black clouds'; but I prefer the sense given." It is not clear to which commentator he is referring, as Ct, to whom he normally refers, is silent on this point, while Cr, who does comment, offers both meanings.

[2]"A long time" mahān kālaḥ: Ct and Cm understand that the battle rages for many days (mahān kālo 'nekadinarūpaḥ).

22. "Deploying" darśayantau: Literally, "displaying, manifesting."

"filled the sky with arrows of every size and shape" śarān uccāvacākārān antarikṣe babandhatuḥ: Literally, "those two bound arrows of various forms in the sky." The precise sense of the polysemic root √bandh here is not certain. Our understanding is that it is used metaphorically to suggest that the warriors shoot their arrows so rapidly that they appear to be bound in chains or webs that cover the sky. Translators render the term variously. Commentators are silent as to the meaning of the verb. Cs explains the compound uccāvacākārān, "of every size and shape," as "having forms characterized by numerous varieties (anekaprabhedaviśiṣṭākārān)."

23. "flawlessly" vyapetadoṣam: Literally, "in such a way that its flaws were gone." We follow Cr in reading the compound adverbially with the participle asyantau "[those two] throwing or hurling (vyapetadoṣādi yathā bhavati tathā [asyantau])." Cg believes that the specific flaw alluded to here is that of confusion or delusion (vyapagatamohatvadoṣam).

24. "crash of their bowstrings against their armguards" talanisvanaḥ: Literally, "the sound of the armguards." Like Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 114), we take the reference here to be an elliptical variant of the compound jyātalanirghoṣam at verse 2 above. See note ad loc. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1737) translates, "the . . . sound produced by the impact of the palms . . . on their bowstrings," while Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 258) translates, "The thud of bowstring on palm." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead tumulaḥ svanaḥ, "a tumultuous sound."

Following 24ab, Ñ,V1,3 (after line 5 of 1674*),B2–4,D4–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1675*], "Indeed, that terrible sound of those two, frenzied with battle as they were,[1] burst forth[2] like a fearsome thunderbolt, causing all creatures to tremble in fear.[3]"

[1]"frenzied with battle as they were" samaramattayoḥ: Literally, "maddened with battle." V3,D9,10,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead samarayattayoḥ, "exerting [themselves] in battle." D5,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead samarasaktayoḥ, "engaged or locked in battle."

[2]"burst forth" bhrājate: Literally, "it shone or flashed forth."

[3]"causing all creatures to tremble in fear" prakampayañ janam: Literally, "causing people to shake." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sa kampaṃ janayāmāsa, "that [sound] produced trembling."

Following 24cd, Ś2,V2,D,S insert a passage of two lines [1677*]: "Wounded with golden-fletched iron arrows, the two mighty and illustrious warriors bled copiously, intent on victory."

25. "smeared with blood" asṛgdigdhāḥ: In keeping with his interpretation of the star passages quoted above (1674*, line 5; and 1677*), which also refer to Lakṣmaṇa's bleeding wounds, here Cr attempts to deny that the hero is actually wounded. He claims that the arrows are smeared only with the blood of Indrajit and other warriors (anyayuddhīyaśarīrajenendrajiccharīrajena ca rudhireṇa digdhā vyāptāḥ śarāḥ). See note to 32 below. See, too, note to 6.35.9.

26. "Meanwhile, some of their arrows" tayor bāṇāḥ: Literally, "arrows of those two." The reference is to those missiles that, unlike those in the previous verse, fail to strike their targets.

"were intercepted" saṃjaghaṭṭire: Literally, "they clashed with." We follow Ct, who glosses the past passive participle saṃghaṭṭitāḥ, "[they were] crashed into."

"by other" anyaiḥ: D9–11,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead the nominative plural anye, "others," which then modifies bāṇāḥ, "arrows," making it more explicit that these are arrows other than the ones described in verse 25.

"they smashed and splintered one another" babhañjuś cicchiduś cāpi: Literally, "they broke and cut." The syntax here is elliptical, as the verbs lack any explicit direct object. Commentators resolve the issue in various ways. Cr, whom we have followed, supplies the term parasparam, "one another," while Cg supplies a direct object, bānāṇ, "[other] arrows." According to Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 297), Cl interprets the two verbs as intransitive or reflexive, giving them the sense "they were broken and splintered. (babhañjur bhagnā babhūvuḥ. cicchiduś ca chinnāś ca.)" Gorresio, however, feels it is better to interpret the verbs as transitive.

27. "During the struggle, a . . . carpet" raṇe . . . cayaḥ: Literally, "in the battle, . . . a pile or heap." D7,9, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Gita Press read instead the nominative raṇaḥ, which radically alters the syntax of the entire verse, since now it is the battle that is described as ghastly while the nominative cayaḥ, "pile, mass," must be construed as part of a subordinate clause. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 258) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1737) struggle to make sense of this reading.

"a carpet of kuśa grass" kuśamayaś cayaḥ: In some printed texts (Gita Press 6.88.70 and GPP 6.88.70) the second occurrence of the term cayaḥ in pāda d is broken up into the words ca + yaḥ, "and which." This leaves the compound kuśamayaḥ as an adjective that must modify either "battle" or a supplied term such as "place or field." Cr reads the verse in this fashion. See note to 6.60.22.

"two . . . fires" agnibhyām: Cg, in an attempt to maintain the precision of the image, informs us that the sacrificial fires in question are the gārhapatya and the āhavanīya. This suggestion is represented in the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1737).

28. "of those two great warriors" mahātmanoḥ: Literally, "of the two great ones."

"a śālmali and a kiṃśuka tree in full bloom . . . before their leaves appear" supuṣpāv iva niṣpatrau . . . śālmalikiṃśukau: The comparison with the trees is quite apt, for both the śālmali, or silk-cotton (or semul) tree (Salmalia malabarica or Bombax malabaricum), and the kiṃśuka, or "flame-of-the-forest" tree (Butea frondosa or Butea monosperma), have bright crimson flowers that bloom before their leaves appear. The image draws its force from the comparison of the bleeding wounds of the warriors and the red blossoms of the trees. See notes to 6.30.26, App. I, No. 18, lines 27–30. See, too, note to 6.7.12–13, on the śālmali tree. See 6.35.9; 6.55.22; 6.62.19; and notes.

29. "eager to vanquish"-jayaiṣiṇau: D5,T1,G1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead -vadhaiṣiṇau, "eager to kill."

30. "neither of them grew weary" na śramaṃ pratyapadyatām: Literally, "the two of them did not attain fatigue."

31. "deeply rooted, yet protruding from their bodies" śarīrasthair avagāḍhaiḥ: Literally, "situated in the body and deeply implanted." We agree with Ct and Ck, who gloss gāḍhamagnaiḥ, "deeply sunk," for avagāḍhaiḥ, as opposed to Cr, who glosses, "dense, firm (dṛḍhaiḥ)."

"like twin mountains bristling with trees" virūḍhāv iva parvatau: Literally, "like two overgrown mountains." We follow the interpretation of Ck, Ct, Cr, and Cm, who understand, "having full-grown trees (pravṛddhavṛkṣau—so Cm, Ct)." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 115), who translates, "come due monti vestiti di sprocchi," indicates in a note (p. 297) that he is following the interpretation of Cl, who glosses, "on which sprouts were growing (jātāṅkūrau)." The image is repeated at verse 20 above. See 6.78.20 and note.

32. Here, as earlier (see verse 25 above and note), Cr makes a distinction between Indrajit, whom he sees as actually bloodied, and Lakṣmaṇa, who is merely reddened. He understands two different kinds of redness: one from blood (rakta) [i.e., in the case of Indrajit] and the other from reddening (āruṇya) [through anger, exertion, etc., in the case of Lakṣmaṇa] (rudhirābhyām āruṇyaraktābhyām). See note to 6.35.9.

"resembled blazing fires" jvalanta iva pāvakāḥ: The simile is apparently intended to derive its force from the image of a fire glowing red but largely obscured by smoke. Here the blood-smeared bodies suggest flames, while the arrows take the place of smoke.

33. As Cr notes, this verse is a repetition of an earlier one [1674*, lines 8–9]. See notes to verse 21 above.

34. "fray . . . battle . . . combat" samara- . . . samara- . . . samaram: The repetition of the same word is perhaps less appealing in English than it is in Sanskrit.

"to aid and comfort" priyahitam: Literally, "what was [at once] agreeable and beneficial."

"to give . . . respite from the fatigue of combat" samarapariśramaṃ nihantum: Literally, "to counteract or destroy battle fatigue." No commentator seems troubled by the apparent contradiction between this verse and the preceding one, where Lakṣmaṇa is said to experience no battle fatigue. Cm, however, understands the compound samarapariśramaṃ to be a bahuvrīhi in the sense of "experiencing battle fatigue," which he believes modifies Indrajit. Thus, his understanding of the phrase would be "to kill Indrajit, who was suffering from battle fatigue (samaraparisramaṃ samare pariśramo yasya taṃ indrajitam iti śeṣaḥ)."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

1. "the heroic Vibhīṣaṇa" śūraḥ saḥ: Literally, "that hero."

"watching the two of them" tau dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen those two." Cg understands that, although Vibhīṣaṇa has entered the battlefield in order to fight, he first stops and stands quietly by in order to see which of the two combatants is more powerful. Once he determines that they are equally matched, he enters the fray to assist Rāma. (tau lakṣmaṇendrajitau prathamaṃ draṣṭukāmaḥ sa vibhīṣaṇas tau dṛṣṭvā saṃgrāmamūrdhani yoddhuṃ tasthāv ity anvayaḥ. svayaṃ prathamaṃ yuddhaṃ kartum udyukto 'pi tayor balādhikyaṃ draṣṭuṃ tūṣṇīṃ sthitaḥ. tayor balataulye dṛṣṭe svasya rāmaviṣayakiṃcitkārārtham idānīṃ yuddhāya tasthāv ity arthaḥ.)

"locked in combat" yudhyamānau . . . prasaktau: Literally, "fighting . . . intent."

Following 1ab, Ñ,V,B,D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1682*]: "That mighty warrior was eager to watch those two, who, like two rutting elephants, were locked in battle[1] and eager to kill[2] each other."

[1]"That mighty warrior was eager to watch those two, who . . . were locked in battle" tau draṣṭukāmaḥ saṃgrāme parasparagatau balī (= line 2): Literally, "The mighty one was desirous of seeing those two, who were gone to each other in battle." For the first pāda, D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read tayor yuddhaṃ draṣṭukāmaḥ, while, for the second pāda, Ñ2,V,B1–3,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read varacāpadharo balī. The resulting line in the text of Ct would thus be rendered as "that mighty warrior, holding his superb bow, was eager to watch their combat."

[2]"eager to kill" -vadhaiṣiṇau: B3,D7,9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead -jayaiṣiṇau, "eager to vanquish."

2. "his great bow" mahad dhanuḥ: Cg notes that the bow must be a temporary attribute of Vibhīṣaṇa, since he is normally described as wielding only a mace. (dhanus tādātvikaṃ kiṃcit. vibhīṣaṇasya kevalagadāpāṇitvāt.)

3. "glowing like fire" śikhisaṃkāśāḥ: Literally, "resembling the crested one." We agree with Cr, the only commentator to address this term, and with the majority of translators, who understand śikhin in its common sense of "fire." Dutt (1893, p. 1412) takes śikhin in one of its other common senses, "peacock," and takes the compound to mean "furnished with peacock feathers." This is not a persuasive interpretation. It is remotely possible, however, that Dutt is influenced by a minor northern variant, known to Gorresio, in pāda d of verse 2, barhiṇavāsasaḥ, "clothed in peacock feathers," which is rendered in the translation of Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 116), who translates, "guerniti di penne di pavone." Ś,V2,B1,D3,4,8–12,G1, the printed edition of Gorresio (6.69.4), and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead -saṃsparśāḥ, "having the touch or impact [of fire]."

"thick and fast" samāhitāḥ: Literally, "compact or dense." We share our interpretation of the term with most of the translators. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 259) evidently understands the term in its sense of "focused, concentrated," and renders, "squarely hitting their target." This interpretation, we believe, is plausible. Dutt (1893, p. 1412) renders, "powerfully," but this interpretation has little lexical support.

4. "Vibhīṣaṇa's followers" vibhīṣaṇasyānucarāḥ: The reference is to the four rākṣasas, Vibhīṣaṇa's counselors, who defected with him in sarga 10 and are named at 6.28.6. See 6.10.12; 6.11.6; 6.28.6; and notes.

5. "excited" prahṛṣṭānām: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead pradhṛṣṭānām, "haughty." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1738) plausibly translates, "proud," while Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 293), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 258) and Pagani (1999, p. 1111), less convincingly takes the verb pra $\sqrt{dhṛṣ}$ in its sense of "to press close upon, to attack," rendering, "serrés contre lui."

6. "who took pleasure in battling the rākṣasas" rakṣoraṇapriyān: D7,10,11,T1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead -vadha-, "slaying," for -raṇa-, "battle," giving the compound the sense "fond of killing rākṣasas." VSP (6.90.7) inserts a space between rakṣo and raṇapriyān. Given this, the passage would mean "The rākṣasa, foremost of rākṣasas, urging on the tawny monkeys, who took pleasure in battle." Among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 259) appears to render this reading.

7. "Indrajit alone" eko 'yam: Literally, "this one."

"is, as it were, the last hope" parāyaṇam iva sthitaḥ: Literally, "stands like the last resort." Ñ,V,B,D1–4,7,9–11,13,G1,2, the printed edition of Gorresio, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead avasthitaḥ, "taking his stand," for iva sthitaḥ.

8. "the enemy forces" balam: Literally, "the army or forces."

9–11. "the loyal hero Prahasta" prahasto nihato vīraḥ: We take the adjective nihata here in its sense of "devoted, loyal," as against Cg, who understands the adjective in its more common participial sense of "slain." The meaning then becomes "Prahasta has been slain, as has . . ." This interpretation has been followed by all translators consulted. The syntax of this reading, however, strikes us as unusual and awkward.

"Cakramālin" cakramālī: This rākṣasa is not mentioned elsewhere in the critical edition or the vulgate.

"and other mighty foes" sattvavantaś ca: Literally, "and those possessed of strength or might." Since the term in the critical edition is in the nominative plural, we have taken it as a generic term to include other, unnamed rākṣasas. M3, the text of Gorresio (6.69.14), the texts and printed editions of Cg (VSP, KK 6.90.14), and Gita Press (6.89.14) read instead the dual sattvavantau tau, in which case the adjective applies only to Devāntaka and Narāntaka. Dutt (1893, p. 1413) renders the epithet as if it were a proper noun, "Satwavanta [sic]."

"you have crossed the ocean with your bare hands. You need now only hop across a small puddle." bāhubhyāṃ sāgaraṃ tīrtvā laṅghyatāṃ goṣpadaṃ laghu: Literally, "having crossed the ocean with two arms, you must leap an insignificant cow's footprint." The expression, as several commentators suggest, is entirely metaphorical and has nothing to do with the actual crossing of the ocean accomplished by the monkey army. The idea is that, having accomplished a monumental feat in killing the main rākṣasa champions, the monkeys have only a relatively small task before them, that of killing Indrajit and mopping up his forces. (etān rākṣasasattamān nihatya sthitānāṃ bhavatām indrajito hananaṃ bāhubhyāṃ sāgaraṃ tīrtvā sthitasya puṃso goṣpadataraṇam iva sukaram iti nidarśanā. bāhubhyāṃ sāgaraṃ tīrtvevaitān atibalān bahūn rākṣasasattamān nihatya sthitair bhavadbhir goṣpadam iva laghv indrajiddhananarūpaṃ svalpaṃ kāryaṃ laṅghyatām ity anvayaḥ—so Cg.)

Following verse 9, Ñ,V1,3 (after 9ab),B1 (line 1 only),B2–4,D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of six lines [1686*] in which the list of slain rākṣasas is extended: "Jambumālin, Mahāmālin, Tīkṣṇavega, Aśaniprabha,[1] Suptaghna, Yajñakopa, the rākṣasa Vajradaṃṣṭra, Saṃhrādin, Vikaṭa, Nighna,[2] the one called Tapana,[3] Praghāsa, Praghasa, Prajaṅga, Jaṅga, the unassailable Agniketu, mighty Raśmiketu, Vidyujjihva, Dvijihva, and the rākṣasa Sūryaśatru."

[1]"Aśaniprabha" aśaniprabhaḥ: Dutt (1893, p. 1413) renders, "Hemaprabha," although this variant appears in no printed edition consulted or the critical apparatus.

[2]"Nighna" nighnaḥ: D6,7,10,11,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead arighnaḥ, which may be taken either as a proper noun, "Arighna," or as an epithet, "foe-slaying." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 259), whose text reads with the critical edition, drops the name entirely.

[3]"the one called Tapana" tapano nāma: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the proper name, mandaḥ, "Manda." Translations that follow the text of Ct render this variant. D5,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead the proper noun damaḥ, "Dama."

12. He is the only one left . . . for you to conquer" etāvat . . . śeṣaṃ vo jetavyam: Literally, "there is only so much of a remainder to be defeated by you." The context, especially verses 13 and 14 below, supports Cg's and Cm's claim that the reference is to Indrajit alone (indrajinmātram eva śeṣam—so Cm).

"here . . . here" iha . . . iha: The particle occurs twice in the first half of the critical edition's verse. This awkward repetition apparently occurs in only a few manuscripts (D7,M1,2,5) collated for the critical edition, and in none of the printed editions consulted, which generally read the syntactically preferable eva . . . iha or eva . . . iti. We read the second iha of the critical reading as if it were in pādas cd.

"All the other rākṣasas" sarve . . . rākṣasāḥ Literally, "all the rākṣasas."

"joined battle" samāgamya: Literally, "having assembled or encountered." We follow the interpretation of Ct, who glosses, "having come to war (yuddhaṃ prāpya)."

13. "True, it is not right for someone like me, who is like a father to him, to kill one who is like my own son." ayuktaṃ nidhanaṃ kartuṃ putrasya janitur mama: Literally, "To encompass the destruction of a son on the part of me, a father, is improper." The phrase can be read in two ways. Taking the term janitṛ in its strict lexical meaning, "father," it would mean "the son of my [i.e., Vibhīṣaṇa's] father [i.e., Viśravas]," and this would then refer to Rāvaṇa. This is the interpretation adopted by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 294), who translates, "le fils de mon père." In this he has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 259) and Pagani (1999, p. 1111). These translators evidently understand that Vibhīṣaṇa is saying that, although he could under no circumstances participate in the killing of his brother, he is reluctantly willing to do so in the case of his nephew Indrajit. However, we believe this interpretation is incorrect. As noted above (6.74.11 and note), kinship terms in traditional India are often generational rather than simply lineal, and so Vibhīṣaṇa himself stands in the relationship of a father to his nephew Indrajit, who is thus metaphorically, at least, his "son." The southern commentators reach the same conclusion, although in slightly different ways. Ct and Ck gloss janituḥ as "of the brother of one's father (janayitur bhrātuḥ), i.e., uncle," which then must be read in apposition with the genitive pronoun mama, that is, "of the son of me, his uncle." Cr understands janituḥ as "of someone who is born from the same womb, i.e., brother (samānagarbhe jātasya bhrātur ity arthaḥ)." Thus, for him, Vibhīṣaṇa is referring to "the son of my brother." Cg and Cm, whom we follow, take the word janituḥ metaphorically to refer to someone who stands in the role of a progenitor, in this case, a paternal uncle (janitur janayituḥ pitṛvyasyety arthaḥ), again taking the term in apposition to the possessive pronoun. This interpretation is perhaps further supported by the northern variants, which avoid the term janituḥ entirely. Thus, the text of Gorresio (6.69.17) substitutes [nidhane] putrasya yatituṃ mayā, "for me to try [to kill my] son." See 6.74.11 and note.

"I must . . . compass the death" nihanyām: Literally, "I would kill." Since Vibhīṣaṇa will not actually kill Indrajit, we agree with Ct, Ck, and Cr, who, in different ways, make him step back one degree from the act of killing. Ct and Ck add the phrase "through setting up the means of killing (hananopāyapravartaneneti bhāvaḥ)." Cr glosses the causative ghātayeyam, "I would cause him to be killed." However, as we see in the next verse, Vibhīṣaṇa suggests that he does not kill Indrajit himself only because tears of sorrow cloud his vision.

14. "who will have to finish him off" śamayiṣyati: Literally, "he will pacify or destroy."

"form up their ranks" saṃbhūya: Literally, "having become joined or united."

"who have clustered around him" samīpagān: Literally, "gone into [his] presence."

15. "beat their tails against the ground" vivyadhuḥ: See note to 5.55.30 (=GPP 5.57.43) and 5.40.28 and note, where the term pravivyadhuḥ is discussed in a similar context. As in that passage, we understand that this is an aggressive simian gesture of challenge. Cg is silent on the subject here but comments on the Sundarakāṇḍa passages. He understands there that the monkeys raise their tails to bring them down forcibly on the ground (pravivyadhur lāṅgūlān uddhṛtya bhūmāv atāḍayann ity arthaḥ). This interpretation is also accepted by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 260). See 6.78.52 and note.

16. "roaring" kṣveḍantaḥ: According to Cg, who comments on the verbal root √kṣveḍ at 5.59.29, it refers to lionlike roars. See 5.55.29 and note. See note to 6.4.23–24. See, too, 6.47.8; 6.65.16; 6.78.51; and notes.

"unleashed various screeches, as peacocks do when they see storm clouds" mumucur vividhān nādān meghān dṛṣṭveva barhiṇaḥ: The crying of peacocks at the advent of the rainy season is a commonplace in Sanskrit poetry. See, for example, 4.27.18 and Meghdū 22.

18. "surrounded" parivavruḥ: B4,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the gerund paribhartsya, "having reviled, abused."

20. "as . . . deafening as the clash" yathā . . . mahāsvanaḥ: Literally, "as that great noise or as that one that made a great noise." As Cr and Cg remind us, we must supply the term saṃprahāraḥ, "clash, conflict, battle," here once more to render the simile intelligible.

21. "ripped up a sāla tree from the mountain" sālam utpāṭya parvatāt: The mountain in question must be Mount Trikūṭa. V2,3,D5–7,9–11,T1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read sānum, "peak, summit," for sālam, "sāla tree," yielding the sense "he tore a peak from the mountain." B4,D4,7,13,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read vīryavān, "powerful, heroic [Hanumān]," for parvatāt, "from the mountain."

"advancing to the attack" samāsādya: D10 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the adjective durāsādaḥ, "unassailable," which would then modify Hanumān.

Following 21ab, D7,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr insert a passage of one line [1692*]. KK and VSP, both in brackets, insert the line after their 6.90.25ab: "That wise one [Hanumān], after first taking Lakṣmaṇa down from his back . . ."

Ct suggests that, to gain some relief, Hanumān places Lakṣmaṇa, who had been mounted on his shoulders, on the ground (lakṣmaṇaṃ pṛṣṭhād avaropya viśrāmārthaṃ svārūḍhaṃ lakṣmaṇaṃ bhūmāv avasthāpya). Cg and Cm, whose texts do not include this line, echo this idea and indicate that we are to understand that the logic of the narrative of Hanumān's impending battle involves this step (atra hanumato yuddhakathanāt kiṃcid viśramārthaṃ tasya pṛṣṭhād avarūḍho lakṣmaṇa ity avagamyate—so Cg). The commentarial discussion is striking in that nowhere else in the epic or commentaries have we found a suggestion that Hanumān's endurance has any limit.

22. "having engaged in a . . . struggle with his paternal uncle Vibhīṣaṇa" sa dattvā . . . yuddhaṃ pitṛvyasya: Literally, "he, having given battle to his paternal uncle." Cr, alone among the commentators, believes that Indrajit is described here as fighting solely with Lakṣmaṇa but doing so in the presence of Vibhīṣaṇa (sa indrajit pitṛvyasya samīpe lakṣmaṇaṃ tumulaṃ yuddhaṃ dattvā punar abhyadhāvata).

"slayer of enemy heroes" paravīraghnam: V3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the nominative paravīraghnaḥ, thus making the epithet apply not to Lakṣmaṇa but to Indrajit.

23. "those two" tau: Cr wants to take the pronoun here in the sense of "well known, celebrated," remarking that it means they were like "the thieves of the elixir of immortality," a reference, no doubt, to the well-known mythological battle between the gods and the demons over this precious substance (tau prasiddhau tāv amṛtacorarūpau). See 1.44.14–17 and notes. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1740), alone among the translations consulted, appears to follow this interpretation, rendering, "the two celebrated heroes."

24. "The two swift and immensely powerful archers" mahābalau . . . tarasvinau: Literally, "the two immensely powerful and swift ones."

"were concealed" antardadhatuḥ: Literally, "those two concealed." The verb antar √dhā, when conjugated in the parasmaipada, as in this verse, normally is read transitively, in the sense of "to conceal or hide someone or something." Indeed, many of the translators consulted have rendered it in this way. To do so, however, breaks the parallelism implicit in the simile, where we are certainly not to understand that the sun and the moon are the ones who conceal each other. We therefore concur with Cv, Ck, and Cm, who read the verb intransitively. Cm, for example, glosses, "they became invisible (adṛśyau babhūvatuḥ)."

"summer's end" uṣṇānte: The reference is to the onset of the monsoon, or rainy season.

25–26. "one could not perceive" na . . . na . . . na . . . na . . . na . . . na . . . na . . . adṛśyata: Literally, "was not visible." The verse individually negates virtually every one of the archery techniques that are listed.

"taking up their arrows" ādānam: Literally, "taking." We agree with Cr and Cg in understanding the term to refer to the drawing of an arrow from its quiver (tūṇīrāc charagrahaṇam—so Cr).

"nocking them" saṃdhānam: Literally, "joining." This is the common term for fitting an arrow to the bowstring. Ck and Ct give this explanation, but Ct offers an alternative: "gripping the bow, that is, seizing it in the left and right hands (dhanuṣo vā parigrahaḥ savyāpasvayena kārmukagrahaṇam)."

"drawing back the bowstrings" vikarṣaḥ: Literally, "drawing, pulling, bending (as a bow)." Cg, whom we follow, explains, "drawing back to the ear (ākarṇagrahaṇam)."

"taking up their stances" vigrahaḥ: It is difficult to be certain as to what this polysemic term means in this context. It has no technical meaning specific to archery that we can discover. Most likely, the sense is connected with the term's meanings of "stretching, extension, or body." Commentators are both divided and uncertain as to the meaning. We follow the meaning offered by Cm (also the first meaning given by Cg) in which the word is a technical term for one of the various formal positions taken up by archers for shooting. These commentators gloss, "a type of posture, such as the ālīḍha [the position wherein the right knee is advanced and the left leg retracted], etc. (ālīḍhādyavasthānaviśeṣaḥ)." Several of the commentators quote the Viśvakośa, according to which one of the meanings of the term vigraha is "separation (vibhāgaḥ)." Ct, Cr, and Ck then understand the term to refer to the separation of the arrows (bāṇānāṃ vibhāgaḥ), presumably from the bunches in which they are kept in the quivers. Cg, however, offers, as his third alternative, the separation of the bow, the bowstring, etc.

(dhanurjyādīnāṃ pravibhāgo vā). Cv's explanation and Cg's second alternative is "a position or a stance [for shooting] involving some [external or physical?] support (sāvaṣṭambhāvasthānam)."

"tightly gripping their weapons" muṣṭipratisaṃdhānam: Our translation follows the interpretation of Cv, Ck, Cm, Cr, and Cg, who explain, "clenching the fists around the bow and bowstring (jyākārmukayor muṣṭibandhanam—so Cg, Cm, Cv). Ct glosses, merely, "tightly clenching with the fist (dṛḍhatayā muṣṭisaṃyojanam)."

27. "nothing could be seen" na rūpāṇi cakāśire: Literally, "forms did not shine forth." We agree with Cg and Ct, who take "forms (rūpāṇi)" here to refer to visible things (rūpyanta iti rūpāṇi vastūni).

"darkness engulfed everything" tamasā pihitaṃ sarvam āsīt: Literally, "everything was blocked off by darkness."

Following 27cd, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of six lines [1696*]: "Lakṣmaṇa having encountered Rāvaṇi, and Rāvaṇi, Lakṣmaṇa, a terrifying chaos arose[1] from their mutual clash.[1–2] The sky was completely filled with the sharp arrows the two of them swiftly released, so that it became obscured by darkness.[3–4] The cardinal and intermediate directions, too, became crowded with many hundreds of their sharp, flying arrows.[5–6]"

[1]"having encountered . . . a terrifying chaos arose" prāpya . . . avyavasthā bhavaty ugrā: Several of the commentators are concerned by the awkward and apparently defective syntax in which the subject[s] of the gerund is [are] not the same as that of the finite verb. Ct, Cr, Cm, and Cg (as a second alternative) propose that we remedy the problem by supplying a finite verb in the dual, meaning "the two fought (ayudhyatām—so Ct)." Cv, Cs, and Cg (as a first alternative) supply a phrase to the effect that a mutual conflict arose between the two heroes as they strove to defeat each other. In the course of that conflict, chaos arises (lakṣmaṇo rāvaṇiṃ rāvaṇiś cāpi lakṣmaṇaṃ prāpya tābhyām anyonyavigrahe 'nyonyābhibhava ugrāvyavasthā bhavati—so Cg). Commentators are also divided as to the precise meaning of the term avyavasthā. Ct understands the term to refer to the slaughter of the noncombatant vānaras and rākṣasas caused by the [stray] arrows of Lakṣmaṇa and Indrajit (avyavasthā tattadbāṇair ayudhyadvānararākṣasavadharūpā bhavati). This may be the first literary reference to what is known in modern military parlance as "collateral damage." This interpretation is interpolated into the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1741). Dutt (1893, p. 1414) renders, "critical was the hugger mugger that ensued." Dutt adds a footnote that expresses the interpretation of Ct. Ct goes on to state that we are to understand that the fight is so furious that it is impossible to decide which of the combatants is defeating which. He then adds that the adjective ugra, "terrifying, fierce," is meaningless in this context, since it is actually impossible to describe the fearsomeness of the situation. (yat tv ayam enaṃ nigṛhṇāti sa enaṃ vety aniścayarūpā vyavastheti vyākhyānam. tac cintyam. tasyā avyavasthāyā ugratvasya nirūpayitum aśakyatvāt. ugreti viśeṣaṇavaiyarthyāc ca.) Cs quotes Ct's interpretation only to refute it as utterly inappropriate (yan nāgojibhaṭṭenoktaṃ tad asaṅgatam . . . kathanaṃ tv asaṅgatataram iti jñeyam). Cr glosses the phrase as "the quailing of all hearts (sarvamanasām asvāsthyaṃ bhavati)." Cv, Cg, and Cm understand the reference to be to the confusion engendered by the constantly changing fortunes of battle, so that, from moment to moment, it is impossible to determine who is winning and who is losing (kṣaṇe kṣaṇe jayaparājayaniyamo nābhūd ity arthaḥ—so Cg). This interpretation appears to be reflected in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 261).

Following verse 27, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of three lines [1697*]: "Everything was shrouded in darkness as when[1] the thousand-rayed sun sets. Thousands of mighty rivers brimming with blood[2] gushed forth. Horrible flesh-eating creatures screeched with terrifying cries.[3]"

[1]"Everything was shrouded in darkness as when" saṃvṛtaṃ tamaseva: Literally, "was as if covered with darkness." D10,11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead saṃvṛte tamasā ca, in which case there is no simile and the reference is to when the sun, shrouded in darkness, actually set.

[2]"brimming with blood" rudhiraughā: Literally, "having blood for its floods."

[3]"screeched with terrifying cries" vāgbhiś cikṣipur bhīmanisvanam: Literally, "they threw or released a terrifying sound with speech or voices."

28. "Heaven help us!" svasty astu lokebhya iti: Literally, "May there be well-being for the worlds." We feel that the more idiomatic translation better expresses in English the anxiety that underlies the seers' words. Clearly the ominous signs surrounding the battle are suggestive of the end of the world, and therefore the seers speak as they do.

"came and gathered at that place" saṃpetuś cātra saṃprāptāḥ: Our understanding is that, as at many great duels in the epic, celestial beings gather to watch and later cheer the victor. This interpretation appears to be confirmed at 6.78.48, where the gods, gandharvas, and dānavas gather to celebrate Lakṣmaṇa's triumph over Indrajit. Cg, however, somewhat idiosyncratically, takes the verb sam √pat, "to assemble, to gather," to mean "to go away." His idea is that the celestial beings are terrified of witnessing this extremely frightening battle and flee. (saṃpetuḥ. anyatra gatā ity arthaḥ. atighorayuddhadarśanabhayād iti bhāvaḥ.) This interpretation is explicitly followed in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 261), who renders, "withdrew." Ñ2,V1,B2–4,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead saṃtaptāḥ, "distressed, pained," for the critical edition's saṃprāptāḥ, "came, arrived." Although no commentator remarks on this reading, the translations that follow the text of Ct render it and infer from it that the celestial beings actually flee the scene of the battle. For example, Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1741) renders, "feeling distressed . . . fled away."

30. "as he drove back and forth" vicariṣyataḥ: Literally, "who was about to move about." The correct idea is suggested by Ct, who glosses, "as he was about to drive the chariot (rathasaṃcāraṃ kariṣyataḥ)."

Note that a previous charioteer of Indrajit was slain at 6.34.27.

Following 30a, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1700*] (= GPP, NSP, Gita Press 6.89.40b–41a; KK 6.90.39b–40a; VSP 6.90.40b–41a): "[a crescent-headed arrow]. It was yellow[1] and sharp. Radiant and beautifully fletched, when released from the fully stretched bow, it resembled the thunderbolt of great Indra."

[1]"yellow" pītena: As Ck, Ct, and Cr note, the color derives from the arrow's gold ornamentation. M1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead the redundant śitena, "sharp."

Following 30b, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1701*, line 1]: "with that thunderbolt of an arrow that echoed with the sound of the bowstring striking his armguard.[1]"

[1]"that echoed with the sound of the bowstring striking his armguard" tala-śabdānunādinā: Literally, "echoing the sound of the armguard." Curiously enough, the term tala, which we have consistently translated in the context of archery as "armguard," has been ignored by the commentators up until this point. Here, however, Ck, Cm, Ct, and Cr all gloss jyāghātavāraṇam, "bowstring-blow-guard," and explain the sound as that produced by the friction or striking of the bow against the guard (tasya [talasya] jyāghaṭṭanajo yaḥ śabdas tasyānunādo yasyāsti tena). See notes to 1.21.8; 6.66.23; 6.67.25; and 6.76.2,24.

Following verse 30, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of seven lines [1702*]:

"Now that his charioteer had been slain, the immensely powerful Indrajit, son of Mandodarī,[1] took up the reins himself[2] while still wielding his bow so that those who witnessed this ability[3] in battle thought it a wonder.[4][1–3] But while his hands were busy with the horses, Lakṣmaṇa pierced him with sharp arrows, and while, on the other hand, he was busy with his bow, Lakṣmaṇa loosed[5] his shafts at his horses.[4–5] Thus, during those moments of vulnerability,[6] did the extraordinarily quick[7] Saumitri harry him with torrents of arrows[8] as he drove back and forth fearlessly. [6–7]"

[1]"Indrajit, son of Mandodarī" mandodarīsutaḥ: Literally, "the son of Mandodarī."

[2]"took up the reins himself" svayaṃ sārathyam akarot: Literally, "he acted the part of the charioteer himself."

[3]"this ability" sāmarthyam: D6,7,9–11,T2,3,G1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead sārathyam, "his performance as a charioteer."

[4]"thought it a wonder" tad adbhutam abhūt: Literally, "that was a wonder [to those who saw it]."

[5]"Lakṣmaṇa loosed" mumuce: Literally, "he loosed or released."

[6]"during those moments of vulnerability" chidreṣu teṣu: Literally, "in those weak points." D7,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead chinneṣu, "cut down," which must then refer to the horses (hayeṣu) in line 5.

[7]"extraordinarily quick" śīghrakṛttamaḥ: Literally, "acting most quickly." D6,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead śīghravikramaḥ, "swift in valor or swiftly stepping."

[8]"with torrents of arrows" bāṇaughaiḥ . . . bāṇaughaiḥ: The compound occurs twice in the critical edition. We have omitted the second occurrence of the compound. D9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read samare, "in battle," for bāṇaughaiḥ in line 7. M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead bāṇeṣu, which Cg explains as follows: "he [Saumitri], quick in valor in the use of arrows against weak spots (chidreṣu randhreṣu bāṇeṣu bāṇaprayogeṣu śīghravikrama ity anvayaḥ)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 261) is the only translator to follow this reading and this interpretation. He renders, "Quick in taking advantage of such opportunities to shoot."

33. "unable to hold themselves back, launched a violent assault" amṛṣyamāṇāḥ . . . cakrur vegam: Literally, "not enduring, they made a violent impulse."

34. "Indrajit's" asya: Literally, "his."

35. "Blood gushed visibly" rudhiraṃ vyaktam . . . samavartata: Literally, "blood clearly flowed." D9,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead raktam, "blood or red," in place of vyaktam, "clearly." Cg glosses raktam as śoṇitam, "blood," in which case the word rudhiram must be taken in its adjectival sense of "red."

"of the horses as those monkeys . . . came crashing down upon them" teṣām adhiṣṭhitānāṃ tair vānaraiḥ . . . hayānām: Literally, "of those horses who were sat upon by those monkeys."

Following verse 35, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1705*]: "Crushed, their bodies broken,[1] the horses fell to the ground, their life breaths gone."

[1]"their bodies broken" bhagnāḥ: Literally, "broken." We follow Cr, who glosses, "caused to attain the breaking of limbs (aṅgabhaṅgaṃ prāpitāḥ)."

36. "great chariot" mahāratham: Only Dutt (1893, p. 1416), among the translators consulted, takes the term as a bahuvrīhi in its common sense of "great chariot warrior," although he does note the ambiguity of the compound. Still, nothing in the context indicates that the monkeys have the temerity to directly attack Indrajit. Cf. 6.60.3; 6.72.33; 6.80.6; 6.81.18; 6.83.8; 6.84.15; and notes. Cf. 6.72.33.

37. "its charioteer slaughtered" mathitasāratheḥ: Literally, "having a crushed charioteer." Ñ2,V1,2,B3,4,D5,9–11,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the nominative mathitasārathiḥ in place of the ablative. In this reading, the compound describes Indrajit, "his charioteer slaughtered," rather than the chariot.

38. "with masses of arrows—and sharp and splendid arrows they were" niśitaiḥ śarottamaiḥ . . . bāṇagaṇaiḥ: The critical reading here is awkward, somewhat redundant, and not particularly strong. A number of northern and southern manuscripts offer variant readings for niśitaiḥ śarottamaiḥ, "with sharp and splendid arrows," that refer instead to the death of Indrajit's horses and thus explain why he must now fight on foot. Thus, D7,9–11,G1,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead nihatair hayottamaiḥ, "with [his] excellent horses slain." Ñ,V1,3,B2–4, and the printed edition of Gorresio (6.69.48) read instead yudhi sūditāśvam, "his horses slain in battle." Lahore (unnoted by the critical edition) reads instead nihataiḥ turaṅgaiḥ, "with horses slain." D6,T2,3 read nihatāśvasārathim, "his horses and charioteer slain." Given the distribution and number of the readings, we believe that the idea of Indrajit's horses having been slain is probably original here, although the southern reading may not be.

"was releasing" sṛjantam: Ñ2,V1,3,B2,4,D5,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mṛjantam, literally, "stroking, wiping." The sense of the verbal root √mṛj here is not entirely clear. Ct himself is silent, and the translators who follow his text all render some variation on the sense of "loosing, releasing," as in the critical text. Perhaps the idea is similar to the one expressed at 6.75.3 by the gerund parāmṛśya, "having stroked or having fingered." See notes to 6.75.3 and 14.

"forcefully warded him off" bhṛśam . . . nyavārayat: Ñ2,B2,D7,9–11,G2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read vyadārayat, "he cut up or lacerated," for nyavārayat, "he warded off."

*"in battle" ājau: The critical edition reads the contextually awkward ādau, "at the onset or at the beginning." Since all printed editions consulted read the contextually appropriate and common ājau, "in battle," and no mention of this as a variant is made in the critical apparatus, we can only assume that the critical reading is the result of a typographical error not noted by the compilers of the errata list. We have therefore emended accordingly.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Sarga 78

2. "for the sake of victory" vijayena: Literally, "by victory." The commentators note the unusual use of the instrumental case, generally indicating that we are to take it in the sense of cause. Cg succinctly remarks that this is an instrumental of purpose, which should be read as a dative. (vijayeneti prayojane tṛtīyā. vijayāyety arthaḥ.)

"the two . . . charged at each other" abhiniṣkrāntau: Literally, "the two set out toward." We follow Cm, who glosses, "they ran toward [each other] (abhimukham adhāvatām)." Other commentators interpret similarly.

"like two bull elephants" gajavṛṣāv iva: Literally, "like two elephant bulls." Cg, alone among the commentators, offers, as a second alternative, that we read the compound as a dvandva in the sense of "like a bull and an elephant." Indrajit, as we learned earlier, had been somewhat weakened in the course of battle so that he is compared to a bull, [wheras the stronger Lakṣmaṇa is likened to an elephant] (yadvā kiṃcid dhīnabalatvād indrajito vṛṣabhatulyatvam). This reading of the compound is represented only in the translation of Dutt (1893, p. 1416).

3. "their respective masters" bhartāram: Literally, "the master."

Following verse 3, Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D4 (after line 1 of 1710*),5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of thirty-seven lines [App. I, No. 46]: "Then, in great excitement, Rāvaṇa's son urged on all the rākṣasas. Praising them, he said these words:[1–2] 'Foremost of the rākṣasas! All directions are shrouded in dense darkness[1] so that one cannot distinguish friend from foe.[2] [3–4] Therefore, you gentlemen must continue to fight bravely so as to delude[3] the tawny monkeys. Meanwhile, I shall return to the battle, mounted in another chariot.[4][5–6] So you, gentlemen, must see to it[5] that those evil-minded[6] forest-dwelling monkeys do not attack while I am in the city.'[7–8] When he had spoken in this fashion, that slayer of his foes, Rāvaṇa's son, entered the city of Laṅkā to get another chariot, eluding the notice of[7] the forest-dwelling monkeys.[9–10] He had a splendid chariot, already adorned with gold, fully decked out.[8] It was fully equipped with darts, swords, and arrows, harnessed to magnificent steeds, and driven[9] by a charioteer who was expert with horses and was a trusted adviser.[10] Immensely powerful Rāvaṇi, conqueror in battle, mounted it.[11–14] Then, driven onward by the force of doom, the son of Mandodarī, surrounded by the foremost rākṣasa troops, sallied forth swiftly[11] from the city.[15–16] Leaving the city behind, Indrajit, slayer of enemy heroes,[12] charged with his swift steeds toward Lakṣmaṇa and Vibhīṣaṇa.[17–18] Then, seeing the son of Rāvaṇa mounted once more in a chariot, Saumitri, the immensely powerful monkeys, and the rākṣasa Vibhīṣaṇa were amazed at that wise hero's[13] speed.[19–21] But, with torrents of arrows, Rāvaṇi, in a rage, cut down the monkey troop leaders in their hundreds and thousands. Bending his bow into a circle, Rāvaṇi, victorious in battle, relied on his extraordinary quickness to slaughter the tawny monkeys in his rage.[22–25] As they were being massacred by his iron arrows, the tawny monkeys, fearsome in their valor,[14] took refuge with Saumitri, as do all creatures with Brahmā, lord of creatures.[15][26–27] Then the delight of the Raghus, inflamed with the fury of battle, demonstrated his own deftness of hand and split Indrajit's[16] bow.[28–29] But Indrajit[17] took up another bow and swiftly strung it. Yet again Lakṣmaṇa cut it to pieces with three arrows.[30–31] Then, once Rāvaṇi's bow had been cut to pieces, Saumitri pierced him[18] through the chest with five arrows that were like the venom of venomous serpents.[32–33] Loosed from Lakṣmaṇa's mighty bow,[19] those arrows pierced Indrajit's[20] body and then plunged into the earth like huge red serpents.[21] [34–35] His armor pierced,[22] Rāvaṇi spewed blood from his mouth. Nonetheless, he took up a splendid and exceedingly powerful bow with a taut bowstring.[36–37]"

[1]"in dense darkness" tamasā bahulena: Ck, Ct, and Cm understand Indrajit to be encouraging the rākṣasas by reminding them that night is approaching, the time when the rākṣasas' strength is supposed to increase (evaṃ cāsmākaṃ balakarī rātrir āgatā—so Ct). See note to 1.25.13. Cf. note to 6.34.1.

[2]"so that one cannot distinguish friend from foe" neha vijñāyate svo vā paro vā: Cr wants to add "by the monkeys (vānarair iti śeṣaḥ)" to suggest that only the monkeys and not the rākṣasas will be blinded in this fashion.

[3]"so as to delude" mohanāya: The idea here, according to the commentators, is that by giving battle the rākṣasas can conceal from the monkeys the fact that Indrajit has left the field [to secure a new chariot] (madgamanāparijñānāya—so Ct).

[4]"another chariot" ratham: Literally, "a chariot."

[5]"see to it" tathā . . . kurvantu yathā: Literally, "[you] must act in such a way that."

[6]"evil-minded" durātmānaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahātmānaḥ, "great ones." Translations that follow the text of Ct treat the epithet in one of two ways. Dutt (1893, p. 1417) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1743) bite the bullet, as it were, and assign the complimentary epithet to the monkeys, as the syntax suggests. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 297), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 261) and Pagani (1999, p. 1114), takes the term in the sense of "courageous" and reads it as a vocative applied by Indrajit to his own rākṣasa troops.

[7]"eluding the notice of" vañcayitvā: Literally, "having deceived."

[8]"fully decked out" bhūṣayitvā: Literally, "having adorned." Cg believes that Indrajit adorns the chariot with his own radiant energy (svatejasā).

[9]"driven" adhiṣṭhitam: Literally, "mounted, sat in."

[10]"a trusted adviser" āptopadeśinā: The commentators understand, "one whose character is to offer beneficial advice (āptaṃ hitam upadeṣṭuṃ śīlam asty asya—so Ct, Ck, and Cm)."

[11]"swiftly" tūrṇam: Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D4,9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vīraḥ, "that hero."

[12]"slayer of enemy heroes" paravīrahā: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead paramaujasā, "with great force or energy."

[13]"that wise hero's" dhīmataḥ: Literally, "the wise one's."

[14]"fearsome in their valor" bhīmavikramāḥ: D6,10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the instrumental plural bhīmavikramaiḥ for the nominative, thus making the epithet apply not to the monkeys but to the iron arrows. Translations that follow the text of Ct generally render this in the sense of "having terrific impetus or violence."

[15]"Brahmā, lord of creatures" prajāpatim: Literally, "the lord of creatures." This is a common epithet of Brahmā.

[16]"Indrajit's" tasya: Literally, "his."

[17]"Indrajit" saḥ: Literally, "he."

[18]"once Rāvaṇi's bow had been cut to pieces . . . him" chinnadhanvānam . . . rāvaṇim: Literally, "Rāvaṇi, whose bow had been cut."

[19]"Lakṣmaṇa's mighty bow" mahākārmuka-: Literally, "the great bow."

[20]"Indrajit's" tasya: Literally, "his."

[21]"like huge red serpents" raktā iva mahoragāḥ: Ct notes that the arrows, too, are red because they are smeared with blood, implying, it seems, that he understands that the upamāna is actually red snakes (bāṇānām api rudhirasaṃbandhād raktatvam). We think it more likely, however, that the poet intends an abhūtopamā, in which the object of comparison is imaginary. See notes to verse 12 below.

[22]"His armor pierced" bhinnavarmā: D9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead chinnadhanvā, "his bow cut to pieces."

4. "Indrajit" saḥ: Literally, "he."

5. "all-but-unstoppable" sudurāsadam: Literally, "extremely irresistible." The idea here is conveyed by Cr, who glosses, "impossible for others to ward off (anyair nivārayitum aśakyam)."

Following verse 5, Ñ,V1–3,B2–4,D4–7,9–11,S insert a passage of eighteen lines [App. I, No. 47]: "Then the immensely powerful delight of the Raghus calmly showed Rāvaṇi his skill;[1] and a wonderful thing it was.[2][1–2] In a towering rage, he demonstrated his extraordinary swiftness in releasing divinely charged weapons[3] in battle by piercing each of the rākṣasas with three arrows.[3–4] Next he struck the son of the rākṣasa lord[4] with torrents of arrows.[5] Pierced by his powerful foe-slaying foe, Indrajit[5] nonetheless unceasingly shot many arrows at Lakṣmaṇa.[6–7] But the delight of the Raghus[6] cut them to pieces with his own sharp arrows before they reached him. And then, with a straight[7] crescent-headed arrow, that righteous hero, foremost of chariot-warriors, struck off the head of the chariot-warrior Indrajit's charioteer in battle.[8][8–10] Although they were deprived of their driver, the horses continued to draw the chariot without confusion.[9] They ran in perfect circles;[10] and a wonderful thing it was.[11][11–12] Giving way to rage, Saumitri, firm in his valor, pierced Indrajit's[12] horses with arrows, sowing panic in the battle.[13–14] Unable to endure that act, the powerful[13] son of Rāvaṇa pierced the furious[14] Saumitri with ten arrows.[15–16] But although his arrows had the force of thunderbolts[15] and were as deadly as the venom of serpents,[16] they disintegrated as they struck Lakṣmaṇa's armor,[17] brilliant with gold.[17–18]"

[1]"showed . . . his skill" saṃdarśayāmāsa: Literally, "he showed or demonstrated." The commentators supply a variety of contextually apposite objects of the verb, such as "his own valor (svapauruṣam—so Ct, Cr)," "his prowess (parākramam—so Cg)," and "his deftness of hand (hastalāghavam—so Crā)."

[2]"and a wonderful thing it was" tad adbhutam ivābhavat: Literally, "that was as if a wonder."

[3]"his extraordinary swiftness in releasing divinely charged weapons" śīghrāstram: Literally, "swift astra." The compound is puzzling, and the commentators offer a variety of interpretations. Ck and Ct raise the question of how Lakṣmaṇa, while engaged in fighting Indrajit, can possibly manage to shoot all the other rākṣasas three times each. They offer two explanations of the term śīghrāstram. According to the first, the term refers to a specific type of weapon, which, upon being discharged, somehow pierces all [one's enemies] (prayogamātreṇa sarvabhedakam astram—so Ct). As an alternative, they take the term merely as an emotional one, that is, perhaps, hyperbolic (yadvā bhāvapradhāno nirdeśaḥ—so Ct). The idea then, in their view, is that Lakṣmaṇa is demonstrating his swiftness in the use of weapons, which takes the form of the capacity to discharge them rapidly (astraviṣayakaśīghraprayogasāmarthyarūpaṃ śīghrāstratvaṃ sampradarśayann ity arthaḥ). Most translators, ourselves included, follow this general interpretation. Cg glosses, "the mantra of swiftness (śīghramantram)," that is, the magical spell that controls and lends velocity to one's divinely charged weapons.

[4]"son of the rākṣasa lord" rākṣasendrasutam: D5,10,11,T1,G1,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead rākṣasendras tu tam, "but the rākṣasa lord [struck] him [Lakṣmaṇa]," thus reversing the sense of the critical reading.

[5]"Indrajit" saḥ: Literally, "he." Regardless of who is the subject of the preceding sentence, the pronoun here must refer to Indrajit.

[6]"But the delight of the Raghus" raghunandanaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead paravīrahā, "the slayer of enemy heroes."

[7]"straight" anataparvaṇā: See 6.59.71 and note.

[8]"And . . . in battle" ca raṇe: Cr, alone among the commentators consulted, suggests, as an alternative, that we read the sequence of words ca raṇe together as one word, the dual accusative caraṇe, "two feet," in which case Lakṣmaṇa cuts off both the head and the two feet of the charioteer.

[9]"without confusion" aviklavāḥ: Literally, "not confused or agitated." Cg explains that we are to understand that the composure of the horses is testimony to their extraordinary training (śikṣāpāṭavātiśayād iti mantavyam).

[10]"in perfect circles" maṇḍalāni: Literally, "circles."

[11]"and a wonderful thing it was" tad adbhutam ivābhavat: Literally, "that was as if a wonder."

[12]"Indrajit's" tasya: Literally, "his."

[13]"the powerful" balī: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead raṇe, "in battle."

[14]" the furious" tam amarṣaṇam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead romaharṣaṇam, "hair-raising, terrifying."

[15]"had the force of thunderbolts" vajrapratimāḥ: Literally, "similar to or resembling thunderbolts or vajras."

[16]"as deadly as the venom of serpents" sarpaviṣopamāḥ: Literally, "comparable to snake venom." Ñ2,V1,B2,D6,9, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sarva- "all," for sarpa-, "serpents," yielding the sense "like all venom."

[17]"Lakṣmaṇa's armor" kavacam: Literally, "armor."

6. "Realizing that Lakṣmaṇa's armor was impenetrable" abhedyakavacaṃ matvā lakṣmaṇam: Literally, "thinking that Lakṣmaṇa was one whose armor was not to be pierced." Cv, Cm, and Cg, recalling an earlier passage (known only to the southern recension) in which Indrajit is said to have destroyed Lakṣmaṇa's armor, note that we are to infer that in the interim Lakṣmaṇa has acquired new armor (abhedyakavacam ity anena pūrvakavacasya bhagnatvāt kavacāntaraṃ dhṛtam iti gamyate). See 1672*, lines 3–4, following verse 6.76.20 (=NSP and GPP 6.88.57; VSP 6.89.22; and KK 6.89.21).

"him" lakṣmaṇam: Literally, "Lakṣmaṇa." In order to avoid repetition the pronoun has been substituted for the proper noun, which also occurs in pāda b.

"his extraordinary swiftness in releasing divinely charged weapons" śīghram astram: Literally, "a swift astra." The similar compound term śīghrāstram is used above at App. I, No. 47, line 4. See notes to verse 5 above.

7. "who delighted in battle" samaraślāghī: Like most of the translators consulted, we read the compound as do Cg and Cm, who analyze it to mean "he praises battle (samaraṃ ślāghate)" and gloss, "fond of battle (samarapriyaḥ)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 299), however, interprets the compound in its other plausible sense of "celebrated in battle," rendering, l'illustre guerrier." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 263) and Pagani (1999, p. 1115).

8. Following verse 8, Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1715*]: "[Lakṣmaṇa] drawing back [his bowstring, pierced] in battle Indrajit's face with its splendid earrings."

9. "with sharp arrows" bāṇair viśikhaiḥ: The sequence is problematic, and several of the commentators attempt to rationalize it. One explanation is that viśikha has "arrow" as one of its more common meanings, but in this sense it would be redundant with bāṇaiḥ, "arrows." We follow the suggestion of Cm, who takes viśikhaiḥ adjectivally in the sense of "having special tips, that is, sharp (viśikhaiḥ viśiṣṭaśikhair niśitair iti yāvat)." Cg, however, takes the vi- of viśikhaiḥ in the sense of "various (vividha)," explaining that the arrowheads had different shapes, such as that of karavīra leaves, etc. (viśikhair vividhaśikhaiḥ. karavīrapatrādyākārāgrair ity arthaḥ). This interpretation is followed only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 264), who renders, "with darts having many different kinds of arrow-heads." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct avoid the problem of the redundancy of bāṇaiḥ and viśikhaiḥ by reading vīrau, "the two heroes," for bānaiḥ. This, however, merely creates another redundancy with the term vīrau in pāda a. Ct, although he reads this variant, interprets the term viśikhaiḥ in the same way as Cm does.

Following verse 9, D5–7,9–11,S (Ñ,V1,3,B2–4 following 1715*; and V2,B1,D1–4,13 following 1714*) insert a passage of two lines [1717*]: "Then, in that battle, both heroes, Lakṣmaṇa and Indrajit, their limbs drenched with blood, resembled a pair of kiṃśuka trees[1] in full bloom."

[1]"resembled a pair of kiṃśuka trees" iva kiṃśukau: See 6.35.9; 6.55.22; 6.60.34; 6.62.19; 6.76.28; and notes.

10. Following verse 10, D5–7,9–11,S (while Ñ,V,B,D1–4,13 insert lines 1–4) insert a passage of ten lines [1718*]: "Then Rāvaṇa's son, filled with the rage of battle, shot Vibhīṣaṇa in his handsome face with three arrows.[1–2] Once he had pierced the rākṣasa lord Vibhīṣaṇa with his three iron-tipped arrows,[1] he shot all the troop leaders of the tawny monkeys with one arrow each.[2][3–4] But the immensely powerful Vibhīṣaṇa, now still further enraged at him, slew with his mace the horses of that very evil-minded Rāvaṇi.[3][5–6] Then leaping down from his chariot, of which the horses and charioteer had been slain, immensely powerful Indrajit hurled a javelin[4] at his uncle.[7–8] But when Lakṣmaṇa, the increaser of Sumitrā's joy,[5] saw it hurtling toward him, he cut it down with sharp arrows, so that it fell to the ground in ten pieces.[6][9–10]"

[1]"three iron-tipped arrows" ayomukhais tribhiḥ: Literally, "with three iron-tipped ones."

[2]"with one arrow each" ekaikena: Literally, "one by one."

[3]"of that very evil-minded Rāvaṇi" rāvaṇeḥ sudurātmanaḥ: D5,10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sa durātmanaḥ, "he . . . of that evil-minded one," for sudurātmanaḥ, "of that very evil-minded one."

[4]"Then . . . a javelin" atha śaktim: D6,T1,G1,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead rathaśaktim, " a chariot-javelin," which Cg glosses as "a javelin mounted in or on a chariot (rathe 'vasthitāṃ śaktim)." See notes to 6.33.21; 6.59.13; and 6.95.9. This term is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 264), who renders, "the javelin that went with the chariot."

[5]"Lakṣmaṇa, the increaser of Sumitrā's joy" sumitrānandavardhanaḥ: Literally,"the increaser of Sumitrā's joy."

[6]"so that it fell to the ground in ten pieces" daśadhā sāpatad bhuvi: Literally, "it fell tenfold to the ground." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the causative [a]pātayat, "he knocked [it] down," for sāpatat, "it fell."

11. "still further enraged at Indrajit" tasmai dṛḍhataraṃ kruddhaḥ: Literally, "more firmly angered toward him." Ñ,V,B,D1–3,6,7,10,11,T3,M3,5, Gorresio's edition, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead dṛḍhadhanuḥ," of firm bow," for dṛḍhataram, "more firmly."

12. "those gold-fletched arrows" te . . . rukmapuṅkhāḥ: Literally, "those gold-fletched ones."

"resembled huge, red serpents" raktā iva mahoragāḥ: Compare the similar figure, following verse 3 above, App. I, No. 46, line 35 and n. 20.

13. "immensely powerful" mahābalaḥ: D7,9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the accusative mahābalam for the critical edition's nominative, thus making the adjective apply not to Indrajit but to his arrow.

14–15. "immeasurable" amitātmanā: A number of northern manuscripts as well as M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead mahātmanā, "by the great one." Cg glosses, "of immeasurable intellect (aprameyabuddhinā)."

Following verse 15, D5–7,9–12,S insert a passage of two lines [1721*]: "Drawn powerfully by their arms, which resembled iron beams, their two magnificent bows shrieked like a pair of krauñcas."

17. "They struck each other head on" mukhena mukham āhatya: Literally, "having struck the face with the face,"

Following verse 17, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1723*]: "There was a collision of those two fearsome-looking arrows and from it arose a terrifying conflagration emitting smoke and sparks."

18. "Colliding with each other . . . like two great planets" mahāgrahasaṃkāśāv anyonyaṃ saṃnipatya: The image appears to derive not from a literal collision of planets but rather from an astronomical observation of planets in apparent conflict when aligned. Cm notes that the planets intended are "like Mars and Saturn, etc. (aṅgārakaśanyādiḥ)." See 6.75.30 and note.

19. "both . . . were filled with shame and rage" vrīḍitau jātaroṣau ca . . . ubhau: Ck, closely paraphrased by both Cm and Ct, is disturbed at the thought that Lakṣmaṇa has anything to be ashamed of. His reasoning is that, although Indrajit has reason to be ashamed (in that he has failed in his purpose of killing Vibhīṣaṇa), Lakṣmaṇa has succeeded in his purpose, which was simply to destroy Indrajit's astras. Ck concludes by saying that Lakṣmaṇa is included in the adjective vrīḍitau, "ashamed," by the maxim of the men with umbrellas (chatrinyāya), according to which one might say that people are carrying umbrellas, when in, fact, only some of them are. (vrīḍitau svasvaprayuktaśarasya moghatvadarśanena saṃjātalajjau. yady api rāvaṇer eva vrīḍā yuktā lakṣmaṇasya tu tadbāṇanivāraṇāya prayoktuḥ sārthakyasattvena vrīḍābhāvas tathāpi tannirākaraṇapūrvakaṃ ripuvadhaparyantavyāpāreṇopādānāt tadabhāvena tasyāpi lajjeti bodhyam. chatrinyāyena dvivacanaprayoga iti kaṭakaḥ—so Ct and Cm.) Regarding the warriors' rage, Ck, Ct, and Cm understand that Lakṣmaṇa's anger derives from the fact that Indrajit had shot at Vibhīṣaṇa, whom Lakṣmaṇa regards as no different than Rāma himself, while Indrajit is angry merely because Lakṣmaṇa has destroyed his arrow. (rāmāviśeṣe vibhīṣaṇe bāṇaḥ pramukta iti lakṣmaṇasya roṣaḥ. lakṣmaṇas taṃ parihṛtavān iti rāvaṇe roṣaḥ—so Ct.) On Cm quoting Ck, see note to the opening of sarga 96 and Introduction, p. 105.

20. "the conqueror of great Indra" mahendrajit: This is a variant of the warrior's standard epithet, Indrajit.

Following verse 20, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of eleven lines [1726*]: "And that [divinely charged weapon] struck down the extremely marvelous weapon of Varuṇa. Then immensely powerful Indrajit, victorious in battle, was enraged, and he nocked the blazing, divinely charged weapon of Agni, which seemed capable of destroying the world.[1][1–3]. But heroic Lakṣmaṇa warded it off with the divinely charged weapon of Sūrya. When Rāvaṇi saw that his divinely charged weapon had been warded off, he was beside himself with rage, and he took up the fearsome, divinely charged weapon of the asuras for the destruction of his enemy.[2][4–6] Then from his bow there flew forth blazing mallets and war hammers, as well as lances, bludgeons,[3] maces, swords, and battle-axes.[7–8] But when Lakṣmaṇa there in the battle saw that fearsome, divinely charged weapon of the asuras, which was all but impossible to ward off[4] by any creature and capable of destroying every foe,[5] that illustrious hero parried it with the divinely charged weapon of Maheśvara. [9–11]"

[1]"which seemed capable of destroying the world" lokaṃ saṃkṣipann iva: Literally, "as if collapsing or destroying the world."

[2]"he took up the fearsome, divinely charged weapon of the asuras for the destruction of his enemy" āsuraṃ śatrunāśāya ghoram astraṃ samādade: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead ādade niśitaṃ bāṇam āsuraṃ śatrudāraṇam, "He took up the sharp, enemy-rending arrow of the asuras."

[3]"bludgeons" bhuśuṇḍyaḥ: Cg glosses, "types of cudgels (musulaviśeṣāḥ)." See notes to 6.48.32 and 6.60.11, 1336*, n. 1.

[4]"But . . . that fearsome, divinely charged weapon of the asuras, which was all but impossible to ward off" ghoram astram athāsuram / avāryam: Literally, "now, the fearsome astra of the asuras, not to be warded off." B2,D7,9–11,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read sudāruṇam, "very fearsome," for athāsuram, "now, of the asuras."

[5]"capable of destroying every foe" sarvaśatruvināśanam: Literally, "destroying every foe." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sarvaśastravidāraṇam, "tearing apart or destroying all weapons."

21. "Then a tumultuous and wondrous battle took place between the two of them" tayoḥ sutumulaṃ yuddhaṃ saṃbabhūvādbhutopamam: Our understanding, shared by other translators consulted, is that the pronoun tayoḥ, "of those two," refers to Indrajit and Lakṣmaṇa. Cr, however, understands the pronoun here to refer to the two astras (that of the asuras and that of Maheśvara, mentioned in lines 9–11 of 1726*). For him, then, the battle between the two would be the fearsome collision of the divine weapons. D9,10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tayoḥ samabhavad yuddham adbhutaṃ romaharṣaṇam, "a wondrous and hair-raising battle arose between those two."

"the supernatural beings surrounded Lakṣmaṇa" bhūtāni lakṣmaṇaṃ paryavārayan: Literally, "the creatures surrounded Lakṣmaṇa." The creatures referred to here are doubtless the various types of celestial beings, such as gods, sages, gandharvas, caraṇas, etc., who stereotypically gather in the heavens to observe major battles. Cr understands that these beings huddle around Lakṣmaṇa not merely to watch but for their own protection (svasvarakṣārthaṃ tatra tasthuḥ). This idea is represented in the translations of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 266) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1748).

22. "As that . . . battle . . . raged on" yuddhe: Literally, "in that battle." One needs to read the first half of the verse as a locative absolute (sati saptamī).

23. "with the great birds and the great serpents" garuḍoragāḥ: Literally, "with garuḍa[s] and great serpents." The compound is slightly ambiguous. Given the context in which groups of celestials are mentioned, one would expect the term garuḍa to refer to the class of supernatural or semidivine birds, who, along with their half siblings, the great serpents, are descended from the sage Kaśyapa by the sisters (and co-wives of Kaśyapa) Vinatā and Kadrū, respectively. See 4.57.27. See, too, MBh 1.19–20. On the other hand, the term garuḍa, per se, is rarely, if ever, used in this generic sense, although its synonym, garutmant, is so used. The term garuḍa chiefly refers to the specific bird-divinity of that name, the mount of Viṣṇu, who had rescued Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa from Indrajit's serpent-weapons at sarga 40. The commentators are silent and the translators are divided as to whether to take the term garuḍa as a singular or plural. Cf. 6.40.49; 6.90.20; and notes.

"watched over" rarakṣuḥ: Literally, "they watched over or protected." Cg, evidently thinking that the celestial beings do nothing to actually protect Lakṣmaṇa, sees them mainly as a kind of cheering section, adding the phrase "with words such as, 'Be victorious! Be victorious!' (jaya jayetyādy uktibhiḥ)." This interpretation apparently informs the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 266), who renders, "were present there, intent on the welfare of Lakshmana." See note to verse 21 above.

24–26. "another arrow, the greatest of all" anyaṃ mārgaṇaśreṣṭham: Literally, "another excellent arrow." The context makes it clear that this is not just another arrow that is doomed to failure. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 300), evidently misreading the "n" of anya for a "v," mistakenly understands the astra in question to be called "the Avya."

This unfortunate error is replicated by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 265), who translates, "the Avya Weapon." The critical apparatus records no such variant.

"lethal" śarīrāntakaram: Literally, "making an end of the body."

"impossible . . . to withstand" durviṣaham: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead durviṣamam, "very dangerous or fearsome."

"worshiped by the hosts of gods" devasaṃghaiḥ samarcitam: Since, as Ck and Ct point out, the astra in question is that of Indra, the gods naturally revere it since it belongs to their ruler (devarājīyatvād eva—so Ct, Ck). Pagani (1999, p. 1117) understands that the gods worship the arrow because, as indicated in the following verse, it was the means of their victory over the dānavas. Cs argues that there is a suggested irony here in that Indrajit, the conqueror of Indra, is to be brought down by the weapon of his conquered foe. In this way, Cs notes, Lakṣmaṇa dispels the infamy that accrued to Indra from his humiliating defeat at the rākṣasa's hands. (aindram astram anenendrajito hananaṃ tatparājitendradevatākenāstreṇa kurvaṃl lakṣmaṇaḥ svapakṣasthendrāpaprathāṃ vārayāmāseti dhvanyate.)

27. "This was the very arrow with which" yena: Literally, "by which."

"Śakra of the tawny steeds" śakraḥ . . . harivāhanaḥ: Literally, "Śakra of the tawny mounts or vehicles." This common epithet of Indra has been rendered variously by commentators and translators. We understand the term hari- in its sense of "tawny." This is also our understanding of Cg's gloss, "possessing horses of a tawny color (haritavarṇāśvaḥ)," and is reflected in those translations that use the word "bay" for hari. The terms hari and harita can also refer to the color green, and both Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1748) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 266) understand it in this sense. Cr, however, glosses, "mounted on horseback (aśvārūḍhaḥ)." This interpretation is followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1421), who translates, "riding the horse," identifying in a note the mount in question as the celestial steed Uccaiḥśravaḥ. Pagani (1999, p. 1117), alone among the translators consulted, understands the term -vāhana here in the sense of "driver or charioteer," rendering, "le valeureux aurige." Cf. 6.90.5–6; 6.95.15 and notes.

28. "foremost of men, placed" naraśreṣṭho 'bhisaṃdadhe: D10,11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct omit pādas 28b–30a. GPP acknowledges these lines as belonging to the texts of Cg and Cr, and places them unnumbered in brackets between verses 6.90.38 and 39. Gita Press (6.90.68–69) omits the lines altogether. KK [6.91.68cd–70b] and VSP [6.91.690b–71b], reading with the critical edition, include the passage.

29. D10,11,G3 omit this verse. See note to verse 28 above.

"that foe-destroying, divinely charged weapon" amitradalanam: Literally, "that enemy-cleaving one." Like Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 122), who reads the variant amitradamanam, "foe-taming" (Gorresio 6.70.35), we understand the adjective to refer to the astra of Indra described in the preceding verses. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 266), the only other translator to read this passage, applies the adjective to Lakṣmaṇa's bow, translating, "the . . . bow, which broke the strength of the foe." We find this interpretation unpersuasive, however, since the verb sam $\sqrt{}$dhā, "to nock or place on the bowstring," in the preceding and following verses, clearly presupposes the arrow [in the accusative] as its object.

"unassailable" durdharṣaḥ: D6,T2,3,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Cg read instead the accusative durdharṣam, which then makes the adjective modify Lakṣmaṇa's bow rather than Lakṣmaṇa himself.

"stretching it to its limit" āyamya: Literally, "having extended or drawn."

30. "Once he had placed the arrow on his splendid bow" saṃdhāya dhanuṣi śreṣṭhe: Literally, "having placed on his splendid bow." D10,11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct omit this pāda. See note to verse 28 above.

"fortunate Lakṣmaṇa" lakṣmīvāṃḷ lakṣmaṇaḥ: See 6.67.37 and note.

"in order to accomplish his purpose" arthasādhakam ātmanaḥ: Literally, "effecting his own purpose." Ck and Ct understand that the words Lakṣmaṇa is about to utter in verse 31 are addressed to the presiding divinity of his divine weapon-spell (vakṣyamāṇavacanam astrādhiṣṭhātrīṃ devatāṃ praty abravīt). In this case the divinity is Indra.

31. Lakṣmaṇa's words constitute an example of the kind of "truth act" or "oath by truth" that is common in the literature. See Hopkins 1932. Cs observes that, by Lakṣmaṇa taking an oath based on Rāma's virtues, prior to releasing his divinely charged weapon, we are to understand that the weapon will be unstoppable.

32. "fortunate Lakṣmaṇa" lakṣmaṇaḥ . . . lakṣmaṇaḥ: As Cv, Cm, and Cg point out, quoting the lexicon of Amarakośa (3.1.14), the word lakṣmaṇaḥ itself is a synonym of the adjective lakṣmīvān, "possessing good fortune." See note above to verse 30. They do so, of course, to absolve the poet of the charge of redundancy.

"charging it with the weapon-spell of Indra" aindrāstreṇa samāyujya: Literally, "having conjoined [it] with the aindra astra."

33. "It severed . . . before falling to the ground" pramathya . . . papāta dharaṇītale: Literally, "having severed, it fell to the surface of the earth." Ś,Ñ2,V2,B1,D1–4,7,8,10–13,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators and Gorresio read instead a causative construction pātayāmāsa bhūtale, "made it fall to the surface of the earth."

35. "instantly" āśu: V3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead atha, "now."

"sprawling . . . with . . . his . . . bow" vidhvastaḥ saśarāsanaḥ: Cg understands vidhvastaḥ here in its sense of "slain (hataḥ)." He offers no explanation, however, as to how he understands the term hataḥ, "slain," in pāda a. Presumably, he would have to read it as "stricken." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vipraviddhaśarāsanaḥ, "with his bow broken or fallen away."

36. "once Indrajit was slain" nihate tasmin: Literally, "when he had been slain."

"Vṛtra" vṛtra-: See note to 6.75.31.

37. "there arose a mighty shout" abhijajñe ca saṃnādaḥ: Literally, "a great sound was produced." Cr understands the sound to be the cry, "Lakṣmaṇa has triumphed (lakṣmaṇavijayo 'bhūt)!" D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read jajñe 'tha jaya- for abhijajñe ca, yielding the sense "a cry of victory was produced."

"all beings" bhūtānām: Literally, "of beings." Ś,D5,7,8,12,T1,G2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cr, Cg, and Cm read instead devānām, "of the gods."

38. "Realizing that their champion had fallen" patitaṃ samabhijñāya: Literally, "realizing [him to be] fallen." A number of primarily northern manuscripts show variants that provide a referent: either the pronoun tam, "him," or the proper noun rāvaṇim, "the son of Rāvaṇa."

"fled in all directions" diśo bheje: Literally, "[the . . . host] resorted to the directions."

"who now had a victorious air" jitakāśibhiḥ: Literally, "having the appearance of victory." See 6.42.9–10; 6.44.36; and note to 6.42.9–10.

39. "all . . . ran" sarve . . . pradhāvitāḥ: The vast majority of manuscripts, both northern and southern, collated for the critical edition, show a finite verb of motion in place of the critical edition's sarve, "all." Thus, Ñ,B1,3,4,D1,2,5,6,9–11,T2,3,G,M1,3,5, the texts and printed editions of all southern commentators, and the edition of Gorresio read sasruḥ, "they fled." V1,3 read petuḥ, "they took to flight," while Ś,D4,8,12 read jagmuḥ, "they went." It is not clear, given the textual evidence, why the critical editors have chosen their reading, which is apparently read by only five manuscripts (V2,B2,D3,T1,M2). The reading forces one to understand the participle pradhāvitāḥ, "ran or fled," as a finite verb.

"dazed" naṣṭasaṃjñāḥ: Literally, "their consciousness destroyed." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read bhraṣṭa- for naṣṭa-, giving the compound the sense of "their heads spinning."

40. "by the hundreds in many directions" bahudhā . . . śataśo diśaḥ: Literally, "in many ways, by the hundreds, to the directions."

41. "threw themselves" patitāḥ: Literally, "fell."

"on the mountain" parvatam: The reference here is probably to Mount Trikūṭa, unless we are to take the singular in the generic sense of "the mountains," as some translators do. See notes to 6.2.10 and 6.30.18–20.

43. "Once Indrajit had fallen" tasmin nipatite: Literally, "when he had fallen."

"vanished in all directions, just as do the solar rays" yathā . . . nāvatiṣṭhanti raśmayaḥ / . . . gatā diśaḥ: Literally, "they went to the directions just as the rays do not remain."

"has set behind the western mountain" astaṃgate: See notes to 6.39.15; 6.47.16; and 6.57.20.

44. "that warrior" saḥ: Literally, "he."

"of immense blazing energy" mahātejāḥ: Ñ,V,B,D1–4,7,9–11,13,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahābāhuḥ, "great-armed."

"stripped of life, his limbs sprawling" vyapāstagatajīvitaḥ: Commentators and translators are uncertain as to how to interpret this opaque compound. One possible meaning, deriving from the normal sense of vyapāsta as "expelled, driven out," would be "whose life was driven out and so departed." But this seems redundant, and no commentator supports it. Cm and Cg, whom we more or less follow, take the compound as a dvandva, glossing the first adjective vyapāsta- as "whose limbs were tossed about (vikṣiptāṅgaḥ)." This interpretation is similar to that of Ck, who understands the reference to be specifically to Indrajit's decapitation, glossing, "whose head and trunk were powerfully driven asunder (viśeṣaṇopāstaśiraḥkāyaḥ)." Ct understands vyapāsta to mean "separated from his particular qualities and therefore stripped of life (vyapāsto viśeṣadharmair ata eva gatajīvitaḥ)." Cr offers two overlapping explanations of the compound, the first of which is similar to Ct's. He glosses, "whose life has departed because of the abandonment of qualities; moreover, vyapāsta means, 'fallen, and therefore stripped of life.' (vyapāstena dharmatyāgena gataṃ jīvitaṃ yasya saḥ. kiṃca vyapāstaḥ patitaḥ sa eva gatajīvito babhūva.)" Cs, characteristically, offers a unique and somewhat forced explanation, taking vyapāsta to be an adjective referring to Lakṣmaṇa, with the sense that that hero was thwarted by Indrajit's previous invisibility. For him, then, the compound should be interpreted to mean "he whose life was made to depart by the thwarted one (vyapāstena svena pūrvam alakṣyatayā nirastena lakṣmaṇena gataṃ jīvitaṃ yasya sa tathā)."

45. "its enemy destroyed" vinaṣṭāriḥ: Ñ,V1,2,B1,2,4,D2–4,G1,2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read instead naṣṭāriṣṭaḥ, "its calamities destroyed."

"its oppression nearly at an end" praśāntapīḍābahulaḥ: We follow Cm, Cg, Ck, and Ct in reading the compound as a paranipāta, with the sense "which has most of its oppressions pacified (praśāntabahulapīḍaḥ)."

"filled with joy" praharṣavān: B2,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead pratāpavān, which, as Cg suggests, must be interpreted here to mean "filled with sunlight." Cg remarks that, prior to the death of Indrajit, the sun shone weakly out of fear (pratāpavān sūryaprakāśavān pūrvaṃ bhayena maṇḍasūryatvāt). Cf. 1.14.10 and note to 6.99.26, 3127* and n.1, where the sun and other natural phenomena are represented as diminished by fear of Rāvaṇa.

46. "along with . . . the bulls among the gods" saha surarṣabhaiḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read maharṣibhiḥ, "with the great seers," for surarṣabhaiḥ.

Following verse 46, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines [1737*]: "And in the heavens as well was heard the beating of the war drums of the gods along with the sound of dancing apsarases and the great gandharvas.[1] [1–2] When that rākṣasa of cruel deeds had been slain, the heavenly beings uttered words of praise and rained down[2] showers of blossoms. It was a wonder to behold.[3] [3–4]"

[1]"along with the sound of the dancing apsarases and of the great gandharvas" nṛtyadbhir apsarobhiś ca gandharvaiś ca mahātmabhiḥ: Literally, "along with dancing apsarases and the great gandharvas." The line is elliptical and syntactically awkward. We follow the suggestion of Cv, Cm, and Cg, who add the phrase "the sounds produced by the dancing of the apsarases and the singing of the gandharvas was heard (apsarobhir gandharvaiś ca kṛtanartanagānajanyasvanaḥ śuśruva ity arthaḥ)." This interpretation is also represented in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 267). Note that, despite the renditions of some translators, we should understand that it is the apsarases who are dancing while it is implied that the gandharvas are engaged in their normal activity, viz., singing. This is so despite the masculine gender of the participle nṛtyadbhiḥ, which Cg considers irregular here for the feminine.

[2]"heavenly beings uttered words of praise and rained down" vavarṣuḥ . . . praśaśaṃsuḥ: Literally, "they rained down and praised." We follow Cv, Cm, and Cg, who understand the gods to be the subject of both verbs. D7,10,11,G1,2,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read praśaśāma, "he calmed or suppressed," for praśaśaṃsuḥ. Cr and Ct understand this weak reading to be an elliptical reference to the settling of the dust, which presumably had been raised by the battle (praśaśāma raja iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct).

[3]"It was a wonder to behold." tad adbhutam abhūt tadā: Literally, "that was a wonder."

47. "the heavens" nabhaḥ: D5,6,T2,3,G3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead diśaḥ, "the directions, quarters."

"the *daitya*s and *dānava*s" daityadānavāḥ: These two terms, often used as synonyms for the *asura*s, technically refer, respectively, to the demonic descendants of Diti and Danu. Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,7,8,10–12,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead devadānavāḥ, "the gods and the *dānava*s," which is the stereotypical reading one would expect. Ck and Ct feel it is necessary to explain why the *dānava*s, who are the ancient and implacable foes of the gods, are rejoicing at Indrajit's fall. He notes that he was their enemy as well (dānavānām api tacchatrutvāt teṣām api harṣaḥ).

48. "all" sarve: Ñ2,V1,2,B2–4,D2,7,9–11,13,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Cr, Ck, and Ct read instead tuṣṭāḥ, "gratified, pleased."

"their impurities removed" śāntakaluṣāḥ: This could also mean "their sins allayed." Commentators are strangely silent as to what is being referred to here. Translators generally understand kaluṣa, literally, "dirt, taint," to refer to "sin," or, more generally and more commonly, "troubles, disquiet, etc." Our understanding is that the impurities or sins of the brahmans are those produced by their inability to complete their obligatory vedic rites in the face of the depredations of Indrajit and his followers.

49. "that warrior of unrivaled strength" tam apratibalam: Literally, "of him, whose strength was unrivaled."

51. "Their goal obtained" labdhalakṣāḥ: Literally, "those by whom a goal is obtained." Ct, Ck, and Cr understand, "having obtained an occasion for joy (prāptaharṣāvasarāḥ—Ct, Ck). All three commentators offer an alternative reading based on the interchangeability of the syllables ra and la. They suggest that if one replaces the la of -lakṣāḥ with a ra, we get the compound labdharakṣāḥ with the sense "having obtained protection (labdharakṣaṇāḥ)." See 6.56.11 and note.

"that scion of the Raghus" raghusutam: Literally, "Raghu's son." Ck, Ct, and Cr indicate that we are to understand, "born in the Raghu dynasty (raghuvaṃśajam—so Ct)."

"roaring" kṣveḍantaḥ: See 5.55.29 and 5.60.12, but cf. 5.3.25 and note. See, too, 6.48.31; 6.77.16; and notes.

"howling" nadantaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead plavantaḥ, "leaping about."

52. "Beating their tails on the ground" lāṅgūlāni pravidhyantaḥ: Literally, "beating or lashing their tails." See 5.40.28; 5.55.30; and notes. See, too, 6.77.15 and note.

53. "great and small" uccāvacaguṇāḥ: Literally, "of diverse or high and low qualities." We agree with Cr, the only commentator to remark on this verse, that this adjective should modify kapayaḥ (v.l. harayaḥ), "monkeys." The idea seems to be that the monkey troops, regardless of status or station, mingle freely with one another in their exaltation at the destruction of Indrajit. This interpretation is also found in the translations of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1751) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 268). Pagani (1999, p. 1118), too, appears to construe the adjective with the monkeys but seems to misread it (as uccaiḥ?) to mean "à voix haute." Other translators consulted take the term to modify kathāḥ, "stories, conversation," in its sense of "varied or diverse."

"as they chattered about Rāghava's exploits" cakruḥ . . . rāghavāśrayajāḥ kathāḥ: The precise meaning of the compound is uncertain because of the ambiguity of its middle term āśraya. The commentators are silent, while most of the translators consulted take the term in its common meanings of "reliance, connection, etc.," so that for them the compound means "arising from reliance on Rāghava." Since to us the term āśraya in this sense seems somewhat redundant with the term -jāḥ, "produced from," and, since the context is that of praise for Lakṣmaṇa's exploit, we believe that the term āśraya should be taken here in its less common sense of "an appropriate act or one consistent with character" (see Apte, s.v. meaning 19). This interpretation is apparently shared by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 268), who renders, "stories that testified to the qualities of the scion of the Raghus." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead rāghavāśrayasatkathāḥ, "true or excellent stories of the exploits of Rāghava." Translations that follow the text of Ct render this reading variously. Translators also differ somewhat as to whether we should understand the patronymic rāghava here to refer to Lakṣmaṇa or Rāma. In our opinion, the context favors the former.

54. "his dear friends . . . Lakṣmaṇa's" priyasuhṛdaḥ . . . lakṣmaṇasya: The term priyasuhṛdaḥ is ambiguous as it can be read, as we have done, following Ck, as a nominative plural referring to Lakṣmaṇa's allies, Sugrīva, Hanumān, Vibhīṣaṇa, etc.; as an adjective modifying devāḥ, "gods," in pāda d, as some translators have done; or, following Cg, as a genitive singular agreeing with lakṣmaṇasya in the sense of "who is a dear friend" or "who delights his friends." Cg understands the term to mean "dear friend of all (sarvapriyasuhṛdaḥ)," basing this interpretation on his alternative reading of the term asukaram (see below).

"all-but-impossible" asukaram: Literally, "not easy to accomplish." Cr glosses, "impossible for others to accomplish (anyaiḥ kartum aśakyam)." Cg, who glosses, "difficult or impossible to accomplish (duṣkaram)," offers an alternative explanation in which he breaks up the compound not as a + sukaram but as asu + karam," in the sense of "maintaining or saving the lives of all (sarveṣāṃ prāṇapratiṣṭhāpakam)." It is on the basis of this alternative, it seems, that Cg understands the term priyasuhṛdaḥ as discussed above.

"they were delighted . . . the gods" hṛṣṭāḥ . . . devāḥ: Cg understands hṛṣṭāḥ, "delighted," to be an optional variant of hṛṣitāḥ, which can have the sense of vismitāḥ, "astonished or amazed." Since Cg understands that the word devāḥ, "gods," is the subject of both halves of the verse, he devises a small sequence of their responses to the news of Indrajit's death. According to him, at first the gods are pleased when they learn of the slaying of Indrajit from the mouths of the celestial bards, etc., but then, reflecting upon the virtual impossibility of such a feat, they come to believe that the report is false. When, however, they proceed to the battlefield and witness Lakṣmaṇa's feat for themselves, they become filled with astonishment. (vismitapratighātayoś ceti vaktavyam iti hṛṣeḥ pākṣika iḍabhāvaḥ. devāś cāraṇādimukhena prathamam indrajiddhananaṃ śrutvā saṃtuṣṭāḥ santaḥ paścāt tasyātyantāśakyatvād atathyaṃ manvānā yuddhabhūmim āgatya tatpratyakṣīkṛtya vismitā āsann iti bhāvaḥ.)

The meter is puṣpitāgrā.

Cv and Cm quote 1754* line 6 (= GPP 6.91.16ab; VSP 6.92.15cd; KK 6.92.15cd) to support their understanding that the battle with Indrajit has occupied three lunar days, namely, the eleventh through the thirteenth day [presumably of the dark half of Phālguna/Caitra]. (ekādaśyāṃ dvādaśyāṃ trayodaśyāṃ cendrajidyuddham. ahorātrais tribhir vīraḥ kathañcid vinipātita ity uttaratrābhidhānāt—Cm.) See note to 6.79.7. See, too, note to 6.4.4.

Sarga 79

1. "Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks" lakṣmaṇaḥ śubhalakṣaṇaḥ: See 6.14.3; 6.67.37; 6.71.20; 6.73.5; 6.75.16; 6.89.4; and notes. See also Goldman 1984, p. 105. Cf. 6.31.1 and note.

"his body drenched with blood" rudhiraklinnagātraḥ: Despite Lakṣmaṇa having been wounded several times during his battle with Indrajit (see 6.78), Cr, in keeping with his concern expressed earlier (6.35.9 and note) that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa as divinities cannot really bleed, argues here that the blood covering Lakṣmaṇa is Indrajit's (rudhireṇa nihatendrajiccharīrotthitaraktena klinnaṃ gātraṃ yasya saḥ).

"conqueror of Śakra" śakrajetāram: This is a synonym for the epithet "Indrajit." Ś1,Ñ2,V,B2–4,D1,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead śatrujetāram, "conqueror of his enemies."

2–3. "taking" saṃnivartya: Literally, "having caused [them] to return." D7,9–11,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead saṃnipatya, "having met together or assembled." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead saṃnihatya, which Cg glosses as "having assembled or joined up with (saṃghībhūya)."

"leaning on" avaṣṭabhya: Literally, "having leaned upon." Ck and Ct believe that Lakṣmaṇa requires support because of the pain of his battle wounds (yuddhavraṇajapīḍāvaśāt). Cg and Cm ascribe his weakness simply to battle fatigue (yuddhapāravaśyāt).

4. "Approaching" abhikramya: Literally, "having approached." Ct glosses, "reverentially circling (pradakṣaṇīkṛtya)," and this interpretation has been followed by several of the translators.

"Viṣṇu, Indra's younger brother" indrānujaḥ: Literally, "the younger brother of Indra." The reference is to Viṣṇu having taken birth in the form of the vāmanāvatāra as the child of Aditi and the sage Kaśyapa, who are generally regarded as the parents of the vedic gods, including Indra. This accounts for Viṣṇu's epithet, Upendra "junior Indra." See 6.40.43; 6.49.1–2; 6.59.7; and notes. The simile is slightly awkward, since Viṣṇu, despite his being technically junior to Indra, is, by the period of the epics, regarded as vastly his superior. The figure thus appears to invert the status of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D5–7,9–11,T1,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of Crā, Cm, and Cg read instead [indrasyeva] bṛhaspatiḥ, which would yield the meaning "like Bṛhaspati [in the presence] of Indra." This figure perhaps is contextually more suitable, as Bṛhaspati, the legendary purohita of the gods, is Indra's dependent, although he may still have superior ritual status in that he is a brahman. Cm, Crā, and Cg indicate that the illustration is intended merely to show relative status in terms of dependency (pāratantryamātre sāmyam—so Cg; pradhānopasarjanabhāvenāvasthānamātre dṛṣṭāntaḥ—so Cm). Ct is aware of the variant and explains it similarly.

Following 4cd, D5–7,9–11,13,T1,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [1744*]: "Moaning softly,[1] he approached and [reported] to great Rāghava."

[1]"Moaning softly" niṣṭanann iva: Commentators and translators differ significantly as to the meaning of the participle, the particle iva, and even the subject of the phrase. We understand the verb ni $\sqrt{}$stan, in the sense of "to groan, moan, cry" as it is more or less used in the Uttarakāṇḍa (7.404*, line 2 = GPP 7.21.12) and the particle iva in its common sense of "slightly, softly." We further understand that the subject here is Lakṣmaṇa, who, in his weakened and wounded condition, is emitting sounds of distress. Cg glosses the participle as "speaking indistinctly (avyaktākṣaraṃ vadan)" and understands it to be either merely ornamental (vākyālaṃkāre) or to indicate the falsehood of the impression created by Lakṣmaṇa's gestures indicating fatigue [i.e., that Indrajit had not been defeated] (āyāsasyābhinayamātreṇālīkatvadyotanāya vā). Cr takes the phrase to mean that Lakṣmaṇa, by his pleased facial expressions, is, as it were, already communicating the destruction of Indrajit (prasādaviśiṣṭamukhadarśanenendrajidvadhaṃ kathayann iva). Ck and Ct believe that the subject is not Lakṣmaṇa but rather Vibhīṣaṇa, who is referred to in the previous verse, and that the phrase means that the latter is informing Rāma of the death of Indrajit through his own joyful arrival (vibhīṣaṇaḥ saṃtuṣṭāgamanenaivendrajidvadhaṃ niṣṭanan bodhayann iva). Translators either follow one these commentators or take the verb ni $\sqrt{}$stan in its alternative sense of "to cry, to resound." See note to 6.82.37, where we have taken the derivative form niṣṭānakaḥ in the sense of "lamentation." See note to 6.89.6.

5. "Vibhīṣaṇa . . . told" nyavedayata . . . vibhīṣaṇaḥ: Several of the commentators show some concern over what appears to be a repetition of Lakṣmaṇa's report by Vibhīṣaṇa. They explain this in various ways. Ct and Ck note that Vibhīṣaṇa speaks in anticipation of Rāma's question as to who actually killed Indrajit (tataḥ kiṃkartṛko vadha ity ākāṅkṣāyām āha—so Ct). Cg and Cm understand that Lakṣmaṇa is too modest to trumpet his own feats in the presence of his older brother and wants to share the credit for his deed with the others so that Vibhīṣaṇa must relate the story in full (rāmasannidhau saṃkocavatā lakṣmaṇenāviśeṣeṇendrajidvadhakathanād vibhīṣaṇaḥ spaṣṭatayāha—so Cg). Cg also proposes an alternative: that, in his excessive excitement, Vibhīṣaṇa repeats the story, even though Lakṣmaṇa has already provided the details (yadvā lakṣmaṇena sūcanayoktāv api harṣaprakarṣeṇa vibhīṣaṇaḥ punar āha).

Following verse 5, Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D5–7,9–11,T1,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of six lines [1747*]: "Now, when the immensely powerful Rāma heard that Lakṣmaṇa had slain Indrajit, he experienced unparalleled delight, and he said these words[1][1–2]: 'Well done, Lakṣmaṇa! I am pleased. You have accomplished an all-but-impossible feat.[2] Know that by the destruction of Rāvaṇi victory is ours![3]'[3–4] Then that mighty hero kissed Lakṣmaṇa, increaser of good fortune,[4] on his head and, in his affection, forcibly took his bashful brother on his lap.[5–6]"

[1]"Rāma . . . these words" rāmo vākyam: D9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vākyaṃ cedam, "these words."

[2]"accomplished an all-but-impossible feat" karma cāsukaraṃ kṛtam: M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead karmaṇā sukṛtaṃ kṛtam, "by [your] action [you have] accomplished a needful action."

[3]"victory is ours" jitam: Literally, "[it is] conquered." Ck and Ct think that we should add the words "now by us (idānīm evāsmābhir iti śeṣaḥ)." Cr supplies a modificand, "the whole race of rākṣasas (rākṣasajātam iti śeṣaḥ)."

[4]"increaser of good fortune" lakṣmivardhanam: This is yet another of Vālmīki's etymological epithets. See note to verse 1 above. D6,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead kīrtivardhanam, "increaser of fame or glory." Compare 6.89.9 and note.

6. "The bull among men, Rāma" puruṣarṣabhaḥ: Literally, "the bull among men." The transition between verses 5 and 6 is rather abrupt in the critical edition in the absence of one of the two insert passages 1746* (mainly northern manuscripts) or 1747* (mixed, but largely southern manuscripts). In both of these insert passages, the subject is Rāma rather than Vibhīṣaṇa.

"tightly" avapīḍitam: As several of the commentators indicate, the term is ambiguous. It can be read either as we have done, as an adverb modifying the gerund pariṣvajya, "having embraced," or as an adjective modifying tam . . . lakṣmaṇam, "him, Lakṣmaṇa," in which case it must be understood in the sense of "wounded, pained, oppressed."

"swiftly" tvaran: Cg, the only commentator to remark on this participle, believes that Rāma hastens to caress or stroke his brother in order to alleviate the pain of his wounds (tvarā ca prahāravyathāpanayanāyeti bhāvaḥ).

Following 6ab, Ñ,V,B2–4,D5–7,9–11,T1,G,M, the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators, and the printed edition of Gorresio (first line only) insert a passage of three lines [1749*]: "And Rāma, distressed with grief,[1] then sighed[2] and gazed tenderly again and again at his brother Lakṣmaṇa, who was pierced with darts, wounded, and breathing hard.[3]"

[1]"distressed with grief" duḥkhasaṃtaptaḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the accusative duḥkhasaṃtaptam, in which case the adjective would modify Lakṣmaṇa and have a sense more like "distressed with pain."

[2]"then sighed" niśvasitas tadā: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead tadā niḥ[ni—D7,9–11]śvāsapīḍitam, "then oppressed by sighs," which then modifies Lakṣmaṇa. G2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead tadā niśvasito bhṛśam, "then sighing deeply."

[3]"was pierced with darts, wounded, and breathing hard" śalyasaṃpīḍitaṃ śastaṃ niśvasantam: Continuing his argument from verse 1 above that Lakṣmaṇa has not, in fact, been wounded, Cr interprets all these terms causatively to suggest that Lakṣmaṇa has inflicted these injuries upon Indrajit.

7. "I have been freed from my enemy" niramitraḥ kṛto 'smi: Literally, "I have been made one without an enemy." Ct and Ck raise the question of how Rāma can be considered to be freed from his enemies when Rāvaṇa is still alive. They understand that the explanation is implicit in Rāma's immediately following statement that Rāvaṇa will surely now come out to fight with his remaining forces [since Rāma anticipates no difficulty in killing him]. (kathaṃ rāvaṇe jīvati niramitratvaṃ tatrāha niryāsyatīti. avaśyaṃ niryāsyati—so Ct, Ck.)

Following 7ab, Ñ,V1,2 (continues),3,B2–4,D5–7,9–11,T1,G,M, the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators, and the printed edition of Gorresio insert a passage of six lines [1754*]: "Now that his son is dead, I reckon that Rāvaṇa is as good as slain in battle. Now that my evil-minded foe has been slain, I am victorious.[1–2] Fortunately, hero, you have cut off cruel Rāvaṇa's right arm in battle. For Indrajit was his main support.[3–4] Vibhīṣaṇa and Hanumān, as well, performed a great deed in battle. And thus was that mighty warrior struck down with great difficulty after three days and nights.[1][5–6]"

[1]"after three days and nights" ahorātrais tribhiḥ: Cg and Cm reiterate the idea broached by Cv and Cm at the end of the preceding sarga that the duel between Lakṣmaṇa and Indrajit lasted from the eleventh to the thirteenth [of the dark half of Phālguna/Caitra]. Ct's reckoning is more specific. He goes so far as to specify the exact duration of the battle, claiming that it began in the fourth prahara (=late afternoon, between 3 and 6 PM) on the tenth day [of Āśvina] and ended at around the same time on the thirteenth (daśamyāṃ caturthaprahara ārambhāt trayodaśyāṃ caturthaprahare vadhād iti bhāvaḥ). See note to 6.4.4.

Following 7cd, D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct insert a passage of one line, which repeats, in reverse order, pādas d and e of verse 7 [1755*]: "Surely Rāvaṇa himself will now come forth with a vast array of troops."

8. "surrounded by my own vast army" balenāvṛtya mahatā: Literally, "having surrounded with a vast army." The phrase is elliptical and ambiguous. Most translators, like us, understand that Rāma is referring to his own monkey army. Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p, 269) takes the reference to be to Rāvaṇa's army, with which the rākṣasa lord would be surrounded. Among the commentators consulted, only Ct glosses the phrase, taking bala in one of its other meanings, "strength," and glosses the gerund āvṛtya, "having surrounded," as "having attacked (ākramya)." He thus understands the gist of the verse to be "having attacked with my great innate strength, I shall kill him as he marches forth (niryāntaṃ ca taṃ mahatā balena sahajenāvṛtyākramya nihaniṣyāmi)."

9. "my guardian" nāthena: The most common meanings of this term are "lord, master, husband," and, indeed, Dutt (1893, p. 1425) translates accordingly. But this, of course, is entirely inappropriate contextually. We believe that the term must be taken in its less common but well-attested sense of "guardian, protector" in this context. In this we are in agreement with Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1753) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 269). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 304), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 267), renders, "Sous ta direction." Pagani (1999, p. 1120) idiosyncratically renders, "grâce á ton exploit." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 125) offers, "Coll' ausilio di te." Commentators, too, struggle with the seemingly inappropriate term. Ck and Ct take it as a term of endearment (upalālanārthaṃ nāthaśabdaprayogaḥ), although they offer no lexical support for this. Cg, deriving the noun from its underlying root √nāth, in its sense, "to beg," glosses, "begging, pleading (yācamānena)," although it is not clear why this interpretation would be appropriate here.

"both Sītā and the earth itself have been placed within my grasp" sītā ca pṛthivī ca me / na duṣprāpā: Literally, "Sītā and the earth are not difficult to obtain for me." Pagani (1999, pp. 1622–23), noting the close mythological and etymological associations between Sītā ["furrow"] and the earth, offers a lengthy and highly speculative note on the connections between Sītā and the kingdom as amorous and political objects of contestation between Rāma and Rāvaṇa.

11. "Wise" mahāprājñaḥ: Ś,D2,3,5,8,11,12,G2,3,M3, the texts and printed editions of Ct, and the editions of Gorresio (6.71.20) and Gita Press (6.91.21) read instead the vocative, mahāprājña, which then must refer to Suṣeṇa.

"Saumitri, so loving of his friends" saumitrir mitravatsalaḥ: For other etymological epithets of this type, see note to 6.14.3 and R. Goldman 1984, pp.105–6. See, too, note to verse 1 above.

Ck, Ct, and Cr (on the following verse) note that we are to understand that Suṣeṇa has retained some of the healing herbs from the mountain of medicinal plants that Hanumān had brought earlier (6.61) (auṣadhiparvatānayanottaram oṣadhyaḥ suṣeṇena saṃgṛhya sthāpitā ity anena jñāyate).

"is still riddled with darts" saśalyaḥ: Literally, "one with darts." D10,11,T2,3,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead viśalyaḥ, "free from darts." This reading must then be read in apposition with the adjective susvasthaḥ, "restored to health," in pāda c.

"and Vibhīṣaṇa" savibhīṣaṇaḥ: Literally, "along with Vibhīṣaṇa." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct instead repeat the epithet mitravatsalaḥ, "so loving of his friends," from pāda b, which echoes the name Sumitra. See note to verse 1 above.

13. "held . . . to Laksmaṇa's nose" lakṣmaṇāya dadau nastaḥ: Literally, "he gave to Lakṣmaṇa nasally." As we see from 6.61.67 above, as well as from the following verse, the mere fragrance of these powerful medicinal herbs effects the cure. Thus, we believe that Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 269), who renders, "gave . . . a powder to inhale," is perhaps off the mark. See, too, 6.89.23 and note.

14. "the darts fell away from him" saḥ . . . viśalyaḥ samapadyata: Literally, "he became free from darts."

"his wounds healed over" saṃrūḍhavraṇaḥ: Literally, "one whose wounds were healed over." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead saṃruddhaprāṇaḥ, literally, "one whose breaths are obstructed." This term seems hardly to fit the context. Indeed, all translations consulted, with the sole exception of Dutt (1893, p. 1425), who renders, "his outgoing vitality was shut up," and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 268), who appears to ignore the term entirely, render the reading found in the critical edition.

15. "Suṣeṇa" saḥ: Literally, "he."

16. "his fever had subsided" vigatajvaraḥ: The compound can also mean "free from care or anxiety."

"he was free of pain" gatavyathaḥ: Ñ,V1,3,B2,3,D6,7,9–11,G2, the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr, and the printed edition of Gorresio read instead gataklamaḥ, "free from fatigue or exhaustion."

17. "in good spirits" mudā: We follow Cg in taking this as an elliptical reference to Lakṣmaṇa's return to good spirits mentioned in the previous verse. Cg glosses, "we must supply the word[s] 'filled with,' so that the sense is 'Saumitri, who was filled with good spirits' (mudā yuktam iti śeṣaḥ. mudā yuktaṃ saumitrim . . .)." Some translators take the term to refer to Rāma and his allies so that their understanding of the verse is that these figures "rejoiced with joy or rejoiced to a great degree."

"Sugrīva, the lord of the leaping monkeys" plavagādhipaḥ: Literally, "the lord of the leaping monkeys."

"Jāmbavān" jāmbavān: B1,D2,6,7,9–11,13,T1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read vīryavān, "mighty," in place of the proper noun.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

18. "while the foremost of the troop leaders were delighted" hṛṣṭā babhūvuḥ . . . yūthapendrāḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the singular babhūva hṛṣṭaḥ . . . vānarendraḥ, "while the lord of the monkeys [Sugrīva] was delighted."

The meter is upajāti with a hypermetric pāda d.

1. "the ministers of ten-necked Paulastya . . . to him" paulastyasacivāḥ . . . daśagrīvāya: Literally, "the ministers of Paulastya . . . [reported] to the ten-necked one."

"confirmed the news for themselves" abhijñāya: Literally, "having determined." The meaning and even the form of this word are unclear and a matter of dispute among commentators. They read the word either as a gerund, as we do, or as a dative, in agreement with daśagrīvāya, in the sense of "to the ten-necked one who knew." Cm and Cg share the reading of the critical edition. The situation is complicated by the fact that there is a variant, avajñāya, which is read only by D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct but which is acknowledged by a number of commentators. Cm takes the term abhijñāya as a gerund, glossing, "having seen (dṛṣṭvā)." Ct quotes Cm and adds a further explanation not found in available texts of Cm. He says, "having first heard, they then proceeded to the battlefield, and only after directly observing [that Indrajit had been slain] did they report [to Rāvaṇa] (pūrvaṃ śrutvā paścād yuddhabhūmiṃ gatvā pratyakṣīkṛtyācacakṣur ity artham āha)." In a similar vein, Cg glosses, "having known for themselves, that is, having seen with full knowledge (svayam abhijñāya sābhijñānaṃ dṛṣṭvā)." This is the interpretation we have followed, as have Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1756) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 270). Cg provides an alternative explanation for this reading, taking the term as a dative describing Rāvaṇa. Cg then goes on to say, " 'knowing' means that he would have already realized that Indrajit would certainly be slain since his sacrifice had been disrupted. (athavābhijñāyeti caturthī. pūrvam eva yajñavighnena niścitatadvadhāyety arthaḥ.)" Ct, Ck, and Cs, who accept the reading avajñāya, understand it as a dative, meaning "not knowing" and modifying Rāvaṇa, who does not yet know of his son's death. (avajñāya avakṣiptā jñā jñānaṃ yasya tasmai. putravadhavṛttāntajñānarahitāyety arthaḥ—so Ck, Ct.) Translations that follow the text of Ct render this variant. Cr similarly takes the term as a dative but derives it from ava $\sqrt{}$jñā, in the sense of "to disrespect or hold in contempt," arguing that it refers to Rāvaṇa's practice of holding all virtuous people in contempt (avajñāya sarvasatpuruṣānādarakartre daśagrīvāya). Cg acknowledges the variant reading and takes it either as a dative in the sense of his second interpretation, that is, "already knowing," or as a gerund meaning "having obtained a sight up to [but not including] direct perception (sākṣātkāraparyantadarśanaṃ prāpya)." Ck, in an acerbic comment, criticizes the position held by "Yadvābhaṭṭa" (Cg or Cm?), who reads avajñāya as a gerund in the sense of "having seen (abhijñāya)" and prattles on incoherently (atra yadvābhaṭṭas tu avajñāyābhijñāya dṛṣṭveti lyabantam āśrityāsaṅgatam alapat). See Lefeber 1994, p. 24 and n. 77. See, too, notes to 4.2.56 and 4.33.15. Cf. notes to 5.1.77; 6.12.10; and 6.52.10. See, too, Introduction, pp. 99–107.

"in great distress" savyathāḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead satvarāḥ, "in haste."

2. "Great and glorious king!" mahārāja . . . mahādyute: Literally, "O great king! O one of great luster!" B3,D5,9–11,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read the nominative mahādyutiḥ, "of great luster," for the vocative mahādyute, "O one of great luster!" In this case, the epithet must apply to Indrajit rather than to Rāvaṇa.

"right before our eyes" miṣatāṃ naḥ: Literally, "despite the fact that we were watching." As several commentators point out, this phrase should be read as a genitive of disrespect (anādare ṣaṣṭhī), and our translation attempts to convey this sense. Ct, aware that the ministers were not actually present at the death of Indrajit, understands the expression to be an example of the maxim of "the people with umbrellas" [i.e., that the actions of a few may be generalized to an entire group]. In other words, the ministers are referring to what the rākṣasa combatants saw (yoddhṛrākṣasair darśanāc chatrinyāyena bodhyam).

3. "another heroic warrior, that heroic warrior . . . heroic" śūraḥ śūreṇa . . . śūraḥ: Literally, "the hero, with a hero, the hero." Commentators propose various strategies to minimize the effect of the repetition of the term śūraḥ, "hero," to describe Indrajit. Cr proposes reading pādas ab as part of the syntax of verse 2 above, while Cg notes that we can account for the repetition by the fact that the two halves of the verse contain separate verbs (kriyābhedāt).

"the conqueror of the lord of the all-wise gods" vibudhendrajit: Literally, "the conqueror of the lord of the wise ones." Commentators disagree as to how to analyze what appears to be a kenning for Indra, i.e., vibudhendra. Our translation follows the interpretation of Cg, who glosses, "conqueror of the lord of the gods (devendrajit)." Ct and Ck understand the compound vibudhendra to be a dvandva with the sense of "the gods and Indra (vibudhān devān indraṃ ca)." Cs offers two alternative explanations. In the first, he breaks the compound up into a vocative, vibudha, "O wise one," referring to Rāvaṇa, which he glosses as "you who possess the knowledge of what should be done next," and indrajit. According to his second alternative, the compound vibudhendra is a madhyamapadalopī, which must be understood as "Indra accompanied by the gods." (he vibudha ita uttaraṃ kartavyajñāna. indrajid vibudhaiḥ sahita indras taṃ jayatīti sa tathā vā.) Finally, Cs addresses Ct's interpretation, criticizing it, since, he argues, if the compound were indeed a dvandva, then indra should be placed before vibudha (nāgojibhaṭṭavyākhyānaṃ tu sarvathāpīndraśabdasya pūrvanipātasyāvarjanīyatvād upekṣam).

Following verse 3, Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1779*], while V2,B1,D1–4,13 read 1779* for 3cd: "After having ravaged[1] Lakṣmaṇa with his arrows, he [Indrajit] has departed for a higher realm."

[1]"After having ravaged" saṃtāpya: Literally, "having pained or afflicted." V1,B1,D2–4,6,7,9–11,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead saṃtarpya, "having gratified."

4. "grievous, terrible, and horrifying" pratibhayam . . . dāruṇam / ghoram: The three terms are more or less synonymous in the sense of "frightful." Several of the commentators try to distinguish them. Thus, Ct says that the death is dāruṇa, "grievous," because it gives rise to grief (śokajanakatvāt). He glosses pratibhayam, "terrible," as "extremely frightening (atibhayaṃkaram)" and ghoram, "horrible," as "harsh or painful (tīkṣṇam)." Cr takes pratibhayam to mean "frightening (bhayaṃkaram)," dāruṇam to mean "rending (dārakam)," and ghoram to mean "unbearable (asahanīyam)." Cv, Cm, and Cg take dāruṇam to mean "pitiful (karuṇam)" and ghoram to mean "harsh or painful (tīkṣṇam)." Cm takes pratibhayam to mean "frightening (bhayaṃkaram)." See note to 6.2.14.

6. "Great chariot-warrior!" mahāratha: Ñ,V1,3,B3,4,D3,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahābala, "Mighty one!" See 6.60.3; 6.72.33; 6.81.18; 6.83.8; 6.84.15; and notes. Cf. 6.77.36.

7. "even Kāla or Yama, the ender of all things" kālāntakāv api: The dvandva compound is both unusual and awkward in that the two terms, kāla-, "time," and -antaka, "the ender [i.e., death]," are often used synonymously in the epic and may even appear together in appositional karmadhārya compounds, in the sense of "Kāla, the ender [of all things]" (cf. 6.75.2). Commentators therefore struggle somewhat to differentiate the terms. Ct takes kāla to mean "the destroyer of all things (sarvasaṃhārakaḥ)" and antaka to refer to "his [i.e., Kāla's] officer or appointed official (tadadhikṛtaḥ)." The idea here appears to be that kāla, "time or death," is an abstract concept, whereas antaka refers to a personified agent, "the god of death." Cr explains somewhat similarly, glossing, "death and Yama (mṛtyuyamau)." A further variation on this theme is Crā's and Cm's explanation, whereby kāla is "the destroyer of all (sarvasaṃhārakaḥ)," while antaka is "a person who regards himself as time or death (kālābhimānī puruṣaḥ)." Cg contents himself in glossing, "two different forms of Yama (yamasya mūrtibhedau)." Northern manuscripts tend to avoid the dvandva entirely. Cf. 6.21.26 and note.

"What then to speak of Lakṣmaṇa?" kiṃ punar lakṣmaṇam: Literally, "how much more [easily] Lakṣmaṇa?"

8. "Today . . . now" adya . . . adya: The poet lends poignancy to Rāvaṇa's lament by employing anaphora, repeating the adverb in initial position several times throughout the passage. Thus, verses 8, 10, 11, and 12 all begin with this word.

"King Vaivasvata" vaivasvato rājā: Vaivasvata, son of Vivasvant, is a common patronymic for Yama, the god of death.

"he has . . . brought you . . . under the power of time" yena . . . tvam . . . saṃyuktaḥ kāladharmaṇā: Literally, "by whom you are joined with the rule of time (kāla). The compound kāladharma, "the rule of time," is a common epic euphemism for death.

"great-armed warrior" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed one."

9. "who gives up his life" hanyate: Literally, "who is slain."

10. "This night" adya: Literally, "today." See note to verse 8 above.

"the guardians of the world" lokapālāḥ: These are the eight divinities who guard the cardinal and intermediary points of the compass. See note to verse 36 below. See, too, 5.1.8 and note.

"and the seers" tatharṣayaḥ: D6,7,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead maharṣayaḥ, "the great seers."

"having seen" dṛṣṭvā: Ś,V2,B1,D1,2,4,8,12,13,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead śrutvā, "having heard."

"will sleep soundly, freed from fear" sukhaṃ svapsyanti nirbhayāḥ: Cr, the only commentator to remark on the passage, observes that the suggestion here is that it is the happiness of the gods that causes Rāvaṇa the greatest suffering (etenedam eva mama mahad duḥkham iti sūcitam).

11. "through the loss of Indrajit alone" ekenendrajitā hīnā: Literally, "diminished by one Indrajit."

"all the three worlds and the . . . earth" lokās trayaḥ kṛtsnāḥ pṛthivī ca: Since the traditional set of the three worlds normally includes the earth, the atmospheric region, and the heavens (bhūr bhuvaḥ svaḥ), the commentators are perplexed by the mention of the earth separately from those three regions. They explain it in one of two ways. Cv, Cm, and Ct understand that the reference to the three worlds here includes the underworld known as Pātāla, the atmospheric realm, and heaven (pātālāntarikṣasvargāḥ). Thus, for these commentators, the earth is simply a separate, fourth, world. Cg, however, disagrees, arguing that the earth (which he implicitly includes among the three worlds) is mentioned separately because of its primacy. He illustrates this by comparing the utterance to the expression, "the brahmans have come and so has [the brahman] Vasiṣṭha." (pṛthīvyāḥ pṛthag upādānaṃ prādhānyād yathā brāhmaṇā āgatā vasiṣṭho 'py āgata ity ādau.) Ñ,V,B,D1–4,7,9–11,13,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read the feminine singular kṛtsnā, "all, entire," for the masculine plural kṛtsnāḥ, "all, entire," thus making the adjective refer to the earth rather than to the three worlds.

12. "of the daughters of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos," nairṛtakanyānām: Literally, "of the nairṛta maidens." The precise identity of these women is obscured somewhat by the term's possible range of meanings. Although kanyā typically refers to a young, unmarried woman, virgin, or daughter, it can also refer to women in general (Apte s.v.).

"shrill trumpeting" ninādam: Literally, "sound, roar."

13. "your succession to the throne" yauvarājyam: Literally, "the office of heir apparent." See note to 6.51.10.

"all of us" naḥ: Literally, "us." We follow Cg, who adds the word "all (sarvān)."

"your wife" bhāryām: Literally, "a wife." Ñ2,V1,B2,3,D2,3,5,9–11,T1,G1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the plural bhāryāḥ, "wives."

14. "But now you have reversed this" viparīte hi vartase: Literally, "for you are in inversion." The idea here, as expressed by Ct, is that now, contrary to the expected and proper order of things, Rāvaṇa must perform the funerary rites for Indrajit (tvaṃ tu viparīte vartase yatas tvadīyāni [pretakāryāṇi] mayā kartavyāni bhaviṣyanti). Cm's view is similar to that of Ct. Cr, although taking the finite verb as a causative, similarly understands, "how is it that you have forced me to travel by a reversed path (viparīte pathi marge tvaṃ hi kathaṃ vartase māṃ pravartayasi)."

15. Cm, as he does so often, acknowledges that the manifest meaning of the verse is clear, but he suggests an inner meaning to the effect that Rāvaṇa is really saying to Indrajit, "since Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are still living, what is the point of your existence?" He says this, Cm continues, because of the impossibility of conquering Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. (sa tvam ity asya prātītikārthaḥ spaṣṭaḥ. vastutas tu salakṣmaṇe rāme jīvati sati yas tvaṃ jīvitaṃ kasmād vrajasi, tayor asādhyatvād iti bhāvaḥ.) See note to 6.27.4. All northern devanāgarī manuscripts and a few southern manuscripts read the facilior variants kasmād vrajasi putraka, "son, why have you gone" (V2,B1,D1–4,13), kva nu yāsyasi putraka, "son, where will you go" (Ś,D8,12), or kasmāt tyajasi jīvitam, "why did you abandon life" (Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D6,T2,3 [Ñ1—kathaṃ; B4—tyakṣyasi]). D6 is commonly aligned with Cr and sometimes with Cm as well. It is possible that Cm here either read or was familiar with these variants, which would explain his use of the phrase jīvitaṃ kasmād vrajasi in his commentary.

"Rāghava, and Lakṣmaṇa: rāghave ca salākṣmaṇe: Literally, "And Rāghava along with Lakṣmaṇa." Ñ,V1,B2–4,D5,7,9,11,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead lakṣmaṇe ca sarāghave, "and Laksmaṇa along with Rāghava." GPP (6.92.15) erroneously prints lakṣmaṇe na ca rāghave, "Lakṣmaṇa but not Rāghava."

"this source of all my torment" mama śalyam: Literally, "my dart, thorn, splinter, or source of pain."

16. Following verse 16, all manuscripts, in whole (southern) or in part (northern), insert a passage of eight lines [1790*]. The text of Ct, however, does not know lines 3–4, a fact unrecorded in the critical apparatus. "His mental anguish over his son further inflamed him, who was already wrathful by nature and blazing with anger, just as, in the hot season, its rays do the sun.[1–2] With his knitted brows[1] conjoined on his forehead, he resembled the ocean, receptacle of waters, at the end of a cosmic age, together with its sharks and mighty waves.[3–4] And as he gaped in his fury, a clearly perceptible and smoky fire shot forth, blazing from his mouth, as if from the mouth of Vṛtra.[2][5–6] Then Rāvaṇa's two eyes, which were red by nature, now grew more so[3] through the fire of his wrath and, blazing, became truly terrible to behold.[4][7–8]"

[1]"With his knitted brows" bhrukuṭībhiḥ: Literally, "With the curvings of his brows." The term bhrukuṭī, in the sense of "frown," is usually used in the singular. Cg observes that the plural is appropriate here because Rāvaṇa has ten heads (bahuvacanaṃ daśaśiraskatvāt). One should note, however, that Cg fails to comment on the fact that, in this and the following verses, reference is made to Rāvaṇa's having only one mouth and two eyes.

[2]Following line 6, D5,7,9–11,T1,G3,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read a close variant of the critical edition's verse 6.80.29, repeating it in its proper place.

[3]"which were red by nature, now grew more so" prakṛtyā rakte ca rakte: Literally, "red by nature and red."

[4]"truly terrible to behold" mahāghore: Literally, "very terrible."

17. "was now transfigured" -mūrchitam: Literally, "enhanced, augmented." Although the poet normally uses this adjective in its more common sense of "stunned, insensible, bewildered," here it must be taken in its other sense of "increased, enhanced."

"unbearable" durāsadam: Literally, "difficult or impossible to approach." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vyavasthitam, "fixed, settled, determined," which makes little sense in the context. Translations that follow the text of Ct simply ignore the word.

19. "some vast engine being turned by the dānavas" yantrasyāveṣṭyamānasya mahato dānavaiḥ: The commentators and the translators who follow them, respectively, are divided as to the exact reference here. In our judgment, which we base on the context of the passage with its reference to such notorious demonic warriors as Vṛtra, the poet probably has in mind some great infernal engine of war such as the dānavas, the perennial demonic foes of the gods, might employ. Compare 6.3.11 and notes, where some sort of yantras, "mechanical devices," for hurling stones (upalayantrāṇi) are said to be part of the defensive emplacements of Laṅkā. Compare, too, the use of the term yantra at 6.49.11 and note. Ct, Cr, and Ck, however, take the phrase to be an oblique and elliptical reference to the well-known myth of the churning of the ocean [or ocean of milk] in which the gods and the demons use Mount Mandara as a churning rod, which they twirl by using the great serpent lord Vāsuki as the churning rope. In this interpretation, the yantra, or "engine," referred to would be the mountain itself. (yantrasya mandararūpamathanayantrasya vāsukinā karaṇena dānavaiḥ kṛṣyamāṇasya mathnataḥ kṣīrābdhimathanaṃ kurvato mandarasyeva—so Ct.) See 1.44.14–27 and notes, especially notes to verse 16. On the story of the churning of the ocean, see 6.12.22; 6.40.29; 6.41.17; 6.53.23; 6.105.19; and notes. This interpretation is no doubt driven by the fact that D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read ākṛṣyamāṇasya mathnataḥ, "[a yantra] being dragged [and] churned," for āveṣṭyamānasya mahataḥ, "of a great [yantra] being turned." Cv and Cg, however, take the yantra in question to refer to a press [oil press—Cg] (tilapīḍanayantrasya—so Cg). Cg further glosses "powerful [men] (balavadbhiḥ)" for dānavaiḥ, presumably understanding the term as a metaphor in the sense of "titans, etc." Cm has a different machine in mind, glossing, "a potter's wheel [literally, 'pot-machine,'] (ghaṭayantrasya)," which he understands is being spun by dānavas. Compare 6.3.11; 6.30.26; 6.49.11; and notes.

20. D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct omit this verse as do translations that follow his text. GPP reads the verse, in brackets and unnumbered, between 6.92.23 and 24.

"petrified with terror" bhayatrastāḥ: Literally, "frightened with fear."

"hid themselves" saṃnililyire: According to Cg, the only commentator to remark on this verse, the rākṣasas hide behind pillars, etc. (stambhādivyavahitāḥ).

21. "The rākṣasas did not dare come near" rākṣasā nopacakramuḥ: Literally, "the rākṣasas did not approach."

"intent upon devouring everything in the world" carācaracikhādiṣum: Literally, "wishing to eat what moves and what does not move." The compound carācara-, "moving and unmoving," is a common epic kenning for the entire contents of the world, which is thus frequently characterized as sacarācara, "with its moving and unmoving [contents]." Cg glosses the desiderative adjective -cikhādiṣum, "wishing to eat," as "wishing to destroy (saṃhartum icchum)."

22. "in their midst" rakṣasāṃ madhye: Literally, "in the midst of the rākṣasas."

23. "all-but-impossible" duścaram: Literally, "hard to practice." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead paramam, "supreme, greatest."

"time after time" teṣu teṣv avakāśeṣu: Literally, "on occasion after occasion." We follow the interpretation of Cg, Cr, and Ct (first alternative), who understand the reference to be to the moments of completion of Rāvaṇa's courses of austerities (tat-tattapaḥsamāptisamayeṣu). Ck and, following him, Ct (second alternative), however, understand the reference to be to the various places at which Rāvaṇa has propitiated Brahmā (svāyaṃbhuvasthānaviṣayeṣu). This interpretation is represented only in the translation of Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 128), who renders, "or in questo or in quel luogo."

25. "by vajra or javelin" vajraśaktibhiḥ: Ñ,V1,2,B,D1–3,6,9–11,13,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vajramuṣṭibhiḥ. Translations that follow the texts and printed editions of Ct understand this either to mean "by those holding the thunderbolt or vajra in their fists" or "by those having adamantine fists." A few of these manuscripts (D2,6,T2,3) and the edition of Gorresio read the singular -muṣṭinā. This is rendered by Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 128) as "colui che impugna il fulmine (Indra)."

"in any of my battles with the gods and asuras" devāsuravimardeṣu: The context indicates that we are not to understand the compound in its usual sense of "in the battles between the gods and asuras" but rather in reference to Rāvaṇa's conflicts with both of them. This is made explicit by Cr (mayā saha devāsurayor yuddheṣu).

26. "even Indra, smasher of citadels himself" sākṣād api puraṃdaraḥ: Literally, "even the smasher of citadels in person." Cr takes the compound not in its sense as a standard epithet but, literally, as "even [some]one capable of smashing citadels (puradāraṇasamārtho 'pi)."

"equipped with that armor" tena . . . saṃyuktam: Literally, "joined with that." We follow Cv, Cg, and Cs in taking the pronoun to refer to the armor mentioned in the previous verse. Cr, on the other hand, reads it more broadly, glossing, "by reason of having attained fearlessness (abhayaprāptihetunā)."

"this very day" adya . . . adya: Literally, "today . . . today." The commentators are concerned about the apparent redundancy. Ct claims that the redundancy is not a fault, since it is part of an expression of anger (kruddhoktitvād adyety asya punar uktir na doṣāya). Other commentaries try to avoid the repetition by supplying a negative particle, thus turning the second half of the verse into a separate sentence.

27–28. With some hesitation we follow the suggestion of Cg in construing the two verses as a single syntactical unit. We do so because verse 27 by itself is technically a relative clause, beginning as it does with the relative pronoun yat, "which." Our hesitation stems from the fact that the verses repeat two words (or synonyms), as indicated below.

"for the slaughter of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa" rāmalakṣmaṇayor eva vadhāya: Cm, in keeping with his project of denying any reference to harm or hostility directed toward the avatāras, claims that the verse has an inner meaning, so that we should understand that Rāvaṇa is saying that he intends to kill only the monkeys in the battle with Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa (vastutas tu rāmalakṣmaṇayoḥ saṃbandhyāhave vadhāya vānarāṇām iti śeṣaḥ).

"trumpets" tūrya-: See 6.24.25 and note. Cf. 6.116.34.

"great" mahat . . . mahat: We have collapsed the two adjectives for the sake of style. D5–7,9–11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read mama, "mine," for the second occurrence of the word in 28b.

"bow and arrows that were given" śaśaraṃ kārmukaṃ . . . dattam . . . dhanuḥ: Literally, "the bow together with arrows . . . given . . . the bow."

"during my battles with the gods and asuras" devāsuravimardeṣu: See note to verse 25 above. We follow the suggestion of Cg, who understands that the bow was given to Rāvaṇa at the time of his battles with the gods and asuras (vimardakāle).

"who was pleased with me" abhiprasannena: Literally, "who was pleased."

29. This verse is a close paraphrase of GPP 6.92.12 (= VSP and KK 6.93.20). See note to verse 16 above, 1790*, following line 6: "Tormented by the killing of his son and in the grip of his rage, cruel Rāvaṇa, reflecting in his mind, decided upon the slaughter of Vaidehī."

"heroic" śūraḥ: V3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead krūraḥ, "cruel."

"resolved to kill Sītā" sītāṃ hantuṃ vyavasyata: Cm, unwilling as always to contemplate any real hostility toward Sītā on Rāvaṇa's part, claims that the inner meaning of the verse is to be derived from taking the root $\sqrt{han}$, normally, "to kill or strike," in its lexically sanctioned sense of "to go." Thus, he argues that Rāvaṇa has merely resolved to go and see Sītā. (vastutas tu sītāṃ hantuṃ gantum. sītādarśanārthaṃ gantuṃ vyavasyatety arthaḥ. hanahiṃsāgatyor iti dhātuḥ.) Interestingly, the variation in wording, "decided upon the slaughter of Vaidehī (vaidehyā rocayad vadham)," of the first occurrence of this verse in the vulgate leads Cm to provide a very different version of its inner meaning. There (at VSP 6.93.20) he explains that Rāvaṇa, having realized in his mind that his own death will be caused by Vaidehī and that Rāma will shortly kill him, resolves upon his own destruction. In his desire to die by Rāma's hand, he then feigns anger so as to conceal from the other rākṣasas that he has decided that their entire race is to be annihilated. (vastutas tu rāvaṇo vaidehyā hetubhūtayā vadhaṃ svavadhaṃ buddhyā samīkṣyetaḥparaṃ rāmo mām avaśyaṃ vadhiṣyatīti niścityety arthaḥ. arocayat svavadham ity anuṣaṅgaḥ. rāvaṇakrodhāveśasya sītāhananodyogasya cāyam āśayaḥ svasya rāmahastavadhecchayā sakalarākṣasakulanāśaṃ matam itītararākṣasānām aprakaṭanāya krodhāveśādikam ity arthaḥ.) See notes to 6.27.9; 6.81.4; and 6.91.19. Cf. notes to 6.27.4 and 6.48.38.

30. "The fearsome rākṣasa" sughoraḥ: Literally, "the fearsome one." Ct and Cg believe, respectively, that it is Rāvaṇa's mind (cittam) and nature (prakṛtiḥ) that are fearsome.

"fearsome-looking" ghoradarśanān: Ñ,B2,3,D9–11,G1,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead the nominative singular, ghoradarśanaḥ, which would then modify Rāvaṇa rather than the rākṣasas.

"who were murmuring dejectedly" dīnasvarān: Literally, "having dejected sounds or voices." We, like Cr and many translators, understand the compound to be a bahuvrīhi modifying niśācarān, "night-roaming [rākṣasas]." Somewhat less plausibly it is possible to take the compound as a simple karmadhāraya and read it to mean that Rāvaṇa is uttering (uvāca) dejected sounds. This rendering is found in Dutt (1893, p. 1428).

31. "A short time ago" tatra: Literally, "there." We follow Ck and Ct, who gloss, "at that time (tasmin kāle)."

"my beloved son" vatsena: Literally, "by my dear child."

"an apparition of a murdered woman" kiṃcid eva hatam: Literally, "something slain." We follow Cg, who glosses, "something false (kiṃcid alīkam)." The reference is to Indrajit's illusory slaying of Sītā at sarga 68.

32. "I shall murder Vaidehī, so devoted to that false kshatriya!" vaidehīṃ nāśayiṣyāmi kṣatrabandhum anuvratām: Literally, "I shall destroy Vaidehī, who is devoted to that relative of the kshatriyas." The term bandhu, "a kinsman, relation," is frequently used at the end of compounds in the sense of "in name only." Cm, who typically resists all threats toward and criticism of Rāma and Sītā, offers here one of his "inner readings (vastutas tu)." He takes the pejorative term "false kshatriya (kṣatrabandhum)" in its literal sense of "a friend or kinsman of the kshatriyas," glossing, "Rāma, the best friend of the kshatriyas." He then argues that Rāvaṇa merely wants to upset Sītā slightly, even though he finds doing so distasteful, in order to satisfy the other rākṣasas (reading pāda b, "just to please myself I shall [kariṣye priyam ātmanaḥ]," as "though it displeases me [kariṣye 'priyam ātmanaḥ]"). (ahaṃ kṣatrabandhuṃ kṣatrāṇāṃ bandhuṃ paramāptaṃ rāmam anuvratāṃ vaidehīṃ tathyaṃ [v.l. for satyaṃ] yathā tathā nāśayiṣyāmi yadi tad idam ātmano 'priyam eva syād ataḥ kariṣya itararākṣasasantoṣārthaṃ tasyāḥ kiṃcid duḥkham iti śeṣaḥ.)

33–34. "seized his . . . sword . . . and drew it" uddhṛtya . . . khaḍgam ādāya: Literally, "having drawn . . . having taken up [his] sword." The syntax of the two verses, which, as Cv notes, must be read together, is somewhat tortured. To render the verse plausibly in English, we have in effect reversed the two gerunds, one of which is in pāda a of verse 33 and the other in pāda c of verse 34. Ñ2,V,B,D5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read utplutya, "having leapt up," for uddhṛtya, "having drawn." No commentator consulted mentions this variant. Among the translators consulted, only Pagani (1999, p. 1123) appears to render it, translating, "il s'élança d'un bond rapide."

"magnificent" guṇasampannam: Literally, "endowed with virtues or qualities." Cg, taking guṇa in its sense of "string, cord," understands, "adorned with garlands (mālyālaṃkṛtam)."

"which shone like a cloudless sky" vimalāmbaravarcasam: Literally, "which had the brilliance of a clear or spotless sky." Cr reads the compound as a bahuvrīhi in the sense of "possessing a spotless sheath and brilliance (vimalāmbaraṃ kośo varcas ca yasya tam)."

"his mind reeling with grief" bhṛśam ākulacetanaḥ: Literally, "his mind powerfully agitated."

"from the assembly hall" sabhāyāḥ: V2,3,B1,4,D5,7,9–11,T1,G2,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead sabhāryaḥ, "with his wife or wives."

35. "rushing forth" vrajantam: " Literally, "going, proceeding."

"the rāksasas" rākṣasāḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the redundant, accusative singular, rākṣasam, which then modifies Rāvaṇa.

"roared like lions" siṃhanādaṃ pracakruśuḥ: Literally, "they cried a lion's roar." We understand with Ck and Ct that the rākṣasas, seeing their lord come forth [apparently to battle], utter a cry that is reminiscent of a lion's roar. Ck further specifies that this cry is appropriate to the time of preparation for battle, etc. (siṃhanādo nāma yuddhādisajjāhakālinaḥ). Ct indicates that we should supply the word "ministers" as the subject of the verb (sacivā iti śeṣaḥ). Cr, on the other hand, understands siṃhanādam to be a bahuvrīhi compound modifying the rākṣasa, i.e., Rāvaṇa. The idea, then, is that "seeing Rāvaṇa emerge roaring like a lion, the rākṣasas cry out."

"they huddled together" anyonyam āśliṣya: Literally, "having embraced one another."

36. "Rāvaṇa" enam: Literally, "him."

"the four guardians of the world" lokapālā hi catvāraḥ: Normally there are eight guardians of the principal and intermediate quarters: Indra, east; Agni, southeast; Yama, south; Nairṛta, southwest; Varuṇa, west; Vāyu, northwest; Kubera, north; and Īśa, northeast. See note to verse 10. The reference here, no doubt, is to the guardians of the four cardinal directions.

Following verse 36, Ñ,V,B2–4,D5–7,9–11,13,S insert a passage of two lines [1796*]: "Rāvaṇa takes and enjoys the finest things in the three worlds. Indeed, he has no equal on earth in valor and might."

37. "went storming toward" abhidudrāva: Literally, "he ran toward."

38. "concerned for his welfare" hitabuddhibhiḥ: Literally, "having beneficial thoughts or thoughts for [his] welfare."

"the angry planet . . . toward Rohiṇī" saṃkruddhaḥ . . . graho rohiṇīm: We agree with Ck, Ct, and Cg, who understand the reference to be to the inauspicious planet Mars (aṅgārika—Cg; kuja—Ct, Ck), which, in this simile, would be entering or occluding the fourth nakṣatra, or lunar mansion, Rohiṇī. Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 129), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 271), and Pagani (1999, p. 1123) take the term graha, "planet," in its common meaning as a reference to Rāhu, the demon or principle of the eclipse.

However, we think this is less plausible, since eclipses affect the sun and the moon and not nakṣatras, such as Rohiṇī. Rohiṇī is one of the lunar mansions, either the ninth (MW s.v.), the fourth (Pingree 1978), or the second (Kirfel 1920). The twenty-seven lunar mansions are personified as the moon's wives, and of these Rohiṇī is his favorite (MBh 9.34.40ff.). Compare 5.13.21 and note, where, in a simile involving Sītā, the planet Mars is explicitly said to oppress Rohiṇī. Cf. 5.17.8 and note as well. See note to verses 50–51 below.

40. "not turning back" anivartinam: T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead anuvartinam, "continuing onward."

Following verse 40, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1802*]: "Overcome with misery, Sītā, lamenting, said this."

Northern manuscripts insert or substitute 1801*, in part or in whole, a passage of two lines, which similarly provides an introduction to what is represented there as Sītā's thoughts (rather than words) that follow in verse 41. As the critical text stands, it seems out of keeping with the normal style of the epic in which direct speech or thought is generally explicitly introduced. See Sutherland 1992.

41. "From the way he is racing toward me . . . it is clear . . . is going to kill me" yathā . . . mām . . . samabhidravati . . . / vadhiṣyati . . . mām: Literally, "in which manner he is running toward me, [in that manner] he will kill me."

"as if I had no one to protect me, although, in fact, I do" sanāthām . . . mām anāthām iva: Literally, "me who has a protector, like one who has no protector."

42. "no matter how many times" bahuśaḥ: Literally, "many times."

" 'Be my wife, enjoy yourself!' " bhāryā bhava ramasveti: Literally, "Be a wife. Enjoy." B1,D1–7,9–12,T2,3,G1,2,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cr, Ct, and Ck read instead bhāryā mama (mama bhāryā—D6,T2,3,5) bhavasveti, "be my wife," using the irregular ātmanepada form bhavasva, "[you] be." Cr, wishing to avoid the sense that Rāvaṇa has made any direct sexual solicitation of Sītā, reads the nominative singular bhāryā, "wife," as the accusative plural, bhāryāḥ (with loss of visarga before a voiced consonant), and takes bhavasva in the sense of "[you] obtain." Thus, he understands the line to mean "[you] become an object of reverence to my wives, Mandodarī, etc. (mama bhāryā mandodarīprabhṛtīr bhavasva prāpnuhi tatpūjyātvena tiṣṭhety arthaḥ)."

"I rejected him" pratyākhyāto 'bhavan mayā: D5,7,9–11,T1,G2,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead pratyākhyāto dhruvaṃ mayā, "by me [he] was firmly rejected." In keeping with his interpretation mentioned above, Cr understands that Sītā did not reject Rāvaṇa's advances but rather failed to accept his advice (pratyākhyātas taduktaṃ nāṅgīkṛtam).

43. "because I rejected him as a suitor" anupasthānāt: Literally, "because of non-acceptance." See 6.52.21 and note for a similar use of the term.

"he has given up all hope of winning me" mām . . . nairāśyam āgataḥ: Literally, "he has come to hopelessness [with respect to] me," or so we must read the awkward accusative pronoun mām in pāda a. A few northern manuscripts and the edition of Gorresio read the facilior mamānavasthānāt, "because of my rejection."

"mad passion" -moha-: Literally, "confusion, delusion, infatuation." Here the idea seems to be that Rāvaṇa is essentially out of his mind with unfulfilled passion and so becomes homicidal. An alternative reading would be to take the compound krodha-mohasamāviṣṭaḥ not as "overwhelmed with anger and delusion" but rather as "suffused with delusion because of anger." This idea is apparently rendered in the translations of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 307) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 271). Pagani (1999, p. 1123) understands, "son courroux l'égare."

44. "the ignoble creature" anāryeṇa: Literally, "by the ignoble one."

"Ah! What an evil fate that I should be the cause of the princes' death" aho dhiṅ mannimitto 'yaṃ vināśo rājaputrayoḥ: Literally, "Ah! Alas! The destruction of the king's two sons has me for its cause."

Following 44cd, many, primarily northern, manuscripts insert a passage of six lines [1805*] in which Sītā offers further speculations as to the cause of Rāvaṇa's murderous rage. D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr insert only lines 1 and 2 of 1805*: "For I just now heard a tumultuous shout from the rākṣasas in Laṅkā.[1] It seemed as if many were crying out in great delight."

[1]"For . . . just now . . . a tumultuous shout from the rākṣasas in Laṅkā" sampraty eva hi laṅkāyāṃ rakṣasāṃ tumulaḥ svanaḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead bhairavo hi mahān nādo rākṣasānāṃ śruto mayā, "I heard a great and terrible sound from the rākṣasas."

Following verse 44, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1806*]: "Or, perhaps, having failed to kill Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, the fierce rākṣasa, so evil in his resolve, is going to kill me out of grief for his son."

45. "the advice of Hanumān" hanūmato . . . tad vākyam: Literally, "that speech of Hanumān." The context and the commentators make it clear that Sītā is referring to Hanumān's offer, at 5.35.21–29, to carry her to Rāma on his back.

"seated . . . in my husband's lap" bhartur aṅkagatā satī: For a possible pregnant ambiguity in the use of the term satī, "being," see note to verse 48 below.

"blamelessly" aninditā: Literally, "blameless." Apparently Sītā now thinks better of her earlier rejection of Hanumān's offer of rescue on the grounds that she might incur censure for lack of perfect devotion to her husband should she willingly touch the body of another male (see 5.35.62–63 and notes). D9–11,T1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead anirjitā, "not won back." Ct, no doubt thinking of the sentiment expressed by Sītā at 5.35.64 that it would be more appropriate for Rāma to win her back himself in combat with Rāvaṇa than for her to be rescued by Hanumān, adds the phrase "by Rāma (rāmeṇa)." Cr understands, "not slain by Rāvaṇa (rāvaṇenānihatety arthaḥ)."

47. "she will surely call fondly to mind" saṃsmariṣyati: Literally, "she will recall, call to mind, or remember."

"righteous deeds, and beauty" dharmakāryāṇi rūpaṃ ca: D6,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead dharmakāryānurūpaṃ ca, literally, "conformable to righteous deeds." Cg, the only commentator to remark on this variant, glosses, "conformability to righteous action (dharmakāryānurūpatvam)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 273), the only translator to render this variant, translates, "and his aptness for righteous living (works)."

48. "she will perform his funerary rites" dattvā śrāddham: Literally, "having given śrāddha." Cr understands the term śrāddham adverbially, in the sense of "faithfully offering (śraddhayā yutaṃ yathā bhavati tathā dattvā)," although it is not clear what he takes to be the object of the gerund dattvā, "having given."

"she will surely mount the funeral pyre or hurl herself into the water" agnim ārokṣyate nūnam apo vāpi praveksyati: Literally, "she will surely mount the fire or fire-altar or enter the water." It is not perfectly clear here whether Sītā is envisaging a kind of maternal sahagamana, or ritual death to accompany a beloved person, normally one's husband, or whether she foresees Kausalyā simply committing suicide in her grief and despondency. The use of the verb ā √ruh, "to mount," rather than the usual √viś, "to enter," for entering fire, seems to us to suggest the former. If this is correct, it would appear to be an interesting and unusual variant on the theme of the widow as satī. A number of manuscripts, Ñ2,V,B1,2,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read āvekṣyate, "she will enter," for the critical reading's ārokṣyate, while T2,3 read the variant praveksyate, "she will enter." These variants may represent the tradition's discomfort with the idea of a mother attempting to follow her son in death as if she were his wife. Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,8,12,13 (with minor variants), and the editions of Lahore and Gorresio read prāyaṃ vopagamiṣyati, "or she will fast unto death," for the critical edition's apo vāpi praveksyati, thus envisaging another mode of ritual suicide. Note, of course, that unlike the Mahābhārata, where the practice of sahagamana is not uncommonly referred to, the central narrative of the Rāmāyaṇa shows no examples of the practice. Thus, after the death of Daśaratha and at his funeral at Ayodhyākāṇḍa sargas 59, 60, and 70, there is not even an allusion to the possibility of the widows' mounting his funeral pyre. Note also how the verse is framed between two perhaps intentional plays on the term satī. At verse 45 above, Sītā describes herself as aninditā, "blameless," and describes herself further as "sitting on her husband's lap (bhartur aṅkagatā)." These adjectives are then followed by the term satī. This latter term is ambiguous in this context. It can be read either as a present participle of the root √as, "to be," as we have done in verse 45, or in the more highly charged sense of "a virtuous woman, chaste wife." Then in verse 49, in contrast to the virtuous Sītā and Kausalyā, bitter reference is made to the scheming hunchback Mantharā, who is described as asatī, literally, "an unchaste woman," a term used in the sense of "depraved woman or slut." See S. Goldman 1996.

49. "that . . . slut" asatīṃ: Literally, "an unchaste woman" See note to verse 48 above.

"and her wicked scheming" pāpaniścayām: Literally, "her of evil intentions."

"such suffering" idaṃ duḥkham: Literally, "this suffering." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead imaṃ śokam, "this sorrow."

50–51. "the wise rākṣasa Supārśva" supārśvo nāma medhāvī: Literally, "the wise one named Supārśva." Ct claims that Supārśva is another name for the rākṣasa minister Avindhya, supporting this claim by quoting the parallel passage from the Mahābhārata (3.273.27–28), where it is said that Avindhya calms the angry Rāvaṇa, who is on the point of slaying Sītā. Compare 5.35.12–13 and notes and MBh 3.264.55, where Avindhya, too, is called "wise (medhāvī)." At 6.77.9–11, a rākṣasa named Supārśva is listed among those already slain. At 6.25.20, a rākṣasa named Aviddha is mentioned.

"like the constellation Rohiṇī occluded by a hostile planet and so cut off from the moon, her lord" rohiṇīm iva candreṇa vinā grahavaśaṃ gatām: Literally, "like Rohiṇī without the moon, gone to the power of a planet." See note to verse 38 above.

"whose ministers were attempting to restrain him" nivāryamāṇaṃ sacivaiḥ: Literally, "who was being held back by ministers." Ñ1,B2,D7,9,10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the nominative nivāryamāṇaḥ, "being held back," for the critical edition's accusative nivāryamāṇam. According to this reading, as Ct notes, the ministers are trying to prevent Supārśva from speaking inappropriately to Rāvaṇa (sacivair evaṃ vaktum ayogyam iti nivāryamāṇo 'pi).

Following verse 50, Ñ,V,B4,D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1811*], which fleshes out the somewhat elliptical reference to Supārśva in verse 51a: "At that juncture, his wise and honest minister . . ."

52. "How can you . . . even think of killing" kathaṃ nāma . . . hantum icchasi: Literally, "How, indeed, do you wish to kill?"

"ten-necked Rāvaṇa" daśagrīva: Literally, "O ten-necked one."

"the younger brother of Kubera Vaiśravaṇa himself" sākṣād vaiśravaṇānuja: Literally, "O younger brother of Vaiśravaṇa, in person." Ck and Ct note that, by addressing Rāvaṇa in this way, Supārśva is appealing to the fact that he is born in a noble family (anena mahākulaprasūtatvam uktam—so Ct). Cs more explicitly argues that what is suggested here is that unrighteous behavior is improper for someone born in a lineage of seers (ṛṣivaṃśasaṃbhavasyādharmapravṛttir anucitety anena dhvanyate). See, too, 6.4.16 and note.

53. "You have completed your discipleship in vedic knowledge" vedavidyāvratasnātaḥ: Literally, "[you are one who has] completed the vow of vedic knowledge." As Ct, Ck, and Cr suggest, the idea here is that, after completing the vow of celibacy (brahmacarya) that is essential for vedic discipleship, Rāvaṇa was successfully initiated into vedic knowledge and [then] returned home from his guru's house (vedavidyāgrahāpekṣitābrahmacaryavratapūrvaṃ vidyāṃ gṛhītvā snāto gurukulāt samāvṛttaḥ—so Ct).

"you are ever devoted to the proper duties of your rank" svadharmaniratāḥ sadā: The critical reading or a close variant, which is shared by several northern and southern manuscripts (Ñ,V1,B2–4,D4,6,9,M1,2,T2,3), appears to refer to the well-known concept of svadharma associated with the ideology of varṇa, or class duty, according to which each of the four varṇas, or social classes of brahmanical Hinduism, is enjoined to adhere to its own proper occupation. The concept is most famously enunciated at Bhagavadgītā 3.35 (see, too, 18.47). Although this concept is essential to the ritual and social order as articulated in the Rāmāyaṇa, it is rarely mentioned explicitly in the text. This may, in fact, be the only such reference. V2,D5,7,10,11,T1,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead svakarmaniratāḥ, "devoted to your own proper rites or duties." Ck and Ct explained this reading to mean that, after his studentship, Rāvaṇa, "having completed the marriage rite, is now devoted to the various rituals incumbent on the householder, such as the agnihotra and the like (tadanantaraṃ dāragrahaṇapūrvaṃ nityāgnihotrādisvakarmaniratāḥ)." A number of northern manuscripts (Ś,B1,D1–3,8,12,13) and Gorresio's edition similarly avoid explicit reference to svadharma by substituting the pronoun tvam, "you," for sva-, "one's own." The resulting reading means "you who are devoted to dharma."

B1,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read tathā, "and or thus," instead of sadā.

54. "You should spare" pratyavekṣasva: Literally, "you should regard, take care of." Ct understands that Rāvaṇa should spare Sītā until he has first killed Rāma (rāmavadhaparyantam iti śeṣaḥ). Ck thinks that she should be spared for the duration of the time allotted her by Rāvaṇa (yāvat pratijñātakālaparyantam iti śeṣaḥ). Cr, the only commentator to gloss the verb, understands it to mean "look at or gaze at continually (nityaṃ paśya)."

"You . . . upon Rāghava" tvam eva . . . rāghave: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tasminn eva . . . āhave, "upon him, in battle."

55. "your preparations" abhyutthānam: Literally, "arrangements for departure." As the commentators indicate, the reference is to preparation for battle (samarodyogam—Ct, Cr).

"this very day, the fourteenth of the dark fortnight . . . tomorrow on the new moon day" adyaiva kṛṣṇapakṣacaturdaśīm . . . amāvāsyām: Cv, Ck, and Cg take this opportunity to provide a day-by-day summary of the war to this point, starting from the reference to sunset on the full-moon day when Rāma's army ascended Mount Suvela. Here the commentators quote 6.29.17. All three commentators give the following identical chronology of events:

Full-moon night—the ascent of Mount Suvela (sarga 29).

Day 1 (of the dark half)—the commencement of hostilities; that night Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are both bound by and released from Indrajit's nāgapāśas (sargas 31–35).

Day 2—the slaying of Dhūmrākṣa (sarga 42).

Day 3—the slaying of Vajradaṃṣṭra (notes to sarga 43.1, App. I, No. 26).

Day 4—the slaying of Akampana (sarga 43).

Day 5—the slaying of Prahasta (sarga 46).

Day 6—the breaking of Rāvaṇa's crown (sarga 47).

Day 7—the slaying of Kumbhakarṇa (sarga 55).

Day 8—the slaying of Atikāya, etc. (sarga 59).

Day 9—the renewed battle with Indrajit; night of the ninth, the slaying of Kumbha, Nikumbha, etc. (sargas 63, 64).

Day 10—the slaying of Makarākṣa (sarga 66).

Days 11–13—the battle with and slaying of Indrajit (sargas 73–78).

Cg adds that the real meaning here is that, since [all] the rākṣasas except the core or elite forces of Rāvaṇa and Indrajit have been slaughtered during the two days starting on the ninth and since the killing of Indrajit took the following three days (viz., days 11–13), the advice that Rāvaṇa gird himself up for battle on the fourteenth is appropriate (vastutas tu navamyāṃ yuddhārambhāt tadārabhya dinadvayena rāvaṇendrajinmūlabalavyatiriktarākṣasanibarhaṇād ekādaśīdvādaśītrayodaśībhir indrajidvadha iti caturdaśyām abhyutthānavacanaṃ yujyata eva). See note to 6.4.4. See, too, 6.48.12; 6.96.30; and 6.97.33.

56. "equipped with a chariot" rathī: Literally, "possessing a chariot." Crā understands the term as a synonym for mahārathaḥ, "great chariot-warrior."

"Rāma Dāśarathi" dāśarathiṃ rāmaṃ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the adjective bhīmam, "fearsome, formidable," for rāmam.

"you, sir. . . will . . . win Maithilī" bhavān prāpsyati maithilīm: Literally, "you [respectful] will acquire Maithilī." Since Sītā is already in the physical possession of Rāvaṇa, we follow Cr, who explains: "the meaning is that Maithilī will come to be held in high regard as your wife (bhavadbhāryāpūjyātvena maithilī sthāsyatīty arthaḥ)." Cm, with his theologian's aversion to verses that speak of harm to Rāma or sexual impropriety toward Sītā, offers an inner meaning of the verse according to which Supārśva is really saying: "Having approached Rāma, you will gain both Dāśarathi and Maithilī, that is, once you have been slain in battle, you will become one of their [heavenly] retinue (vastutas tu dāśarathiṃ prati gatvā dāśarathiṃ maithilīṃ bhavān prāpsyati raṇe hataḥ saṃs tayoḥ pārṣadatāṃ prāpsyatīty arthaḥ)."

57. The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Sarga 81

1. "snarling" śvasan: Literally, "breathing, panting, or sighing."

2. "who stood with their hands cupped in reverence" prāñjalīn: The editor's choice of this reading is virtually impossible to justify on textual grounds. All but two of the manuscripts collated for the critical edition as well as the texts of most commentators and printed editions read prāñjaliḥ, which makes Rāvaṇa the one cupping his hands in reverence or supplication. Only Ñ2,D1, and the Lahore edition (6.94.2) read with the critical edition. Crā, alone among the commentators, notes the majority reading as a variant, indicating, one assumes, that he reads with the critical edition.

Commentators explain the seeming inversion of hierarchy by remarking either that Rāvaṇa, having been placed in the most desperate situation, shows deference to his surviving officers in order to get them to face battle once again (paramāpadaḥ prāptyāvaśiṣṭānāṃ yuddhaunmukhyārthaṃ namaskāraṃ karotīty āśayaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly) or simply that he wants to supplicate them (anunayārtham—so Cg). Perhaps the critical editors have exercised higher criticism in order to avoid having a ruler appear to supplicate his inferiors.

3. "by the entire cavalry and elephant corps" sarveṇa hastyaśvena: Ck and Ct understand that the officers are to leave behind not even a single warrior in any of the four divisions of the army (ekam api hastyaśvarathapādātam atyaktvety arthaḥ—so Ct). See note to 6.3.24.

"accompanied" upaśobhitāḥ: Literally, "adorned, made splendid." Pagani (1999, p. 1125) appears to misread the nominative adjective, taking it in its etymological sense as a modifier of the instrumental "by chariot divisions (rathasaṃghaiḥ)." She renders, "avec vos escadrons de chars éclatants."

"infantry" pādātaiḥ: Literally, "by foot soldiers." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the redundant hastyaśvaiḥ, "with cavalry and elephant corps." Translations that follow the texts and printed editions of Ct struggle with the redundancy. They tend to omit the second reference to the cavalry and elephant corps. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 309), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 272), attempts a solution by repeating the reference to horses but omitting the second mention of elephants.

4. "Exerting yourselves" prahṛṣṭāḥ: Literally, "excited, delighted." D5,6,T1,2,G3, M3, the texts and printed editions of Cg, and the text of Gita Press read instead varṣantaḥ, "showering."

"you must isolate Rāma, surround him" ekaṃ rāmaṃ parikṣipya: Literally, "having surrounded Rāma alone."

"you must . . . slay him" hantum arhatha: In keeping with his ongoing theological reading of the poem, Cm interprets pari √kṣip, "to surround," in the sense of "to meet or join"; the adjective ekam, "alone," in the sense of "principal, outstanding (mukhyam)"; and the verbal root √han, "strike, kill," in the sense of "go or go to." Thus, for him, the inner meaning (vāstavārtha) of this verse and the next is that the rākṣasa troops are to meet the leader, Rāma, and go to him in the battle. On the other hand, should Rāma be wounded by arrows in battle, Rāvaṇa himself will go to him the following day as the people look on. (ekaṃ rāmam ityādi ślokadvayasya vāstavārthas tu śarān varṣanto yūyaṃ parikṣipya militvaikaṃ mukhyaṃ rāmaṃ samare hantuṃ gantum arhatheti sambandhaḥ. atha bhavadbhir vā śarair mahāraṇe bhinnagātraṃ rāmaṃ lokasya paśyato 'haṃ śvo nihantā gantā gamiṣyāmīty arthaḥ.) See notes to 6.27.4 and 6.80.29. On the use of the root $\sqrt{han}$ in the sense of $\sqrt{gam}$, see 6.27.9. Cf. note to 6.48.38.

5. "Otherwise" athavā: The idea here, as the commentators point out, is that Rāvaṇa will act in the event that his warriors are unable to dispatch Rāma (adya rāmahananāsaṃbhave bhavadbhir adya bhinnagātraṃ śvo nihantāsmi—so Ct). See the previous note for Cm's alternative reading.

6. "swiftly" śīghram: Ñ2,V2,3,B2,D5,7,9–11,T1,G1,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead the adjective śīghraiḥ for the critical edition's adverb. In this reading, the adjective must modify rathaiḥ, "chariot."

"by . . . and columns of elephants" nāgānīkaiś ca: Ñ2,V1,3,D1,6,9–11,M3, the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators, and Gorresio's edition read nānā-, "various," for nāga-, "elephants," yielding the sense "and with troops of various kinds."

Following verse 6, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of three lines [1825*]: "They all hurled lethal iron clubs, spears, arrows, swords, and battle-axes at the monkeys[1–2], and the monkeys hurled trees and boulders at the rākṣasas.[3]"

For some reason, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 274) does not translate lines 1–2.

7. "at sunrise" sūryasyodayanaṃ prati: Ct, apparently followed by Cr, notes that the reference is to daybreak on the fourteenth day of the battle [and of the bright half of Āśvina]. Ct goes on to note that we are to understand that Rāvaṇa makes his abortive attack on Sītā in the closing portion of the night of the thirteenth. (caturdaśīsūryodayam ārabhyety arthaḥ. trayodaśīrātriśeṣe rāvaṇasya sītāsamīpagamana iti bodhyam.) See note to 6.4.4.

8. "various types of clubs, darts, swords, and battle-axes" gadābhir vicitrābhiḥ prāsaiḥ khaḍgaiḥ paraśvadhaiḥ: Cv, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cs all note the seeming inconsistency in the apparent ascription of formal weapons to the monkeys, who, it is to be recalled, almost invariably fight only with trees and rocks as well as their teeth, claws, fists, etc. The commentators generally suggest one of two explanations for this departure. According to the first, the monkeys seize these weapons from the hands of their rākṣasa foes (yady api vānarāṇāṃ gadādyāyudhābhāvas tathāpi rākṣasahastebhya ācchidya gṛhītais tais teṣāṃ yuddhasaṃbhava iti bodhyam—so Ct). Cg offers a second possibility: by metonymy (upalakṣaṇa), the names of the weapons given can also designate trees and boulders (anyonyaṃ jaghnur ity atra śilāvṛkṣāṇām apy upalakṣaṇam).

Following verse 8, D5,7,9–11,T1,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of two lines [1830*]: "As the battle progressed in this fashion, the huge dust cloud that was raised[1] was made to settle by the torrents of blood gushing from the rākṣasas and the monkeys.[2]"

[1]"that was raised" uddhūtam: D7,10,11,M2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead hy adbhutam, "wondrous."

[2]"by the torrents of blood gushing from the rākṣasas and the monkeys" rakṣasāṃ vānarāṇāṃ ca . . . śoṇitaviśravaiḥ: Literally, "by the blood flows of the rākṣasas and the monkeys."

9. This type of epic metaphor is known to the Mahābhārata and occurs earlier in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. See 6.46.25–28 and notes for a much more elaborate metaphor of battle as a river.

"carrying logjams of corpses" śarīrasaṃghāṭavahāḥ: Literally, "bearing clumps of bodies." The commentators understand saṃghāṭa, "clumps, multitudes," to refer to logjams (kāṣṭhasamūhāḥ—so Ck, Ct) and we are inclined to agree. Cf. 6.33.17 and note.

"war-horses for their fish" vājimatsyāḥ: Ñ,V1,2,B2,4,D6,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead śaramatsyāḥ, "arrows for their fish."

Following verse 9, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1832*]: "Then all the monkeys, drenched in torrents of blood . . ."

10. "those splendid monkeys" vānarendrāḥ: Literally, "the Indras among monkeys." M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead rākṣasānām, "of the rākṣasas."

12. "swarmed about" abhyadhāvanta: Literally, "they ran toward."

"laden with fruit" phalinam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the contextually inapposite patitam, "fallen."

13. "Similarly" tathā: D5–7,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead tadā, "then."

14. "sought refuge with Daśaratha's son Rāma, the refuge of all" śaraṇyaṃ śaraṇaṃ yātā rāmaṃ daśarathātmajam: Cg understands the reference to the monkeys taking refuge with Rāma to indicate that they have no other recourse. The word śaraṇyam here, Cg believes, is used to express Rāma's qualities of compassion, etc. He also suggests that Rāma's name and patronymic are used here with a theological intent. The name "Rāma," he argues, is used to express the hero's status as the Supreme Being, while the epithet "son of Daśaratha" suggests that he is, nonetheless, accessible. (rākṣasair vadhyamānānām ity ākiñcanyānanyagatikatvoktiḥ. śaraṇyaṃ iti dayādyuktiḥ. rāmam iti paratvoktiḥ. daśarathātmajam iti saulabhyoktiḥ.) See 6.13.4 and 6.59.8; compare 6.31.56; 6.47.43; 6.105.16; and notes. See, too, 5.36.26–29.

16. "fearsome" mahāghoram: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the nominative plural mahāghorāḥ, which makes the adjective modify the implied subject "the rākṣasas."

"the rākṣasas could no more approach him than can clouds approach the sun in the heavens" meghāḥ sūryam ivāmbare / nābhijagmuḥ: Literally, "they did not approach [Rāma] like clouds, the sun in the sky." B1,D5–7,10,11,T1, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read adhijagmuḥ for the critical text's abhijagmuḥ. We believe that the context requires that the verb adhi $\sqrt{gam}$ must be taken as a synonym of abhi $\sqrt{gam}$, "to approach," as does Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1761) and, similarly, Dutt (1893, p. 1432; "stand before"). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 310), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 273) and Pagani (1999, p. 1125), however, takes the verb in its other sense of "to know, discern." His understanding of the verse is that the warriors could no more perceive Rāma, once he had entered their ranks, than one could perceive the sun obscured by clouds. He renders, "Lorsqu'il entrait dans leurs rangs comme le soleil dans les nuages, les formidables guerriers . . . ne l'apercevaient pas." The syntax of the verse can in no way support this interpretation. Roussel and his followers may have been influenced by the following verses in which several references are made to Rāma's being imperceptible to his enemies in battle (verses 18–27 below). Northern manuscripts and the editions of Gorresio and Lahore show a variant that is quite similar to the reading of Roussel, Shastri, and Pagani. Quite possibly Roussel was aware of, and perhaps influenced by, the translation of Gorresio. See note to verse 25 below.

17. "all-but-impossible feats of Rāma . . . only after he had accomplished them" kṛtāny eva . . . rāmeṇa . . . rāmasya . . . karmāṇy asukarāṇi: Literally, "the difficult deeds of Rāma actually accomplished by Rāma." The verse is repetitive and slightly enigmatic. Our translation follows the interpretation of all commentators who treat the verse. They understand that, presumably because of Rāma's blinding speed, the rākṣasas can perceive his martial exploits only when they are completed, not while they are actually being performed (karmāṇi rāmeṇa kṛtāny eva dadṛśur na tu kriyamāṇāni—so Ck). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 310), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 273) and Pagani (1999, p. 1126), understands the verse to suggest that the rākṣasas recognized the feats to be, in fact, those of Rāma. He renders, "les . . . exploits . . . ils les reconnaissaient pour ceux de Rāma."

18. "Although he was shaking their vast host and crushing their great chariot-warriors" cālayantaṃ mahānīkaṃ vidhamantaṃ mahārathān: Dutt (1893, p. 1432) has completely misread pādas ab, rendering the entirely erroneous "Except when guiding the huge army or driving the cars, they [could not see Rāma]." We understand the term mahārathān, "great chariot-warriors," as does Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1761), in its most common usage as a bahuvrīhi, describing outstanding chariot-warriors. Other translators understand, "great chariots." See 6.60.3; 6.72.33; 6.80.6; 6.83.8; 6.84.15; and notes. Cf. 6.77.36.

"they could no more see" dadṛśus te na: Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 310), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 273) and Pagani (1999, p. 1126), understands that the rākṣasas did recognize Rāma through his deeds as one might recognize the passage of a violent wind through a forest. Roussel and the others probably have mistakenly read the text's sequence te na, "they [did] not," as the instrumental pronoun tena, "by reason of that." One should note, however, that the text of GPP (6.93.20) actually reads tena, and it is this that may have conditioned Pagani's reading.

19. "through the skill of Rāma . . . him" rāmeṇa . . . rāmam: Literally, "by Rāma . . . Rāma."

"cut to pieces, shattered, scorched with arrows, broken, and afflicted by weapons" chinnaṃ bhinnaṃ śarair dagdhaṃ prabhagnaṃ śastrapīḍitam: Literally, "cut, split, burned by arrows, broken, and afflicted with weapons." Cg is the only commentator who attempts to differentiate these sometimes seemingly synonymous terms. He defines them as follows: "chinna means 'broken into pieces'; bhinna means 'torn apart'; prabhagna means 'fragmented'; śastrapīḍita means 'having darts lodged in their hearts.' (chinnaṃ khaṇḍitam. bhinnaṃ vidāritam. prabhagnaṃ śakalīkṛtam. śastrapīḍitaṃ hṛdayārpitaśalyam.)" See note to 6.2.14.

"so swiftly did he move" śīghrakāriṇam: Literally, "swift acting."

20. "the inner spirit that resides among the objects of sense" indriyārtheṣu tiṣṭhantaṃ bhūtātmānam: The poet appears to use the term bhūtātmānam in its common sense of "the individual soul," as opposed to "the universal spirit (paramātmā)," although some of the commentators offer this latter meaning as an optional interpretation. Ck and Ct gloss, "soul (jīva)," which they understand to be present amid the objects of sense, such as sound, etc., as the one who perceives or experiences them (indriyārthāḥ śabdādiviṣayās teṣu tiṣṭhantam anubhavitṛtvenāvasthitaṃ bhūtātmānaṃ jīvam—so Ct). Cr, who calls the figure "an apt illustration (saddṛṣṭānta), interprets similarly, glossing, "the inner spirit or individual soul (antaryāmin)." Cv understands bhūtātman in the sense of "the supreme or universal spirit (paramātman)," which, through its universal pervasion, is present in subtle form in all sense objects, although it cannot be directly perceived (indriyārtheṣu śabdādiviṣayeṣu tiṣṭhantaṃ bhūtātmānam iva pratyakṣato 'numīyamāneṣu gandhādiṣu guṇeṣu saukṣmyenānuvṛttaṃ prithivyādisvarūpam iva paramātmanaḥ sarvavyāpitayā candanādiviṣayeṣu tiṣṭhantam). Cg offers two interpretations, the second of which is essentially that of Cv. Cg's first interpretation is similar to that of Ck and Ct, except that he provides a slightly different etymology for the term bhūtātman, according to which "bhūta stands for the body, which consists of the five elements (bhūtas), so that the compound means 'the animating spirit of the body,' that is, 'the living spirit' (bhūtātmānaṃ bhūtasya pañcabhūtātmakaśarīrasyātmānaṃ jīvātmānam)." See notes to 6.15.4. Cm offers three explanations:

1) The first is similar to that of Cv. The term bhūtātman refers to the Supreme Spirit, which is present in all bodies as the animating spirit. (indriyārtheṣu tiṣṭhantam indriyaviṣayeṣu prerakatvena śarīreṣv avatiṣṭhantam. bhūtātmānaṃ paramātmānam.)
2) The second is similar to that of Ck and Ct. Cm adds only the idea that the bhūtātman, or "living spirit," can merely be inferred from the fact of its experiencing the objects of sense (tenānubhavenānumīyamānam api bhūtātmānaṃ jīvātmānam).
3) The third is a slight modification of Cv's interpretation. Cm understands bhūtātman to be the Supreme Spirit, which, by virtue of its universal pervasion, is present in subtle form as the underlying consciousness with regard to objects of sense, such as sound, etc. (bhūtātmānaṃ paramātmānaṃ prajā iva paramātmanaḥ sarvavyāpitayā śabdādiviṣayeṣūpādhānacaitanyarūpatayā sūkṣmarūpeṇa tiṣṭhantam).

According to Gorresio, Cl offers two possible explanations of the term bhūtātman, which are found in several of the other commentators. His first gloss is the same as Cr's (antaryāmin), while his second is that of Ck and Ct (jīva). The term inspires Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, pp. 299–300, n. 59) to provide, in a note, a discussion of the Indian tradition's distinction between the vital principle and the principle of consciousness, which he compares to modern (i.e., mid-nineteenth-century) distinctions between biology and psychology. See 6.47.54 and note, where the term is used but where the context lends it a somewhat different connotation.

21–22. "He is slaughtering . . . He is slaughtering . . . he is slaughtering" eṣa hanti . . . eṣa hanti . . . eṣa hanti: Ck and Ct believe that the exclamations or thoughts are articulated, respectively, by the rākṣasas in each of the four divisions of the army mentioned; each group believes that Rāma is attacking only their individual force. (eṣa gajānīkavartī gajānīkam eva hanti nānyam iti gajānīkasthā manyante. evam anye 'pi manyante smety arthaḥ.) See note to 6.3.24, where the four divisions of the traditional Indian army are discussed.

"great chariot-warriors" mahārathān: Here, as elsewhere, some translators take the term to refer to the chariots themselves rather than the warriors. See notes to verse 18 above.

"infantry along with the cavalry" padātīn vājibhiḥ saha: Literally, "foot soldiers along with horses."

"because of their seeming similarity to Rāma, all the rākṣasas began . . . to slaughter one another in battle, slaying those rākṣasas who resembled Rāghava . . ." te rākṣasāḥ sarve rāmasya sadṛśān . . . / anyonyam . . . jaghnuḥ sādṛśyād rāghavasya te: Literally, "all those rākṣasas, because of similarity to Rāghava, killed one another, who resembled Rāma." The verse manages to be both redundant and elliptical at the same time. In and of itself, it is hard to determine what is supposed to be happening here. The following verses, however, make it clear that the rākṣasas are under the delusive spell of Rāma's supernatural weapons and thus mistake one another for Rāma. Our translation follows the suggestion of the commentators who flesh out the elliptical adjective sadṛśān, "similar," by glossing, "rākṣasas appearing to be similar (sadṛśatvena pratīyamānān rākṣasān)." Ct refers to a variant reading for the first half of verse 22 that is unattested in the critical apparatus. This reading attempts to avoid the redundancy by making the rākṣasas appear in the first instance to be similar to Rāvaṇa rather than Rāma. Some northern manuscripts and the editions of Gorresio (6.73.25–26) and Lahore (6.72.25–26ab) attempt to rationalize the situation by substituting a passage of two lines [1839*], stating that, under the influence of Rāma's divine weapons, the rākṣasas see the entire world as consisting of Rāma.

23. "great Rāma . . . him" rāmam . . . mahātmanā: Literally, "Rāma . . . by the great one." Like Cr, and apparently Cg, we understand the instrumental mahātmanā here as the grammatical subject of the participle mohitāḥ, "befuddled," and as referring to Rāma. Cs explicitly indicates that the adjective modifies the weapon. Several of the translations consulted understand in this same way.

"the mighty, divine weapon-spell of the gandharvas" paramāstreṇa gāndharveṇa: This appears to be one of the weapons given to Rāma by Viśvāmitra at 1.26.14 (see notes to that passage as well), where, however, it appears to be described as a sword (asi). There the weapon is also said to "belong to Manu (mānava)," although the critical editors mark this reading as doubtful. A number of northern and southern manuscripts, as well as the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr, read instead mohanam, "confusing, befuddling," which would appear to conform better to the present context. One may also note that Rāma is said to use the mānava weapon, also called śīteṣu, at 1.29.13–17 (see notes to the passage). Interestingly, the weapon there merely stuns or befuddles (mohayitvā) the rākṣasa Mārīca without killing him. Cg indicates that another two of the weapons, the prasvāpana and praśamana, also belong to the gandharvas (see Cg on GPP 1.27.14; see, too, 1.26.15). See 3.24.28 and note.

"they could not see him" na te dadṛśire rāmam: Literally, "they did not see Rāma." See note above for the syntax. Cs believes that, in their befuddlement, the rākṣasas in the various sections of the army are unable to see Rāma even when he is fighting right near them (sainyaikadeśasthā rāmam . . . svasthāne sthitam . . . mohitāḥ santo na dadṛśire).

"even though . . . the army of his foes" arivāhinīm: Literally, "the army of foes." D5,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead api vāhinīm, "even though [burning] the army."

24. "saw a thousand Rāmas" rāmasahasrāṇi . . . paśyanti: Literally, "they see a thousand Rāmas." Ct and Cr understand that the vision of multiple Rāmas is a result of the confusion caused by Rāma's weapon in the previous verse (mohakāryam eva—so Cr). Cg, however, disagrees, saying that the vision of multiplicity, like the inability to see Rāma and the perception of other rākṣasas as similar to him, is not caused by the divine weapon-spell but rather by the rākṣasas' fear of Rāma. In support of this he cites the statement of the rākṣasa Mārīca at 3.37.26 to the effect that, in his terror, he sees a thousand Rāmas (adarśanavat sadṛśadarśanavac cānekatvadarśanaṃ nāstrakṛtaṃ kiṃtu bhūtikṛtam . . . mārīcenāpy uktam api rāmasahasrāṇi bhūtaḥ paśyāmi rāvaṇeti).

Cs cites no fewer than three textual sources that support the possibility of Rāma making himself appear first multiple and then single. The first is a quote he attributes to "Bhagavatpāda" (Madhva?) according to which the hero (presumably Rāma) was visible in all directions as he struck [his enemies]. (uktaṃ ca bhagavatpādaiḥ—sa eva sarvatra ca dṛśyamāno vidikṣu dikṣu prajaghāna sarvaśa iti punaḥ kṣaṇāntara ekam eva paśyanti.) The second is a passage from the Saṃgraharāmāyaṇa of Śrīnārāyaṇapaṇḍitācārya, in which Rāma manifests himself in a single form, although he truly possesses the universal form (viśvarūpa). (uktaṃ ca saṃgraharāmāyaṇe 'pāṅgamātreṇa jaganniyantā nanv ekarūpo 'pi ripūn nihanyāt. svaiśvaryam evaṃ ca nidarśayan hi sa viśvarūpo 'kṛta viśvarūpam. ityādyārabhyaikīcakārātha sa rāmadevo dīpābhimānī hi yathāgnideva ity antena.) Finally, Cs cites a passage from the Rāmopākhyāna (MBh 3.274.5–7) in which Rāvaṇa magically makes multiple images of himself and of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. Cs notes that this passage does not contradict the present one. (yat tu bhārate māyāvī cāsṛjan māyāṃ rāvaṇo rākṣasādhipaḥ. atha bhūyo 'pi māyāṃ sa vyadadhād rākṣasādhipa ityādinā rāvaṇamāyayānekarākṣasarāmalakṣmaṇarūpanirmāṇakathanaṃ tadaviruddham ity atrāpi grāhyam.) The idea here appears to be that, if Rāvaṇa is able to magically re-create himself, so, too, can Rāma.

25. "tip" koṭim: As is clear from the syntax, as well as from the comments of Ck, Ct, and Cr, the reference here is to the tip or end of a bow (dhanuṣkoṭim—Ct). Three of the translators consulted, however, Gorresio, Roussel, and Shastri, take the term in its sense of a crore, or ten million. They understand that the rākṣasas see Rāma's bow as multiple. This reading cannot be sustained on the basis of the grammar. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 274), as usual, simply translates the version of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 310). As noted above, at verse 16, it appears likely that Roussel himself was influenced by Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 134).

"whirling about like a circle of blazing fire" bhramantīm . . . alātacakrapratimām: Literally, "[a tip] that was like the circle of a firebrand whirling about." The commentators are divided in their understanding of the image represented here. Ck and Ct understand that the golden tip of Rāma's bow appears to make a circle because of the rapidity with which it is being drawn back to his ear (ākarṇavegato 'navasthitam . . . svarṇamayīm . . . dhanuṣkoṭiṃ vegavaśād alātacakrapratimāṃ dadṛśuḥ). Cm, however, understands that the illusion is a result of Rāma's circular movements [in battle] (rāmasya maṇḍalākāragativiśeṣeṣu bhramantīm ata evālātacakrapratimāṃ kārmukakoṭiṃ dadṛśuḥ). Cg quotes the opinion of Cm, attributing it to "some [authorities] (kecit)," but offers his own opinion that the illusion derives from the incessant drawing of the bowstring. He goes on to argue that the image suggested is that of an apparent circle created by the incessant whirling about of a blazing piece of wood through the phenomenon of the persistence of vision. (nirantarajyākarṣaṇād iti vayam. alātacakrapratimāṃ nirjvālaṃ kāṣṭhaṃ nirantarabhramaṇenāntarālāgrahaṇāc cakratvena pratīyamānam ivety arthaḥ.)

26–27. Cg, alone among the commentators, attempts to lend a theological coloring to the metaphor by superimposing Viṣṇu's iconic discus, Sudarśana, upon the common image of the wheel of time (kālacakra). He also attempts to provide a rationale for each of the elements of the extended metaphor. (atha tatra samarasamaye maṇḍalīkṛtakārmukaṃ rāmaṃ sakalaripunighātisudarśanatvena rūpayati.)

"the sound of his bowstring striking his armguard for its rumbling" jyāghoṣatalanirghoṣam: We understand the compound as a paranipāta for jyātalaghoṣanirghoṣam, "having the sound of bowstring and armguard for its sound." The commentators read it as a dvandva, understanding: "The armguard (tala) refers to the place where the string strikes the bow. The word 'armguard (tala)' indicates the sound of the armguard (tala). The bow, then, has for its sound the sounds of both the bowstring and the armguard. (talaṃ jyāghātasthalam. talaśabdena talaghoṣo lakṣyate. jyāghoṣatalaghoṣau nirghoṣo yasya tat—so Cm)." See notes to 6.66.23; 6.75.25; 6.76.2,24; 6.77.31 (1701*); and 6.88.58.

"his qualities of blazing energy and mental brilliance for its radiance" tejobuddhiguṇaprabham: Commentators differ as to how to interpret and analyze this compound. Ck and Ct understand tejaḥ-, "blazing energy," as "courage (pratāpaḥ)"; -buddhi-, "mental brilliance," as "knowledge (jñānam)"; and take the term -guṇa- to refer to those two qualities or virtues. Cr reads the compound similarly, without glossing the first two members. Cm understands similarly but glosses tejaḥ- as "bodily splendor or beauty (śarīrakāntiḥ)." Cg reads the compound somewhat differently from the other commentators. He glosses tejaḥ- as "courage, valor (parākramaḥ)." But through a complex use of metonymy he argues that the term -buddhi-, "intellect," actually refers to the axle or pivot point of a wheel (akṣapradeśaḥ). He then understands -guṇa- to mean "bodily splendor or beauty (śarīrakāntiḥ)."

"the power of his divine weapon-spell for its sharp edge" divyāstraguṇaparyantam: Literally, "having the qualities of a divine astra for its limit. We follow the commentators in understanding the term -guṇa- here in the sense of "power, greatness, etc." They gloss vaibhavam (Ck, Ct), aiśvaryam (Cr), and śaktiḥ or māhātmyam (Cg, Cm). See Introduction, p. 112.

28–30. Several of the commentators, notably Cv, Ck, Cm, Cg, and Ct, spend considerable time attempting to provide the exact and very large numbers of the forces in the rākṣasa army, basing their calculations on the definitions of the different military units given in the Amarakośa (2.8.81). After attempting to enumerate precisely the various rākṣasa forces, Cg suggests that the inclusion of such adjectives as "swift as the wind (vātaraṃhasām)" indicates that there are innumerable chariots, elephants, horses, and infantry over and above those whose numbers are specified. (vātaraṃhasām ityādiviśeṣaṇamahimnā tadbhinnā rathagajaturagapadātayo 'saṃkhyeyā iti bhāvaḥ.) See, too, Dikshitar 1944, pp. 198–99.

"in the eighth part of a day" divasasyāṣṭame bhāge: The period of time referred to here could be one yāma, or "watch," that is, a period of three hours, and thus one-eighth of a twenty-four-hour day. On the other hand, some of the commentators offer different interpretations. Ck believes that the reference is to a period of two muhūrtas, i.e., ninety-six minutes (muhūrtadvayena). Ct concurs but specifies that these are the two closing muhūrtas of the fourteenth day of the lunar fortnight (caturdaśīsaṃbandhyantyamuhūrtadvayena). Cv similarly notes that, with the destruction of Rāvaṇa's core army, the fourteenth day [of the battle] has been completed (mūlabalavadhena caturdaśam ahaḥ samāptam). Cm and Cg understand that the period is two muhūrtas (four ghaṭikās—so Cg) decreased by one-quarter [of a ghaṭikā], in other words, ninety-six minutes less six (pādonaghaṭikācatuṣṭaye). This calculation yields a period of ninety minutes, which corresponds to the eighth part of a twelve-hour tropical day. See note to 6.4.4.

31. "remnants" hataśeṣāḥ: See 6.42.36; 6.82.4; and notes.

32. "the playground" ākrīḍabhūmiḥ: Cg, who reads the variant ākrīḍam iva, understands the term here to refer to the cremation ground, which is, after all, one of the places where Rudra/Śiva disports himself. Cg bases his interpretation on a passage, which he indicates was given earlier, to the effect that "the citadel of Laṅkā will soon resemble a cremation ground (acireṇa purī laṅkā śmaśānasadṛśī bhaved iti pūrvokteḥ). See 5.24.24 (GPP 5.26.22). Cf., too, 6.82.20 and note.

"wielder of the Pināka" *pināki*naḥ: Ś,B1,D1–4,6–12,T2,3,G2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead mahātmanaḥ (Ś,D8,12,M3—[su]mahātmanaḥ), "of the [very] great one." Cg, the only commentator to remark on this reading, understands the epithet to refer not to Rudra but to Rāma, in which case the verse would mean that Rāma's battlefield resembled Rudra's playground.

34. "the power of this divine weapon-spell" etad astrabalaṃ divyam: Literally, "this divine power of the astra." The reference, of course, is to the great gāndharva weapon-spell, named in verse 23 above, with which Rāma has accomplished his decimation of the rākṣasa army.

"belongs only to me and three-eyed Śiva" mama vā tryambakasya vā: Literally, "is mine or Tryambaka's." Cg believes that Rāma makes this assertion to dispel any anticipation that he is employing the kind of magic illusion used by the rākṣasas, an anticipation that might arise from his virtually instantaneous destruction of the rākṣasa forces (kṣaṇenānena rakṣaḥpratikṣepajanitāṃ māyāvittvaśaṅkāṃ vārayati). Cg also indicates that Tryambaka would possess this power at the time of [universal] destruction (saṃhārakāle 'stīti śeṣaḥ). Ct believes that, in mentioning that this power belongs to himself and Śiva alone, Rāma is suggesting that he is, in fact, Viṣṇu (anena svasya viṣṇutvaṃ sūcitam). See 6.66.6 and note.

Following 34ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1849*], which extends Rāma's audience: "the righteous one [addressed Sugrīva], Vibhīṣaṇa, the monkey Hanumān, the foremost of tawny monkeys Jāmbavān, Mainda, and Dvivida."

35. "the rākṣasa host" rākṣasavāhinīṃ tu: D7,9–11,G1,2,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the hypermetric rākṣasarājavāhinīm, "the host of the rākṣasa king."

"who had conquered all fatigue and who was the equal of Śakra in the use of weapons and divine weapon-spells" śakrasamaḥ . . . astreṣu śastreṣu jitaklamaś ca: Literally, "the equal of Śakra in the use of weapons and astras and who had conquered fatigue." Cr reads the adjective jitaklamaḥ, "having conquered fatigue," closely with the locatives referring to the divine weapon-spells and the weapons (astreṣu and śastreṣu). He therefore seems to understand the verse to mean that Rāma was unwearied in the use of these weapons. This interpretation has been followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 276) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1763). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 311), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 275) and Pagani (1999, p. 1127), understands that Rāma is simply standing amid the fallen weapons.

"was praised by the . . . hosts of the gods" saṃstūyate devagaṇaiḥ: Literally, "is praised by the hosts of the gods." Ct and Ck add the particle sma to indicate that the present tense is to be read here as the past. Cg, however, believes that the poet has deliberately used the present to indicate that the uninterrupted praise of Rāma goes on even until today (saṃstūyata iti vartamānanirdeśena stuter adyāpy avichinnatvam ucyate).

The meter is upajāti.

1–3. "Thousands of war-elephants and battle-steeds with their riders" tāni nāgasahasrāṇi sārohāṇāṃ ca vājinām: Literally, "those thousands of elephants and of horses with their riders." D5,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read tāni, "those," for nāga-, "elephants," which results in the sequence tāni tāni, "those various." This reading makes no explicit reference to the elephants, which are mentioned throughout the preceding sarga. Cg seeks to remedy this omission by arguing that the term vājin, "battle-steed, horse," whose underlying meaning is "swift or feathered one," refers here through upalakṣaṇa (metonymy) to the elephants as well.

V3,D6,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the nominative/accusative plural sārohāṇi for the critical edition's genitive plural sārohāṇām. This reading assigns the riders to the elephants rather than the horses.

"sharp" tīkṣṇaiḥ: Ñ2,V,B,D1–3,6,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead, dīptaiḥ, "blazing, burning."

4. "When . . . had seen what had happened and . . . had heard about it" dṛṣṭvā śrutvā ca: Literally, "having seen and having heard." Several of the commentators suggest that the verse should be construed with the three preceding verses, taking the participle nihatāni, "slaughtered" from 3a as the object of the two gerunds. The syntax would thus be "having seen and heard that the [rākṣasas, etc.] had been slaughtered . . ." The poet's idea in using the two gerunds is probably to distinguish the survivors of the battle, who had actually witnessed the destruction of the army, from the women who had merely heard about it. Ct and Ck seem to understand that it is the elderly rakṣasa males who actually see the troops slaughtered by Rāma while the collectivity of those who are old, have survived the battle, women, and children hear about it (rāmeṇa hatāni dṛṣṭvā vṛddhās tu śrutvā hataśeṣā bālavṛddhā niśācarā rākṣasyaś ca).

"the remnants of the night-roaming rākṣasa troops" hataśeṣā niśācarāḥ: Literally, "night-roamers who were left over from the slain." We have added the word "troops" to make it clear that the reference is to the battle survivors mentioned in 6.81.31 above. Ct and Ck understand the term hataśeṣāḥ, "left over from the slain," to refer to those rākṣasas who were either too young or too old to have participated in the battle (see note above). Cm, on the other hand, understands that hataśeṣāḥ refers to the surviving troops who have returned from the battlefield as well as those who had remained in Laṅkā (hataśeṣā niśācarā raṇāt pratinivṛttā laṅkāsthāś ca).

"they huddled together in panic" saṃbhrāntāḥ . . . samāgamya: Literally, "[they] agitated, having assembled."

5. "they huddled together" saha saṃgamya: Literally, "they assembled together." The phrase seems somewhat redundant. Cr explains the adverb saha, "together," as meaning "all at the same time (ekakālāvacchedena)." Both he and Cg understand that the women embrace one another (parasparam āliṅgitā ity arthaḥ—so Cg).

6. "potbellied" nirṇatodarī: We understand the term to refer to Śūrpaṇakhā's pendulous or protuberant stomach. This would tend to be confirmed by the passage at 3.15.8, where Śūrpaṇakhā is said to be "large-bellied (mahodarī)" in contrast to Rāma with his "slender waist (vṛttamadhyama)." See 3.15.8 and note. See, too, MW (s.v.). Cm appears to share our view. He glosses, "whose belly [hung down] like an elephant's trunk (karabhodarī)." Ck, Ct, and Cr, however, ignoring the upasarga niḥ, "outward," understand the adjective nirṇata to mean "sunken (nimna—so Ck, Ct)," and several translators have followed this interpretation.

"snaggletoothed" karālā: Cg takes the term in its sense of "hideous, deformed, frightful (vikaṭā)." Compare, however, 5.15.8 and note, where the rākṣasa women are described.

"that . . . hag" vṛddhā: Literally, "old woman."

"made advances" āsasāda: Literally, "she approached."

7–8. Compare the similar yet more elaborate passage at 3.16.8–10 (and note). The two verses constitute a single extended sentence in which the rākṣasa woman Śūrpaṇakhā is the subject and Rāma is the object. We have broken it up and restructured it in the interest of English style and readability.

"delicate, yet immensely powerful" sukumāraṃ mahāsattvam: Literally, "delicate [and] of immense strength."

"hideous" hīnarūpā: Literally, "devoid of beauty."

"Really, someone ought to kill her." lokavadhyā sā: Literally, "she ought to be killed by the people." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read lokanindyā sā, "she ought to be censured by the people."

"how . . . could. . . have possibly hoped to win him" katham . . . kāmayāmāsa: Literally, "How did she desire [Rāma]?"

9–10. "this white-haired crone" palinī śvetamūrdhajā: Literally, "the white-haired woman with gray hair." The reading, although fairly well attested textually, appears to be redundant. D7,10,11,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead valinī, "wrinkled," for palinī, "gray-haired." Ñ,V1,2,B,D1–4,6,9,T2,3, and the editions of Lahore and Gorresio read instead malinā, "dirty, impure, sinful." Neither Apte nor MW cite palinī as an entry; however, both the word palikī, "a gray-haired lady," and palitin, "gray-haired," are cited.

"so ill suited to Rāghava . . . advances to him" apratirūpā sā rāghavasya pradharṣaṇam: Literally, "she who was not conformable [made] an assault or outrage against Rāghava." In the spirit of the viṣamālaṃkāra in the preceding passage and at 3.16.8–10, we concur with Cg's interpretation of the term apratirūpā. He glosses, "not similar or conformable (ananurūpā)." Ś1,V,B1,2,D3,8,12,T2,3, and the text of Ck read instead apratirūpasya, which makes the adjective modify rāghavasya. Ct, noting the variant, explains it as meaning "dissimilar to her in appearance (tadasadṛśākārasyety arthaḥ)." Ct glosses the critical reading, which is his as well, as "of deformed appearance (vikṛtarūpā)."

"impermissible" akāryam: Literally, "not to be done."

"led to the destruction of Dūṣaṇa, Khara, and the rākṣasas in general" rākṣasānāṃ vināśāya dūṣaṇasya kharasya ca: Literally, "for the destruction of the rākṣasas, Dūṣaṇa and Khara" We understand that the rākṣasa women are anticipating the extermination of their race and not merely referring to the fourteen thousand rākṣasa warriors slain by Rāma in Janasthāna. See 3.19–29.

11. "It was on her account" tannimittam: Literally, "because of him, her, or it." We agree with Cr in taking the pronoun tat- to refer to Śūrpaṇakhā, since the rākṣasa women had been speaking so vehemently against her. Ct, Cm, and Cg see the reference to be to the pronoun's closest antecedent, pradharṣaṇam, "assault, outrage," in the preceding verse.

"to his own destruction" vadhāya: Literally, "for death or destruction." Ct and Cr understand the reference to be to the destruction of [all] the rākṣasas.

12. "Yet although he has not won over" na ca . . . prāpnoti: Literally, "and he does not acquire." The idea, of course, is that, although Sītā is in Rāvaṇa's possession, she has never yielded to his advances. Ct adds the words "and he will not acquire (na prāpsyati ca)."

"Rāvaṇa has forged . . . enmity" baddham . . . vairam: Literally, "enmity was bound." We understand, with Cr, that one needs to supply the subject "Rāvaṇa (rāvaṇena)."

13. Virādha's attempted abduction of Sītā is narrated at Araṇyakāṇḍa 2–3.

"When he heard" prekṣya: Literally, "having seen." We follow the suggestion of Cg, who glosses, "having known (jñātvā)." Rāvaṇa was, of course, not a witness to the slaying of Virādha at Araṇyakāṇḍa 3.

"who was assaulting" prārthayānam: We understand this irregular present participle in its sense of "attacking, assaulting" (Apte s.v.). Translators consulted have taken the verbal root in its more common sense of "solicit, beg, desire," but that sense is far too weak to express Virādha's abortive attempt to carry off Sītā at Araṇyakāṇḍa 2.

"by Rāma single-handedly" ekena rāmeṇa: Literally, "by Rāma alone." Both Ck and Ct understand ekena here to mean "without assistance (asahāyena)." But this is at variance with the account of the slaying of Virādha at Araṇyakāṇḍa 3, where Lakṣmaṇa actively assists his brother. Cr supplies the word bāṇena, lending the verse the sense that Rāma killed Virādha with a single arrow. But this, too, contradicts Araṇyakāṇḍa 3.11, where Rāma riddles the rākṣasa's body with seven arrows.

"that should have been a sufficient warning" paryāptaṃ tan nidarśanam: Literally, "that was a sufficient demonstration." One could also understand, "[it was] a sufficient demonstration of that" (reading tannidarśanam as a tatpuruṣa compound). In either case, the idea is that Rāma's earlier heroic deed should have warned Rāvaṇa of the hero's extraordinary power. As Ct and Ck put it, it should have been a demonstration leading to [Rāvaṇa's] understanding that Rāma was superior to the whole world, including the gods and asuras (rāmasya sadevāsurasakalalokātiśayitvāvagamāya paryāptaṃ nidarśanam ity arthaḥ). The phrase paryāptaṃ tannidarśanam is repeated in similar contexts in verses 15–18 below.

14. "Rāma": The proper noun has been added.

Cg argues that one should supply the refrain "that should have been a sufficient warning (paryāptaṃ tannidarśanam)." See note to verse 13 above.

15. "Khara, Dūṣaṇa" kharaḥ . . . dūṣaṇaḥ: See note to verse 10 above.

"That, too, should have been a sufficient warning" paryāptaṃ tannidarśanam: See note to verse 13 above.

16. "Kabandha" kabandhaḥ: See Araṇyakāṇḍa 65–69.

"who bellowed in a transport of rage" krodhārto vinadan: D5,7,9–11,T1,G2,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead krodhān nādaṃ nadan, "roaring a roar out of rage."

"That, too, should have been a sufficient warning" paryāptaṃ tannidarśanam: See note to verse 13 above.

17. "Vālin" vālinam: See 4.16.25.

"who resembled a storm cloud" meghasaṃkāśam: Literally, "resembling a cloud." T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read meru-, "[Mount] Meru," for megha-, "cloud," lending the compound the sense "resembling [Mount] Meru."

"That, too, should have been a sufficient warning" paryāptaṃ tannidarśanam: See note to verse 13 above.

18. "his dreams shattered" bhagnamanorathaḥ: Literally, "whose fantasies were shattered or broken." The reference is to the exiled Sugrīva's seemingly vain hopes of recovering the lordship of the monkeys and Tārā as his queen. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 313), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 276), renders the term manoratha, "fantasy, wish," more literally, rendering, "le char de ces espérances," while Shastri renders, "the vehicle of his hopes."

"established him in royal sovereignty" sthāpito rājye: See 4.25.20–35.

"That, too, should have been a sufficient warning" paryāptaṃ tannidarśanam: See note to verse 13 above.

19. "Rāvaṇa paid no heed to the fitting words spoken by Vibhīṣaṇa" vākyam . . . / yuktaṃ vibhīṣaṇenoktam . . . tasya na rocate: Literally, "he does not like the fitting words spoken by Vibhīṣaṇa." For the advice of Vibhīṣaṇa and Rāvaṇa's rejection of it, see 6.9–10.

20. "Rāvaṇa, the younger brother of Kubera" dhanadānujaḥ: Literally, "the one born after the giver of wealth."

"this city of Laṅkā would not have become" neyaṃ laṅkāpurī bhavet: D10,11, and the texts of Ct read instead neyaṃ laṅkā bhaviṣyati, "this Laṅkā will not be . . ." See note to 6.81.32. Cf. 5.24.24.

21. "that . . . Kumbhakarṇa had been slain by Rāghava and that his own beloved son Indrajit had been slain as well" kumbhakarṇaṃ hatam . . . rāghaveṇa . . . cendrajitam: Literally, "Kumbhakarṇa was slain by Rāghava . . . as was Indrajit." We have separated the two references, as Indrajit, in fact, was slain by Lakṣmaṇa at sarga 78 above. The correct state of affairs is represented in the southern recension, which includes 1860* translated below. Thus, Lakṣmaṇa is introduced as killing first Atikāya and then Indrajit. See sarga 55 for the death of Kumbhakarṇa and sarga 59 for the death of Atikāya.

"did not understand" nāvabudhyate: Several of the commentators suggest that one should supply an object, "[Rāma's] power or valor" (parākramam iti śeṣaḥ—so Cg and Cm).

Following 21ab, D4–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1860*]: "and that the unassailable Atikāya had been slain by Lakṣmaṇa." See 6.59 for Atikāya's death.

Following verse 21, D7 (line 1 only) and KK insert a passage of two lines [1862*]: "Even when he saw early on that Hanumān had burned Laṅkā with the fire on his tail and killed Prince Akṣa, he did not understand." See Sundarakāṇḍa 45 for Akṣa's death and Sundarakāṇḍa 52 for the burning of Laṅkā. This verse appears in brackets as 6.95.22 in KK and is rendered in a footnote by Dutt (1893, p. 1435).

22. " 'My son has been slain in battle! My brother has been slain! My husband has been slain!' " mama putro mama bhrātā mama bhartā raṇe hataḥ: Literally, "my son, my brother, my husband has been slain in battle."

"Such are the cries that are heard" ity evaṃ śrūyate śabdaḥ: Literally, "thus the sound is heard."

"in household after household of the rākṣasas" rākṣasānāṃ kule kule: Ñ,V1,2, B3,4,D1–3,7,9–11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the feminine rākṣasīnām, for the masculine rākṣasānām. This lends the passage the sense "[such is the cry] of the rākṣasa women in household after household or in household after household of the rākṣasa women."

23. "has destroyed . . . rākṣasa . . . hundreds" hatāḥ śata- . . . rākṣasāś ca: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tatra tatra for hatāḥ śata- and hatāś cāpi for rākṣasāś ca, giving the sense "[has] destroyed here and there [by the thousands] . . . and slain [foot soldiers]."

26. "Having been granted his boon . . . in battle" dattavaro yudhi: Literally, "he to whom a boon was given . . . in battle." The reference, as Cr points out, is to Rāvaṇa's boon of immunity from the gods and other supernatural beings (devādibhyo mṛtyurāhityarūpam īpsitam yasmai sa daśagrīvaḥ). Ñ,V1,2,B2,D5–7,9–11,T,G2,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead dattamahāvaraḥ, "he to whom a great boon was granted." See notes to 6.28.28–29; 6.31.51–52; and 6.47.104.

"ten-necked Rāvaṇa" daśagrīvaḥ: Literally, "the ten-necked one."

"the . . . danger he faces at Rāma's hands" rāmahastāt . . . bhayam . . . utpannam: Literally, "the danger that has arisen from Rāma's hand."

27. "not even . . . or" na . . . na . . . na . . . na: Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B,D1–4,6–12,T2,3,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read taṃ, "him," for the first negative particle of the critical edition. This makes Rāvaṇa the specific object of the verbal phrase "can save (paritrātuṃ śaktāḥ)."

"one who is assailed" upasṛṣṭam: The word, whose basic meanings are "joined, troubled, eclipsed, thrown off," seems unusual here. Commentators gloss it variously around the general sense of "engaged in battle (yuddhāya pravṛttam—so Cr)," "engaged to be killed (hantuṃ niyuktam—so Ck)," or "begun to be killed (hantum ārabdham—so Ct, Cm)." We believe that Cv and Cg, who gloss, "assailed, attacked (upadrutam)," are closest to the intended meaning.

28. "foretelling" kathayiṣyanti: Literally, "they will tell." Cv and Cm gloss, respectively, "they will show (darśayiṣyanti)" and "they will indicate (sūcayiṣyanti)." Cg, who shares the reading with them, is uncomfortable with the awkward use of the future tense here. He offers two explanations. The first is that there will still be some future portents that, having once appeared, will foretell [Rāvaṇa's doom] (itaḥ param api kānicin nimittāni prādurbhūya kathayiṣyantīty arthaḥ). Alternatively, he notes that other authorities suggest that the future is used in the sense of the present (vartamāne tātparyam ity apy āhuḥ). Apparently he is referring to Crā, who glosses, "they foretell (kathayanti)." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck appear to remedy the problem by reading instead kathayanti hi, "for they foretell." Ck and Ct are disturbed by the use of the root √kath, "to tell," with the subject utpātāḥ, "portents," and suggest that we must supply the actual subject, which would be Mālyavān and the other rākṣasa elders who have foretold the consequences of the portents (tadutpātaphalaṃ mālyavadādayo vṛddhā iti śeṣaḥ).

"his death at Rāma's hands" rāmeṇa rāvaṇasya nibarhaṇam: Literally, "the destruction of Rāvaṇa by Rāma."

29. On Rāvaṇa's boon, see notes to verse 26 above.

"But Rāvaṇa never requested invulnerability to men" mānuṣebhyo na yācitam: Literally, "from men it was not requested."

30. "I believe" manye: Literally, "I think." Cg, no doubt recalling that this is the collective lamentation of the rākṣasa women, glosses, "we think (manyāmahe)."

"that very same dangerous vulnerability" tad idam . . . bhayam . . . ghoram: Literally, "this [is] that terrible danger."

"to men" mānuṣāt: Literally, "from a man." D10,11,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cg read instead the adjective mānuṣam, "human, pertaining to men," which would construe with bhayam, "danger."

31. "the wise gods" vibudhāḥ: Literally, "the wise ones." This is a common kenning for the gods.

"with fierce austerities" dīptais tapobhiḥ: Literally, "with blazing austerities."

32. "these grave words" idam . . . mahad vacaḥ: Literally, "this great speech."

"the divinities . . . their" devatānām . . . devatāḥ: Literally, "of the divinities . . . the divinities."

33. "all the dānavas and rākṣasas" sarve dānavarākṣasāḥ: According to Cg, the reference to the term dānava here refers specifically to those dānavas who, through their kinship with Mandodarī, Rāvaṇa's chief queen, reside among the rākṣasas (mandodarīsambandhena dānavāś ca kecit rākṣasaiḥ saha tiṣṭhantīti jñeyam).

"beset by danger" bhayena prāvṛtāḥ: Literally, "[they] shrouded or covered by fear." The participle is somewhat awkward in this context. The commentators who share this reading (Cv, Cm, Cg) are silent. D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr, Ct, and Ck substitute the equally awkward prabhṛtāḥ, "borne or supported." Ct and Ck take the passive participle actively, glossing, "they will wander about bearing fear of the gods (dānavā rākṣasāś ca bhayena prabhṛtā devebhyo bhayaṃ bibhrāṇā eva vicariṣyanti)." Ct goes on to say, "The meaning is 'they [the dānavas and rākṣasas] will be fearful, thinking, "Whether by themselves or through others, the gods will oppress us" ' (devāḥ svataḥ parato vāsmān pīḍayiṣyantīti bhayayuktā eva bhaviṣyantīty arthaḥ)." Cr glosses, "supported by fear, that is, nourished [by fear], that is, joined with [fear] (prabhṛtāḥ poṣitā yuktā ity arthaḥ)."

34. "the great god, bull-bannered Śiva, destroyer of Tripura" vṛṣadhvajas tripurahā mahādevaḥ: Literally, "Mahādeva, whose banner is a bull, the destroyer or slayer of Tripura." The term tripura- can refer either to the legendary three cities of gold, silver, and iron constructed for the asuras by their architect Māyā, or to the asura chieftain who rules these cities. Thus, the epithet here is somewhat ambiguous. It can also mean "the slayer of Tripura." See 6.59.73 and note.

35. "a woman shall be born" utpatsyati . . . nārī: Śiva's prophecy of the birth of Sītā is not mentioned in the Uttarakāṇḍa.

36. "Sītā" sītā: Ś,B1,D1–4,8–12, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sarvān, "all [of us]."

"just as, long ago, famine was used to devour the dānavas" kṣud yathā dānavān purā: Literally, "just as famine, long ago, the dānavas." The mythological reference here is not clear. Ck, Ct, and Cr note that in an earlier cosmic cycle the gods successfully employed hunger in order to destroy the dānavas. (purā pūrvakalpe. devair dānavanāśārthaṃ prayuktā kṣud yathā dānavān harati sma—so Ct.) Cg remarks that this event took place immediately after the well-known episode of the bestowing of the amṛta, or "nectar of immortality," upon the gods (devebhyo 'mṛtapradānānantaram iti bodhyam).

37. "This dreadful lamentation" ayaṃ niṣṭānako ghoraḥ: We are inclined to agree with Cl, who, quoted in a note by Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 301), glosses the term niṣṭānakaḥ as "that which causes one to roar or weep continually (niṣṭānako nirantaraṃ stānayati rodayatīti)." For Cl, the term is thus derived from the verb ni √stan, "to roar, make a loud sound, groan." A closely related term, niṣṭanaḥ, in the sense of "groan, sigh," is used by Vālmīki at Uttarakāṇḍa 404*, line 3 (= GPP 7.21.12a). The term niṣṭānaka is also used in the sense of a "loud, sorrowful cry" at MBh 7.126.3. Gorresio translates, "gran pianto." The southern commentators are virtually unanimous in taking the term to mean "destruction (nāśaḥ)." Cv alone glosses, "end (antaḥ)." See note to 6.79.4, 1744*, n. 1. Cf. 6.42.23 and note, where the term stanita is used in the somewhat similar sense of "faint cries."

38. "Afflicted as we are by Rāghava, we can see no one in the world who can afford us refuge, any more than one could afford refuge to creatures afflicted by Kāla himself at the end of a cosmic age" taṃ na paśyāmahe loke yo naḥ śaraṇado bhavet / rāghaveṇopasṛṣṭānāṃ kāleneva yugakṣaye //: Literally, "We do not see him who, in this world, would be a granter of refuge to us who are afflicted by Rāghava, just as by Kāla at the destruction of a cosmic age."

Cg observes that the rākṣasa women would have heard this account of Brahmā's boon, etc., from Mandodarī, who, he notes, will be described later on as a "wise woman." (atra pitāmahādivarapradānavṛttānto rākṣasībhir mandodarīsakāśāc chruta iti jñeyam. sā ca jñānavṛddheti vakṣyate.)

Following verse 38, D4–7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines [1869*]: "There is no refuge for us who are placed in such great peril any more than for elephant cows surrounded by a forest fire.[1–2] The great Vibhīṣaṇa Paulastya[1] acted in a timely fashion when he took refuge with him from whom he foresaw this danger.[3–4]"

[1]"Vibhīṣaṇa Paulastya" paulastyena: Literally, "the descendant of Pulastya." Cg suggests that this patronymic epithet, which normally refers to Rāvaṇa, is used here to indicate that henceforward Vibhīṣaṇa will be the sustainer of the House of Pulastya (itaḥ paraṃ tasyaiva paulastyakulapratiṣṭhāpakatvāt tacchabdaprayogaḥ).

39. "Afflicted and tormented by a terrible fear" ārtātibhayābhipīḍitāḥ: Like Cr, the only commentator to remark on this verse, we read the compound as a dvandva. In other words, the rākṣasa women are both miserable (ārtāḥ) and greatly afflicted with terrible fear (atibhayābhipīditāḥ). Cr, however, also notes that the junction (sandhi) of the words ārta- and -atibhaya- suggests an alternative reading. In this reading, Cr glosses ārta in a lexically unsupported sense as prāpta, "arrived, present," lending the compound the sense "afflicted by the terrible present danger." (ārtātīty atra sandhir ata eva jñāpakād ārtaṃ prāptaṃ yad atibhayaṃ tenābhipīḍitā ity artho vā). D5,7,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead ārtā bhayabhārapīḍitāḥ, "miserable [and] oppressed by the weight of fear."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

3. "Gnawing at his lip" saṃdaśya daśanair oṣṭham: Literally, "having bitten [his] lip with [his] teeth."

"flaring up" mūrcchitaḥ (mūrchitaḥ—so crit. ed.): Like Cg, who glosses, "increased (abhivṛddhaḥ)," we take the term in its sense of "made violent, intensified." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 139) similarly renders, "veemente." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mūrtimān, "incarnate."

4. "their speech slurred with fear" bhayāvyaktakathān: Literally, "having speech that was indistinct with fear." D5–7,T1,G2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read the nominative singular -kathaḥ instead of the accusative plural -kathān, thus making the phrase apply to Rāvaṇa rather than to his rākṣasa attendants. In addition, D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct substitute krodha-, "rage," for the critical edition's bhaya-, "fear." This lends the compound the sense "his speech slurred with anger."

5. "tell Mahodara, Mahāpārśva, and the rākṣasa Virūpākṣa" mahodaraṃ mahāpārśvaṃ virūpākṣaṃ ca rākṣasam / . . . vadata: Several of the translators consulted understand that the named rākṣasas are identical with or among the rākṣasas addressed by Rāvaṇa in the previous verse. The syntax does not support this reading, however. The idea is that Rāvaṇa instructs his attendants to go and alert Mahodara, etc. Cg notes that Mahodara and Mahāpārśva are ministers (sacivau) of Rāvaṇa. The two rākṣasas of those names who were killed earlier in the battle at sarga 58 were, Cg continues, brothers of Rāvaṇa, whose alternate names were Matta and Pramatta (pūrvahatau tu mattapramattāparaparyāyau rāvaṇabhrātarau). A rākṣasa named Virūpākṣa is mentioned at 6.27.20, 6.28.14, and 6.33.10, and is killed by Lakṣmaṇa at 6.33.25. Yūpākṣa is said to be crushed by Mainda at an insert to 6.63 following verse 3 (App. I, No. 43, lines 62–63 = GPP 6.76.34), while two rākṣasas named Yūpākṣa and Virūpākṣa are said to have been killed by Hanumān at 5.44.30. See Goldman and Goldman 1996, p. 23. See, too, 6.28.31 and note.

"Send forth the troops!" sainyāni niryāteti: The syntax is awkward and perhaps elliptical. We believe the best solution is that proposed by Cr, who suggests reading the verb niryāta, "[you all] go forth," as an unmarked causative. Alternatively, Cr suggests that if, by the word "troops (sainyāni)," we are to understand enemy troops, then we need not read the verb as causative, and the idea would be "go forth to the troops." (sainyāni yūyaṃ niryāpayata niḥsārayateti mahodarādīñ chīghraṃ vadata. yadi tu sainyaśabdena ripusenā gṛhyeta tadā nāntārbhāvitaṇicūkalpanā.)

6. "the rākṣasas . . . the rākṣasa warriors" rākṣasāḥ . . . rākṣasān: Literally, "the rākṣasas . . . the rākṣasas." We agree with Cr, who understands that the first term, in the nominative, refers to Rāvaṇa's rākṣasa attendants who are mentioned in 4ab. He understands that the second occurrence of the term, in the accusative, refers to the rākṣasa warriors Mahodara, etc., mentioned in 5ab. We have translated accordingly. This distinction is supported, we believe, by the fact that the first group is represented as being terrified, whereas the second, the noble rākṣasa champions, are shown as retaining their composure.

"although stricken with fear . . . who retained their composure" bhayārditāḥ / . . . avyagrān: Literally, "afflicted with fear . . . not agitated." Cs understands that the rākṣasas are caught between two sources of terror. They are fearful of going forth because of Rāma and fearful of not going because of Rāvaṇa (gamane rāmato bhītir bhītiś cāgamane rāvaṇāt). Ct understands that the rākṣasa warriors have abandoned their fear because of Rāvaṇa's exhortation (rāvaṇaprotsāhanena tyaktabhayān). Cs, on the other hand, feels they have simply become undemonstrative since they are resigned to their own death, like a beautiful young woman prepared to accompany her husband [on the funeral pyre] (sahagāmibhāminīvan nirṇītamaraṇatvenāvyaktān). Cs goes on, as he often does, to quote and reject the interpretation of Ct. He argues that there is no possibility that Supārśva (presumably a variant for Mahāpārśva) and the other rākṣasa warriors will abandon their fear because, first, they had not previously been described as frightened, and, second, because, in any case, they would not lose their fear because of Rāvaṇa's exhortation of the rākṣasas under their command. (*yat tu nāgojibhaṭṭena rāvaṇaprotsāhanena tyaktabhayān iti vyākhyātaṃ tat tu supārśavādīnāṃ netṝṇāṃ yadā bhayārditoktāpūrvaṃ tan niyamyānāṃ rākṣasānāṃ rāvaṇaprotsāhanenāvyāgratvoktyasam-bhavād upekṣyam.) Cm, however, glosses, "devoid of any enthusiasm for battle (raṇotsāharahitān)."

7. "After performing benedictory rites" kṛtasvastyāyanāḥ: The svastyāyana is a benedictory or propitiatory rite performed to ensure the success of an undertaking, such as a sacrifice or a journey. See 1.21.2 and note, where the term is used to refer to the blessings that Daśaratha and Kausalyā give as Rāma departs on his journey to the forest. See, too, 6.72.28 and notes.

"they all presented themselves before Rāvaṇa" rāvaṇābhimukhā yayuḥ: Literally, "they went facing Rāvaṇa." V3,D5,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead te raṇābhimukhāḥ, while D4,7,T1,G2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Cg read raṇāyābhimukhāḥ. Both of these variants mean "[they went off] facing battle." Since the following verse shows the rākṣasas paying their respects to Rāvaṇa, we cannot understand the variants to mean that the rākṣasas proceed directly into combat upon receiving their orders. Nonetheless, several of the translators who follow the texts of the southern commentators do render the variants in this fashion. Cr attempts to avoid the problem. He first reads the sequence sarve raṇāya, "all . . . to battle," as the compound sarveraṇāya, "for the agitation (īraṇāya) of all (sarveṣām)," supplying the word "enemies (ripūṇām)" and glossing īraṇāya as "causing to tremble (prakampanāya)." He then glosses -abhimukhāḥ, "facing," as "their faces bright (prakāśitavadanāḥ)," adding the words "to the presence of Rāvaṇa," after the verb "they went (yayuḥ)." His interpretation would then read: "Their faces bright, so as to terrify all their enemies, the rākṣasas proceeded into the presence of Rāvaṇa."

8. "those great chariot-warriors" mahārathāḥ: D4,5,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead niśācarāḥ, "night-roaming [rākṣasas]." See 6.60.3; 6.72.33; 6.80.6; 6.81.18; 6.84.15; and notes. Cf. 6.77.36.

9. "laughing but beside himself with rage" prahasya . . . krodhamūrcchitaḥ (-mūrchitaḥ—so crit. ed.): Literally, "having laughed, [he] stupefied with anger." Ct and Ck understand that Rāvaṇa's laughter is a product of his anger (krodhajo 'tra prahāsaḥ). Cg, however, sees it as a sign that Rāvaṇa regards his enemies as insignificant (śatruṣu tṛṇīkārāt). Cs believes we should understand the term for laughter here as a synonym for weeping (rodanāparaparyāyo 'yaṃ prahāsaḥ). Perhaps the idea here is that Rāvaṇa's laughter is forced in order to hide his growing despair from his troops.

10. "I shall lead Rāghava and Lakṣmaṇa" rāghavaṃ lakṣmaṇaṃ caiva neṣyāmi: Cm acknowledges the manifest meaning of the verse, but, as is so often the case when he sees hostility directed toward Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, he adds a second, inner, meaning. Here he argues that we should supply the words "those other than Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa (rāghavaṃ lakṣmaṇaṃ vinānyān iti śeṣaḥ)." Cs mockingly criticizes Cm's inner meaning by noting that there is no evidence of Rāvaṇa's killing even a single monkey prior to this or later (ekasyāpi kaper anāśād atraiva pūrvatrottaratra). But compare verse 40 below.

"the abode of Yama" yamasādanam: Cs notes the obvious meaning but suggests another, which he achieves by breaking up the compound yamasādanam into the words yam + asādanam, which he explains as "him whom, i.e., Rāma, you [i.e., the rākṣasas addressed by Rāvaṇa] believe to be indestructible (yaṃ rāmam asādanam asaṃhāryaṃ manyadhve taṃ rāghavam)."

11. "I shall avenge Khara, Kumbhakarṇa, Prahasta, and Indrajit" kharasya kumbhakarṇasya prahastendrajitos tathā / kariṣyāmi pratīkāram: Literally, "I shall take counteraction for Khara, Kumbhakarṇa, Prahasta, and Indrajit." Cm and Cg, respectively, suggest inserting the words vadhasya and hananasya, "[for] the killing [of Khara, etc.]."

12. "the . . . rivers" nadyaḥ: Many manuscripts, including V2,B1,D3,7,10,11, G1,2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr, read instead ca dyaur, "and the sky."

"shall disappear from view" na . . . na . . . nāpi . . . prakāśatvaṃ gamiṣyanti: Literally, "they shall not go to visibility."

13. "the masses of monkey troops" vānarayūthānāṃ tāni yūthāni: The critical reading, which can be read as "troops of monkey troops" or "hosts of monkey hosts," is redundant and poorly supported by the critical apparatus. The great majority of both northern and southern manuscripts collated for the critical edition (Ś2,Ñ2,V,B3,D1–4,6–12,T,G1,2,M1,2,5) and all available commentators and printed editions read -mukhyānām for -yūthānām, lending the phrase the sense "the hosts or troops of principal or leading monkeys." All translations render this variant. It is not clear why the critical editors chose their reading.

Following 13ab, D4–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [1877*]: "This very day, with my chariot, powerful as the wind, I shall slaughter the monkey troops with my bow and a mass of feathered arrows.[1]"

[1]"I shall slaughter . . . a mass of feathered arrows" śarajālena vadhiṣyāmi patatriṇā: Literally, "I will slaughter with my feathered arrow-mass." D4,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Crā, Cv, and Cm read instead vidhamiṣyāmi patriṇā for vadhiṣyāmi patatriṇā. This lends the line the sense "I will smash with my feathered mass of arrows."

14. "I shall wreak havoc upon the lotus ponds that are the monkey troops, their faces like full-blown lotuses, their color that of lotus filaments" vyākośapadmavaktrāṇi padmakesaravarcasām / . . . yūthataṭākāni . . . pramathāmy aham: Literally, "I crush the ponds that are the troops whose faces are full-blown lotuses and whose luster is that of lotus filaments." Following the commentators, we add the word "monkeys" as the substantive to which the adjective padmakesaravarcasām, "whose luster is that of lotus filaments," applies. D1,2,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cv and Cg read instead ākośa- for vyākośa-, "full-blown." Cv and Cg gloss ākośa- as "slightly expanded (īṣadvikasita-)."

15. "with their protruding stalks" sanālaiḥ: Literally, "with their stalks."

16. "With each of the arrows" ekeṣuṇā: Literally, "with one arrow."

"armed with trees" drumayodhinām: Literally, "of those tree-fighters."

17. "these women whose husbands, brothers, and sons have been slain" hato bhartā hato bhrātā yāsāṃ ca tanayā hatāḥ: Literally, "of whom (fem.) the husband is slain, the brother is slain, and the sons are slain." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead hato bhrātā ca yeṣāṃ vai yeṣāṃ ca tanayo hataḥ, "of whom (masc.) the brother has been slain, and of whom (masc.) the son has been slain." The critical reading, in addition to being far better attested textually, is contextually superior in that it is responsive to the lamentation of the bereaved rākṣasa women described at verse 6.82.22, where slain husbands are mentioned in addition to sons and brothers. Rāvaṇa, it will be recalled, has overheard this lamentation at 6.83.1 above.

18. "robbed of life" gatacetanaiḥ: Literally, "whose consciousness is gone." The context, we believe, supports Cg's and Cm's gloss, "with life breaths departed (gata-prāṇaiḥ)."

"I shall make it so that one will have to strain to see the surface of the earth" karomi . . . yatnāvekṣyatalāṃ mahīm: Literally, "I shall make the earth such that its surface is to be seen with effort." The idea, as Cg notes, is that Rāvaṇa intends to strike the monkeys down [so thickly] on the ground that there will be no spaces between their bodies (nairandhryeṇa bhūmau vānarān pātayiṣyāmīty arthaḥ).

19. "I shall . . . let . . . gorge" tarpayiṣyāmi: Literally, "I shall satisfy or sate."

"jackals, vultures" gomāyavo gṛdhrāḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead kākāś ca gṛdhrāś ca, "crows and vultures."

"rent by my arrows" śarārditaiḥ: Literally, "tormented by arrows." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -hataiḥ for -arditaiḥ, lending the compound the sense "struck or slain by arrows." D7,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Cg read instead śarārpitaiḥ. Here the adjective -arpita, normally, "placed, offered, transferred," would have to be taken in the sense in which it is used in the same compound at 3.27.17 (GPP 3.29.19), where it means "pierced or wounded," and is so glossed ad loc. by Cg (saṃkṣata, "wounded").

20. "Get . . . ready" kalpyatām: Cg glosses ākalpyatām, which he explains as "ornament, decorate (alaṃkriyatām)."

"who remain" ye 'vaśiṣṭāḥ: D3,9–11, and the texts of Ct read instead ye 'tra śiṣṭāḥ, "who remain here." In the absence of the upasarga ava, the participle śiṣṭāḥ, "remaining, surviving," can also be construed to mean "trained or eminent." Of the translators who share the reading śiṣṭāḥ, only Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 140) appears to take cognizance of this set of meanings. He translates, "[i] Racsasi più prestanti," by which he seems to mean the rākṣasas who are most fit [for battle].

21. "Assemble . . . at once" saṃtvaryatām: Literally, "hasten together."

22. "in great agitation" saṃrabdhāḥ: Cg, the only commentator to share this reading, takes the term in its common sense of "enraged, angry." He argues that the officers are furious because [the rākṣasa troops] have not come forth despite their having been repeatedly summoned (punaḥ punar āhvāne 'py anāgamanāt kupitā ity arthaḥ). D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead saṃyuktāḥ, "engaged, enjoined."

"raced about" pariyayuḥ: Literally, "they went around." Cg glosses, "they went by every road (pratirathyaṃ yayur ity arthaḥ)."

"rousting" codayantaḥ: Literally, "urging, impelling."

23–25. "of fearsome valor" bhīmavikramāḥ: Ñ2,B4,D5–7,9–11,T,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead bhīmadarśanāḥ, "of fearsome aspect."

"They had mighty arms" bhujaiḥ: Literally, "with arms." The syntax here is unclear. We broadly follow Ct, Cg, and Cm, who understand that the instrumental is used to indicate a distinctive feature or mark (upalakṣaṇe—so Cg). Some translators ignore the term entirely, while others understand that the rākṣasas are holding the listed weapons in their arms.

"They . . . bore all manner of weapons" nānāpraharaṇaiḥ: Literally, "with various weapons."

"ploughshares" halaiḥ: One assumes that some broad-bladed weapon reminiscent of the agricultural implement is intended. M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead hulaiḥ, "with knives or daggers." Cg and Cm cite the lexicon of Vaijayantī in support of their contention that hula is a type of double-edged or double-bladed weapon (dviphalapatrāgrāyudhaviśeṣaiḥ). Ck appears to show a slight variant, hulu, which he defines as a type of weapon (āyudhaviśeṣaḥ). See 6.59.103 and note.

"short javelins" bhiṇḍipālaiḥ: See 6.32.30; 6.42.19; 6.53.12; and notes.

"hundred-slayers" śataghnībhiḥ: See 6.3.12; 6.63.33; and notes.

26. "acting on Rāvaṇa's orders" rāvaṇājñayā: Literally, "by the order of Rāvaṇa."

"four commanders of the army" balādhyakṣāś catvāraḥ: M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read satvaraḥ, "in haste," for catvāraḥ, "four," and the singular balādhyakṣaḥ for the plural balādhyakṣāḥ, so that only one officer is involved in bringing the chariot.

Following 21ab, D7 and the printed editions of GPP (6.95.27cd–ab), NSP (6.95.27cd–ab), Gita Press (6.95.27cd–ab), and KK (in brackets = 6.96.27cd–32cd), as well as the text of Ct, insert a passage of thirteen lines [1881*]: "[and they brought up] a full one million chariots, three million[1] war-elephants, and six hundred million horses, donkeys, and camels.[1–2] And innumerable foot soldiers marched up at the king's command. The commanders of the army then arrayed[2] the forces before the king.[3][3–4] At that juncture, the charioteer brought his chariot to a halt. It was covered with celestial garlands and hangings,[4] and adorned with all manner of ornaments.[5–6] It was yoked to celestial steeds and adorned with celestial ornaments.[5] It was filled with every sort of weapon and covered with networks of little bells.[7–8] It was inlayed with all sorts of gems and shone with jeweled pillars. It had thousands of vessels made of jāmbūnada gold.[9–10] When the rākṣasas saw it, they were all supremely astonished. And Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, seeing it shining like fire and blazing like ten million suns, leapt to his feet.[11–13]"

[1]"one million . . . three million" niyutam . . . niyutatrayam: The term niyuta is lexically recorded in the sense both of "one hundred thousand" and "one million" (Apte s.v.). Translators consulted choose one or the other, or, in some cases, leave the term untranslated. Although numerous terms for large numbers occur earlier in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (see note to 6.19.32), this term is not among them.

[2]"arrayed" saṃsthāpya: Literally, "having placed." The gerund is not resolved by any finite verb.

[3]"before the king" rājñaḥ . . . puraḥsthitām: Literally, "standing or situated before the king." GPP (6.95.29), KK (6.96.28), and the text of Gita Press (6.95.29) read instead purasthitām, "standing in the city." This variant is rendered in Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1769), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 316), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 279), and Pagani (1999, p. 1131). It is not recorded in the critical apparatus.

[4]"It was covered with celestial garlands and hangings." divyasragvastrasampannam: D7, GPP (6.95.30), NSP (6.95.30), KK (6.96.29cd), and Gita Press (6.95.30) all read instead divyāstravarasaṃpannam, "endowed with the most excellent of divine missiles." According to the critical apparatus, only D7 and KK (in brackets) read this passage. All translators who render it translate this variant.

[5]"It was yoked to celestial steeds and adorned with celestial ornaments." divyavājisamāyuktaṃ divyālaṃkārabhūṣitam: GPP, NSP, KK, and Gita Press omit this line. The critical apparatus notes that it is omitted only from KK.

27. "that celestial chariot" rathaṃ divyam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tadā bhīmam, "then [he mounted] that fearsome [chariot]." D7,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read the nominative variant bhīmaḥ, "fearsome," in which case the adjective must apply to Rāvaṇa.

"with its own splendor" svatejasā: Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 281) renders, "[the chariot] lit up by his [Rāvaṇa's] splendour."

"In the excess of his power" sattvagāmbhīryāt: Literally, "out of the profundity of strength." Here we follow Ct, Cm, and Cr in understanding the term gāmbhīrya to refer to excess (balātiśayāt—so Ct and Cm). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 281) reads the compound as a dvandva, rendering, "with his strength and weight," but this is not persuasive. Pagani (1999, p. 1131) idiosyncratically renders, "du poids énorme de ses troupes."

"as if he would tear up the earth itself" dārayann iva medinīm: Literally, "as if rending the earth." D4,7,9, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read vārayan, normally, "covering, warding off, or obstructing," for dārayan, "rending." None of these meanings makes a great deal of sense here. Of the translators consulted, only Roussel, followed by Shastri, and Pagani attempt to render this variant. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 317) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 279) understand the participle to mean "écrasant" and "bearing down," respectively, while Pagani (1999, vol. 3, p. 1131) understands, "couvrir," which leads her to the idiosyncratic translation of sattvagāmbhīryāt noted above.

Following 27ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1884*]: "He then set forth impetuously, surrounded by many rākṣasas."

Following verse 27, D7, the printed editions of GPP (6.95.35–38), NSP (6.95.35–38), Gita Press (6.95.35–38), and KK (in brackets, 6.96.35–38), as well as the text of Ct, insert a passage of nine lines [1885*]: "Then on all sides there arose a tremendous din of trumpets, mṛdaṅga and paṭaha drums, conches, and the shouts of the rākṣasas.[1–2] A tumultuous cry went up, 'Marked by the insignia of the parasol and yak-tail fly whisks, the malevolent king of the rākṣasas—the ravisher of Sītā, the murderer of brahmans, and the thorn in the side of the gods—has come to offer battle to the foremost of the Raghus!'[3–5] That mighty roar caused the earth to tremble. And, hearing that sound, the monkeys suddenly fled in terror.[6–7] But great-armed Rāvaṇa, of tremendous blazing power, marched on to battle surrounded by his ministers in order to secure victory.[1] [8–9]"

[1]"marched on to battle . . . in order to secure victory" ājagāma . . . vijayāya raṇaṃ prati: Literally, "he came to battle for victory." The texts and printed editions of Ct, KK, and Gita Press read instead the seemingly redundant jayāya vijayam, "to victory for victory."

30. "Rāvaṇa marched forth" niryayau: Literally, "he went out."

"he resembled Yama, who brings time itself to an end" kālāntakayamopamaḥ: Literally, "[he was] similar to Yama, the ender of time." See 6.21.26 and note.

31. "through the gate" dvāreṇa: Cg notes that this would be the northern gate (uttaradvāreṇa). This is in accord with 6.28.30, where Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are said to have taken up their positions at the northern gate (see 6.28.30 and note).

32. Verses 32–35 provide a list of inauspicious omens very similar to those that accompany the march of Dhūmrākṣa at 6.41.30–33. For similar passages listing inauspicious omens, see 6.31.3–12; 6.45.31–37; 6.53.41–45; 6.65.17–19; 6.94.14–27; and notes.

"the sun grew dim" naṣṭaprabhaḥ sūryaḥ: Literally, "the sun was such that its radiance was destroyed."

"Fierce birds" dvijāḥ . . . ghorāḥ: All translators consulted who have this reading render the adjective ghorāḥ either adverbially or adjectively modifying a supplied term meaning "cries or screeches." Although attractive, this reading cannot be easily supported by the grammar. See note to 6.28.8.

33. "It rained blood" vavarṣa rudhiraṃ devaḥ: Literally, "the god rained blood." As Cg notes at 6.41.33, the god in question is the vedic rain god Parjanya. See 6.94.15 and note for the identical phrase. For blood raining down, see 6.26.22; 6.31.5; 6.41.33; 6.45.926*–36; 6.94.15; and notes. Cf. note to 6.76.2, 1674*, lines 5–7.

"and the horses stumbled" caskhaluś ca turaṃgamāḥ: D5,T1,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead caskhalus turagāḥ pathi, "and the horses stumbled on the path." See 6.26.23; 6.65.18; 6.94.26; and notes.

"A vulture alighted on the tip of his flagstaff" dhvajāgre nyapatad gṛdhraḥ: Cf. 6.41.31, 6.94.16; and notes.

"jackals . . . inauspiciously" aśivaṃ śivāḥ: D9–11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead aśivāḥ śivāḥ, "inauspicious jackals." The phrase contains a play on words, since the term for jackals (śivāḥ) can also mean "auspicious." The howling or shrieking of beasts of prey, especially jackals, is a common portent of destruction. See 6.22.24; 6.31.7; 6.45.32,34; 6.53.42; 6.94.21; and notes. Cf. 6.41.32 and note.

36. "A blazing meteor" ulkā: Literally, "a meteor." Compare 6.45.35a and note, where the pāda is repeated.

"their cries echoed by the crows" vāyasair anunāditāḥ: Literally, "echoed by crows." V2,D7,9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read abhimiśritāḥ, "mixed with," for anunāditāḥ, "echoed."

37. "But heedless" acintayan: Literally, "not thinking or worrying about."

38. "Hearing the rumbling of the . . . chariots" rathaghoṣeṇa: Literally, "by the sound of the chariots."

39. "A hugely tumultuous battle then broke out between the monkeys and rākṣasas." teṣāṃ sutumulaṃ yuddhaṃ babhūva kapirakṣasām: Literally, "There was a very tumultuous battle of monkeys and rākṣasas." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct omit this line (39ab).

40. "ten-necked Rāvaṇa" daśagrīvaḥ: Literally, "the ten-necked one."

41. "the wrinkle-faced monkeys" valīmukhāḥ: Literally, "the wrinkle-faced ones." Cr glosses, "those whose faces were filled with wrinkles (valīyuktāni mukhāni yeṣāṃ te)." See 6.54.28; 6.55.2; 6.57.59; 6.85.3; and notes.

"struck dead, their breathing stopped forever" nirucchvāsā hatāḥ: Literally, "struck or slain, breathless."

"had their eyes torn out" cakṣurvivarjitāḥ: Literally, "ones lacking eyes."

Following 41ab, D5–7,9–11,T1,G1,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [1893*]: "Some were pierced through the heart. Some had their ears cut off."

42. "ten-faced Rāvaṇa" daśānanaḥ: Literally, "the ten-faced one."

"the crushing force of his arrows" śarapravegam: Literally, "the impact of arrows."

The meter is upajāti.

1. "litter the ground, covering it" vasudhā tatra prakīrṇā . . . vṛtā: Literally, "the ground there was strewn . . . covered." B1,D5,7,9–11,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read tadā, "then," for vṛtā, "covered."

2. "single-handed" ekataḥ: Literally, "from one." The exact sense of the adverb here is uncertain. Commentators and translators alike have rendered it variously. We have followed the interpretation of Cg and Cm, who take it as an adjective in the sense of "single," modifying Rāvaṇa (ekata ekasya rāvaṇasya). The idea is to emphasize that this massive hail of arrows emanates from the bow of Rāvaṇa alone. This interpretation is followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 282). Ct and Ck understand, "at every single point (ekaikasmin pradeśe)," an interpretation rendered only by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 319). Cr understands, "at a single moment (ekasminn api kṣaṇe)," in which he is followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1771). Pagani (1999, p. 1133) appears to extend somewhat the notions of Ck, Ct, and Cr that the arrows are striking in a single place or at a single time, rendering, "drue." Dutt (1893, p. 1440) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 281) ignore the term entirely.

3. "a forest fire" pāvaka-: Literally, "fire."

4. "Rāvaṇa careened" sa yayau: Literally, "he went."

"a mighty wind" mārutaḥ: Literally, "the wind."

5. "then immediately . . . Rāghava" rāghavaṃ tvaritas tadā: Literally, "swift [Rāvaṇa] . . . then Rāghava." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tvaritaṃ rāghavaṃ raṇe, "swiftly . . . Rāghava on the battlefield" or "swift Rāghava on the battlefield."

6. "the encampment" gulme: Normally the term gulma refers to a military encampment. It can also refer to a particular fighting unit consisting of three senāmukhas, for a total of forty-five foot soldiers, twenty-seven cavalry, nine chariots, and nine elephants (Apte s.v.). Cf. note to 6.3.24. See Amarakośa 2.8.81. Dutt (1893, p. 1441) leaves the term untranslated and explains it in this latter fashion in a footnote. Other translators render it variously. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1172) understands, "division," while Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 319) translates, "son poste d'observation." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 281) renders, "his division." Pagani (1999, p. 1133) translates, "son propre post," while Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 282) understands, "the investing forces." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 144) renders, "esercito." Cf. 5.3.27; 6.3.27; 6.27.20; 6.28.31; 6.31.31; 6.45.2; 6.62.5; 6.71.1; 6.72.5; and notes.

"and resolved to enter the fight at once" cakre yuddhe drutaṃ manaḥ: Literally, "he swiftly made up his mind with regard to battle." D9,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read [a]dbhutam, "wondrous," for drutam, "swiftly." Cg understands the term to be an adverb, which would then lend the phrase the somewhat peculiar sense of "amazingly or wonderfully made up his mind." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 282), the only translator to render this variant, translates, "resolved to put up a marvelous fight."

7. "Sugrīva turned his face toward the enemy" sugrīvo 'bhimukhaḥ śatrum: Literally, "Sugrīva, facing the enemy." Ñ,V,B2–4,D2,10,11,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read abhimukham for abhimukhaḥ. This can be read as either an adjective modifying śatrum, "enemy," in the sense of "the enemy who was facing [him]," or as an adverb, with the verb pratasthe, "he set forth," in the sense "he set forth toward the enemy."

8. "All the troop leaders . . . voluntarily" sarve yūthādhipāḥ svayam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead sarve vānarayūthapāḥ, "all the troop leaders." Ct and Ck note with regard to the adjective "all (sarve)" that we must, of course, exclude Suṣeṇa, who has been left in command of the encampment.

"followed him wielding huge boulders and . . . gigantic trees" anujahrur mahāśailān . . . mahādrumān: Literally, "they imitated [him, wielding] great boulders [and] great trees." The syntax is elliptical. If we take the verb anujahruḥ to mean "they took up after," governing the accusatives mahāśailān, "huge boulders," and mahādrumān, "huge trees," then we lack a necessary verb of motion. Cg understands the verb anujahruḥ to mean that, in keeping with military protocol, a king's retainers carry his weapons for him. Therefore, the monkeys are carrying Sugrīva's trees and boulders to give to him at the proper moment (yathā mahārāje yuddhāya gacchati tadāyudhāni bhṛtyā āharanti tathā vānararāje yuddhāya niṣkrāmati tadāyudhabhūtāñ chailavṛkṣādīn samaye dātuṃ vānarā ājahrur iti bhāvaḥ). Ñ,V,B2–4,D4,6,7,9–11,T2,3,G2,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the variant anujagmuḥ, "they followed," and propose supplying the gerund gṛhītvā, "having seized (gṛhītveti śeṣaḥ—so Ct)."

9. "began to slaughter" jaghāna: Literally, "he killed." D4,G1,2,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead jagāma, "he went [toward]." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead mamantha, "he crushed or annihilated."

"felling" pātayan: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead pothayan, "slaughtering."

10. "the mighty gale at the end of a cosmic age" yugāntasamaye vāyuḥ: Literally, "the wind at the time of the end of a yuga."

12. "Their heads shattered . . . crumpled" vikīrṇaśirasaḥ . . . nikṛttāḥ: Literally, "scattered . . . cut down." GPP and NSP (6.96.12) read vikarṇaśirasaḥ, "having heads devoid of ears." This peculiar reading is not recorded in the critical apparatus. It is, however, rendered by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 319) as "aux têtes sans oreilles." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 281), who renders, "their heads shorn of their ears." The texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr, as well as B1,D1–3,7,9–11,13, then read vikīrṇāḥ, "scattered," for nikṛttāḥ, "crumpled."

13–14. "routed" prabhagneṣu: Literally, "broken." See 6.44.7; 6.55.29,113; 6.68.24; 6.87.8; and notes, where the term is used similarly.

"took up his bow" dhanvī: Literally, "having a bow."

"the back of a war-elephant" gajaskandham: Literally, "the shoulder of an elephant."

15. "the great chariot-warrior" mahārathaḥ: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,7–13,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead mahābalaḥ, "of great strength." See 6.60.3; 6.72.33; 6.80.6; 6.81.18; 6.83.8 and notes. Cf. 6.77.36.

"unleashing a terrifying roar" vinadan bhīmanirhrādam: Literally, "roaring a terrible sound." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the finite verb nanarda, "he roared," for the present participle vinadan, "[he] roaring."

16. "rallying . . . he made them hold their lines: sthāpayāmāsa . . . saṃpraharṣayan: Literally, "cheering [them], he made [them] stay."

17. "irascible . . . flew into a rage" cukrodha ca mahākrodhaḥ: Literally, "and the one of great anger became angry." Because of the redundancy, we believe one should take the epithet mahākrodhaḥ to refer to a general condition. Sugrīva's notoriously short temper is alluded to by the monkeys in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa (4.52.22–30), when Aṅgada expresses his fear of being executed by the wrathful Sugrīva should they return unsuccessful from their search for Sītā. Ñ2,V2,B1,2,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read cukrośa, "he cried out, roared," for cukrodha, "he was angry or he became angry."

18. "in battle" saṃpradhane: D10,11,T1,G3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Ck, and Ct read the nominative saṃpradhanaḥ in place of the locative. This reading is rather difficult to construe, and the commentators struggle to interpret it. Ct reads the term as a bahuvrīhi compound with the sense "whose combat was proper (samyakpradhanaṃ yuddhaṃ yasya saḥ)." Ck appears to read the upasarga sam in the sense of samāna, "equal," glossing, "for whom battle [all battles?] was equal (samānaṃ pradhanaṃ yuddhaṃ yasya saḥ)." Cg takes the suffix ana as agentive and reads the term to mean "fighter, warrior." (saṃpradhanaḥ bahulagrahaṇāt kartari lyuṭ. prahartety arthaḥ.) Crā, who rarely comments on any textual question, believes the appropriate reading should be the locative, explaining that "saṃpradhane means 'in battle' (saṃpradhane yuddhe)." Translators who read the variant generally take the term in the sense of "valiant, fighting well, etc."

"Virūpākṣa's great war-elephant" asya . . . taṃ mahāgajam: Literally, "that great elephant of his."

"in the face" pramukhe: We follow the interpretation of Cg, who glosses, "in the face (mukhe)," and those of Ct and Ck, who, perhaps uncertain as to whether an elephant has a face per se, gloss, "in the protuberant region of the face (prakṛṣṭe mukhapradeśe)." The locative pramukhe can also be read adverbially, in the sense "facing, in front of, opposite to," and several of the translators consulted understand it in this way.

19. "staggered back a bow length" apāsarpad dhanurmātram: Literally, "retreated to the measure of a dhanuḥ." On the measurement of a dhanuḥ, see 6.53.34 and note.

"and collapsed, bellowing" niṣasāda nanāda ca: Literally, "he sank down and bellowed."

22. "In his rage at Virūpākṣa . . . at him" sa hi tasyābhisaṃkruddhaḥ . . . virūpākṣāya: Literally, "enraged at him . . . at Virūpākṣa" D8,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sa hi tasyāpi[atha—D8] saṃgṛhya, literally, "taking from him as well," for sa hi tasyābhisaṃkruddhaḥ. This weak reading is interpreted by Ct to mean "having received the blow given by him [Virūpākṣa] (tasyāpi tenāpi dattaṃ prahāraṃ saṃgṛhya gṛhītvā)."

23. "struck Sugrīva" prāharat: Literally, "he struck."

Following verse 23, D6,7,9–11,S insert a passage of five lines [1910*]: "Struck with that sword stroke by the powerful rākṣasa, the heroic[1] monkey was rendered unconscious for a moment.[1–2] But then, suddenly springing up, he clenched his fist and brought it down with force upon the rākṣasa's chest in that great battle.[3–4] Struck with the blow of that fist, the night-roaming rākṣasa Virūpākṣa . . .[5]"

[1]"heroic" vīraḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bhūmau, "on the ground."

24. "Sugrīva's armor" sugrīvasya . . . kavacam: This is one of the extremely rare instances in the poem in which a monkey is said to be equipped for battle with anything other than trees, stones, and other found objects. Cg is struck by this and notes that we must understand by this reference that Sugrīva actually wore armor (anena sugrīvasyāpi kavacadhāraṇam astīti gamyate). Pagani (1999, p. 1671) also notes this use of military equipment by monkeys. See 6.63.46 and note.

"Struck with that sword, the monkey" sa khaḍgābhihataḥ: Literally, "struck with the sword, he." D9–11,G2,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead padbhyām abhihataḥ, "struck with [his] two feet." Dutt (1893, p. 1442) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1773) appear to follow Cr in taking this variant to mean that Virūpākṣa uses his feet to knock Sugrīva down. The other translators understand it to mean that Sugrīva falls to his knees.

26. "skillfully" naipuṇyāt: Literally, "out of dexterity, proficiency."

"the blow" talaprahāram: Literally, "the blow of the palm, slap."

"in return struck him" enam . . . atāḍayat: Literally, "he struck him."

28. "temple" śaṅkhadeśe: The commentators understand, "the region of the bone[s] of the forehead (lalāṭāsthipradeśe)." Cm and Cg cite Amarakośa 3.3.18 for this meaning (śaṅkho nidhau lalāṭāsthnīty amaraḥ). Earlier the commentators understood the term to refer to the temporal bones at the corners of the eyes, and we follow this interpretation here as well. See 6.38.10 and note.

29. "drenched in gore and vomiting blood" rudhiraklinnaḥ śoṇitaṃ sa samudvaman: Literally, "he, wet with blood, vomiting blood."

Following verse 29, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1916*]: "Virūpākṣa [vomiting blood] from every orifice, like water from a spring . . ."

30. "Virūpākṣa appeared to the monkeys to have his eyes still more disfigured than before." dadṛśus te virūpākṣaṃ virūpākṣataraṃ kṛtam: Literally, "they saw that Virūpākṣa had been made even more virūpākṣa." The verse plays on the name Virūpākṣa, "having deformed eyes." Cf. 6.28.31 and note.

31. "as he rolled in convulsions from side to side" sphurantaṃ parivartantaṃ pārśvena: Literally, "[he] jerking, rolling on his side." See 6.27.2 and note.

"moaning" vinardantam: Literally, "crying."

32. "those . . . vast . . . armies . . . like two great oceans" balārṇavau . . . mahārṇavau dvāv iva: Literally, "those army-oceans . . . like two great oceans." The redundant force of the metaphor and simile makes a literal translation awkward. Cr, alone among the commentators, understands the term balārṇavau to mean "reservoirs of strength" and to refer not to the armies but to the single combatants Sugrīva and Virūpākṣa, whom he sees as having been dispatched into battle by the monkeys and the rākṣasas, respectively (vānararākṣasānāṃ vānararākṣasaiḥ saṃyati saṃgrāme saṃprayuktau niyojitau balārṇavau parākramasamudrau dvau sugrīvavirūpākṣau bhīmau mahārṇavāv iva sasvanatuḥ). This reading, which no translator adopts, has a certain appeal in that it follows the convention of summing up in a longer verse the preceding action and avoids the redundancy of the metaphor and simile mentioned above. On the other hand, it seems contextually awkward in light of the mortal blow delivered to Virūpākṣa at verse 28 and his piteous moaning in verse 31.

"crashed beyond their shorelines" bhinnavelau: Literally, "having broken banks or shorelines." The idea appears to be that two neighboring bodies of water flood a narrow intervening strip of land to merge tumultuously. D6,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read -setū, "banks or bridges," for -velau. Cf. 6.58.54 and note.

The meter is upendravajrā.

33. "the combined host" balaṃ samastam: Literally, " the whole army."

"the . . . rākṣasa Virūpākṣa, his eyes disfigured" virūpanetram: Literally, "he of disfigured eyes." The term can be taken here either as a variant of Virūpākṣa's name or as a descriptive adjective. See note to verse 30 above. See, too, 6.28.31 and note.

"it became as agitated as the Ganges in raging flood" unmattagaṅgāpratimaṃ babhūva: Literally, "[it] was like the wild Gaṅgā." The commentators generally understand the term or its more or less synonymous variant (V1,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead udvṛttagaṅgā-) to mean "like the Gaṅgā when it has risen beyond its banks (udvelagaṅgā—so Cg, Ct, Ck, Cm)." The term unmattagaṅgā may resonate with the term unmattagaṅgam, which is the name of a region where the Gaṅgā flows rapidly and noisily (s.v. Apte). Ct suggests that the agitation of the monkey forces is expressive of their delight whereas that of the rākṣasas arises from their grief (vānarabalam ānandena rākṣasabalaṃ śokeneti śeṣaḥ).

The meter is upajāti.

3. "by the wrinkle-faced monkeys" valīmukhaiḥ: Literally, "by the wrinkle-faced ones." See 6.54.28; 6.55.2; 6.57.59; and 6.83.41.

"he realized that the fortunes of war had turned against him" yuddhe prekṣya daivaviparyayaṃ: Literally, "having perceived a reversal of fate in battle."

4. "tamer of his foes" ariṃdamam: V3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead anantaram, "without interval, next." Several of the translators who follow the text of Ct render this as an intensifier of samīpastham, "standing near."

"you are my only hope of victory" jayāśā tvayi me sthitā: Literally, "my hope of victory rests on you."

5. "Now is the time to repay your obligation to your master." bhartṛpiṇḍasya kālo 'yaṃ nirveṣṭum: Literally, "This is the time to repay [your] master's food." The southern commentators agree that the phrase bhartṛpiṇḍasya refers to the favors in the form of food, etc., that Mahodara, as a retainer, would have received from his master, Rāvaṇa (svāmikṛtānnādidānarūpopakārasya—so Cr). Cl understands slightly differently, glossing, "the favors that one is obliged to perform for one's master (bhartuḥ kartavyopakārasya)." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 302), in a note to the passage, expresses his opinion that the image here is derived from the funerary offerings of piṇḍas, or "balls of rice," presented to the departed. However, although the reference to piṇḍa might evoke such an image, the poet probably uses the term in its more general sense of "food." For this idiom, compare Mālavikāgnimitra 5.11.4.

6. "to the rākṣasa lord" rākṣasendram: D5,8–11,G1,M, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cg read the nominative rākṣasendraḥ for the accusative, which would make the compound modify Mahodara.

7. "urged on by his master's words and his own valor" bhartṛvākyena . . . svena vīryeṇa coditaḥ: Like some of the translations consulted, we understand that Mahodara is impelled both by Rāvaṇa's order and by his own valor. The commentators, however, propose reordering what they take to be the somewhat scattered syntax of the verse and understand that, although it is his master's command that urges him on, his valor is what enables him to slaughter the monkeys (bhartṛvākyena coditaḥ san svena vīryeṇa kadanaṃ cakra ity anvayaḥ—so Cg).

"that immensely powerful rākṣasa" mahābalaḥ: Literally, "the one of great power."

Following verse 7, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of six lines [1923*]: "The immensely powerful monkeys seized huge boulders and, plunging into the fearsome army of their enemies, slaughtered the night-roaming rākṣasas.[1][1–2] But Mahodara, in a rage, with his gold-ornamented arrows, hacked off the monkeys' hands, feet, and thighs in that great battle.[3–4] Then all the monkeys were severely harried by that rākṣasa.[2] Some of them fled in the ten directions, while others took refuge with Sugrīva.[5–6]"

[1]"the night-roaming rākṣasas" rajanīcarān: Literally, "the night-roamers." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sarvarākṣasān, "all the rākṣasas."

[2]"were severely harried by that rākṣasa" rākṣasenārditā bhṛśam: T2,3,G1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read rākṣasair arditā bhṛśam, "were severely harried by the rākṣasas." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead rākṣasānāṃ mahāmṛdhe, "in that great battle with (lit., of) the rākṣasas."

8. "who happened to be nearby" anantaram: Literally, "without interval." We follow the commentators who understand that Mahodara was near Sugrīva (anantaraṃ samīpastham—so Cg). Cf. verse 4 above.

9. "in order to kill Mahodara" tadvadhāya: Literally, "for the killing of him."

10. "unstoppable" durāsadām: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the redundant tataḥ śilām, "then the boulder."

11. "fell . . . like a frenzied flock of vultures descending" nipapāta . . . gṛdhracakram ivākulam: Literally, "it fell like an agitated circle or mass of vultures." The commentators observe that the only basis for this rather odd simile is the multiplicity of the stone fragments and the vultures (śilāyā anekadhā bhagnatvāt tatsādṛśyam—so Ct). A number of translators render ākulam here in its common meaning of "frightened." However, this fits the context poorly, since frightened birds would doubtless fly up and not down. We understand the image to be derived from the once-common sight in India of excited vultures descending en masse on some choice carcass.

12. "at the rākṣasa in the forefront of battle" rakṣase raṇamūrdhani: Ñ,V2,B2,4,D1–3,9–11,M1,2, the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr, and the editions of Gorresio (6.77.12) and Lahore (6.76.12—with slight variant) read instead taṃ sa (sa taṃ—Ñ2,V2,B2,4,D3) ciccheda naikadhā, "he cut it into many [pieces]."

"that . . . conqueror of enemy citadels" parapuraṃjayaḥ: D9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead parabalārdanaḥ, "that tormentor of enemy armies."

13. "He brandished . . . made a display of it before his foe" āvidhya . . . tasya darśayan: Literally, "he having brandished [it], [he] showing [it] to (lit., of) him." The idea apparently is that Sugrīva is brandishing the weapon menacingly in front of Mahodara. Ct, Ck, and Cg suggest supplying terms such as "dexterity or deftness of hand (hastalāghavam—so Ck, Ct)" as an object of the participle darśayan. Their idea is that Sugrīva is showing off his skill with the weapon.

"with its tip . . . violently" parighāgreṇa vegena: Literally, "with the tip of that iron club with force." Ñ,V1,3,B3,4,D3,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead parigheṇogravegena, "with that iron club of fierce impact."

15. "With one holding a mace and the other an iron club" gadāparighahastau: Literally, "the two with mace and iron club in hand."

Following verse 15, Ñ,V,B3,4,D3,5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines [1929*]: "Then, in a rage, the night-roaming rākṣasa Mahodara hurled his mace—blazing with the brilliance of the sun—at Sugrīva.[1–2] Seeing that extremely terrifying mace[1] hurtling toward him, immensely powerful Sugrīva, his eyes red with rage, raised his iron club[2] in that great battle.[3–4]"

[1]"Seeing that . . . mace" gadām: Literally, "the mace." We follow the suggestion of the commentators in supplying an appropriate verbal form (dṛṣṭveti śeṣaḥ—so Ct).

[2]"raised his iron club" samudyamya: Literally, "having raised." We follow the suggestion of the commentators in supplying the missing object of the gerund (parigham iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct).

16. "the rākṣasa's mace" gadāṃ tasya: Literally, "his mace."

"shattered by that mace" sa gadodbhinnaḥ: D9–11,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tarasā bhinnaḥ "swiftly or forcefully shattered."

18. "just as Mahodara hurled a second mace" so 'py anyāṃ vyākṣipad gadām: Literally, "and he, too, threw another mace." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read asya, "his," for anyām, "another."

19. "the two warriors closed in combat with their fists" muṣṭibhyāṃ tau samīyatuḥ: Literally, "the two came together with two fists."

"two . . . fires, eaters of oblations" hutāśanau: Literally, "two eaters of oblations."

20. "Slapping each other with their open hands" talaiś cānyonyam āhatya: Literally, "having struck each other with [their] palms." B2,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead talaiś cānyonyam āsādya, "having attacked each other with [their] palms."

21. "Jumping . . . to their feet" utpetatuḥ: Literally, "those two jumped up."

"The two . . . flailed at each other with their arms" bhujaiś cikṣipatuḥ: Literally, "The two struck with arms."

"yet neither could get the better of the other" anyonyam aparājitau: Literally, "the two were mutually undefeated."

Following verse 21, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1933*]: "Then the two heroes, scorchers of their foes, grew exhausted in that hand-to-hand combat."

22. "a sword and a shield that were lying nearby" khaḍgam adūraparivartinam . . . carmaṇā sārdham: Literally: "a sword remaining not far away along with a shield."

D9–11 and the text of Ct omit 22cd–23 ("The immensely swift rākṣasa Mahodara . . . and a shield"—rākṣasaś carmaṇā sārdhaṃ mahāvego mahodaraḥ). GPP includes 22cd–23, unnumbered in brackets, between 6.97.28 and 29. Translations that follow the text of Ct omit this passage and understand the verb "seized," ājahāra, in 22a to apply to each of the combatants. In this they follow Ct, who glosses the singular jahāra, "he seized," with the dual jahratuḥ, "those two seized."

23. D9–11 and the text of Ct omit 22cd–23. See note to verse 22 above.

"a huge sword and shield that had fallen" mahākhaḍgaṃ carmaṇā patitaṃ saha: Literally, "a great sword fallen together with a shield."

24. "the two warriors, skilled in the use of weapons" śastraviśāradau: Literally, "the two skilled in the use of weapons."

"hurled themselves . . . on the battlefield . . . in the fury of battle" abhyadhāvatām / . . . raṇe hṛṣṭau yudhi: Literally, "those two ran toward . . . on the battlefield, excited in battle."

25. "the two" ubhau tau: Curiously, Cr wants to read the dual pronoun ubhau as a bahuvrīhi compound, explaining it to mean "the two whose radiance was like that of Rudra (oḥ rudrasyeva bhā yayos tāv ubhau)."

"the two . . . circled . . . to the right and to the left" dakṣiṇaṃ maṇḍalaṃ ca . . . saṃparīyatuḥ: Literally, "the two moved around a rightward circle and." We follow the commentators, who understand the conjunction ca, "and," here to suggest that we should supply the phrase "and to the left (cakārād vāmam ca—so Ct)" and who gloss "the two circled (saṃparīyatuḥ)" with "the two made (akurutām—so Ct)."

26. "Sugrīva's great shield" mahācarmaṇi: Literally, "on the great shield." We follow Cr in supplying the proper name. D6,10,11,T2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahāvarmaṇi, "on the great armor."

27. "The sword lodged in the shield; and as Mahodara struggled to free it . . . the rākṣasa's head: lagnam utkarṣataḥ khaḍgam . . . śiraḥ: Literally, "the head of him who was withdrawing the stuck sword."

28. "When they saw that" tat . . . dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "that . . . having seen." The syntax of the verse is difficult and seemingly defective. The gerund dṛṣṭvā, "having seen," has no clear object. Commentators seek to remedy this by taking the pronoun tat, "that," to refer to the severed head of Mahodara (tac chiraḥ—so Cg). Cr additionally suggests that we read the genitives in pādas a–c as a generic ṣaṣṭhī for the accusative (saṃbandhasāmānyaṣaṣṭhī) so that we can then take rākṣasendrasya, "of the rākṣasa lord," as the object of dṛṣṭvā, "having seen." This would yield: "Having seen the rākṣasa lord fallen to the ground with his head cut off . . ." We have chosen to read the pronoun tat in an abstract sense to refer simply to Mahodara's decapitation.

"fled" tatra na tiṣṭhati: Literally, "[it] does not stay there." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead na dṛśyate for na tiṣṭhati, yielding the sense "it was not seen there," i.e., it vanished.

29. "Having slain Mahodara" hatvā tam: Literally, "having killed him."

"and he and his monkeys roared in unison" vānaraiḥ sārdhaṃ nanāda: Literally, "he roared together with the monkeys."

Following verse 29, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of ten lines [1940*]: "All the rākṣasas had dejected faces and despondent hearts. Their hearts overwhelmed with fear, they all fled.[1–2] Having hurled Mahodara to the earth like the shattered summit[1] of some great mountain, the son of Sūrya was as radiant with splendor as is unassailable Sūrya with his innate radiance.[2] [3–6] Then, having gained the victory, the great lord of the monkeys was praised[3] there, in the forefront of battle, by the joyful hosts of gods, perfected beings, and yakṣas, as well as the hosts of creatures who were present on earth.[4][7–10]"

[1]"the . . . summit" ekadeśam: Literally, "one part or portion." Given that Mahodara has been decapitated, we believe the reference here is to the summit of the mountain that forms the upamāna.

[2]Lines 3–6 constitute a verse in the upajāti meter.

[3]"the great lord of the monkeys was praised" vānarendraḥ . . . stuto mahātmā: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the participle nirīkṣamāṇaḥ (nirīkṣyamāṇaḥ—D7) for stuto mahātmā, giving the verse the sense "the great lord of the monkeys was gazed upon."

[4]Lines 6–10 constitute a verse in the puṣpitāgrā meter with a hypometric pāda d. D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the metrically correct but lexically irregular term haruṣa[samākulitaiḥ], "joyful," for harṣa[samākulitaiḥ], "joyful." Ct explains: "In the place of the word harṣa, there is the reading haruṣa to conform to the meter (harṣapadasthāne haruṣeti pāṭhaś chandonurodhāt)."

Sarga 86

1. "wrought havoc . . . upon" kṣobhayāmāsa: Literally, "he shook or agitated."

Following 1ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1943*]: "[When Mahodara was struck down] by Sugrīva, [Mahāpārśva], his eyes red with rage, glaring . . ."

2. "On every side" sarvaśaḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B,D2,3,4,7–13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead rākṣasaḥ, "the rākṣasa."

3. "the rākṣasa . . . cut off . . . shoulders" skandhāṃś ciccheda rākṣasaḥ: D1,2,3,8–10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead cicchedātha sa rākṣasaḥ, "the rākṣasa then cut off," thus omitting the reference to shoulders.

"tore open the sides of others" pārśvaṃ keṣāṃ vyadārayat: Literally, "of whom [pl.] he tore the side." Ś,V2,B1,D1–3,7–12, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead pārśvaṃ (pārśve—Ś,D7) keṣāṃcid ākṣipat (akṣipat—Ś,D12), "he struck the side of some of those [monkeys]."

4. "stunned" gatacetasaḥ: Literally, "those whose consciousness is gone." A number of the translations consulted understand the phrase here to mean "lost heart" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1778) or "lost courage" (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 285). The commentators are silent.

5. "great-armed" mahābāhuḥ: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–3,6,8–13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahāvegaḥ, "of great speed or force."

"he surged powerfully forward" vegaṃ cakre: Literally, "he made a powerful impulse."

"like the ocean on the new- or full-moon day" parvaṇi: Literally, "on the parvan day." The term is used to designate the four transitional days of the lunar cycle that are days of important observances in the vedic religion. These are the new-moon day, the full-moon day, the first-quarter day (the eighth day), and the third-quarter day (the fourteenth day). Since the spring tides occur on the new- and full-moon days, no doubt it is those two that are specifically intended here. See 5.2.54; 5.5.12; 5.46.15; 5.57.16; and notes. D5,7,9–11,T1,G1,3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct substitute the plural parvasu.

6. "an iron club" āyasaṃ parigham: Since the term parigha generally refers to a beam or a club made of or studded with iron, the adjective āyasa, "iron," here is somewhat redundant. See verse 12 and note. See, too, 6.3.12; 6.7.2; and notes.

7. "from his chariot . . . along with his charioteer" sasūtaḥ syandanāt: Ś2,Ñ2,V2,3, B1,4,D4,5,10,11,T2,3,G1,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read the sequence as a compound, sasūtasyandanāt, "from that chariot with its charioteer." Ck and Ct attempt to recuperate this banal reading by understanding the compound elliptically to mean that the charioteer had been slain (hatasūtasahitarathāt—Ct) or not slain (ahata[sūta]sahitarathāt—Ck) by the same blow. Ct's reading is rendered by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 325) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 285).

8. "Gavākṣa . . . accompanied by Jāmbavān, the king of the apes" sarkṣarājaḥ: Literally, "one who was accompanied by the king of the apes." Following Cg and Cm, who base their arguments, sensibly enough, on the mention of Gavākṣa starting in verse 11 below, we believe that the reference here is to the warrior Gavākṣa. (ṛkṣarājo jāmbavān tena sahitaḥ sarkṣarājo gavākṣaḥ. jāmbavantaṃ gavākṣaṃ cety uttaratra vakṣyamāṇatvāt.) The word ṛkṣarājaḥ is, as all commentators and translators agree, an epithet used almost exclusively to designate Jāmbavān. Cr, who shares the critical reading, appears to interpret the sequence sarkṣarājaḥ as a case of double sandhi for sa ṛkṣarājaḥ, that is, "that king of the apes." He thus understands the subject of the verse to be Jāmbavān himself (ṛkṣarājaḥ sa jāmbavān). Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D1–3,9–11,T2,3,G1,2,M2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read instead tasyarkṣarājaḥ, in which the subject again is Jāmbavān rather than his ally Gavākṣa. It is difficult, if not impossible, to construe the genitive pronoun tasya, and translators who follow this reading simply drop it. See 6.4.17; 6.39.25; and notes.

9. "Mahāpārśva's horses" aśvān: Literally, "horses."

"and smashed his chariot" syandanaṃ ca babhañja tam: Literally, "and he broke the chariot." Ck and Ct are at pains to show that the breaking of the chariot occurs only after the slaying of the horses. (śilāṃ gṛhītvāśvān jaghāna. anantaraṃ syandanaṃ taṃ babhañja—so Ct.) With this temporal sequence in mind, Ck, evidently thinking that the boulder has been used to kill the horses, suggests that the chariot is destroyed by a mace (anantaraṃ gadayā syandanaṃ ca babhañja—so Ck).

10. "after a short while" muhūrtāt: Literally, "after a moment."

11. "in the center of his chest" stanāntare: Literally, "between the breasts or in the interior of the chest."

"with many more" bahubhiḥ śaraiḥ: Literally, "with many arrows."

12. "a . . . iron club" parigham: See note to verse 6 above.

13–14. "Enraged" prakupitaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead saroṣākṣaḥ, "with his eyes full of rage."

"powerful" vegavān: Literally, "possessing speed or great force." B1,D5,10,11, T1,G3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the adverb vegavat, "forcefully or rapidly."

"that iron club" tam āyasam . . . parigham: See notes to verses 6 and 12 above.

15. "by the powerful monkey" balavatā: Literally, "by the powerful one."

"struck the bow and arrows from the rākṣasa's hand and knocked off his helmet" tasya rakṣasaḥ / dhanuś ca saśaraṃ hastāc chirastraṃ cāpy apātayat: Literally, "[it] caused the rākṣasa's bow with its arrows to fall from the hand and [it knocked down] the head protector." Ct and Ck believe that the iron club not only knocks Mahāpārśva's bow from his hand but takes his hand off with it as well. This, according to Ct, is indicated by the conjunction ca, "and," in pāda d, and is substantiated by the reference in verse 17 below, where the rākṣasa seizes a battle-axe in one hand. (cād ekaṃ hastaṃ śirastrāṇaṃ cāpātayat. ata evāgre vakṣyaty ekena kareṇeti—so Ct.)

16. "just below the ear, where his earring hung" karṇamūle sakuṇḍale: Literally, "at the root of the ear with its earring."

17. "with one hand" kareṇaikena: See note to verse 15 above.

18. "that weapon" tam: Literally, "it, that."

"honed with oil" tailadhautam: Literally, "washed with oil." Ck, Ct, and Cr note that the process is done for the sake of sharpening the axe (tailena dhautaṃ taikṣṇyārthaṃ saṃskṛtam—so Cr). Cg understands that the axe is spotless because of daily applications of oil (pratidinaṃ tailasecanān niṣkalmaṣam). Cg evidently believes that the blade is oiled to prevent rust.

"made of the essence of the mountains" śailasāramayam: Literally, "made of the essence of stone or mountain." Ck, Ct, and Cr take the compound śailasāra, "essence of stone or mountains," to be a kenning for iron (śailasāro 'yas tanmayam—so Ct). Cg does not define śailasāra specifically but takes the compound as figurative in the sense of "as hard as that (tadvat kaṭhinam ity arthaḥ)." Presumably he understands the reference to be to stone.

19. "Aṅgada's left shoulder blade" vāmāṃsaphalake: Literally, "on the flat part of the left shoulder."

20. "clenched" saṃvartayan: Literally, "clenching." D1,2,5,10,11,T1,G3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cr, Cm, Cg, and Ct read instead the irregular finite form, saṃvartayat, "he clenched." We follow Ct, who glosses, "he bound (babandha)." Cg understands, "he whirled or waved about (bhrāmayāmāsa)."

21. "Knowing all the body's vital points" marmajñaḥ: Literally, "knowing the mortal spots."

22. "By virtue of that blow" tena . . . nipātena: Literally, "by that descent."

"dead" hataḥ: Literally, "struck or slain."

23. "but Rāvaṇa flew into a tremendous rage" abhavac ca mahān krodhaḥ . . . rāvaṇasya tu: Literally, "and of Rāvaṇa there arose a great anger."

Following verse 23, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of seven lines [1961*]: "Then from the delighted monkeys there arose a mighty lion's roar, shaking, as it were, with its din the city of Laṅkā with its gateways and lofty towers.[1] Indeed, it was like the great and simultaneous roar of the gods along with Indra.[2][1–3] Now, when that enemy of Indra, the lord of the rākṣasas, heard the tremendous roar of the heaven-dwelling gods and of the forest-dwelling monkeys in battle, he was enraged, and, turning once more to face the battle, he took up his stand.[3][4–7]"

[1]"Laṅkā with its gateways and lofty towers" laṅkāṃ sāṭṭāṃ sagopurām: For aṭṭa, "tower," see notes to 6.33.28 and 6.62.6; and for gopura, "gateway," see note to 6.61.39.

[2]"like the great and simultaneous roar of the gods along with Indra" sahendreṇeva devānāṃ nādaḥ . . . mahān: Literally, "like the great sound of the gods together with Indra." Despite the term iva, "like," suggesting that this is merely a simile, it is apparent from the following verse that the gods actually do utter a triumphant roar at the same time as the monkeys do. We have therefore added the word "simultaneous" in an effort to clarify this issue. In this we follow Cv, Cm, and Cg, who make it clear that they understand that both the monkeys and the gods utter shouts of triumph (mahendreṇa saha devānāṃ nāda iva vānarāṇāṃ ca devānāṃ nādaḥ samabhavad ity arthaḥ—so Cg). D5,6,9,T1,G1,2,M1,3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cv, Crā, and Cg read instead mahendreṇa, "with great Indra."

[3]The meter of lines 4–7 is upajāti.

1–2. The syntax of the opening verses of this sarga in the critical edition, as well as the printed editions of the vulgate, is defective and confused. Pādas ab of verse 1 form a relative clause governed by the gerund dṛṣṭvā, "having seen," and create an expectation of a finite verb of which Rāvaṇa would be the subject. No such verb is found in the text or recorded in the apparatus. In effect, these pādas are grammatically orphaned, as it were. The following lines, beginning with pādas cd of verse 1, introduce a new syntactical structure in which a shift is made to a locative absolute construction and the subject of the independent clause becomes Rāvaṇa's anger, krodhaḥ, found in pāda a of verse 2, while Rāvaṇa himself (pāda b of verse 2) becomes the object of the verb āviveśa, "it seized hold of, entered," in pāda a of verse 2. D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct attempt to address the difficulty by substituting the phrase sa rāvaṇaḥ, "he, Rāvaṇa," as a subject of the gerund dṛṣṭvā for the critical edition's tu rākṣasau, "and now the two rākṣasas." Ct then completes the remediation by suggesting that we supply a predicate phrase, "he grew angry (kruddho jāta iti śeṣaḥ)." The northern recension avoids the grammatical difficulty either by substituting a consistent locative absolute construction (1962* and Lahore 6.79.1–2) or by providing a correctly structured relative correlative sequence of clauses (1963* and Gorresio 6.79.1–2).

3. "In killing those two, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa" hatvā tau rāmalakṣmaṇau: After noting the manifest meaning of the verse, Cm adds his own "inner meaning (vastutas tu)." In keeping with his ongoing project of deflecting any hint of hostility directed toward Rāma, he argues here, as before, that we must understand the gerund hatvā, "having slain," in the sense of gatvā, "having gone to, approached." See 6.80.29; 6.81.4; and notes. He continues this in the following two verses.

"I shall allay" apaneṣyāmi: Cm argues that Rāvaṇa will allay his grief by approaching Rāma but killing only his minions, Sugrīva, etc., who constitute "the branches" of Rāma's "tree" as described in verse 4 below (śākhārūpasugrīvādīn hatvā duḥkham apaneṣyāmīty arthaḥ).

4. "the tree that is Rāma" rāmavṛkṣam: Cm, continuing his inner reading of the passage from the preceding verse, provides an etymological interpretation of the word vṛkṣa. He says, "a vṛkṣa is that which 'cuts down,' that is, Rāma is the destroyer of his enemies. (vṛścayatīti vṛkṣas tam. śatrusaṃhārakaṃ rāmam ity arthaḥ.)" Compare Śaṅkarācārya's similar etymology for the "world tree (saṃsāravṛkṣa)" in his bhāṣya to the Kaṭhopaniṣad 2.3.1 (or 6.1) (vṛkṣaś ca vraścanāt).

"which dispenses fruit and has Sītā for its blossom" sītāpuṣpaphalapradam: The compound is somewhat ambiguous in its meaning and lends itself to various interpretations. We follow Cm and Crā in taking it as a dvandva in which Rāma's role as a dispenser of fruits is independent of his having Sītā for his flower or blossom (sītāpuṣpaṃ yasya saḥ sa cāsau phalapradaś ceti sītāpuṣpaphalapradas tam). Ck and Ct understand similarly but add that Rāma dispenses fruit arising from various actions to all the monkeys by means of that blossom that is Sītā (sītāpuṣpaṃ yasya saḥ sa cāsau tenaiva puṣpeṇa sarveṣāṃ vānarāṇāṃ tat tat karmajaphalapradas tam—so Ct). Cr, in a similar vein, notes that the tree that is Rāma dispenses fruit by means of a blossom in the form of Sītā (sītārūpapuṣpeṇa phalaṃ pradadāti). The intention of the metaphor, as Ct and Ck suggest, is that, since Rāma is the root of the entire struggle, cutting him off will end Rāvaṇa's difficulties (mūlocchedaṃ kariṣyāmīty āśayena rāmaṃ sarvāśrayamahāvṛkṣatvena nirūpayati). This idea is perhaps confirmed by the apparent gloss in the reading [1966*] of most northern manuscripts, as well as the editions of Gorresio (6.79.5–6) and Lahore (6.79.5–6), where Rāvaṇa makes it clear that, in destroying Rāma, all his dependents will be similarly destroyed. On the other hand, it is possible to interpret the critical text to suggest that, with the felling of the tree that is Rāma and the cutting off of its branches in the form of the monkey warriors, the delightful blossom in the form of Sītā will finally fall to Rāvaṇa.

Following verse 4, D5–7,9–11,13,S insert a passage of two lines [1969*]: "and Mainda, Dvivida, Aṅgada, Gandhamādana, Hanumān, Suṣeṇa, and all the troop leaders of the tawny monkeys."

6. "its boar, deer, and elephants" savarāhamṛgadvipāḥ: Manuscripts show considerable variation in the construction of this compound. The texts and printed editions of Ct (NSP and GPP 6.99.7d) read instead trastasiṃhamṛgadvijāḥ, "with its lions, deer, and birds terrified."

7. "Rāvaṇa then produced" cakāra: Literally, "he made."

"the . . . divine weapon-spell, the Tāmasa, bringer of darkness" tāmasam . . . astram: Literally, "the tāmasa astra." The commentators understand the weapon-spell to be the one whose presiding spirit is Rāhu, the demon of darkness or the eclipse (tāmasaṃ rāhudevatākam astram—so Cr). A divine weapon-spell of this name, it should be noted, is among those Viśvāmitra confers upon Rāma at 1.26.17.

"and, with it, he scorched" nirdadāha: Literally, "he burned."

"They fled on every side." prapetuḥ samantataḥ: The verbal root √pat is ambiguous in that it can mean "to fall" or "to flee." Translators have chosen one or another of these possible meanings. The reading of the Lahore edition (6.78.44), however, clearly has the monkeys fall to the earth (prapetur mahītale). The large majority of manuscripts and the remainder of the printed editions clearly understand, in their following verses [1973*], that the monkeys are fleeing.

Following verse 7, Ñ,V1,3,B,D4–7,9–11,T,G1,3,M, and all printed editions consulted except for Lahore insert a passage of two lines [1973*]: "A fearsome cloud of dust[1] arose as the monkeys broke and fled.[2] For they could not withstand that weapon[3] that had been created by Brahmā himself."

[1]"A fearsome cloud of dust" rajo ghoram: Literally, "fearsome dust." V3,B1,3,D4,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read bhūmau, "from [lit., on] the earth," for ghoram, "fearsome."

[2]"as the monkeys broke and fled" tair bhagnaiḥ saṃpradhāvitaiḥ: Literally, "by those broken, fleeing ones." Cr understands by bhagnaiḥ that the monkeys are broken in body (aṅgabhaṅgaṃ prāptaiḥ).

[3]"that weapon" tat: Literally, "that."

8. "routed" bhagnāni: Literally, "broken." See 6.44.7; 6.55.29,113; 6.68.24; 6.84.13–14; and notes, where the term is used similarly.

"he took up his battle stance" paryavasthitaḥ: Literally, "[he] stood." We follow Cr, who glosses, "he became ready for battle (yuddhāyodyukto 'bhavat)."

Following verse 8, D5–7,9–11,T,G1,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [1974*]: "Since[1] that tiger among rākṣasas had put the army of tawny monkeys to flight . . ."

[1]"Since" yataḥ: All printed editions of the text that include this line read instead tataḥ, "then." The critical apparatus takes no notice of any such variation.

9–10. Cg offers a theological reading of the passage beginning with 1974* (see note above) and continuing through verse 10. He understands: "[By the fact] of Rāma's being unconquerable, and because of his having abandoned all enmity through his being the repository of limitless graciousness [and] the object to be constantly meditated upon, the stupidity and misfortune of Rāvaṇa, who has failed to immerse himself in the ocean of the nectar of the physical beauty of Śrī Rāma, which is enhanced by that great and splendid bow, which is, as it were, causing to flow the current of nectar, is expressed (tata ityādi sārdhaślokadvayena rāmasyāparājitatvaṃ niravadhikasaundāryanidhitvena vairaṃ vihāya nirantarānubhāvyatvaṃ rāvaṇasya durbuddhitvam amṛtapravāham āvarteneva mahatā dhanurvareṇāvartitaṃ śrīrāmadehalāvaṇyāmṛtapūram anavagāhamānasya tasya daurbhāgyaṃ cocyate)."

"Rāvaṇa" saḥ: Literally, "he." Although Rāma himself was the subject of the previous verse, the context obliges us to understand that the pronoun refers to Rāvaṇa.

"like Vāsava with Viṣṇu" viṣṇunā vāsavaṃ yathā: The simile derives its logic, as Cr points out, from the fact that Viṣṇu, sometimes called Upendra, "junior Indra," is, since he is born in his dwarf incarnation as the child of Kaśyapa and Aditi, the parents of the vedic gods, considered to be Indra's younger brother. See 6.40.43; 6.47.119; 6.49.1–2; 6.53.26; 6.59.7; 6.105.15,24; and notes. See, too, 1.28.2 and note.

"Holding aloft" avaṣṭabhya: We believe that the figure in the verse makes it apparent that we are to understand the verb ava $\sqrt{}$ṣṭambh in its sense of "to hold, support" rather than, as several translators consulted have done, in its sense of "to lean on."

Following verse 10, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1976*]: "Then the mighty and immensely powerful Rāma together with Saumitri . . ."

11. "routed" bhagnān: See note to verse 8 above.

"delighted" hṛṣṭaḥ: According to Cr, Rāma attains mental delight at the thought, "now I will see a real (lit., great) battle" (mahāyuddhaṃ drakṣyāmīti buddhyā prāptaharṣa ity arthaḥ). Cg believes Rāma is gratified that his archenemy has at last appeared (cirād vairī samāgata iti saṃtuṣṭaḥ).

12. "he began to twang" visphārayitum ārebhe: Cg believes that Rāma's delay in actually shooting arises from his thought: "Will Rāvaṇa now finally submit?" This, Cg believes, is an indication of Rāma's compassionate nature. (visphārayitum ārebha ityādi. vilamboktyā kim idānīm api vā nato bhaviṣyati rāvaṇa iti rāmasya dayālutocyate.)

"powerfully and loudly" mahāvegaṃ mahānādam: Literally, "having great force, having great noise." We read the compounds adverbially with the infinitive construction rather than, as do most translations consulted, adjectivally with dhanuḥ, "bow," in pāda b.

13. Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,6–8,10–12,T2,3,M2,3, and the texts and printed editions of the commentators, as well as the editions of Gorresio and Lahore, transpose verses 13 and 14. This order of the verses has been followed in all translations consulted.

"he looked like Rāhu, the demon of the eclipse" sa babhūva yathā rāhuḥ: Literally, "He was just like Rāhu."

"as he bears down upon the sun and the hare-marked moon" samīpe śaśisūryayoḥ: Literally, "in the vicinity of the one with the hare and of the sun." Cg and Crā note that the simile is based on the idea of Rāhu approaching the two heavenly bodies on the new-moon day, when they would be in conjunction. Crā is so impressed with the aptness of the figure of the maleficent demon bearing down upon the splendid princes that he notes that the subject and object of comparison are one and the same (atikrūrasvabhāvasya rāvaṇasya rāmalakṣmaṇayoḥ samīpāgamanam amāvāsyāyāṃ rāhoś candrasūryasamīpāgamanam iveti kṛtvā dṛṣṭāntadārṣṭāntikayor aikarūpyam—so Crā). It is difficult to conceive of an eclipse of the new moon.

14. On the order of verses 13 and 14, see note 13 above.

"The streams of Rāvaṇa's arrows and the sound of Rāma twanging his bow knocked . . . down" rāvaṇasya ca bāṇaughai rāmavisphāritena ca / śabdena . . . tena petuḥ: Literally, "they fell because of the floods of Rāvaṇa's arrows and the sound that was Rāma's twanging." No commentators remark on the seeming oddity of Rāvaṇa's appearing to shoot down his own forces. A number of northern manuscripts attempt to correct this situation by substituting Lakṣmaṇa's name for Rāvaṇa's in pāda a.

15. "Rāvaṇa" tam: Literally, "him."

"with his own sharp arrows" niśitaiḥ śaraiḥ: Literally, "with sharp arrows." Cr glosses, "possessing (lit., characterized by) arrows (śarair upalakṣitaḥ)."

16. "intercepted" pratyavārayat: Literally, "he warded off or obstructed."

"with his own arrows" bāṇaiḥ: Literally, "with arrows."

17. "one of Lakṣmaṇa's arrows with one of his own" ekam ekena bāṇena . . . lakṣmaṇasya: Literally, "one of Lakṣmaṇa's with one arrow."

18. "Then" tataḥ: Ś,B1,D1–3,8–12, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead raṇe, "in battle."

"leaving . . . aside" abhyatikramya: We agree with Cg, who understands that Rāvaṇa contemptuously breaks off his duel with Lakṣmaṇa since not even one of the latter's arrows has been able to strike him (ekasyāpi bāṇasya svasminn apatanād anādareṇātikramya). Cr, more simply, glosses, "leaving aside (tyaktvā)." Ct glosses, "having confounded with his arrows (bāṇair vyākulīkṛtya)." Translators understand the gerund in a variety of ways: "sautant par dessus" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 328); "leaping over" (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 288); "overpassing" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1782); "bypassing" (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 289); and "surpassing" (Dutt 1893, p. 1448).

"as immovable as a mountain" śailam ivācalam: The adjective acala, "immovable," is also a common kenning for mountain. B3,D4,6,9–11,T2,3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Crā, Cm, and Ct read instead śailam ivāparam, "like another or unsurpassable mountain." Translations that follow the text of Ct understand the term apara to mean either "another" or "unapproachable."

19. "And, as he advanced upon Rāma Rāghava in battle . . . upon him" sa saṃkhye rāmam āsādya . . . rāghavopari: Literally, "he, having approached Rāma in battle . . . upon Rāghava." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sa rāghavaṃ samāsādya . . . rākṣaseśvaraḥ, "he, the lord of the rākṣasas, having approached Rāghava."

20. "hurtling swiftly toward him" āpatitāḥ śīghram: Literally, "flying swiftly."

"loosed" -cyutāḥ: Literally, "fallen."

21. "those torrents of immensely powerful arrows" tāñ śaraughān . . . mahāvegān: Literally, "arrow-streams with tremendous impact." Ś,D1–5,8–12,T1,G1,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead mahāghorān, "immensely fearsome."

"angry" kruddhān: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the redundant śarān, "arrows."

22. "showered . . . with . . . arrows" śarair abhivavarṣatuḥ: D7,9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead śaravarṣair vavarṣatuḥ, "those two showered with showers of arrows."

23. "Never yet defeated in battle" samareṣv aparājitau: Literally, "unconquered in battles." We take the term to be a general qualification of the two warriors, even though Rāvaṇa was technically defeated by Rāma earlier in sarga 47. Ct and Cm, however, gloss, "unimpaired, unrepulsed (apratihatau)," apparently understanding the term to refer to the specific battle at hand. The majority of translators understand similarly.

"in an astonishing way" citram: All translators consulted understand citram to be an adjective modifying maṇḍalam, "circle," taking the term to mean either "marvelous" or "various." We, however, have taken the term as an adverb.

"in battle . . . keeping his eyes on the trajectory of the other's arrows" bāṇavegān samudvīkṣya samareṣu: Literally, "in battles . . . having watched the impacts of the arrows." Our understanding of the phrase is that each of the warriors is keeping his eye on the path of the incoming arrows loosed by his adversary and is thus able to avoid being struck. The only translator to read similarly to the critical edition is Gorresio (6.79.54), whose text reads bāṇavegaṃ samīkṣyantau, which he translates as "avendo l'occhio attento all'impeto de'dardi" (1858, vol. 10, p. 155).

D9–11,G1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the ablative singular bāṇavegāt, "from the impact of [his] arrows," for the accusative plural bāṇavegān, "the impacts of the arrows." D5,9–11,T1,G1,3,M1,3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read samutkṣiptau, "[those two] hurled," for samudvīkṣya, "having watched." Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B,D1–3,7–12,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read anyonyam, "each other, mutually," for samareṣu, "in battles." The text of Ct thus reads bāṇavegāt samutkṣiptāv anyonyam [aparājitau], "with the speed of their arrows, those two [undefeated] shot at each other." Ct glosses, "the two shot at each other forcefully or swiftly (anyonyaṃ vegāt samutkṣiptavantau)." Cm, who reads bāṇavegān with the critical edition, glosses, "they hurled [away] the force of each other's arrows, that is, they fended them off (anyonyaṃ bāṇavegān samutkṣiptau samutkṣiptavantau nivārayantāv iti yāvat)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 289), who follows Cm, translates, "rendering nugatory the other's fusillade of arrows." Dutt

(1893, p. 1449) inexplicably renders, "uprooting the earth with the vehemence of their arrows."

24. "all creatures" bhūtāni: Literally, "beings."

"those two fierce warriors" raudrayoḥ: Literally, "of the two fierce ones."

"like Yama and Death himself, ender of all things" yamāntakanikāśayoḥ: The compound is somewhat ambiguous. The epithet antaka, "ender," is most commonly used of Yama himself and, for that matter, is a kenning for death. Thus, we normally translate antaka as "Yama, the ender of all things." One could, as Dutt (1893, p. 1449) has done, understand the two names to be in apposition so that the compound would mean,"[the two of them were] like Yama, the ender." However, the context would generally require the upamāna to consist of two entities, as does the upameya (Rāma and Rāvaṇa). The only commentator to propose an interpretation, Cg, understands, "Yama and his ender, i.e., Rudra (yamatadantakau yamarudrau)," but we find this unpersuasive. This idea is followed only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 289), who renders, "like Yama (the god of death) and his destroyer (Rudra)." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1782) appears to try to separate out two functions associated with Yama, rendering, "the god of retribution and the god of death." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 328), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 288) and Pagani (1999, p. 1140), simply understands the reference to be to two entities, Yama and Antaka, without attempting to differentiate them. Our rendition is closest to that of Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 155), who translates, "pari a Yama ed alla Morte."

26. "fletched with vulture feathers" gṛdhrapatraiḥ: Literally, "having vulture feathers." Ct and Cr understand that the arrows are bound with these feathers (gṛdhrapatrais tadbandhanaiḥ—so Ct). Cg understands that it is the vulture-feather fletching that makes the arrows so extremely swift and that they have beautiful fletching (gṛdhrapatair hetubhiḥ suvājitaiḥ saṃjātaśobhanapakṣaiḥ). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 328), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 288), translates, "garnies de plumes de hérons." Cf. note 6.35.12.

"made the sky appear to be densely covered with latticework" gavākṣitam ivākāśam: Literally, "the sky was as if latticed." We agree with Ct, Ck, and Cg, who gloss, "in which latticework was produced (saṃjātagavākṣam)." For some reason, the majority of translations consulted take the underlying noun gavākṣa in its other common sense of "a hole, airhole, or window," but this appears to make little sense in this context. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 289) combines the two meanings, rendering, "it seemed to convert it into lattice windows," while Pagani (1999, p. 1140), who renders, "fut en quelque sorte tissé," seems to approximate the proper meaning. See 6.109.1. Cf. 6.45.26; 6.50.3; and notes.

27. "With their arrows, the two heroes then created a massive and fearsome darkness" śarāndhakāraṃ tau bhīmaṃ cakratuḥ paramaṃ tadā: Literally, "Then the two made a supreme and fearsome arrow-darkness." D5,9–11,T1,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read ākāśam, "the sky," in place of tau bhīmam, "those two . . . fearsome." In this reading, śarāndhakāram, "arrow-darkness," must be read as a bahuvrīhi compound modifying ākāśam. The phrase would then mean "the two made the sky dark with arrows." D5,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read prathamam, "first of all," for paramam, "supreme." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read samaram, "battle," for paramam, in which case śarāndhakāram modifies samaram, giving the sense "the two made the battle dark with arrows." This variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 289), who renders, "made darkness descend on the battle-ground with their arrows." Cf. 6.92.9 and note for a similar image of arrows darkening the battlefield.

"as might two vast storm clouds arising at sunset" gate 'staṃ tapane cāpi mahāmeghāv ivotthitau: Literally, "and like two large clouds arisen when the hot one [i.e., the sun] has gone to the setting [mountain]." The commentators discuss the basis for the simile in terms of the camatkāra, or "strikingness," of poetic language. Ct, observing that there is nothing striking about the fact of clouds producing darkness at night, argues that we should understand the indeclinable api, "also," to mark an ellipsis that, when supplied, would indicate that the sun, having set, then rises. His idea is that the storm clouds then block out the risen sun during the daytime, which makes the simile more striking. (apiśabdād astācalaṃ tyaktvodayādriṃ gate 'pīty arthaḥ. divāpīti yāvat. yat tu yathāśrutarītyā rātrāv apīti vyācakṣate tatra na kaścic camatkāraḥ.) Cs disagrees with Ct. He claims that "the strikingness (camatkāra)" of the figure comes from the fact that the clouds create additional darkness during the evening by covering up the moon, etc. He quotes Ct, ridiculing him by saying that his assertion that the figure lacks "strikingness (camatkāra)" itself lacks "strikingness (camatkāra)." (candrādikam ācchādya satimirīkaraṇaṃ camatkāra iti "na kaścic camatkāraḥ," iti nāgojibhaṭṭoktir eva niścamatkārā.) Cs also proposes an alternative reading in which the warriors act like two great clouds in such a way that [with the darkness they create] they make the sun appear to be setting when it is actually shining (yadvā tapane sūrye saty astaṃ gata iva yathā tathā mahāmeghāv iva cakratuḥ).

28. "A tumultuous battle . . . then raged" babhūva tumulaṃ yuddham: D9–11,M2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tayor abhūn mahā[mahad—M2]-yuddham, "there was a great battle between the two."

"like that between Vṛtra and Vāsava" vṛtravāsavayor iva: Despite his characterization of the battle as unique, the poet cannot resist the temptation to compare it to the great mythic battle between Indra and Vṛtra that serves as the gold standard of comparison for all great epic duels. See note to 6.75.31.

"unequaled" anāsādyam: Literally, "unapproachable, unattainable." Cr glosses, "not to be accomplished by others (anyaiḥ kartum aśakyam)." Cg explains, "impossible to accomplish by anyone prior to this (itaḥ pūrvaṃ kenāpi durlabham)."

29. "skilled in the use of weapons" śastraviśāradau: Ñ,V,B2–4,D4,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read yuddha-, "battle," for śastra-, "weapons," lending the compound the sense "skilled in battle."

"and they both hurled themselves at each other in battle" yuddhe viceratuḥ: Literally, "those two attacked or moved about in battle."

30. "As they maneuvered, waves of arrows preceded them" ubhau hi yena vrajatas tena tena śarormayaḥ . . . jagmuḥ: Literally, "by which [way] the two moved, by that very [way] arrow-waves went." Ct, Ck, Cm, and Cg understand that these are the circular movements (maṇḍalacāreṇa) referred to earlier in verse 23 above.

31. "Rāvaṇa, who makes the world cry out" rāvaṇo lokarāvaṇaḥ: See note to 6.8.12.

"his hands working swiftly" saṃsaktahastaḥ: Literally, "whose hand or hands was/were engaged or attached." The compound is elliptical and ambiguous. The southern commentators gloss, "whose hand was engaged in deploying his arrows (bāṇaprayoga āsaktahastaḥ—so Ct, Ck)." Cl, cited in Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 303, n. 73), understands, "whose hands were firmly fixed to the bow and the bowstring (dhanuṣi guṇe ca saṃsaktau saṃyuktau hastau yasya saḥ)."

32. "that chain of iron arrows" tām: Literally, "that."

33–34. "divine weapon-spell of Rudra" raudram astram: See 6.55.78 and note.

"Allowing no interruption in the stream of his arrows, he . . . them" tāñ śarān . . . acchinnasāyakaḥ: Literally, "he whose arrows were uninterrupted (lit., uncut) . . . those arrows." We understand the compound as do Ck and Ct, who gloss, "of uninterrupted arrows, that is, whose hail of arrows was sent forth without gaps. (avyavacchinnasāyakaḥ. nirantarapravartitabāṇavarṣa iti yāvat.)" Cs interprets similarly.

D5,7,T1,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Crā and Cg omit 34cd, "Allowing no interruption in the stream of his arrows, he loosed them toward the lord of the rākṣasas (tāñ śarān rākṣasendrāya cikṣepācchinnasāyakaḥ)."

35. "harmlessly" na vyathāṃ janayan: Literally, "they did not cause harm." The commentators note the irregular absence of the augment in the verbal form.

36. "with a splendid, divinely charged weapon" paramāstreṇa: It is normal for Vālmīki to specify the identity of a special astra, although the critical text does not do so here. Some northern manuscripts (Ñ,V,B2–4) and the edition of Gorresio (6.79.66) identify the weapon as the gāndharva astra. See Introduction, p. 112.

"pierced . . . through the forehead" lalāṭe . . . abhinat: Ś,B1,D1–5,8,9,12,T,G1,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Crā, and Cm read raṇe, "in battle," for the verb [a]bhinat, "he pierced." Since the variant reading provides no finite verb for the sentence, these commentators are obliged to supply a verb, such as mumoca, "he loosed, shot." They then must provide an object for this verb in the form of "arrows that are charged with the paramāstra (splendid divine weapon-spell)" (paramāstreṇa śreṣṭhāstramantreṇa yojitān bāṇān mumocety adhyāhartavyam—so Cm). Crā justifies this interpretation by noting the mention of arrows in the plural in the following verse (samanantaraśloke bāṇabahutvābhidhānāt). These commentators additionally take the locative lalāṭe, "in the forehead," to mean "toward the forehead" (lalāṭe lalāṭaviṣaye, lalāṭam uddiśyeti yāvat—so Crā).

"the rākṣasa lord . . . latter: rākṣasādhipam . . . Literally, "the rākṣasa lord."

37. "those arrows . . . were deflected" te . . . -pratikūlitāḥ: Literally, "they were deflected or warded off." These would presumably be the various arrows charged with the divine weapon-spell mentioned in verse 36 above. The passage, as it is constructed in the critical edition and the vulgate, seems to suffer from a problem in its narrative sequence. Rāvaṇa appears to be able to deflect or evade Rāma's weapons, whether singular or plural here, except for the awkward fact that, in verse 36cd, he was shot through the head. This seeming inconsistency may be behind the fact that the subrecension of Crā, Cm, Cv, and Cg replaces the verb abhinat, "he pierced," with raṇe, "in battle," in 36d as mentioned above, thus making the passage merely state that Rāma shot at Rāvaṇa, not that he hit him. The northern editions of Lahore (cf. 6.78.72–74) and Gorresio (cf. 6.79.64–67) omit any reference to Rāvaṇa's being struck in the forehead. Cv attempts to address the incongruity by proposing that we invert the order of verses 36 and 37, but this does not seem to address the problem adequately.

Crā understands the participle pratikūlitāḥ, "warded off," to mean "shattered by Rāvaṇa with his opposing missile (rāvaṇena pratyastreṇa khaṇḍitāḥ)." It is difficult, however, to imagine that the broken arrows would then enter the earth.

"the splendid arrows" bāṇarūpāṇi: We follow Ck, Ct, and Cr in taking the suffix rūpa to suggest the excellence of the thing to which it is appended (praśaṃsāyāṃ rūpap [Pā

5.3.66]. praśastā bāṇāh—so Ct). Cs idiosyncratically takes the noun bāṇa, normally, "arrow," in its other sense, "body," and then understands the compound bāṇarūpāṇi to mean "beautifying the body." He then argues that Rāma's arrows beautify the body [of Rāvaṇa] by piercing his hands and other limbs before being deflected and entering the earth (te śarā bāṇarūpāṇi bāṇaṃ kāyaṃ rūpayanti sundarīkurvantīti tāni karādyaṅgāni bhittvā . . . bhūmiṃ viviśuḥ).

"like five-headed serpents" pañcaśīrṣā ivoragāḥ: Vālmīki normally employs this image to refer to people, not arrows. At 5.36.22, Rāma is quoted as comparing himself to a pañcavaktra serpent (pañcavaktreṇa bhoginā). This is repeated at 5.65.8. We translate the adjective there as "with jaws agape," following the interpretation of Cg, who, deriving the word pañca from the root √pac in the sense of "spread" or "extend," glosses, vyāttamukhena, "with mouth wide open." As an alternative explanation, he understands the reference to be to a serpent with five jaws, i.e., heads. It is this second interpretation that has been uniformly adopted by the translations consulted. See 5.65.8; cf. 5.49.21.

At 5.49.21, Sītā is described as pañcāsyām iva pannagīm, which we rendered as "like a five-headed cobra" (lit., like a five-mouthed she-cobra). Several of the commentators note that the simile serves to inform Rāvaṇa that Sītā will destroy him and his city with the fire of her grief, just as a cobra would with its fiery venom. The commentator Cs sees the five heads as a reference to the five principal characters who will ultimately bring about Rāvaṇa's downfall, viz., Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, the king [Sugrīva], Hanumān, and Sītā. However, as an alternative, he reads pañca as an adjective, meaning "spread or extended," and thus takes the compound to mean "with mouth agape." See 5.36.22; 5.65.8; and notes. Cf. 5.47.2–14 (verse 8). At 5.1.52, Hanumān's outstretched arms are said to resemble "five-headed serpents rearing up from a mountain." See note to verses 39–40 below.

38. "invoked yet another divine weapon-spell" anyad astraṃ samādade: Literally, "he took up another astra." The editors of the critical edition have marked, quite exceptionally for this volume, the verb samādade, "he took up," as uncertain. D5,9–11, T1,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read cakāra saḥ, "he made," for samādade. Ct glosses, "he produced or manifested (prāduścakāra)." D7,G2,M3, and the texts and printed edition of Cv(?), Cg, Crā, and Cm read the entire pāda somewhat differently: astraṃ prāduścakāra ha, "he produced an astra."

39–40. "The heads" -mukhān: Literally, "faces." The idea, however, appears to be that the arrowheads are shaped like the faces of the various animals mentioned.

"adjutant storks" kaṅka-: For a discussion of the identification of this bird in various epic contexts, see note to 6.35.12. Cf. 6.46.28; 6.47.127; 6.55.80; 6.87.26; 6.97.1; and notes.

"crows" -kāka-: Ñ2,V,D9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead -koka-. The term koka refers to a variety of animals, including the wolf, the cakravāka bird or ruddy goose, the frog, and a kind of lizard. Given the context in which predatory and scavenger animals are mentioned, only the wolf seems a plausible choice. This, in turn, however, creates a problem of apparent redundancy with the term īhāmṛga- in pāda 40a, and it is perhaps because of this that most of the translators choose to render, "ruddy goose or duck." See 5.23.5, where the term is translated as "wolf."

"falcons" -śyena-: The term refers to a variety of raptors, including falcons, hawks, eagles, kites, etc. See 4.57.26 and note. Cf. 6.31.11; 6.75.20; and notes.

"wolves" īhāmṛga-: See 5.7.12; 5.16.6–9; and notes.

"five-headed serpents with flickering tongues" pañcāsyāṃl lelihānān: Literally, "five-faced lickers." The term lelihāna is a kenning for snake, derived no doubt from the habit of these animals of flicking their tongues to receive sensory impressions. Ct, Ck, and Cs (first alternative) take the term pañcāsya separately from lelihāna. Ck takes the term as a kenning for lion, while Ct and Cs gloss, "with the heads of lions (siṃha-mukhān)." Although neither commentator makes this explicit, it would appear that they are taking the term in the sense "with gaping jaws," as some other commentators do elsewhere in the poem (compare 5.36.22; 5.49.21; 5.65.8; and notes). Only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1784) translates accordingly, rendering, "having the heads of terrible lions with their mouths wide open." Cs offers an alternative explanation, whereby the arrows themselves simply have five heads (pañcamukhāñ charān iti vā). See note to verse 37 above.

41–42. "employing his powers of illusion" māyābhiḥ: Literally, "by means of illusions." D5,T1,G1,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead māyāvī, "[he] possessed of the power of illusion." This variant is rendered only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 290), who translates, "The master wizard."

"sea monsters" makara-: See 6.14.8 and note. See, too, 5.7.6; 5.34.7; and notes.

"venomous serpents" -āśīviṣa-: Among the commentators, only Cg seems concerned about the apparent redundancy between this reference and the one- to five-headed serpents in 40c above. He claims that these are different serpents than those mentioned earlier (atrāśīviṣaśabdaḥ pañcāsyasarpetarasarpaparaḥ).

43. "Assaulted" samāviṣṭaḥ: Literally, "pervaded, overcome."

"invoked" sasarja: Literally, "he released." Here, as in the case of Rāvaṇa at verse 38ff. above, the idea is that the warrior employs a mantra to invoke the divine weapon-spell, which is then activated in the form of the numerous arrows fired under its influence. Cf. 6.90.15 and note.

"immensely energetic" mahotsāhaḥ: D5,7,9–11,T1,G1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the accusative mahotsāham, in which case the adjective must modify Rāma's astra and not Rāma himself.

"delight of the Raghus" raghunandanaḥ: D7,9–11,G1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead raghupuṃgavaḥ, "bull among the Raghus."

"the divine weapon-spell of Agni, the purifier . . . a weapon-spell" astram . . . pāvakam: Literally, "the pāvaka astra." Ck and Ct understand that the fiery divine weapon-spell of Rāma is the counter-missile to Rāvaṇa's missile of darkness, the tāmasa astra mentioned in verse 7 above (tamostrasya pratyastraṃ pāvakam iti tat sasarjety āha—so Ct).

44–45. "Rāma then released" sasarja: Literally, "he released."

"Some had heads like the moon or half-moon, while others had heads like comets" candrārdhacandravaktrāṃś ca dhūmaketumukhān api: D10,11, and the text of Ct omit this line (44cd). NSP also omits this line, while GPP prints the line, unnumbered, between verses 6.99.45 and 46.

"resembled" -varṇān: Literally, "having the appearance or color." B2–4,D4,5, T1,G2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Gorresio read instead -vaktrān, "having faces or mouths."

46. "Intercepted in the air . . . disappeared" -samāhatāḥ / vilayaṃ jagmur ākāśe: Literally, "struck or destroyed in the sky, they went to dissolution." The majority of translators read the locative more closely with the verbal phrase, "they disappeared [in the sky] (vilayaṃ jagmuḥ)."

"shattering into thousands of fragments" jagmuś caiva sahasraśaḥ: Literally, "and also they went by the thousand." Ñ2,V2,B2,D5,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read jaghnuḥ, "they struck, destroyed," for jagmuḥ, "they went." Ct and Cr understand that we should supply the word "monkeys (vānarān)" as the object of this verb. According to their reading, Rāvaṇa's arrows vanish only after having slain thousands of monkeys. This interpretation is shared only by Dutt (1893, p. 1450) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1784). Other translators who share this variant read jaghnuḥ passively or reflexively, understanding that the arrows themselves were destroyed.

47. "Rāvaṇa's divinely charged weapons" tadastram: Literally, "his astra or divinely charged weapon" or, reading tad astram, "that astra."

Following verse 47, Ñ,V,B2–4,D4–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [1992*]: "Surrounding Rāghava, those heroes, of whom Sugrīva was the foremost[1] . . ."

[1]"of whom Sugrīva was the foremost" sugrīvapramukhāḥ: Ñ2,V2,3,D9–11,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sugrīvābhimukhāḥ, "facing Sugrīva."

Following 1992*, D5–7,9–11,S continue with a passage of four lines [1993*]: "Then the great[1] Rāghava Dāśarathi, having forcefully destroyed the divinely charged weapon that had been loosed by the arm of Rāvaṇa, was filled with delight.[1–3] The monkey lords were similarly delighted and roared loudly.[4]"

[1]"great" mahātmā: M3 and the printed editions of Cg read instead mahāhave, "in the great battle."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila with a hypometric pāda c.

Sarga 88

1. "redoubled his fury . . . and . . . invoked . . . divine weapon-spell" krodhaṃ ca dviguṇaṃ cakre . . . astram: Literally, "made anger double and produced an astra." We agree with the commentators that one either must read the verb cakre, "he made or produced," to govern both the accusatives or repeat the verb cakre to govern the accusative astram, "divine weapon-spell."

2. "fierce . . . divine weapon-spell" raudram . . . astram: The adjective raudra, which we have rendered here as "fierce," is quite ambiguous in this context. Normally, with reference to a divine weapon-spell, one would understand it to mean "belonging to Rudra, as, for example, at 6.55.78 and 6.87.33–34. Since Rāma has invoked or deployed the raudra astra at least twice and Rāvaṇa has thwarted it in its most recent use, we hesitate to assign the use of this particular weapon to Rāvaṇa at this point. Among the commentators, only Cg addresses this issue. He unambiguously believes that this is the astra of the god Rudra (rudradevatākam). Ironically, it seems, all translations consulted share Cg's understanding, with the exception of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 290), who generally follows Cg closely. He, like us, renders, "fierce." See, too, notes to 6.55.78 and 6.87.33–34.

"by Maya, the craftsman of the asuras" mayena: Literally, "by Maya." Maya is the well-known artisan and architect of the asuras. He has a special relationship with Rāvaṇa, as Mandodarī, Rāvaṇa's chief queen, is said to be his daughter by the apsaras Hemā (6.7.2 and note; and Uttarakāṇḍa 12.3–18). See verses 30–31 below. This figure is well known in the Mahābhārata as the creator of the Pāṇḍavas' marvelous capital of Indraprastha (MBh 2.1–3) and in the purāṇas as the creator of Tripura, or the Triple City of the asuras. See note to 6.59.73. See, too, note to verses 30–31 below.

4. "the mighty gales" vātāḥ: Literally, "winds." Cf. 6.84.10 and note.

"and blazing darts" dīptāś cāśanayaḥ: The term aśani commonly refers to Indra's thunderbolt, but here, as in a number of places in the epic, the reference appears to be to a weapon. See note to verse 19 below. See, too, 5.3.32 and 6.69.16–17.

"various other sharp weapons" vividhās tīkṣṇāḥ: Literally, "various sharp [things]."

5. "that divine weapon-spell" tad astram: Literally, "that astra," or, reading tadastram, "his [i.e., Rāvaṇa's] astra."

6. "his eyes red with rage" krodhatāmrākṣaḥ: See notes to 6.19.22–23 and 6.31.72.

"of Sūrya" sauram: Literally, "belonging to the sun." See note to 6.59.84.

7. "discuses flew forth from the bow" cakrāṇi niṣpetuḥ . . . kārmukāt: The idea of discuses flying forth from bows is a bit unusual. The term cakra, when referring to a weapon, usually indicates a disc and is considered a mukta, or "released," weapon (Oppert 1880, p. 15 and Dikshitar 1944, pp. 109, 122). Perhaps what is meant here is an arrow with a discuslike head. The commentators are silent.

8. "on every side" itas tataḥ: Literally, "from here and there." D6,7,9–11,T2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead samantataḥ, "from all around, on every side."

"as the blazing moon, sun, and planets might light up the directions, if they were to fall" patadbhiś ca diśo dīptaiś candrasūryagrahair iva: The simile is somewhat ambiguous and perhaps elliptical. We understand it is as a kind of abhūtopamā, or simile, in which the object of comparison is nonexistent or hypothetical. An alternative reading is to take the participles patadbhiḥ, "falling, descending," and saṃpatadbhiḥ, "descending," in pāda b, in the senses of "flying" and "falling," respectively, and to construe them both with taiḥ, "those [discuses]," in pāda a. The translation would then be: "As they flew through the air, they lit up the sky on every side, and, in falling, those blazing [discuses illuminated] the directions as do the moon, sun, and planets." This interpretation is followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1785), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 331), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 290). M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read the nominative plural dīptāḥ for the instrumental plural dīptaiḥ in pāda c. In this reading we have to understand that the directions are blazing and not the sun, moon, and planets. This is, in fact, the rendition of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 291).

11. "Rāghava was not shaken in the least" na prākampata: Literally, "he did not tremble."

13. "At this juncture" etasminn antare: Cg comments on the apparent impropriety of Lakṣmaṇa's moving to attack Rāvaṇa while the latter is engaged in battle with Rāma. Cg notes that this would normally constitute a grave breach of the warrior code but observes that, in the present case, Rāma, after having struck Rāvaṇa as described in the previous verse, is now resting for a while. Lakṣmaṇa, meanwhile, having earlier set out to do battle with Rāvaṇa (6.87.15–17), has been waiting for a break in Rāma's combat so that he can continue. (evaṃ rāvaṇaṃ prahṛtya kṣaṇaṃ rāme viśrāmyati satīty arthaḥ. lakṣmaṇaḥ pūrvaṃ yuddhe pravṛtto madhye rāmeṇa yuddhakaraṇād avasarapratīkṣa ity arthaḥ. evam avyākhyāne katham anyena yuddhyamānam anyo yuddhyeteti mahān doṣaḥ syāt.) Compare notes to verse 17 below.

14. "that immensely lustrous hero" mahādyutiḥ: Literally, "the immensely lustrous one."

"shredded" ciccheda naikadhā: Literally, "he cut in many ways."

"battle flag with its image of a human head" dhvajaṃ manuṣyaśīrṣam: Literally, "a battle standard that had a man's head." The phrase is somewhat ambiguous and can be read in a number of ways. One could, for example, read it to mean "a battle standard that was a human head," assuming that Rāvaṇa adopts this ghastly device of a severed head as a means of terrorizing his enemies or that he has such a head impaled on the top of his flagstaff. It is, perhaps, more likely that, as with other epic heroes, Rāvaṇa has an image emblazoned on his battle flag. Ct offers an unusual interpretation whereby we are to understand that the battle standard has a man on its top (manuṣyaḥ śīrṣe yasya tam). But he acknowledges that others understand that the battle standard is merely marked by or connected with a human head (manuṣya-śīrṣayuktam ity artha ity anye).

15. "of the charioteer of the rākṣasa, son of chaos" sāratheḥ . . . nairṛtasya: Literally, "of the charioteer . . . of the nairṛta." The collocation is ambiguous. We follow Cr in taking the kenning nairṛta to refer to Rāvaṇa. This interpretation is shared by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1785) and Dutt (1893, p. 1452). Gorresio's reading (6.80.16), rathāt tasya mahātmanaḥ, "from the chariot of that great one," clearly indicates that the reference is to Rāvaṇa and not to the charioteer. In the critical edition's reading, the word nairṛtasya could optionally modify sāratheḥ, "charioteer," and some have translated accordingly.

16. "sharp arrows . . . his arrows" tasya bāṇaiḥ . . . niśitaiḥ śaraiḥ: Literally, "with his arrows . . . with sharp arrows." The critical reading appears redundant but has fairly solid textual support, although the north avoids the redundancy. There are two ways to resolve the problem. The one we have chosen is to understand bāṇaiḥ to be an instrumental of accompaniment. The idea is that Lakṣmaṇa uses his arrows to destroy Rāvaṇa's bow and arrows. This solution has also been adopted by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 291), the only translator consulted who shares the critical reading. Cg proposes instead that we read the term śaraiḥ in its sense of "a type of grass or reed" and thus take it as an adjective modifying bāṇaiḥ, that is to say that Lakṣmaṇa is shooting "arrows made of reeds" (śarair ity atra śaraśabdaḥ kāśadaṇḍaviśeṣamayatvaparo bāṇaviśeṣaṇam). D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck avoid the problem by reading tadā, "then," in place of śaraiḥ, "with arrows."

17. "Meanwhile": We add the word in keeping with the idea Cg proposes that there is a brief pause in the action after Rāvaṇa's bow has been destroyed (evaṃ dhanuṣi chinne kṣaṇaṃ tūṣṇīṃ tiṣṭhati rāvaṇe vibhīṣaṇena kiṃcitkāram āha). Cg, we believe, is asserting that there is a pause here so as to free Vibhīṣaṇa of the criticism that he is attacking someone already engaged in single combat. Compare the note to verse 16 above.

18. "powerful" vegavān: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead tu tadā, "but then."

"conceived" āhārayat: Literally, "he manifested or produced." Cr, the only commentator to remark on this form, glosses, "he made or produced (akarot)."

19. "immensely powerful . . . javelin" śaktiṃ mahāśaktiḥ: Note the play on words. See note to verse 30 below.

"blazing . . . like a blazing bolt of lightning" dīptāṃ dīptāśanīm iva: D7,9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead pradīptām aśanīm iva, "like a blazing lightning bolt." Cf. verse 4 and note above.

20. "before it reached Vibhīṣaṇa" aprāptām eva tām: Literally, "it [the javelin], which had not even reached."

"At that . . . in the battle" atha . . . tadā raṇe: Literally, "now, then, in battle." D4,9–11,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read mahāraṇe, "in the great battle," for tadā raṇe, "then, in the battle."

21. "Encircled with gold" kāñcanamālinī: Literally, "having a gold garland."

"cut into four pieces" tridhā chinnā: Literally, "thrice cut." All translators consulted understand the phrase to mean that the lance fell in three pieces. However, because it was cut by three arrows, technically it would have been split into four pieces.

"in a shower of blazing sparks" savisphuliṅgā: Literally, "with sparks."

22. "Then Rāvaṇa took up a . . . javelin" tataḥ . . . jagrāha . . . śaktim: Literally, "then he seized a javelin." This is the special javelin, or śakti, that Rāvaṇa is given at 7.12.19. See notes to 30–31 below. Cf. notes to verses 2 and 19 above.

"which he prized greatly" saṃbhāvitatarām: Literally, "still more esteemed." Commentators are divided as to the precise sense of the term here. Ck, Ct, and Cr understand that the javelin is universally renowned for its infallibility (amogheti sarvavyākhyātām—so Ct, Ck). Cm and Cg, however, understand that the weapon was worshiped with sandalwood, etc. (candanādibhir arcitām). Translators are also divided. Dutt (1893, p. 1452) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1786) follow Ct. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 292) renders, "celebrated for its power." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 332), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 291) and Pagani (1999, p. 1142), understands that the weapon is more reliable or tested [than the previous javelin]. Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 158), with whom we agree, renders, "da lui tenuta in maggior pregio." Cf. notes to 6.15.7, 262*, n. 1.

"and even Kāla himself could not withstand it" kālenāpi durāsadām: Literally, "irresistible even by Kāla."

23. "Brandished violently" vegitā: Literally, "quickened, expedited, or agitated." Since Rāvaṇa does not actually throw the weapon at this point, we have to understand that he is shaking or brandishing it violently in preparation for throwing it. Alternatively, one may take the term to be a general description of the javelin, the sense being that, whenever Rāvaṇa would throw it violently, it would blaze up. This is apparently the sense we are to take from Cr's gloss, "thrown with violence (vegena prakṣiptā)."

"supremely terrifying" sumahāghorā: Ñ,V,B2–4,D7,9–11,13,G1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read instead sumahātejāḥ, "of immense blazing energy."

"with a splendor equal to that of Śakra's thunderbolt" śakrāśanisamaprabhā: Literally, "having luster equal to Śakra's aśani." D10 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead dīpta-, "blazing," for śakra-. This yields the sense "with a splendor equal to that of a blazing thunderbolt."

24. "ran quickly" tūrṇam evābhyapadyata: Literally, "he swiftly approached." The commentators understand, quite correctly in our opinion, that Lakṣmaṇa races to Vibhīṣaṇa's side in order to protect him. Ct understands that Lakṣmaṇa stands in the path of (lit., faces) Rāvaṇa's javelin and so protects Vibhīṣaṇa (śaktisaṃmukhaṃ svayam āgatya vibhīṣaṇaṃ rakṣitavān ity arthaḥ). Cg similarly understands that Lakṣmaṇa stands in such a way as to screen Vibhīṣaṇa (tamācchādya svayam atiṣṭhad ity arthaḥ).

"was now in mortal danger" prāṇasaṃśayam āpannam: Literally, "had come to danger to his life breaths."

26. "by great Lakṣmaṇa" mahātmanā: Literally, "by the great one."

"his martial ardor now diverted, decided not to strike his brother" na prahartuṃ manaś cakre vimukhīkṛtavikramaḥ: Literally, "his valor made adverse, he made up his mind to not strike or did not make up his mind to strike." The half verse is slightly ambiguous. Our interpretation follows that of the commentators, who generally understand that, as a result of Lakṣmaṇa's attack, Rāvaṇa loses his immediate desire to use his javelin to kill Vibhīṣaṇa (vimukhīkṛtavibhīṣaṇaviṣayaparākramaḥ—so Cg, Cm; kuṇṭhitabhrātṛvadhaviṣayotsāhaḥ—so Ck, Ct). With the exception of Gorresio, translators understand that Lakṣmaṇa's hail of arrows has thwarted or diminished Rāvaṇa's strength or prowess (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1786; Dutt 1893, p. 1452; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 292; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 332; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 291; and Pagani 1999, p. 1142). Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 159) understands, as we and the commentators do, and similarly adds a referent, the name Vibhīṣaṇa.

Ñ2,B1–3,D5,7,9–11,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the pronoun saḥ, "he," (i.e., Rāvaṇa), in place of the negative particle na. In this reading, one would have to understand that Rāvaṇa diverts his attention from Vibhīṣaṇa and resolves to strike Lakṣmaṇa.

28. "so proud of your strength" balaślāghin: Literally, "O you who are boastful of strength!" The majority of translators understand the compound as do we. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 292), on the other hand, sees it as a term of praise for the adversary rather than a taunt, rendering, "You, whose strength is worthy of all praise."

29. "blood-stained" lohitalakṣaṇā: Literally, "characterized by blood or redness." The idea, as set forth by the commentators, is that the weapon is stained with the blood of Rāvaṇa's enemies. Cg observes that Rāvaṇa uses this expression to suggest that he has slain his enemies many times in the past (anena pūrvam api bahudhā ripavo mayā hatā iti vyajyate).

30–31. "that javelin" śaktim: See verse 22 above and note.

"Maya, the craftsman of the asuras, had forged it with his magical powers so that it was infallible in slaying one's enemies." mayena māyāvihitām amoghāṃ śatrughātinīm: Literally, "made with māyā by Maya, unfailing, enemy slaying." One should note that this javelin, which Maya presented to Rāvaṇa on the occasion of the latter's marriage to his daughter, Mandodarī, is said, at Uttarakāṇḍa 12.19, to have been acquired by Maya through supreme austerity rather than actually fashioned by him (pareṇa tapasā labdhām). See note to verse 2 above.

32. "emitting a roar like that of Śakra's thunderbolt" śakrāśanisamasvanā: Literally, "having a sound equal to Śakra's aśani." Ś,Ñ,V,B2–4,D1–3,6–13,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read vajra- for śakra-, "Śakra," lending the compound the sense "with a sound equal to that of the vajra or the thunderbolt."

"struck" abhyapatat: Literally, "it fell upon."

33. "was hurtling toward Lakṣmaṇa" āpatantīm: Literally, "flying."

"Rāma Rāghava" sa rāghavaḥ: Literally, "that Rāghava." The context makes it clear that Rāma, and not Lakṣmaṇa, is meant.

"addressed it" tām anuvyāharat: As several of the commentators point out, Rāma is actually addressing the divinity that presides over the weapon (śaktyadhiṣṭhātṛdevatām—so Ct).

"May Lakṣmaṇa be spared!" svasty astu lakṣmaṇāyeti: Literally, "May there be well-being for Lakṣmaṇa."

"And may you . . . be foiled" moghā bhava: Literally, "May you be in vain." Ct is evidently disturbed by the fact that, despite Rāma's words, the javelin appears, at least at first, to deliver a mortal blow to Lakṣmaṇa. He argues that Rāma is really saying that the javelin should merely cause pain so that, despite its power of killing by its mere touch, it will thus become foiled by Rāma's utterance. In this way, Ct continues, the truthfulness of Rāma's words is suggested. (tacchaktis tu pīḍāmātreṇa caritārthāstv iti bhāvaḥ. sparśamātreṇa prāṇāpaharaṇasāmarthyayuktāyāḥ śakter anena svavākyena moghīkaraṇāt svasya satyasaṃkalpatvaṃ sūcitam.)

Following verse 33, D5,7,9–11,T1,G,M1,3,5 (D6,T2,3,M2 following verse 34) insert a passage of two lines [2006*]: "In a rage, Rāvaṇa hurled that javelin, which was like a venomous serpent. It swiftly buried itself in the breast of fearless Lakṣmaṇa.[1]"

[1]The wording of the verse, particularly that of pāda c (muktāśūrasyabhītasya . . . mamajja "hurled . . . It swiftly buried itself in the breast of fearless"), is ambiguous and can be read in at least two ways. The ambiguity is of particular importance to some of the commentators who reject the idea that Lakṣmaṇa could actually be struck or wounded by Rāvaṇa's weapon, especially in light of Rāma's words at verse 33 above. Apart from the sequence of words that we, along with Cg, Ck, and Ct understand, i.e., muktā āśu urasi abhītasya, pāda c could also be broken up as muktā śūrasya bhītasya, which would appear to mean "hurled, [it sunk into] the frightened hero [Lakṣmaṇa]." Ck and Ct, arguing for their analysis of the sequence, note that because the meaning of the verse is not immediately apparent, the poet clarifies it in the following verse (34) (muktā āśu urasīti chedasya gūḍhatvāt spaṣṭam evāha kavir nyapatad iti). Cr chooses the second analysis but then has to confront the awkwardness of the resulting term bhītasya, "frightened," used in connection with the heroic warrior Lakṣmaṇa. He does this ingeniously by reading the participle as a bahuvrīhi compound whose meaning is "from whom fear is constantly removed (bhītasya bhīr bhayam itā nityaṃ nivṛttā yasmāt tasya lakṣmaṇasya)." Cr further rejects the notion that Lakṣmaṇa is actually wounded, arguing that we should understand that the javelin merely falls near him. To assert that the weapon actually struck and injured Lakṣmaṇa, Cr argues, would contradict the utterance of Rāma, the Supreme Lord, in verse 33. Thus, Cr continues, his interpretation is in keeping with both śruti and smṛti (Śvetāśvatara Upaniṣad 6.6), where the Supreme Lord is represented as omniscient and omnipotent. (lakṣmaṇasya san- nidhau mamajja papātety arthaḥ. urasi mamajjety arthas tu na yuktaḥ. śaktikarmakarāmakartṛkokter viruddhatvāpatteḥ. ata eva jñaḥ kālakālaḥ kartṛtvaṃ karaṇatvaṃ cetyādiśrutismṛtayaḥ sānukūlāḥ.) Interestingly, Cr is then forced to ascribe Lakṣmaṇa's collapse in the following verses not to any injury but to his extreme delicacy (mūrcchāvāptis tu tadasparśe 'pi saukumāryātiśayāt). See note to 6.35.9.

34. "Nonetheless, that immensely brilliant weapon" sā . . . mahādyutiḥ: Literally, "that one of great luster."

"like the flickering tongue of a serpent king" jihvevoragarājasya: Literally, "like the tongue of a king of serpents."

"fell . . . on Lakṣmaṇa's broad chest" nyapatat . . . lakṣmaṇasya mahorasi: Here again, as in his comments to 2006* discussed in note 33 above, Cr denies that Lakṣmaṇa is actually struck. He suggests that we read the particle iva, "like or as if," from pāda c, both with the simile of the serpent's tongue and with the verbal phrase nyapatat . . . mahorasi, "[the javelin] fell on the broad chest." Thus, he understands: "It seemed to fall on Lakṣmaṇa's broad chest. The meaning is that it appeared to be situated there because of its extreme proximity. The particle 'like (iva)' applies in both contexts. (lakṣmaṇasya mahorasīva nyapatat. atisānnidhyāt tatsthevālakṣyatety arthaḥ. ivobhayānvayī.)"

35. "his heart pierced by that javelin, so deeply embedded" sudūram avagāḍhayā / śaktyā nirbhinnahṛdayaḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read vibhinna-, "pierced," for nirbhinna-, "pierced." This slight variation permits Cr to exploit the sandhi to yield the reading śaktyā avibhinnahṛdayaḥ, "his heart not pierced by the javelin." Cr then disposes of the embarrassing adjectival phrase "deeply imbedded (sudūram avagāḍhayā) by glossing, "come near (samāgatayā)."

37. "He remained lost for a moment in thought" sa muhūrtam anudhyāya: Literally, "having thought for a moment." We believe the context suggests that Rāma is brooding or grieving for Lakṣmaṇa. Cg, Ck, and Ct, however, believe he is pondering what he should do at this point (tatkālakartavyaṃ cintayitvā—so Cg). Ś,B1,D1–3,7–13,M1, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read instead muhūrtam iva dhyātvā, "having thought, as it were, for a moment." Cs appears to understand that, by using the word "like (iva)" here, the poet is suggesting that an omniscient being's [i.e., Rāma's] appearance of being lost in thought is merely the avatāra's imitation of worldly [behavior] (ivena kaviḥ svataḥ sarvavido dhyānaṃ lokānukṛtita iti sūcayati).

"he flared up in anger" babhūva saṃrabdhataraḥ: Literally, "he became very angry or excited." We agree with Cr in taking the term saṃrabdha in its sense of "furious, angry." Cr suggests that Rāma's anger is feigned. He glosses, "he was as if extremely angry (atikruddha iva babhūva)." Ct, however, understands the adjective to mean "filled with increased enthusiasm for battle (yuddhe 'dhikotsāhavān)."

38. Following verse 38, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [2010*]: "[Reflecting] . . . and[1] seeing Lakṣmaṇa, [Rāghava] with a great and total effort [began . . .]."

[1]"and" ca: Cv and Cg take the conjunction to suggest that seeing Lakṣmaṇa in this condition gives Rāma yet another reason—over and above the abduction of Sītā—for wanting Rāvaṇa dead (na kevalaṃ sītāharaṇāt kiṃtu lakṣmaṇadarśanād apīti caśabdārthaḥ).

39. "pierced by that javelin . . . and drenched in blood" śaktyā bhinnam . . . rudhirādigdham: In keeping with his insistence that Lakṣmaṇa is uninjured, Cr reads these two sequences as "not pierced by the javelin (śaktyā-abhinnam)" and "not drenched with blood (rudhira-adigdham)."

"resembled a mountain with a mighty serpent" sapannagam ivācalam: Literally, "like a mountain with a snake." The basis for this odd simile appears to be the image of the large frame of the fallen Lakṣmaṇa, from which protrudes the length of the javelin. Cr, who, as noted above, refuses to entertain the idea that Lakṣmaṇa has been injured by the javelin, thinks instead that the image is based on Lakṣmaṇa's extreme pallor [suggesting perhaps a snowcapped peak?] and his possession of a bow and arrows (lakṣmaṇasyātigauratvena ca dhanurbāṇaviśiṣṭatvena ceyam upamā). In many traditional schools of painting, Lakṣmaṇa is represented as very fair in contrast to his dark brother. Some post-Vālmīkian traditions also regard him as an incarnation of the white serpent Śeṣa, or Ananta, who serves as Viṣṇu's couch when the deity sleeps on the cosmic ocean. For a discussion of the color contrast between Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, as well as other paired avatāras, see R. Goldman 1980.

40. "by the swift-handed rākṣasa" kṣiprahastena rakṣasā: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead te pravekeṇa rakṣasām, "they . . . by that foremost among the rākṣasas."

"they . . . were unable to extract" na śekur avamarditum: Literally, "they were not able to grind [it] down." The commentators offer a variety of reasons for the monkeys' inability to free Lakṣmaṇa from the javelin. Cg understands that the monkeys were still being afflicted by [Rāvaṇa's] arrows (bāṇārditatvena), while Cr argues, in addition, that it was because Rāvaṇa had embedded the javelin with such effort (rāvaṇena yatnataḥ prahitāṃ śaktim avamarditum . . . na sekuḥ). Ct and Ck, looking to the next verse, understand that the monkeys were unable to extract the javelin because it had pierced through Lakṣmaṇa's body and was embedded in the earth (sā śaktiḥ saumitrer dehaṃ nirbhidya dharaṇītalaṃ bhuvaṃ praviṣṭā spṛṣṭavatī).

41. "which, having transfixed Saumitri, was embedded in the earth" saumitriṃ sā vinirbhidya praviṣṭā dharaṇītalam: Cr, of course, reads "not having transfixed (sā avinirbhidya)" and understands that the javelin is embedded in the earth near Lakṣmaṇa (saumitreḥ samīpavarti dharaṇītalaṃ praviṣṭā).

"Wrenching it out violently" balavad vicakarṣa ca: Literally, "and he withdrew powerfully." Ś,B1,D2,6,7,8–12,T2,3,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Cg, Cr, and Ct read for balavat, "violently, powerfully," the adjective balavān, "mighty," which then modifies Rāma. Ck and Ct understand that, under normal circumstances, the javelin, after piercing an enemy, would return to Rāvaṇa. In this case, however, its capacity of exiting the body of its victim has been destroyed by the utterance [in verse 33] of Rāma, whose vows are infallible. Thus, it remains lodged [in Lakṣmaṇa] until the Lord extracts and breaks it. (iyaṃ śaktiḥ sarvadā śatruṃ nirbhidya rāvaṇasamīpam eva prāpnoti. idānīṃ rāmeṇa moghā bhavety uktyā satyasaṃkalpena nāśitaniṣkramaṇaśaktis tatraiva lagnā sā ca bhagavatā vikṛṣya bhagnā—so Ct.)

43. "Rāghava . . . and" caiva rāghavaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ca mahākapim, "and to the great monkey." Cr understands the epithet to refer to Jāmbavān, who is not named in the verse. Translators who follow the text of Ct, except for Pagani, understand the epithet to refer to Sugrīva.

Pagani (1999, p. 1143), for some reason, translates it as a plural referring to both Hanumān and Sugrīva.

"embraced" samāślisya: Literally, "having embraced." Ct lends the embrace a theological significance, remarking that, in revealing his own identity [with Lakṣmaṇa], Rāma's embrace leads to the cessation of all pain (samāśleṣo 'yaṃ sakalapīḍānivṛttiphalakaḥ svatādātmyāvabhāsanarūpaḥ).

44. "The moment to display my valor is now at hand, a moment" parākramasya kālo 'yaṃ saṃprāptaḥ: Literally, "the time of valor has come."

"a thirsty cātaka" kāṅkṣataḥ stokakasya: Literally, "of a stokaka, who is longing." The term stokaka is a synonym for the more common name cātaka (Cucculus melanoleucus), a bird that, according to the Sanskrit poetic convention, lives entirely on raindrops and so, presumably, must remain parched for most of the year, waiting anxiously for the rains. D10,11,T2,3,M1,5, and the texts and printed editions Ck and Ct read instead kāṅkṣitaṃ cātakasyeva, "as if desired by (lit., of) the cātaka." In this case, the participle modifies meghadarśanam, "the sight of rain clouds," rather than the bird itself.

"must die" vadhyatām: Literally, "let [him] be slain."

45. "I give you my solemn word here and now . . . that very soon" asmin muhūrte na cirāt satyaṃ pratiśṛṇomi vaḥ: Literally, "at this moment, I promise you truthfully, that soon." We follow Cr in understanding the phrase asmin muhūrte, "at this moment," to qualify the making of Rāma's promise (asmin muhūrte vo yuṣmākam agre satyaṃ pratiśṛṇomi pratijñāṃ karomi) rather than, as Cg suggests, the time frame in which his vow will be accomplished (asmin muhūrte tatrāpi na cirād drakṣyathety anvayaḥ). A number of translators have interpreted as does Cg, but we believe that this is inappropriate for two reasons. First, it seems redundant with the phrase na cirāt, "soon (lit., not long)," in pāda a. Second, it seems to conflict with the fact that Rāma does not kill Rāvaṇa very quickly, because the battle rages on, with various fluctuations and pauses, for another nine chapters until sarga 97. On the other hand, it should be noted that, in the following verses, Rāma does vow to kill Rāvaṇa without delay.

46–47. "I will put behind me" ahaṃ tyakṣye: Literally, "I shall abandon."

"the terrible suffering and hellish torment" duḥkham . . . kleśaṃ ca nirayopamam: Literally, "suffering and distress comparable to hell." Ck and Ct understand that duḥkha, "suffering," refers to the mental anguish caused by the loss of the kingdom, etc., whereas kleśa refers to physical suffering, similar to the torments of hell. (rājyanāśādikṛtaṃ ghoraṃ duḥkhaṃ mānasaṃ prāptam. nirayopamo yātanopamaḥ kleśaḥ kāyakleśaś ca prāptaḥ.)

48–49. "placing . . . on the throne" kṛto rājye: Literally, "rendered into kingship."

"on whose account I bridged and crossed the ocean" yadarthaṃ sāgaraḥ krāntaḥ setur baddhaś ca sāgare: Literally, "for whose sake the ocean was crossed and the bridge built across the ocean."

"after slaying Vālin in combat" nihatvā vālinaṃ raṇe: Rāma's recollection here is interesting. In fact, as Rāma himself points out at Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa 18, after striking down Vālin, who was engaged in combat with his brother, the killing of Vālin is to be seen either as the execution of an evildoer or the hunting of an animal, and not as any form of normal combat. See R. Goldman 1997.

50. "a person seen by a serpent whose mere glance is deadly venom" dṛṣṭiṃ dṛṣṭiviṣasyeva sarpasya: Literally, "to the sight of a serpent having sight for venom." The upamāna is elliptical. We follow Cm, who suggests adding the words "like a person who comes within the range of sight (dṛṣṭiviṣayaṃ prāpto jana iva)." According to Cg, it is well known that certain types of snakes kill people by their mere glance (kecid dhi sarpāḥ darśanamātreṇa manuṣyān mārayantīti prasiddhiḥ). The reference puts one in mind of the medieval legend of the basilisk, the mythical beast of European folklore.

Following verse 50, D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr insert a passage of one line [2017*]: "Or any more than a serpent can, once it comes within the sight of Garuḍa Vainateya.[1]"

[1]"Garuḍa Vainateya" vainateyasya" Literally, "of Vainateya." The great celestial bird Garuḍa is the mortal enemy of all snakes. See 6.40.33ff.

52. "along with . . . the gods, the seers, and the celestial bards" sadevāḥ sarṣicāraṇāḥ: D9,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the partially redundant (since the gandharvas are already mentioned in pāda c) siddhagandharvacāraṇāḥ, "siddhas, gandharvas, and celestial bards."

"what makes Rāma Rāma" rāmasya rāmatvam: Literally, "the Rāma-ness of Rāma." In the context, it is clear that Rāma is talking about his extraordinary martial prowess, which, he suggests, will enable him to defeat the powerful rākṣasa lord. This notion is expressed by Cg, who glosses "Rāma-ness (rāmatvam)" with "the state of being the one true hero in the world (jagadekavīratvam)." Cg does note, however, that the "masters" claim that the reference is to "the purpose of Rāma's avatāra (ācāryās tu rāmāvatāra-prayojanam ity āhuḥ)." Cm, Ck, Ct, and Cr offer a variety of related explanations, all of which derive from the etymological play on ramay, the causative of the root √ram, "to delight," which the poet so often uses in connection with Rāma's name. Ck and Ct explain that the Rāma-ness of Rāma inheres in the fact that he delights the three worlds, along with the gods and seers, by means of his righteousness, truthfulness, and valor. They go on to add that here Rāma means to say that he will now perform a feat worthy of his nature. (trīṃl lokān sarṣidevān dharmeṇa satyena śauryeṇa ca ramayatīty anvarthaṃ rāmatvam. taducitaṃ karmādya karisyāmīti bhāvaḥ—so Ct.) Cr glosses, "Rāma-ness is the state of providing delight, etc. (rāmatvam abhirāmadātṛtvādi). Cm notes that Rāma-ness derives from the hero's capacity for delighting, which, in turn, can be traced to his valor (ramayatīti rāma iti vyutpattyā parākrameṇāpi ramayitṛtvam ucyate). The translators offer several variations on these themes.

53. "as long as the earth shall endure" yāvad bhūmir dharisyati: Ck and Ct take the verb dharisyati, "he/she/it will endure," in its transitive sense, "he will sustain, will support," and supply a direct object, "living beings (prāṇinaḥ)." This interpretation has been followed in the translations of Dutt (1893, p. 1455) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1789). Cm understands the term bhūmih, "earth, ground," here to refer to the battlefield and takes the phrase to mean "so long as the battlefield remains (yāvad yuddhabhūmir dharisyaty avasthāsyate)."

Following verse 53, D6,7,9,T2,3,G1,2,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cv, Cg, and Cm insert a passage of one line [2020*]: "Having come together, [the worlds will talk] forever about how the battle proceeded."

54. "with great concentration" samāhitaḥ: Literally, "composed, concentrated, focused."

55. "And . . . with blazing" atha pradīptaiḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tathā praviddhaiḥ, "thus cast away." Cr reads instead tadā prasiddhaiḥ (unattested in the critical edition), "then with excellent or celebrated [arrows]." Dutt (1893, p. 1455), who renders, "great," may be following this reading.

"with its torrential rains" dhārābhiḥ: Literally, "with streams."

56. "And . . . the various arrows" śarāṇāṃ ca śarāṇāṃ ca: Literally, "and of arrows and of arrows." D2,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read the adjective varāṇām, "excellent or outstanding," for the first occurrence of śarāṇām, yielding the sense "of those excellent arrows." Ct and Cr argue that the conjunction ca, "and," implies the inclusion of the cudgels mentioned in verse 55 above (cān musalānām—so Ct).

58. "deafening" mahān: Literally, "great."

"bowstrings . . . striking against their armguards" tayor jyātalanirghoṣaḥ: Literally, "the sound of the bowstrings and forearms of those two." See notes to 6.66.23; 6.75.25; 6.76.2,24; 6.77.31 (1701*); and 6.81.26–27.

"was almost miraculous" babhūvādbhutopamaḥ: Literally, "was comparable to a miracle." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead babhūvādbhutadarśanaḥ, "was wonderful to behold," a rather awkward reading in light of the fact that the referent is a sound. Translators who follow the text of Ct struggle to make sense of the reading. Some substitute "to hear" in place of "to behold." Some take the phrase to refer not to the sound but to its terrifying effect on all beings. One, Dutt (1893, p. 1455), translates, "wonderful to behold," but qualifies this somewhat, observing, "wonderful to witness is the sense."

59. "covered . . . and thus tormented by the great wielder of the blazing bow" kīryamāṇaḥ . . . mahātmanā dīptadhanuṣmatārditaḥ: Literally, "being covered, tormented by that great one, who possesses a blazing bow." Our translation reflects the commentary of Cr, who inserts the phrase ata eva, "[and] for that very reason," between the two participles. Pagani (1999, p. 1144) translates the phrase oddly, rendering, "Criblé des averses de traits . . . dévoré par le feu nourri du resplendissant archer."

"with dense hails of arrows" śarajālavṛṣṭibhiḥ: Literally, "with showers of masses or webs of arrows." Ś1(first time),Ñ2,V (V2 both times),B2,3 (second time),4,G2, and the printed editions of Ct (GPP and NSP but unattested in the critical apparatus) read the nominative singular hypometric śarajālavṛṣṭiḥ. One would expect this to be read as a bahuvrīhi compound modifying Rāvaṇa, and so having little semantic difference from the critical reading. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 334), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 293), however, understands the hail of arrows to be the subject of the sentence. This is, of course, not possible grammatically.

"having first joined battle" sametya: Literally, "having joined or met."

"now fled in terror" bhayāt pradudrāva: Literally, "he ran out of fear." Ck and Ct suggest that Rāvaṇa is terrified at the thought that Rāma, in his rage at Rāvaṇa's wounding of his brother Lakṣmaṇa, will now surely kill him (bhayād bhrātṛpīḍājanitakopena sarvathā māṃ haniṣyaty eva iti bhayād ity arthaḥ).

"like a great storm cloud driven before the wind" yathānilenābhihato balāhakaḥ: Literally, "like a cloud struck by wind."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Ct claims that Rāvaṇa's flight takes place in the evening of the new-moon day [of Āśvinā] (idaṃ palāyanam amāsāyaṃkāle). See note to 6.4.4.

Sarga 89

Before verse 1, D5,7,10,11,T1,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert, while D4,9 insert following verse 1, a passage of two lines [2023*]: "Seeing that heroic Lakṣmaṇa had been struck down in battle with a javelin by mighty Rāvaṇa and was drenched with gouts of blood[1] . . ."

[1]"struck down . . . drenched with gouts of blood" vinihatam . . . śoṇitaughapariplutam: As before, Cr maintains his denial of Lakṣmaṇa's injuries. Once again he understands that Rāvaṇa's javelin is merely close to Lakṣmaṇa and that he only appears to be covered with blood as a result of [Rāma's] compassion [toward him] engendered by his anger [at Rāvaṇa] (śaktyatisānnidhyamātreṇa nipātitaṃ śoṇitaughapariplutaṃ krodhahetukāruṇyena rudhirasamūhavyāptam iva).

1. "Rāma" saḥ: Literally, "he."

"even as he continued to discharge" visṛjann eva: Literally, "while still discharging." As Cg explains, the use of the present participle here suggests that, after Rāvaṇa's flight, Rāma wastes no time in arranging for the welfare of Lakṣmaṇa (visṛjann evetyādivartamānanirdeśena rāvaṇapalāyanānantaraṃ lakṣmaṇayogakṣemānusaṃdhāne 'vilambaḥ sūcitaḥ).

2. "through the power of Rāvaṇa" rāvaṇavegena: Literally, "through the force or impact of Rāvaṇa." D4,6,7,9–11,T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead rāvaṇavīryeṇa, "through the heroic valor or might of Rāvaṇa."

3. "I wonder what power I have left" mama kā śaktiḥ: Literally, "What power have I?"

4. "marked with auspicious signs" śubhalakṣaṇaḥ: Literally, "of auspicious marks." The epithet used alone here is often used for its alliterative effect with the name Lakṣmaṇa. See 6.14.3; 6.67.37; 6.71.20; 6.73.5; 6.75.16; 6.79.1; and notes. See also R. Goldman 1984, p. 105.

"has truly returned to the elements" pañcatvam āpannaḥ: Literally, "attained fiveness." See 6.39.7 and note. See verse 28 below.

5. Compare the similar symptoms of mental distress that afflict Arjuna at BhagGī 1.29–31.

"seems to hang its head in shame" lajjatīva: Literally, "it is, as it were, ashamed."

"from my grasp" karāt: Literally, "from the hand."

"dimmed with tears" bāṣpavaśaṃ gatā: Literally, "gone to the influence of tears."

"Dreadful thoughts grow in my mind" cintā me vardhate tīvrā: Literally, "my dreadful anxiety grows."

"and I wish now only for death" mumūrṣā copajāyate: Literally, "and a desire to die is born."

Following 5cd, D5,7,10,11,T1,G,M1,3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [2025*]: "My limbs sink down like those of men walking in a dream.[1]"

[1]"My limbs sink down like those of men walking in a dream." avasīdanti gātrāṇi svapnayāne nṛṇām iva: Our interpretation follows that of Cg, who glosses "going in sleep (svapnagamane)" for svapnayāne and explains, "men who walk in their sleep drag their feet (svapne hi gacchatāṃ puruṣāṇāṃ pādāḥ paścād ākṛṣṭā bhavanti)." Ct and Ck understand the lexeme not as a nominal compound but as an irregular derivative of the root √svap, "to sleep," having the same sense as the term svapna, "sleep or dream." Cr is the only commentator who attempts to clearly distinguish the senses of sleep and dream, explaining, "my limbs sink down like the limbs of men when they experience a nightmare (svapnasya duḥsvapnakadarśanasya yāne praptau satyāṃ nṝṇāṃ gātrāṇīva me gātrāṇy avasīdanti).

6. "Thus did Rāma . . . lament" vilalāpa: Literally, "he lamented."

Following 6ab, D5–7,10,11,S (D4,9 after 2023*) insert a passage of three lines [2026*]: "When Rāghava had seen his dear brother, who was like another life breath outside his body,[1] deeply wounded in his vitals, wracked with pain, and gasping for breath,[2] he was overcome with enormous grief and gave way to brooding and sorrow."

[1]"another life breath outside his body" prāṇaṃ bahiścaram: Literally, "breath moving outside." See 1.17.17; 3.32.12; and notes. See, too, 6.19.24; 6.40.46; 6.47.123; and notes.

[2]"gasping for breath" viniśvasantam: Literally, "panting, breathing out." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read niṣṭantaṃ tu, while M2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read viniṣṭantam. Both of these readings would convey the sense of "moaning." See note to 6.79.4, 1744*, n. 1.

7. "I have no further use for battle, for my life, or even for Sītā herself." na hi yuddhena me kāryaṃ naiva prāṇair na sītayā: Literally, "there is nothing to be done by [lit. of] me with battle, nor with life breaths, nor with Sītā." V3,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct omit this line [7ab].

Following verse 7, Ś,D6–12,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr insert a passage of two lines [2028*]: "For now, hero, even victory would give me no pleasure. What delight will the moon give in the presence of the blind?[1]"

[1]"in the presence of the blind" acakṣurviṣayaḥ: Literally, "in the range of the sightless." We follow Cr, who glosses, "in the presence of blind people (andhajanasamīpasthaḥ)." The idea is that victory can give no pleasure to Rāma, who, in his grief for Lakṣmaṇa, has lost the will and faculty to enjoy it, just as the moon can give no pleasure to those who have no faculty to enjoy it. Most translators simply understand that the moon is invisible, but this undermines the point of the simile.

8. "for kingship" rājyena: Ś,Ñ2,V,B,D1–3,6,8–12,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead yuddhena, "battle."

"There is now no longer any purpose to this war" yuddhe kāryaṃ na vidyate: Literally, "there is nothing to be done in battle."

Following verse 8, manuscripts aligned with the southern recension insert, in whole or in part, a passage of twenty-four lines [2029*]. The full passage, with the exception of lines 7–8, is known to the text of Ct and is best represented in NSP. The texts and printed editions of Cg, Crā, Cm, and Cv know only a small portion of the passage, and this shorter version is best represented in VSP. The equivalencies are provided below:

KK 6.102.12 = 2029* lines 5–6
KK 6.102.13–19 [in brackets] = 2029* lines 9–23
KK 6.102.20 = 2029* lines 7–8

VSP 6.102.13 = 2029* lines 5–6
VSP 6.102.14ab,cd = 2029* lines 7–8
VSP omits the remainder

Approximately one-third of the passage is repeated verbatim from sarga 39, where Rāma earlier had experienced the apparent death of Lakṣmaṇa. See notes to 6.39.

" 'Just as that glorious hero followed me as I went to the forest, so will I now follow him to the abode of Yama.[1–2 = 6.39.17] He always cherished his family, and he was ever devoted to me [3 = 6.39.18ab with ca for saḥ], but now he has been brought to this condition by the rākṣasas, who fight deceitfully.[1][4] In country after country there are wives to be found, and in country after country there may be friends.[2] But I do not see any country where I might find a true brother.[3][5–6] As he was lamenting in this fashion, his senses disordered with grief, writhing about and sighing piteously again and again . . .[4][7–8] Unassailable hero, of what use is kingship to me without Lakṣmaṇa? How will I tell his mother, Sumitrā, who doted on her son?[9–10] I shall not be able to endure the reproaches given[5] by Sumitrā.[11 = 6.39.11ab] Whatever shall I tell Kausalyā, and what shall I tell mother Kaikeyī?[6][12 = 6.39.8ab] What shall I say to Bharata and immensely powerful Śatrughna? How would it be if I were to return without him with whom I went to the forest?[7][13–14] Death right here and now would be preferable to the censure of my kinfolk. What evil deed did I perform in some other life as a result of which my righteous brother lies slain before me?[15–17] Alas! My brother! Best of men! Foremost of heroes! Mighty one! How could you leave me and journey alone to the next world? [18–19] Why don't you speak to me, brother, as I lament? Arise! Look around. Why do you lie there? Cast your eyes on me in my sorrow.[20–21] You always used to comfort me, great-armed hero,[8] when I was afflicted with grief, despondent, and distracted in the mountains and forests.'[22–23] As Rāma was speaking in this fashion, his senses disordered with grief . . . [24]"

[1]"but now he has been brought to this condition by the rākṣasas, who fight deceitfully" imām avasthāṃ gamito rākṣasaiḥ kūṭayodhibhiḥ: The critical apparatus incorrectly marks these two pādas as identical with 6.39.18cd.

[2]"there are wives to be found, and . . . there may be friends" kalatrāṇi . . . ca bāndhavāḥ: Literally, "there are wives . . . and friends." Given the tenor of the verse, we have taken the term bāndhavāḥ in its sense of "friends, companions" rather than "kinsmen."

[3]"where I might find a true brother" yatra bhrātā sahodaraḥ: Literally, "where [there is] a brother born of the same womb." Cr notes that, although Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa have different mothers, they qualify for the term sahodara because of their common paternity (rāmalakṣmaṇayoḥ sahodaratvaṃ tu pitṛhṛdayavarttitvena). Cs suggests that the term is applicable because Kausalyā shared the impregnating pāyasam with Sumitrā. As an alternative, he suggests breaking the sequence bhrātāsahodaraḥ into bhrātā and asahodaraḥ, "non-co-uterine brother." (pāyasasya kausalyāvibhāgād uddhṛtasya sumitrāyai pradānān nimittād vā lakṣmaṇasya sāhodaryam . . . asahodaraḥ sann etādṛśo bhrātā yatra . . . vā.)

[4]"As he was lamenting in this fashion, his senses disordered with grief, writhing about and sighing piteously again and again" ity evaṃ vilapantaṃ taṃ śokavihvalitendriyam / viveṣṭamānaṃ karuṇam ucchvasantaṃ punaḥ punaḥ //: The insertion of these two lines at this juncture in the passage occurs in no known manuscript. For both KK and VSP, the passage occurs at the conclusion of Rāma's words and is followed immediately by the critical edition's verse 9 in which the accusatives describing Rāma mark him clearly as the object of Suṣeṇa's speech. These lines are not known to the manuscripts and editions that follow the text of Ct. GPP includes the verse, indicating that it is additional in Cg's text, and notes that the following eight verses are not found in Cg's text. As the verse stands in GPP, however, it cannot be construed. No manuscript or translation follows the sequence of verses found in the critical edition or GPP. Compare 2029*, line 24.

[5]"given" dattam: 6.39.11b reads bata "Alas!" for dattam.

[6]"Whatever shall I tell Kausalyā, and what shall I tell mother Kaikeyī?" kiṃ nu vakṣyāmi kausalyāṃ mātaraṃ kiṃ nu kaikeyīm: See note to 6.39.6.

[7]Compare 6.39.10. The critical edition marks these lines as identical. Although they are very similar, they are not identical.

[8]"You always used to comfort me, great-armed hero" mahābāho samāśvāsayitā mama: Literally, "O great-armed one, [you are] a comforter of me."

9. "Then, consoling Rāma, heroic Suṣeṇa spoke these words" rāmam āśvāsayan vīraḥ suṣeṇo vākyam abravīt: Ś,B1,D1–4,8–12, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead āśvāsayann uvācedaṃ suṣeṇaḥ paramaṃ vacaḥ, "Suṣeṇa spoke these excellent words, comforting [him]."

"Great-armed . . . is not dead" na mṛto 'yaṃ mahābāhuḥ: Ñ2,D1,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead naiva pañcatvam āpannaḥ, "[Lakṣmaṇa] has not attained fiveness." See notes to verses 5 and 28.

"Lakṣmaṇa, increaser of prosperity" lakṣmaṇo lakṣmivardhanaḥ: The epithet is somewhat uncommon in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, occurring only in a starred passage at 6.79.5 1747*, lines 5–6. Compare, however, 6.67.37; 6.71.20; 6.73.5; and notes. See note to verse 11, 2032*.

Following 9ab, Ś,V (V3, line 1 only),B1,3,4,D1–4,6,8–12,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr insert a passage of two lines [2030*]: "Tiger among men, give up this notion that is causing you such distress, this mournful brooding that causes you as much pain as arrows in the vanguard of the army.[1]"

[1]"this mournful brooding that causes you as much pain as arrows in the vanguard of the army" śokasaṃjananīṃ cintāṃ tulyāṃ bāṇaiḥ camūmukhe: Literally, "the [sad] thought producing grief, equal to arrows in the vanguard of the army." Note the critical edition's unnoted misprint of bāṇaḥ for bāṇaiḥ.

10. Compare Trijaṭā's words to Sītā at 6.38.31–32, where she lists the facial signs indicating that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are still alive.

"nor has it darkened or lost its radiance" nāpi śyāmaṃ na niṣprabham: V,B2–4,D4,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead na ca śyāmatvam āgatam, "has not become dark." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read śyāvam, "dark brown," for the critical reading śyāmam, "dark."

"his countenance looks quite radiant and clear" suprabhaṃ ca prasannaṃ ca mukham asyābhilakṣyate: Ñ2,V1,2,B,D1–4,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read mukham asya nirīkṣyatām for mukham asyābhilakṣyate, lending the line the sense "just look at his clear and radiant face."

11. "The palms of his hands are as red as the lotus" padmaraktatalau hastau: Literally, "the two hands have palms that are lotus-red." Ñ2,D4,10,11,M1, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read -patra-, "petal," for -rakta-, "red," giving the phrase the sense "whose hands have palms that are like lotus petals."

"people . . . when their life breaths have left them" gatāsūnām: Literally, "of those whose life breaths have gone."

"tamer of your foes" ariṃdama: Ś,D1,7,8,12,T2,3,M2,3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read the nominative ariṃdamaḥ for the vocative ariṃdama, making the epithet refer not to Rāma but to Lakṣmaṇa.

Following 11cd, D5–7,S, and the texts and printed editions of Cg insert a passage of two lines [2032*]: "Such are the faces of long-lived mortals. Surely, Lakṣmaṇa, increaser of prosperity,[1] has not departed this life."

[1]"Lakṣmaṇa, increaser of prosperity" lakṣmaṇo lakṣmivardhanaḥ: See note to verse 9 above.

Among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 295) renders this passage.

12. "unconscious" prasuptasya: Literally, "of him who is asleep."

"the rhythmic movement of his chest proclaims that he still lives" ākhyāsyate . . . socchvāsaṃ hṛdayam . . . kampamānaṃ muhur muhuḥ: Literally, "The chest trembling again and again will proclaim [him] to be one who has breath." Our translation follows the interpretation of Ct, Ck, Cr, Cg, and Cm, who take socchvāsam, literally, "with breath, alive," as an adjective modifying the supplied amum, "him," that is, Lakṣmaṇa. Some translators (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 336; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 295; and Pagani 1990, p. 1146) understand that it is both the beating of Lakṣmaṇa's heart and his breathing that show he is still alive, but this is redundant and grammatically problematic. Note that the critical edition erroneously prints the meaningless okhyāsyati for ākhyāsyati, "he will proclaim." The error is not noted in the list of errata.

13. "skilled in speech" tu vākyajñaḥ: Ś,Ñ2,V,B,D1–3,8,12, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahāprājñaḥ, "exceedingly wise."

14–15. "the . . . mountain known as the mountain of healing herbs" śailam oṣadhiparvatam: Literally, "the mountain, the mountain of herbs." D4,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead parvataṃ hi [tam—D4] mahodayam, "Mount Mahodaya." A number of other manuscripts similarly name the mountain Mahodaya. It is evident from this verse that the mountain intended here is the same one that Jāmbavān instructed Hanumān to visit and that Hanumān brings back with him in sarga 60. There, the mountain is referred to only as the mountain of healing herbs and is precisely located in the Himalayas between Mount Ṛṣabha and Mount Kailāsa (6.61.30). The mountain, we are to understand, is different from the two mountains Candra and Droṇa, described in sarga 40, which are said to lie in the midst of the ocean of milk (6.40.29). Those mountains, which the monkeys never actually visit, are said to contain only two of the four healing herbs mentioned in this passage and at 6.61.33.

"splendid . . . known as the viśalyakaraṇī, the healer of arrow wounds" viśalyakaraṇīṃ nāma viśalyakaraṇīṃ śubhām: Literally "the splendid arrow remover called viśalyakaraṇī ('the arrow remover')." Cv, Cm, and Cg, whom we follow, note that the second occurrence of the term is descriptive [rather than onomastic] (dvitīyo viśalyakaraṇīśabdo guṇavacanaḥ). See 6.40.30; 6.61.32–33; and notes. For this line (15cd), the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead viśalyakaraṇīṃ nāmnā sāvarṇyakaraṇīṃ tathā, "known as the viśalyakaraṇī, the healer of arrow wounds, and the sāvarṇyakaraṇī, the restorer of one's original complexion." The variant sāvarṇyakaraṇī, literally, "the maker of the same color," is glossed by Ct as "the one that produces a color that is the same as the previous color (pūrvavarṇasamānavarṇakaraṇīm)." Compare Ck's variants and comments to 6.61.32–33. See, too, note to verse 24 below.

16. "the sauvarṇakaraṇī, the restorer of a golden glow, the saṃjīvanī, the restorer of life, and the saṃdhānakaraṇī, the joiner of limbs" sauvarṇakaraṇīm . . . saṃjīvanīm . . . saṃdhānakaraṇīm: Literally, "the sauvarṇakaraṇī, the saṃjīvanī, and the saṃdhānakaraṇī." See note to 6.61.32–33 for an explanation of these names.

"great" mahātmanaḥ: Ś,B1,D3,4,8–12,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tvam ānaya, "you must bring."

D4,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct substitute a passage of one line [2034*, line 1] for 16ab ("the sauvarṇakaraṇī, the restorer of a golden glow, the saṃjīvanī, the restorer of life"): "And, hero, also the saṃjīvanī, the restorer of life, and the powerful herb saṃdhinī, the joiner of limbs."

Ś,D2,4,8–12,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct omit 16cd ("Go swiftly and . . . bring . . . the saṃdhānakaraṇī, the joiner of limbs").

17. "But, unable to identify those potent herbs" ajānaṃs tā mahauṣadhīḥ: Literally, "not knowing those great herbs." One of the numerous problems with this slapdash reprise of Hanumān's fetching of the mountain of herbs (see sarga 61) is the awkward fact that, having earlier procured these herbs, he is now unable to recognize them. Other than ascribing this apparent contradiction to the carelessness of the author or redactors, one could perhaps explain Hanumān's failure to identify the herbs by the fact that, during his first mission to the mountain, the herbs had made themselves invisible to him. Indeed, that is why Hanumān finds it necessary to bring back the entire mountain peak (6.61.58–61). Ct, the only commentator who appears to note this problem, explains it in an interesting way. He refers to a lengthy episode commonly interpolated in various places, in whole or in part, into manuscripts and printed editions of the northern recension (App. I, No. 56; Gorresio 6.82; and Lahore 6.82). This is the elaborate story of Hanumān's encounter with the demonic master of illusion Kālanemi, whom Hanumān must overcome and slay before he can continue his quest for the healing herbs. Ct interestingly does not associate this episode with the Rāmāyaṇa itself but sees it as belonging to some other, purāṇic, narrative. He argues that we should understand that Hanumān is unable to identify the healing herbs, even though he had seen them before, because his thoughts had been scattered as a result of his elaborate struggle with Kālanemi (pūrvadṛṣṭānām apy aparicaye purāṇāntaroktakālanemiyuddhakṛtacittacāñcalyaṃ hetur iti bodhyam).

D1,3,5,T1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead the singular tāṃ mahauṣadhīm, "that potent herb," for tā mahauṣadhīḥ. This variant is rendered only in the text of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 295). Compare verses 21 and 22 below.

"majestic monkey" śrīmān: Literally, "the majestic one."

18. Following verse 18, Ñ2,V,B,D1,3,5–7,10,11,T1,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of two lines [2038*]: "I gather through reasoning that the comforting herb grows on this very peak, for that is what Suṣeṇa said."

19. "without bringing the viśalyakaraṇī, the healer of arrow wounds" agṛhya . . . viśalyakaraṇīm: Literally "not having seized that which makes one free from arrows." For viśalyakaraṇī, see note to verse 15 above. The commentators seem concerned that Hanumān mentions only one of the four healing herbs named by Suṣeṇa in verses 15–16 above and offer various explanations. Ct believes that Hanumān specifies the viśalyakaraṇī because Lakṣmaṇa, though wounded, is still alive [and so, presumably, is not in need of the saṃjīvanī, etc.] (viśalyakaraṇīṃ lakṣmaṇasya saprāṇatvād avaśyam apekṣitām). Cs quotes Ct at length and dismisses his interpretation as "impossible (asambhāvitam)" on the grounds that Suṣeṇa had clearly instructed Hanumān to bring all four herbs and that, apart from Lakṣmaṇa, there are many wounded and dead monkeys that require the other herbs. Cs proposes instead that we take the term viśalyakaraṇī here to refer to the collectivity of all four herbs by means of which Rāma would be freed from "the arrow" in the form of his fear for Lakṣmaṇa's life (viśalyakaraṇīṃ viśalyo lakṣmaṇaprāṇasaṃśayātmakaśalyarahito rāmaḥ kriyate 'nayā caturvidhayauṣadhyeti sā suṣeṇabhāṣitasarvauṣadhiḥ).

Cg attempts to avoid the issue by taking the gerund agṛhya to mean "not accepting or heeding." He then understands that its implied object is Suṣeṇa's speech (suṣeṇa-vacanam).

"the loss of time would lead to dire consequences" kālātyayena doṣaḥ syāt: Literally, "there would be a fault through the passage of time." Ct, Ck, and Cg understand that the negative consequence would be the death of Lakṣmaṇa (lakṣmaṇasya prāṇanāśo doṣaḥ—so Ct). Cr understands it to be the failure of Hanumān's mission (doṣaḥ kāryavighātarūpo durguṇaḥ).

"and there might be a serious calamity" vaiklavyaṃ ca mahad bhavet: Cg understands the term to refer to "unmanliness or cowardice (niṣpauruṣatvam)," which charge would be leveled against Hanumān. This would appear to be the basis of Raghunathan's translation (1982, vol. 3, pp. 295–96), "my reputation would suffer." Ct and Ck understand, "the flaw of incompetence, ignorance, etc. (acaturājñatvādidoṣaḥ)."

20. Ct and Ck call attention to the awkward problem of why Hanumān, having once before fetched the mountain with its healing herbs, is obliged to do so again. They explain that the herbs brought on the earlier occasion were used up in treating the dazed monkey troop leaders, and so we must understand that Hanumān needs to be sent once again (pūrvaṃ saṃgṛhītauṣadhīnāṃ mūrcchitayūthapeṣu vyayāt punar asya preṣaṇam iti bodhyam—so Ct).

"descended on" gatvā: Literally, "having gone."

Following 20ab, D1,3,5–7,10,11,T1,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of four lines, clearly intended to remedy the perceived narrative gap between the information that Hanumān is flying back and his unheralded direct address to Suṣeṇa [2041*]: "Approaching that foremost of mountains, the immensely powerful monkey[1] rocked the mountain peak and uprooted it along with its groves of different flowering trees.[1–2] Then, with both hands, that tiger among tawny monkeys seized that peak, which resembled a black storm cloud charged with rain.[2] He hefted it and [flew off] into the sky.[3][3–4]"

[1]"the immensely powerful monkey" mahābalaḥ: Literally, "the immensely powerful one."

[2]"that peak, which resembled a black storm cloud charged with rain" nīlam iva jīmūtaṃ toyapūrṇam . . . [śikharam]: Literally, "[that peak] like a black storm cloud filled with water." For some reason, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 337) understands that Hanumān, and not the mountain, is being compared to a cloud. He translates, "tel qu'un sombre nuage, chargé de pluie, le Vānara . . ." But this is not possible grammatically, and no attested variant supports such a reading. Roussel is followed in this error by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 296) and Pagani (1999, p. 1147).

[3]"into the sky" nabhastalāt: Literally, "from the surface of the sky." The ablative here is rather awkward to construe. A few manuscripts (D6,T1,G,M5), Gita Press (6.101.39), KK (6.102.36), and VSP (6.102.30) substitute nabhaḥ sthalāt, "from the ground to the sky." Ct and Ck, who read with the critical edition, gloss, sthalān nabhaḥ, "from the ground to the sky," while Cs recognizes nabhaḥ sthalāt as a reading known to many manuscripts. However, he criticizes Ct's interpretation and suggests instead that we add the gerund prāpya, "having reached," yielding the sense "having gone up into the sky, he flew off (nabhastalaṃ prāpya utpapātatety anvayaḥ).

Following verse 20, D5,6,7 (after 2046*),10,11,T1,G1,2 (after 2046*),3 (second line),M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of two lines [2045*]: "Returning, the immensely swift Hanumān set down the mountain peak, and, after resting for a bit, he said this to Suṣeṇa."

21. "those healing herbs" oṣadhīḥ . . . tāḥ: D1,3,5–7,T1,G3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead the singular auṣadhīm (auṣadhim—D5,6,G3*; oṣadhim*—VSP) . . . tām. See verse 17 and note.

22. "and . . . the healing herbs" cauṣadhīḥ: D5,6,T1,G3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead the singular cauṣadhīm (cauṣadhim—D6,T1,G2,M5). See verse 17 and note.

Following verse 22, D1,3,5–7,10,11,T,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert, while many northern manuscripts insert after verse 25 or 25ab, a passage of two lines [2054]*: "When the monkeys and the rākṣasas[1] saw that feat of Hanumān, impossible even for the gods themselves, they were all[2] amazed."

[1]"the monkeys and the rākṣasas" vānararākṣasāḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead -puṃgavāḥ, "bulls," for -rākṣasāḥ, yielding the sense "the bulls among monkeys."

[2]"all" sarve: Ñ1,B3,D5,13,T1,G1,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead raṇe, "in battle."

23. "of immense luster" sumahādyutiḥ: D5,7,T1,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead the genitive su(tu—G1)mahādyuteḥ, thus making the epithet apply not to Suṣeṇa but to Lakṣmaṇa.

"crushed one of the herbs" saṃkṣodayitvā tām oṣadhim: Literally, "having crushed or pulverized that herb." Commentators and translators differ as to whether Suṣeṇa merely crushes the herb or actually grinds it into a powder. Thus, Ct glosses, "having crushed (saṃmardya ity arthaḥ)," while Cr glosses, "having ground or pulverized (saṃcūrṇīkṛtya)." We have chosen the former interpretation because we believe that Suṣeṇa simply crushes the plant to release the aroma in which its curative properties are carried. This would be in keeping with verse 6.61.67, where the mere fragrance of the herbs revives Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and the stricken monkeys. Although it is not specified, it is apparent from the context provided by verses 19 above and 24 below that the herb in question here is the viśalyakaraṇī. See, too, 6.79.13 and note.

"held it to Lakṣmaṇa's nose" lakṣmaṇasya dadau nastaḥ: Literally, "he gave it to Lakṣmaṇa nasally." Inhalation therapy is one of the five methods (pañcakarma) of administering medications according to the Āyurveda. Apte (s.v. pañcakarma) quotes a verse to this effect: "The five types of medical treatment are emetics, purgatives, inhalatives or sternutatories, non-oily enemas, and oily enemas. Other types are known, such as vomiting. (vamanaṃ recanaṃ nasyaṃ nirūhaś cānuvāsanam / pañcakarmedam anyac ca jñeyam utkṣepaṇādikam.)" See 6.79.13 and note; compare, too, 6.61.67.

24. "No sooner . . . inhaled that aroma than he leapt up" sa samāghrāya . . . śīghram udatiṣṭhat: Literally, "having smelled, he rose up quickly."

"who had been pierced by that javelin . . . free from the javelin and the pain it had caused" saśalyaḥ . . . viśalyo virujaḥ: Literally, "with a javelin . . . without a javelin, without pain." Note that the word śalya, rendered here as "javelin," is also commonly used by the poet to refer to arrows or any other projectile darts. Thus, regardless of the context, we continue to render the name of the herb viśalyakaraṇī as "remover of arrow wounds," even though, in the present context, it is employed to remove another type of "śalya." See note to verse 15 above. Cr, in keeping with his continuing argument that Lakṣmaṇa has not actually been wounded by Rāvaṇa's javelin, glosses saśalyaḥ, "who had been pierced by that javelin," as "filled with the discomfort caused by the javelin having fallen so close to him (samīpapatitaśalyajanitatāpasahitaḥ)." He then explains the term viśalyaḥ, "free from the javelin," as meaning "free from the agitation caused by his close contact with the javelin (śalyasaṃsargajavyathārahitaḥ san)." See note to 6.35.9. See, too, note to 6.88.33 above and passim.

25. "Suṣeṇa" suṣeṇam: B3,D10,11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead lakṣmaṇam, "Lakṣmaṇa." In this reading, the word "Lakṣmaṇa" occurs twice. Most translators ignore the second occurrence of the word; however, in an attempt to render both occurrences, Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1793) translates, "Lakṣmaṇa, who was endowed with auspicious marks."

26. "Come to me, come to me" ehy ehi: Literally, "Come, come."

"he embraced him tightly in his affection" sasvaje snehagāḍham: Literally, "he embraced [him] tightly and affectionately." D7,10,11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the somewhat redundant sasvaje gāḍham āliṅgya, "having embraced him tightly, he hugged." Translations that follow the text of Ct struggle to deal with the redundancy.

27. "risen from the dead" maraṇāt punar āgatam: Literally, "come again from death."

28. "Sītā, victory, and life itself have no meaning for me" na hi me jīvitenārthaḥ sītayā ca jayena vā: Literally, "for there is no purpose for me with life, and Sītā, or victory." Compare 6.39.5–6 and notes.

"victory, and life itself . . . in living" jīvitena . . . ca jayena vā . . . jīvitena: The critical text is redundant, repeating the term jīvitena, "with life," and making the construction of the verse awkward. D5,6,T1,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg modify the reading by substituting cāpi lakṣmaṇa, "and, O Lakṣmaṇa," for ca jayena vā of pāda b, and vijayena, "with victory," for the second occurrence in pāda c. The reading thus achieved would be: "If you had returned to the elements, Lakṣmaṇa, I would have no use for life or Sītā. Indeed, what purpose would I have for victory?" This reading is followed only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 296).

"returned to the elements" pañcatvam āgate: See 6.39.7 and note; and verse 4 above and note.

29. "distressed at this fainthearted speech" khinnaḥ śithilayā vācā: Literally, "distressed by slack speech." The phrase is actually quite ambiguous in this context. Our reading follows that of Ck and Ct, who understand that Lakṣmaṇa is pained to hear Rāma's words that suggest he is wavering in his determination to kill Rāvaṇa and enthrone Vibhīṣaṇa in his place (ko hi me jīvitenārtha ity evaṃrūpayā rāvaṇavadhavibhīṣaṇarājyadānapratijñāśaithilyakarayā vācā khinna ity arthaḥ). Cv understands similarly. We believe that this interpretation is amply supported by the tenor of Lakṣmaṇa's words in the following verses. It has also been followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1459), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1794), and Pagani (1999, p. 1147). The phrase can also be interpreted to mean that Lakṣmaṇa, weak or pained (khinnaḥ), presumably from his earlier injuries, responds in a faint voice (śithilayā vācā). This interpretation is given by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 337), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 297), and by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 296). We believe that this is less plausible, especially in light of the miraculous and total curative powers ascribed to the healing herbs used to restore Lakṣmaṇa, evidence of which is given in verse 24 above.

30. "Having . . . made that vow" tāṃ pratijñāṃ pratijñāya: Literally, "having vowed that vow." Several of the commentators explain that the vow is to kill Rāvaṇa (Cr, Cg) and to consecrate Vibhīṣaṇa in his place (Cg). Cm actually quotes Rāma's vow to do both of these things (App. I, No. 9, lines 26–27 = GPP 6.19.19).

"truly valorous warrior" satyaparākrama: Literally, " O one of true valor."

31. "blameless hero, the virtuous" sādhavo 'nagha: Literally, "the virtuous, O blameless one." D4,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead satyavādinaḥ, "speakers of truth." This reading yields the tautology that speakers of the truth do not tell lies.

32. "So enough" tadalam: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead nālaṃ te. Here alam is glossed by Ck and Ct as yuktam, "fitting." The sense of the phrase then becomes "it is not fitting for you to give way to despair."

33. "he comes within range of your arrows" bāṇapathaṃ gataḥ: Literally, "gone to the path of [your] arrows." B2,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -vaśam, "power, sway," for -patham, "path, range."

"will no more escape with his life" na jīvan yāsyate: Literally, "he will not go, living."

"than would a great bull elephant that comes within the clutches of a . . . lion" siṃhasyeva mahāgajaḥ: Literally, "like a great elephant . . . of a lion."

34. "I long for" icchāmi: Literally, "I desire."

"of that evil-minded wretch" durātmanaḥ: Literally, "of the evil-minded one."

"the sun, bringer of day" divākaraḥ: Literally, "the day maker."

"before . . . sets behind the western mountain" yāvad astaṃ na yāti: Literally, "so long as it does not go to [Mount] Asta." See note to 6.57.20, etc. Ct observes that here the reference to the setting of the sun leads us to understand that these events take place on the new-moon day of the bright half of the month of Āśvina (yāvad astaṃ na yātīty anenāśvinaśuklapratipady eṣā vārteti gamyate). See note to 6.90.1. See note to 6.4.4.

"his day's work done" kṛtakarmā: Literally, "whose work is accomplished." Ct explains, "having favored the world in respect to his part of daily duty (adyatanakartavyāṃśe kṛtalokānugrahaḥ—Ck similarly)." Cs understands, "the witness of the actions carried out by the people (kṛtakarmā lokakṛtakarmasākṣī)," while Cg glosses, "having completed his course (kṛtasaṃcāraḥ)."

Following verse 34, D6,7,9–11,G1,2,M1,2 (continues),3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of four lines [2071*]: "If you wish the death of Rāvaṇa in battle, if you wish to keep your vow in this matter, and if you wish to recover the king's daughter, then you must, this very day, swiftly heed my advice, noble[1] hero."

[1]"if you wish to recover the king's daughter . . . noble" yadi tava rājasutābhilāṣa ārya: Literally, "if of you there is desire for the daughter of the king . . . O noble one." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead rājavarātmajābhilāṣaḥ, "[if there is] desire for the daughter of the best of kings" or "[if there is] longing, O son of the best of kings," for the critical edition's rājasutābhilāṣa ārya. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 297) renders this as "If . . . you wish to realize your long-cherished desire, O son of the great King."

The meter is a type of atijagatī.

Sarga 90

1. Ct notes that since it has been stated that Rāvaṇa had earlier fled from the battlefield (6.88.59) it is not possible that arrows could be directed at him on that field. From this he concludes that the battle described here took place [earlier] at noon on the new-moon day of [the bright half] of Āśvina. (pūrvaṃ raṇāt palāyanoktyā rāvaṇoddeśyakaśaravisargasya raṇabhūmāv asambhavād āśvinapratipanmadhyāhna etad yuddhapravṛttiḥ.) See note to 6.89.34.

Following 1ab, D5–7,10,11,T1,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [2073*]: "That heroic slayer of enemy heroes took up his bow and nocked [fearsome arrows to it]."

Following verse 1, D5–7,10,11,T1,G,M1,3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [2076*]: "Then Rāvaṇa, overlord of the rākṣasas, mounting another chariot[1] . . ."

[1]"another chariot" anyaṃ ratham: This phrase is yet another occasion for Cs to disagree with a position Ct takes. The question, of course, is in what way is the chariot referred to here as "other." Ct refers to an episode that he describes as purāṇic in which Rāvaṇa, on the advice of his counselor, Śukrācārya, repairs to the Nikumbhilā grove in order to perform a homa ritual that will provide him with a magical war chariot. Cf. 7.25.1–13, where Indrajit carries out similar rituals to gain similar boons. Rāvaṇa's ritual, however, is disrupted by the monkeys, so that his purpose is thwarted. According to Ct, it is in respect to that other, unrealized chariot that the present one is "other." (athānyaṃ ratham ity anena cātra sthāne rāvaṇena śukrājñayā jayanimittaṃ nikumbhilāyām ārabdhahomakarmaṇo vānaradvārā hiṃsanaṃ purāṇāntaroktam anusaṃdheyam iti sūcitam.) Cs refutes Ct's position, quoting him in full and ascribing his version to a passage in the Adhyātmarāmāyaṇa, whose authority Cs regards as questionable. He expands his refutation by mentioning another "spurious" story in which Aṅgada enters the antaḥpuram to drag Mandodarī by her hair into the presence of her husband, Rāvaṇa, in order to pay him back for his treatment of Sītā. This episode is recounted in a number of manuscripts (D4,9,T2,3,D3—App. I, No. 62; Ś,Ñ2, B2,D2,8,12—App. I, No. 63). He thus dismisses Ct's comments, arguing that we are to understand that Rāvaṇa's chariot is "other" only with respect to the one disabled [by Vibhīṣaṇa] in an earlier battle (6.88.17–18). (atrāpi nāgojibhaṭṭenāthānyaṃ ratham āsthāya tu . . . iti vadatā śīghraṃ śukrāntikaṃ yayāv ity ārabhya praviśyāntaḥpure veśmany aṅgado vegavattaraḥ / samānayat keśapāśe dhṛtvā mandodarīṃ śubhām ityādi garbhīkṛtya dṛḍhaṃ syandanam āsthāyety antam adhyātmarāmāyaṇaṃ samgṛhītam iti jñāyate. tatprāmāṇye saṃdihate mahānta iti na taduktaṃ jñāpakam. athānyam ity asya pūrve yuddhakāle rathadhvajādīnāṃ śaithilyād anyam ity uktisaṃbhavenoktārthasyāsūcakatvāc ca.)

Following 2076*, D5–7,10,11,T1,G,M1,2,3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [2078*]: "He advanced rapidly upon Kākutstha, as does Rāhu Svarbhānu[1] upon Sūrya, bringer of light."

[1]"Rāhu Svarbhānu" svarbhānuḥ: Literally, "the light of heaven." This is a common epithet, known from the Ṛgveda (5.40.5,6,8,9) for the demon of the eclipse, who in the later tradition is identified with Rāhu.

2. "in turn pelted" ājaghāna: Literally, "he struck."

"enormously fearsome" mahāghoraiḥ: D7,10,11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahāśailam, "a great mountain," which fleshes out the upamāna of the simile, giving the sense "as might a storm cloud [pelt] a great mountain with torrents of rain."

"with torrents of rain" dhārābhiḥ: Literally, "with streams."

3. "Nonetheless, Rāma" rāmaḥ: Literally, "Rāma."

"with great concentration" samāhitaḥ: Literally, "focused, concentrated." Printed editions of Cg read instead the accusative samāhitam, in which case the adjective modifies Rāvaṇa. This minor reading, which Crā notes as a variant but is unattested in the critical apparatus, is rendered by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 297), who translates, "the unshaken Daśagrīva."

"pierced" nirbibheda: D3,4,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead abhyavarṣat, "he showered, pelted."

4. "the . . . dānavas" -dānavāḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead -kiṃnarāḥ, "the kinnaras." This is perhaps an emendation to avoid the curious circumstance that the demonic enemies of the gods should seem to be on Rāma's side here. On this issue, see note to verse 25 below.

"This . . . is not fair" na samam: Literally, "not equal or even." Dutt (1893, p. 1460) appears to misunderstand the phrase to mean that the battle is unequaled. He renders, "There had been no other battle like unto the battle of Rāma . . . and the Raksha."

Following verse 4, D4 (lines 3–9),6,7,9–11 (7,9–11, lines 1–8),T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct (lines 1–8) insert a passage of nine lines [2082*]: "Upon hearing their nectarlike words,[1] Śakra, the majestic leader of the gods, summoned Mātali and said these words[1–2]: 'You must go at once to great Rāma,[2] foremost of the Raghus, with my chariot. When you reach the earth, you must invite him to mount[3] and so accomplish a great service to the gods.[4]'[3–4] Addressed in this fashion by the king of the gods, Mātali, the god's charioteer, bowed his head to the god and said these words [5–6]: 'I go at once, lord of the gods, and I shall serve as his charioteer.' Then, yoking that splendid chariot to tawny horses,[7–8] he proceeded from heaven for the sake of Rāma's victory.[9]"

[1]"nectarlike words" vacomṛtam: Literally, "speech-nectar." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 339) appears to misunderstand the compound, rendering, "cette parole des Immortels." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 297), who renders, "the words of the Immortals," and Pagani (1999, p. 1148), who translates, "la remarque des Immortels."

The compound is misprinted in the critical edition as two words, vaco mṛtam ("dead speech").

[2]"great Rāma" bhūyiṣṭham: Literally, "the greatest one." D9–11,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bhūmiṣṭham, "standing on the ground."

[3]"you must invite him to mount" āhūya: Literally, "having summoned or invited."

[4]"a great service to the gods" devahitaṃ mahat: Literally, "great welfare or benefit to the gods." Once again Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 339) misunderstands, breaking up the compound as the vocative deva, "O god," and the accusative hitam, "welfare." This leads him to the improbable translation "rends, ô dieu, ce service important."

5–7. "shining like the rising sun" taruṇādityasaṃkāśaḥ: Literally, "resembling the young sun."

"its yoke pole made of lapis" vaidūryamayakūbaraḥ: A number of translators understand the term vaidūrya in its other common sense of "cat's-eye beryl." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 339), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 298) and Pagani (1999, p. 1148), understands, "emerald (émeraudes)." The yoke pole is described by Cg and Cm as "a piece of wood that supports the yoke (yugādhāradāru)." Both commentators cite Amarakośa (2.8.57), whose synonym for kūbara is yugaṃdhara, "yoke supporter." See 6.57.25 and note. On lapis lazuli, see 5.1.2–3 and notes; and notes to 6.3.13 and 6.67.13.

"its flagstaff made of gold" rukmaveṇudhvajaḥ: Literally, "having a golden-staffed flag." Cr, however, reads the compound as a dvandva, glossing, "its staff and flag made of gold (rukmamayau veṇudhvajau yasya saḥ)."

"from Triviṣṭapa, Indra's heaven" triviṣṭapāt: Literally, "from Triviṣṭapa or from the triple world." Cg and Cr gloss, "from heaven (svargāt)." However, since Triviṣṭapa is sometimes used to refer specifically to the heavenly realm of Indra, that sense seems most apposite in this context.

"splendid tawny horses" sadaśvaiḥ . . . haribhiḥ: In this context, the polysemic term hari must be understood in its sense of "tawny, yellowish, or bay." This meaning is suggested by Cg, who glosses, "of a tawny color (haritavarṇaiḥ)." Some translators (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, pp. 1795–96; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 297) take the term hari in its sense of "green, greenish." This seems particularly inapposite in light of the comparison of the horses to the sun, not to mention that green is an unlikely color for a horse. See 6.78.27; 6.95.15; 6.116.24; and notes.

"with their golden plumes" kāñcanāpīḍaiḥ: Literally, "with golden crest ornaments or chaplets." The commentators generally gloss, "with golden ornaments (svarṇābhāraṇaiḥ—so Ct, Ck)." Compare 6.33.2–3 and note.

"white tufts" śvetaprakīrṇakaiḥ: According to Apte (s.v.), a prakīrṇaka is "a tuft of hair used as an ornament for horses." Commentators, citing Amarakośa (2.8.31), understand the term in its common sense of "chowrie or yak-tail fly whisk." According to MW (s.v.), chowries were also used as ornaments for horses.

Following 7ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [2084*], which makes Mātali, Indra's charioteer, and not the chariot itself, the subject of the sole principal verb abhyavartata, "it drew near," of verses 5–7. "Commanded by the king of the gods, Mātali, mounting the chariot . . ." Southern commentators, all of whom read this line, are obliged to supply the relative and correlative pronouns yaḥ, "who," and tam, "that," referring to the chariot, in order to make the syntax intelligible.

8. "of thousand-eyed Indra" sahasrākṣasya: Literally, "of the thousand-eyed one."

9. "Thousand-eyed Indra" sahasrākṣeṇa: Literally, "by the thousand-eyed one."

"this majestic, foe-destroying chariot" rathaḥ . . . śrīmāñ śatrunibarhaṇaḥ: D5,6,10,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead the vocatives śrīmāñ śatrunibarhaṇa, in which case the adjectives modify Rāma rather than the chariot.

10. "sharp" śitā: D9–11,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead śivā, "auspicious."

11. "Rāma" rāma: The word is marked as doubtful by the editors of the critical edition. D6,T2,3,G1,M1,3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead rājan, "O king." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead deva, "O lord (lit., god)." The edition of Gorresio reads vīra, "O hero" (and reads rāma for vīra in pāda a). A number of northern manuscripts, including the printed edition of Lahore, read yuktam, "yoked," which then modifies the chariot.

12. "and, after reverentially saluting Mātali" tam abhivādya ca: Literally, "and having saluted him or it." Commentators are silent as to the object of the gerund abhivādya. Translators of the southern texts understand it to be the chariot itself. However, since the action expressed by the causative of the verb abhi √vad is almost always directed toward a person, and, since it would, we believe, be improper on Rāma's part to take no notice of the divine charioteer, we understand the pronoun tam to refer elliptically to Mātali. This idea appears to be supported by the reading of Ñ1,D4,13, and the edition of Gorresio (=2089* and 2090*), which omit the word abhivādya and explicitly have Rāma circumambulate Mātali.

"illuminating the worlds with his splendor as he did so" lokāṃl lakṣmyā virājayan: Literally, "making the worlds shine with [his] luster."

13. "chariot duel" yuddhaṃ dvairatham: Literally, "a two-chariot battle." Ck and Ct explain the term dvairatham, "having two chariots," as "those two who have two chariots are two-chariot warriors; [the battle between] those two is thus called 'belonging to two-chariot warriors' (dvau rathau yayos tau dvirathau tayor idaṃ dvairatham)." We, however, follow Cr, who understands the compound slightly differently to mean "in which [battle] there are two chariots that is a two-chariot [battle] (dvau rathau yasmiṃs tad eva dvairatham)." D5,T,G1,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read the adjective tumulam, "tumultuous," for dvairatham.

14. "Rāghava, who had mastered the most powerful divine weapon-spells, thwarted each divine weapon-spell of the rākṣasa king with one of his own—a divine weapon-spell of the gandharvas with a divine weapon-spell of the gandharvas, a divine weapon-spell of the gods with a divine weapon-spell of the gods." sa gāndharveṇa gāndharvaṃ daivaṃ daivena rāghavaḥ / astraṃ rākṣasarājasya jaghāna paramāstravit //: Literally, "Knowing supreme astras, Rāghava struck [each] astra of the king of the rākṣasas: a gāndharva with a gāndharva, a daiva with a daiva." See note to 3.24.28.

15. "the lord of the night-roaming rākṣasas invoked" rākṣasādhipaḥ / sasarja . . . niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the lord of the rākṣasas, the night-roaming one, released." See 6.87.43 and note.

16. "the arrows . . . turned into venomous serpents" te . . . śarāḥ . . . sarpā bhūtvā mahāviṣāḥ: The idea here is that Rāvaṇa's arrows are infused with the power of the rākṣasa astra mentioned in the preceding verse. It is no doubt under the influence of this spell that they transform themselves into serpents. It will be recalled that serpent-weapons appear to be a part of the rākṣasa arsenal. They were used earlier to devastating effect by Indrajit at 6.35.8ff. when he struck down Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. On that occasion, however, it was the serpents, sons of Kadrū, who turned themselves into arrows for his use rather than, as in the present case, arrows that turn to serpents during flight. See 6.35.8; 6.40.37,49; and notes.

17. "those terrifying serpents" te . . . bhayānakāḥ: Literally, "those terrifying ones."

18. "by those serpents" taiḥ: Literally, "by them."

"with their blazing hoods" dīptabhogaiḥ: The term bhoga can also refer to the coils of a serpent. Most translators consulted have interpreted in this way. However, given that the serpents are flying straight toward Rāma in the form of arrows, the choice of coils here seems improbable.

"the great serpent Vāsuki" vāsuki-: Literally, "Vāsuki." Vāsuki is one of the great mythic nāgas, or supernatural serpents, frequently named in mythological texts. It is Vāsuki, for example, who serves as the churning rope in the famous myth of the churning of the cosmic ocean for the nectar of immortality (amṛta). See 1.44.14–27 and notes.

19. "he produced" prāduścakre: Literally, "he made visible or manifest." We follow the gloss given by Ct, Cg, and Cm, "he employed or shot (yuyuje)." Translators offer a range of interpretations, including "made visible," "summoned," "chose," and "drew forth."

20. "Loosed from Rāghava's bow" rāghavadhanurmuktāḥ: D6,T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read instead rāghavaśarā muktāḥ, "Rāghava's arrows, released."

"the gold-fletched arrows" te . . . rukmapuṅkhāḥ: Literally, "those gold-fletched ones."

"golden eagles" suparṇāḥ kāñcanāḥ: Literally, "golden birds." Suparṇa is a common epithet for the divine bird Garuḍa, who is generally represented as an eagle or other powerful raptor. The idea here is that, under the power of Garuḍa's divine weapon-spell, Rāma's arrows become so many Garuḍas to counter Rāvaṇa's serpents, their ancestral foe. Garuḍa's enmity for and power over serpents is well known in the mythology (MBh 1.19–20), and, earlier in the book (sarga 40), Garuḍa himself arrives to free Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa from the serpent-weapons of Indrajit. See 6.40.49; 6.78.23; and notes.

"intercepted them" viceruḥ: Literally, "they moved about or attacked." Given the martial context, we believe that this verb should be taken in its sense of "attack." The idea is that each of the golden bird-arrows intercepts and destroys one of the serpent-arrows.

21. "took the form of eagles" suparṇarūpāḥ: Literally, "having the form of birds." See note to verse 20 above.

"those immensely swift arrows" tān . . . mahājavān: Literally, "those immensely swift ones."

22. "at the thwarting of his divine weapon-spell" astre pratihate: Literally, "when the astra was counterstruck."

23. "with a veritable torrent of them" śaraugheṇa: Literally, "with a torrent of arrows."

Following verse 23, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [2097*]: "Taking aim at his battle standard, Rāvaṇa cut it down with a single arrow."

24. "After first knocking the golden battle standard to the floor of the chariot" pātayitvā rathopasthe rathāt ketuṃ ca kāñcanam: Literally, "having caused the golden banner to fall from the chariot into the chariot-bottom."

Following verse 24, D7,G1,2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm insert a passage of one line [2098*]: "Upon witnessing that tremendous feat of evil-minded Rāvaṇa . . ."

25. "hard pressed" ārtam: Literally, "afflicted." Cr, alone among the commentators, expresses disquiet with the notion that Rāma could actually be in trouble. He glosses, "appearing to be that way (tatvena pratīyamānam)." See note to verse 4 above. Cf. 6.77.28; 6.78.47–48; and notes.

"the . . . dānavas" dānavāḥ: Note how here, too, the demons seem to be on Rāma's side. See note to verse 4 above.

27. "Mercury, the planet baleful to all creatures, stood in occlusion with Rohiṇī" rohiṇīm . . . samākramya budhas tasthau . . . prajānām aśubhāvahaḥ: Literally, "Budha, the bearer of inauspiciousness to creatures, having transgressed Rohiṇī, stood." Rohiṇī, either the fourth or the ninth lunar asterism (s.v. Apte, MW), is generally regarded as the wife or consort of the moon. Cg notes that, when Mercury crosses or occludes Rohiṇī, oppression of the world occurs (budhe rohiṇīṃ prāpte jagatpīḍā bhavatīti bhāvaḥ). Cf. 6.19.34; 6.114.21; and notes. See, too, 4.12.17.

28. "the sun, bringer of day" divākaram: Literally, "the maker of day."

29. "The sun, bringer of day" divākaraḥ: Literally, "the maker of day."

"its color that of iron" śastravarṇaḥ: Literally, "having the color of iron, steel, or a weapon." Ct glosses, "its inner circle black (kṛṣṇāntarmaṇḍalaḥ)." Cr offers, simply, "black in color (kṛṣṇavarṇaḥ)." Cg and Cm gloss, "dark as a sword (asiśyāmaḥ)."

"looked ghastly . . . it seemed" suparuṣaḥ . . . adṛśyata: Literally, "it looked very harsh or cruel." We have translated the verb twice for the sake of clarity. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 299), however, understands the adjective to refer not to the sun's appearance but to the fierceness of its rays, rendering, "burnt by its touch," but this seems improbable in light of the dimming of the sun's rays.

"In conjunction with a smoke-bannered comet, it seemed to be crossed by a headless trunk." adṛśyata kabandhāṅkaḥ saṃsakto dhūmaketunā: Literally, "the one having the mark of Kabandha appeared attached to a smoke-bannered one (i.e., a comet)." We understand kabandhāṅkaḥ to be a bahuvrīhi compound modifying divākaraḥ, "the sun," in pāda b, with the sense "having Kabandha for its mark." Ct and Cr analyze the compound as "on whose lap or hip (aṅke) is Kabandha (kabandho 'ṅke yasya saḥ)." Some translators have followed this interpretation. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 299), however, alone among the translators, takes pādas cd as a separate syntactic unit, rendering, "A headless trunk was seen with the comet trailing from it."

30. In keeping with his ongoing contention that Rāma, as a deity, is never really harmed or afflicted, Ct notes that the evil portents represented in this and the preceding verses are there to suggest that Rāma is acting out the role of a mere human (eta utpātā rāmasya tathā manuṣyadharmanaṭanasūcakā iti bodhyam).

"And . . . of Viśākhā, the constellation of the ruling House of Kosala" kosalānāṃ ca nakṣatram: Literally, "And . . . the constellation of the Kosalas." Normally, Viśākhā refers to twin stars. Cr and Cg explain that the term "the Kosalas" refers to the ruling dynasty of the region, i.e., the Ikṣvākus (kosalānām ikṣvākūṇām). Cg further reminds us that Viśākhā is the special constellation of the Ikṣvākus, as indicated earlier in the fourth sarga of the kāṇḍa (viśākhāyās tan nakṣatratvam etat kāṇḍacaturthasarge darśitam). See 6.4.45 and note. In that passage, Lakṣmaṇa assures Rāma of the success of his mission by pointing out that, among other auspicious signs, the Ikṣvāku constellation, Viśākhā, is shining brightly and bodes no ill. See, too, 6.63.3, App. I, No. 43, lines 23–24, and n. 13. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 341), apparently unmindful of this earlier passage, understands, incorrectly, we believe, that Mars is somehow occluding two different asterisms, that of the Kosalas and Viśākhā. In this error he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 299) and Pagani (1999, pp. 1150, 1672–73). See notes to 6.4.45. See, too, Kirfel 1920, p. 35.

"Mars" aṅgārakaḥ: Literally, "Aṅgāraka." Mars, like Mercury (see note to verse 28 above), is a planet whose occlusion of asterisms is considered highly inauspicious.

"This constellation . . . was clearly visible" vyaktam: Literally, "was clearly visible." Along with some translators, we understand the term vyaktam, "clear, manifest, visible," to be an adjective modifying nakṣatram, "constellation." Other translators read the term adverbially with "stood in occlusion of."

31. "With his ten faces and twenty arms, ten-necked Rāvaṇa" daśāsyo viṃś atibhujaḥ . . . daśagrīvaḥ: Literally, "with his ten faces and twenty arms, the ten-necked one." Rāvaṇa is represented here in the awesome form he assumes for battle. See notes to 6.47.106; 6.50.11; and 6.92.20 for a discussion of when Rāvaṇa does and does not have multiple heads and arms. See, too, 5.8.13,19; 5.20.24,26; 5.47.2–14; and notes. Cf. 3.30.8.

"like Mount Maināka" maināka iva parvataḥ: The simile is no doubt based upon Rāvaṇa's huge size and his protruding limbs and weapon[s], which may recall the peaks and trees of the mountain. This is not one of Vālmīki's most elegant figures, and the propriety of choosing this particular mountain as the upamāna is not clear. For a description of Mount Maināka, see 5.1.89–93. See, too, MBh 1.19.290*.

32. "Hard pressed" nirasyamānaḥ: Literally, "being cast down or being defeated." Cr claims that Rāma avoids taking the opposing action of which he is fully capable, entering into the spirit of his role because Rāvaṇa's weapons are products of divine grace. Thus, Cr continues, Rāma's virtue as the protector of the boundaries of proper behavior is made manifest. (sāmarthyānukūlakṛtiṃ notpādayad vaiyākaraṇamate 'pi kṛter vyāpārakukṣipraviṣṭatvān nāśabdārthatvam etena rāvaṇāstrāṇāṃ devānugrahaviṣayatvaṃ sūcitam. tena rāmasya maryādāpālakatvaguṇo vyaktaḥ.)

33. "his eyes turning red with fury" kiṃcitsaṃraktalocanaḥ: Literally, "his eyes somewhat reddened." See notes to 6.19.22–23 and 6.31.72.

"Rāma flew into a towering rage" sa . . . jagāma sumahākrodham: Literally, "he went to very great anger." Cr understands (su)mahākrodham, "great anger," to be a bahuvrīhi compound modifying Rāvaṇa. He thus understands, "he [Rāma] approached the extremely angry [Rāvaṇa]."

"seeming almost to scorch his foe with his gaze" nirdahann iva cakṣuṣā: Literally, "as if burning with his eye." Ñ1,V2,D3,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read rākṣasān, "the rākṣasas," for cakṣuṣā, "with his eye." This yields the sense "as if burning the rākṣasas."

Following verse 33, D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct continue the sarga without a break (GPP and NSP 6.102.39cd, ef).

D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct continue sarga 90. Cs, alone among the commentators, notes that some texts break the sargas here, while others, noting the absence of a change in meter that is generally the case at the end of sargas, do not. (uttaragranthena sahaikaḥ khaṇḍa ekonasaptatiślokātmā sarga iti kecid āhuḥ. sargāntimaślokavṛttādibhedasya prāyikatvāt tasya kruddhasyeti sargaprārambhapadyam iti kecit.)

2. "The mountain" śailaḥ: Unless we are to read this as a generic term for "the mountains," we must assume that the mountain in question is Trikūṭa, upon which the city of Laṅkā is built. This idea is made explicit in the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1798). See note to 6.2.10.

"and its deeply rooted trees" acaladrumaḥ: Literally, "having immovable trees." V3,D9,11,G1,M, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, Cg, and Cm read instead caladrumaḥ, which, in the context, would be interpreted to mean "its trees shaking." Ck avoids the issue of whether the trees are moveable or immoveable, reading mahādrumaḥ, "with great or gigantic trees." This reading is noted by Ct. A number of northern manuscripts, including the edition of Gorresio (6.87.2), similarly avoid this issue by reading ca sadrumaḥ, "and together with its trees."

"grew wildly agitated" babhūva cāpi kṣubhitaḥ: Literally, "and it became agitated." B1,4,D7,T1,G,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead cātikṣubhitaḥ, "and [it became] extremely agitated," for cāpi kṣubhitaḥ, which we believe is probably the intention of the critical reading as well.

3. "birds with harsh cries" khagāḥ . . . paruṣasvanāḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B,D1–4,6,8–12,T2,3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr, as well as the editions of Gorresio (6.84.3) and Lahore (6.84.3), read instead kharāḥ, an ambiguous term here, which has been understood variously by commentators and translators. Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B,D1–4,8–13,T2,3,M2,3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, Cg, Cr, and Cm, as well as the editions of Gorresio (6.84.3) and Lahore (6.84.3), read paruṣā ghanāḥ, "threatening clouds." Cr, the only commentator to discuss the term kharāḥ, bases his interpretation on its nominal sense of "asses, donkeys." He understands it to be an adjective, meaning "having the shape of donkeys (gardabhākṛtayaḥ)" and modifying "clouds (ghanāḥ)." This interpretation is followed only by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1798), which translates, "looking like donkeys . . . clouds." Dutt (1893, p. 1462) takes the term in its adjectival sense of "rough," which he also takes to modify "clouds (ghanāḥ)." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 188) interprets similarly, rendering, "orride." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 341) attempts to avoid the issue to some extent. He clearly understands the term to be a noun but leaves it untranslated as "Des Kharas." This noun, in turn, he sees as modified by the adjective kharanirghoṣāḥ, "braying like asses," which he renders as "à la voix d' ânes." Pagani (1999, p. 1150) takes the term in its standard nominal sense of "ass, donkey" but appears to ignore the term gagane, "in the sky," of pāda b, thus sparing herself the necessity of explaining how these animals can fly. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 300) takes the term in another of its nominal senses to mean "crows." Combining this somewhat awkwardly with the term ghanāḥ, which he takes in its sense of "group or multitude," he renders, "flocks of crows, braying like donkeys." In this interpretation of ghanāḥ, Shastri follows Roussel's "par troupes" (1903, vol. 3, p. 341), as does Pagani (1999, p. 1150) with her "par bandes." Only the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 299), who reads khagāḥ, with the critical edition, and ghanāḥ, with the vulgate, etc., represents both birds and clouds as ominous portents.

4. "fear entered Rāvaṇa's heart" rāvaṇasyāviśad bhayam: Literally, "fear entered of Rāvaṇa." D5,7,9–11,T1,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead rāvaṇasyābhavad bhayam, "Rāvaṇa had fear."

5–6. "The gods, standing in their aerial chariots" vimānasthāḥ . . . devāḥ: Some translators understand, as we do, that it is only the gods who are hovering in their flying cars, whereas others understand that the whole list of beings is so situated.

"and the great birds, who soar through the sky" garutmantaś ca khecarāḥ: Literally, "and the winged ones, the movers in the sky." A number of translators, like us, take khecarāḥ, "moving in the sky," to be an epithet of garutmantaḥ, while others understand that these are two separate groups: the great birds and other sky-goers. Cf. notes to 6.113.18 and 6.116.47.

7. "hostile as always to each other" vigraham āgatāḥ: Literally, "who had come to hostility." The phrase is ambiguous. We follow Ct, Cr, Cm, and Cg (second interpretation), according to whom it is their partisanship for Rāma and Rāvaṇa, respectively, that arouses the hostility of these two groups of spectators (rāmarāvaṇapakṣapātāt parasparaṃ kalahāyamānā ity arthaḥ—so Cg). As is well known, the hostility between the devas and the asuras is innate, long standing, and legendary. Cg's first interpretation, which some translators have followed, takes the term vigraham to refer specifically to the battle at hand. Cg glosses, "They came with reference to the vigraha, that is, battle. The meaning is 'they came to watch the battle.' (vigrahaṃ yuddham uddiśyāgatāḥ. yuddhaṃ draṣṭum āgatā ity arthaḥ.)"

"shouted words of support" ūcuḥ . . . vākyaṃ bhaktyā: Literally, "they spoke words through devotion." The idea, as the following verse makes clear, is that the asuras are cheering for Rāvaṇa, and the devas for Rāma.

8. "the asuras . . . to ten-necked Rāvaṇa" daśagrīvam . . . asurāḥ: Literally, "the asuras to the ten-necked one." Cg is struck by the fact that the asuras, whom Rāvaṇa had also harassed in his career of conquest, nonetheless cheer him on here out of jealousy, lest the gods gain an advantage [through Rāma's victory] (yady apy asurāṇām api rāvaṇo bādhakas tathāpi devānām atiśayo mā bhūd ity asūyayā rāvaṇaṃ vardhayantīti bodhyam). Note, too, that the dānavas seem to have been siding with Rāma at some points in the preceding sarga. Cf. 6.90.4,25; and notes.

9–12. "Rāvaṇa" sa rāvaṇaḥ . . . rāvaṇaḥ: Literally, "he Rāvaṇa . . . Rāvaṇa." In keeping with his usual practice in such cases, Cr takes one instance of the name as an epithet, meaning "he who causes the worlds to cry out (lokānāṃ rāvayitā rāvaṇaḥ)." See note to 6.52.19.

"fingered his mighty weapons" spṛśan praharaṇaṃ mahat: Literally, "touching a great weapon." We tend to agree with Cg here that Rāvaṇa is running his hands over his weaponry while reflecting for a moment as to which one to select at that particular point. (spṛśan parāmṛśan. kiṃ vedānīṃ grahītum ucitam iti kṣaṇaṃ cintayann ity arthaḥ.) We render praharaṇam, literally, "weapon," as a plural to convey this sense of selection. See 6.75.3–4 and note.

"blazing, as it were, with fury" pradīpta iva roṣeṇa: B1,G2,M3, and the printed editions (although not the commentary) of Cg read instead pradīptam iva roṣeṇa, which would then modify, along with the other adjectives, śūlam, "lance." This minor variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 300).

"Fitted with barbs . . . it was fearsome to look upon" kūṭaiś citaṃ dṛṣṭibhayāvaham. Literally, "provided with points, it brought fear to the eye." D6,7,10,11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read citta-, "mind, heart," in place of citam, "provided with." This lends the phrase the meaning: "with its points, it was fearsome to the mind and the gaze." According to Cg, kūṭas in this context are iron spikes or barbs (ayaḥśaṅkubhiḥ).

"Rending and cutting, it was a terror to all beings" trāsanaṃ sarvabhūtānāṃ dāraṇaṃ bhedanaṃ tathā: Literally, "frightening, rending, and cutting all beings." Cg attempts to distinguish the types of cutting represented by dāraṇam and bhedanam. The first he glosses as "cutting like a saw (krakacavat kṛntanam)," the second as "slicing in two (dvidhākaraṇam)."

13. "by many . . . rākṣasas" anekaiḥ . . . rākṣasaiḥ: Ñ2,V1,3,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read anīkaiḥ, "by troops," for anekaiḥ, "by many." Ct, however, glosses, "by large numbers of troops (anekānīkasaṃkhyaiḥ)."

"mighty Rāvaṇa" vīryavān: Literally, "the heroic or mighty one."

"grasped . . . in the middle" madhye jagrāha: D6,7,9–11,T2,3,G1,2,M2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead jagrāha yudhi, "grasped in battle."

14. "the gigantic warrior" mahākāyaḥ: Literally, "he of the huge body."

"raised the lance on high" samudyamya: Literally, "having taken up or raised."

15. "That . . . roar" śabdaḥ: Literally, "sound."

16. "of the extremely loudly roaring and evil-minded rākṣasa" atinādasya . . . tasya durātmanaḥ: Literally, "of the evil-minded one of exceeding roars." We understand both compounds as bahuvrīhis modifying an unexpressed noun, rāvaṇasya, "of Rāvaṇa." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 300), the only translator consulted whose reading is the same as that of the critical edition, disagrees, rendering, "by that wicked bawling." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead atikāyasya, "of him of the huge body."

17. "released a tremendous roar" vinadya sumahānādam: Literally, "having roared a very great roar." Cg, alone among the commentators, is at pains to distinguish Rāvaṇa's roar here from the one described previously in verses 14–16 above. According to Cg, the first sound is the result of the effort of lifting the mighty weapon, while the second is uttered in the course of hurling it. (pūrvaṃ śūlodyamanajanitotsāhakṛtanāda uktaḥ. iha prakṣepajanitotsāhakṛto nāda iti vivekaḥ.)

18. "instantly" sadyaḥ: D9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead samyak, "completely, properly."

"though you have your brother as an ally" bhrātṛsahāyasya: The compound is slightly ambiguous. Several translators understand it to mean that Rāvaṇa intends to take both Rāma's and Lakṣmaṇa's life with the same blow. We agree with Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 300), however, who renders, "though you have your brother to aid you." Among the translators consulted, only Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 189) understands the reference to be to Rāvaṇa's brother Vibhīṣaṇa. He adds the pronoun mio in italics, rendering, "che hai per ausilio mio fratello."

Cm provides an "inner meaning (vāstavārtha)" on this and the following verse. See notes to verse 19 below.

19. "Arrogant in battle though you be" raṇaślāghin: Literally, "praising or boasting in battle." The term raṇaślāghin can be either pejorative, as we understand it to be here, in the sense of a person who vainly boasts of his own prowess, or positive to refer to a person who is actually worthy of praise in battle. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 300) takes it as a term of homage, translating, "you, a foeman worthy of regard." Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 189) understands much as we do. Ñ1,V,B2–4,D4,9–11,13,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the nominative raṇaślāghī for the critical edition's vocative, making Rāvaṇa apply the term to himself. This reading, of course, makes the term unambiguously positive. See, too, 6.92.1 and note.

"striking you down, I shall quickly reduce you" tvāṃ nihatya . . . karomi tarasā samam: Literally, "having struck you down, I shall make [you] equal to." In keeping with his consistent effort to deflect any harm or threat of harm against Rāma, Cm suggests that verses 18 through 20 have an "inner meaning (vāstavārtha)," according to which Rāvaṇa means only to approach heroic Rāma and then turn his murderous lance against the monkey hosts, who are Rāma's and Lakṣmaṇa's allies. (śūlo 'yaṃ vajrasāra ityādisārdhaślokadvayasya vāstavārthas tu mayodyato me śūlas tava bhrātṛsahāyasya bhrātre lakṣmaṇāya sahāyasya vānarasamūhasyety arthaḥ. sadyaḥ prāṇān hariṣyatīti sambandhaḥ. rakṣasām ityādisārdhaślokam ekaṃ vākyam. śūre saty apy eṣo 'haṃ tvāṃ na nihanmy atas tvaṃ tiṣṭha kiṃtu tvāṃ nihatyāgatyety arthaḥ. hanahiṃsāgatyor iti dhātor ayam arthaḥ. nihatānāṃ śūrāṇāṃ rakṣasām. tṛtīyārthe ṣaṣṭhī. samaṃ karomi vānarān iti śeṣaḥ. nihatarākṣasapratikārārthaṃ vānarān hanisyāmīti bhāvaḥ.) See note to 6.80.29. See, too, notes to 6.27.9; 6.37.9; 6.80.29; and 6.81.4. Cf. notes to 6.27.4.

20. See note to verse 19 above.

Following verse 20, Ñ1,B2,3,D4–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [3003*]: "Loosed from Rāvaṇa's hand and haloed with garlands of lightning,[1] it looked splendid as it hurtled through the sky, its eight bells making a tremendous clangor."

[1]"with garlands of lighting" vidyunmālā-: D6,7,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read instead vidyujjvālā-, "flames or flashes of lightning." Cg understands that the lance is wreathed in flames that resemble lightning (vidyutsadṛśajvālā).

Following 3003*, Ñ1,B2,3,D4–7,9–11,S (Ñ2,V1,2,B4 after verse 20) insert a passage of two lines [3004*]: "When mighty Rāghava saw that blazing lance, terrible to look upon, he bent his bow and released his arrows."

21. "strove to stop" vārayāmāsa: The normal sense of the causal root √vāray would be "to arrest, block, or turn back." Since, however, the following verses make it clear that Rāma's arrows are unable to stop or deflect the terrible lance, we have translated accordingly. Ck and Ct, unwilling to contemplate the notion that Rāma's arrows should fly in vain, understand that he is using them initially merely to slow the progress of the lance (prathamaṃ vegabhaṅgam ity arthaḥ).

"just as Vāsava might" iva vāsavaḥ: Literally, "like Vāsava." The simile appears to be a kind of abhūtopamā based on the similar inadequacy of rain showers and flights of arrows directed against an unquenchable fiery energy rather than a reference to any specific mythological event.

23. "shattered . . . by the impact of that lance" śūlasaṃsparśacūrṇitān: Literally, "pulverized by contact with the lance."

"he was furious" krodham āharat: Literally, "he took or acquired anger." Ñ2,V1,2,B2–4,D3,10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead krodhamūrcchitaḥ, "[he was] beside himself with rage."

24. "crafted for Vāsava" vāsavanirmitām: Literally, "crafted for or by Vāsava." The compound is ambiguous as it does not make clear whether Indra actually fashioned the weapon or whether it was made for him by one of the smiths of the gods, such as Tvaṣṭṛ or Viśvakarman. On the other hand, Hopkins (1915, p. 122) cites a passage from the Mahābhārata according to which Indra does fashion at least some of his weaponry. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 301), the only translator to share the critical reading, renders, "fashioned by Vāsava." Ś,Ñ1,B1,D2,3,8,10–12,G1,2,M2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vāsavasaṃmatām, "esteemed or prized by Vāsava."

26. "it collided with the lance" tasmiñ śūle papāta ha: Literally, "it fell on that lance."

"its blazing splendor dimmed" gatadyutiḥ: Literally, "its radiance gone." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read the slight variant, hatadyutiḥ, "its radiance destroyed."

27. "Rāvaṇa's" asya: Literally, "his."

"arrows, arrows that were powerful . . . sharp" bāṇaiḥ . . . tīkṣṇaiḥ . . . śitaiḥ śaraiḥ: Literally, "with arrows that were sharp, with sharp arrows." The critical reading is rather redundant, although the broad semantic range of the adjective tīkṣṇa, which can mean "sharp, fierce, powerful, pungent, etc.," mitigates somewhat the redundancy of śita, "sharp." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read kṣiptaiḥ, "shot, hurled," for tīkṣṇaih, "sharp."

"arrows that were . . . hard as adamant . . . sharp" vajrakalpaiḥ śitaiḥ śaraiḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bāṇavadbhir ajihmagaiḥ, literally, "possessing bāṇas and going straight." The former of these two adjectives is obscure in its meaning and inspires a number of interpretations on the part of the commentators. The normal meaning of bāṇa is, of course, "arrow," but such a reading leads to the seemingly tautologous sense "[arrows] possessing arrows." Among the commentators, only Cs is willing to entertain this sense as a possibility. He observes: "It is possible to say that the quality of possessing arrows attributed to the arrows derives from the fact that, through the supernatural power of Rāma, arrows issue forth from some of the primary arrows that are directly loosed from his bowstring (bāṇavadbhiḥ keṣucit pradhāneṣv sākṣāj jyāvisṛṣṭeṣv iṣuṣu tebhyo 'pi rāmamāhātmyena niḥsaranti bāṇā iti bāṇānāṃ bāṇavattvaṃ sambhavatīti vā tathoktiḥ)." For the rest, commentators who share this reading, as well as Cg, Cm, and Cs, who note it as a variant, take the term bāṇa- in bāṇavadbhiḥ in its less common sense of "noise, sound" and thus understand the adjective to mean "resounding (śabdāyamānaiḥ—so Ct, Cm)." Cf. 6.92.21 and note.

28. "concentrating his energies" paramāyattaḥ: Literally, "exerting himself supremely."

"with . . . feathered shafts" patribhiḥ: The word patrin, "winged or feathered," is a common epic kenning for arrow. Cg argues, however, that there is no redundancy in the verse (between this term and śaraiḥ) because of the separate syntax. He notes that some [commentators, e.g., Cm] take the term adjectivally in the sense of "feathered or winged." (patribhis tribhir iti prayogabhedān na punaruktiḥ. patribhiḥ. patravadbhir ity eke.)

29. "in the midst of that host" samūhasthaḥ: The reference is evidently to Rāvaṇa's rākṣasa forces that are said to surround him in verse 13 above. Ck and Ct, however, seem to think that the adjective is inspired by the fact that Rāvaṇa has multiple heads and hands. (samūhasthaḥ samūhatayā sthitaḥ. bahuśiraḥpāṇitvāt tathātvam.) See notes to verse 30 below.

"like an aśoka tree in full bloom" phullāśoka ivābabhau: The simile derives from the resemblance of the blood-spattered body of Rāvaṇa to an aśoka tree covered with its scarlet blossoms.

30. "grew weary" jagāma khedam: Literally, "he went to exhaustion or depression." The term kheda can refer either to mental or physical lassitude or distress, and translators understand it variously. We believe the context here best supports an interpretation of physical debility.

"in the midst of his hosts" samājamadhye: We believe that this phrase, like the others in the concluding verse, merely echoes the parallel statement in verse 29 above, where Rāvaṇa is described as samūhasthaḥ. Cg and Cr, however, understand the term samāja- in the sense of "battle or battlefield." Cg glosses, "battle (yuddhe)," while Cr appears to associate the term with the noun āji, "battle or battlefield," glossing, "in the middle of the battle or battlefield (ājeḥ saṃgrāmasya madhye)." This interpretation is followed only by Pagani (1999, p. 1152), who renders, "au beau milieu du champ de bataille."

The meter is upajāti.

Sarga 92

1. "in battle" raṇe: D7,9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bhṛśam, "fiercely, severely."

"by Rāma" tena: Literally, "by him."

"arrogant in battle" samaraślāghī: See 6.91.19 and note.

2. "that mighty warrior" vīryavān: Literally, "the mighty or powerful one."

"drew back" āyamya: Literally, "having stretched or bent." Ś,Ñ,V,B2–4,D1–4,6–13,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead udyamya, "having taken up."

3. "filled" pūrayat: We follow Cv, Cg, and Cm, who share this reading, in taking the form to be an augmentless imperfect. Ñ,V1,B2–4,D1,4,6,9–11,13,T,G3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read instead the present participle pūrayan. Commentators who share this reading supplement the participle with a finite verb such as abhyardayat, "[filling,] he afflicted" (Ct).

"arrows . . . with its thousands of arrowlike torrents" bāṇadhārāsahasraiḥ . . . bāṇaiḥ: The simile appears to be slightly defective, as there is no explicit reference to showers of rain, while the term bāṇa- is repeated in pādas a and c. Apparently, the poet intends the compound to be a type of compound simile, in the sense of "arrowlike torrents." Indeed, this may be an idiom to express torrential rain, something like "raining cats and dogs" in English.

4. "riddled" pūritaḥ: Literally, "filled."

5. "the mighty warrior slowed . . . so that he received them as if they were no more than rays of sunshine" vārayan . . . gabhastīn iva sūryasya pratijagrāha: Literally, "blocking, he received [that mass of arrows] as if they were rays of the sun." The precise meaning of the verse is difficult to determine and has caused some confusion among commentators and translators alike. We take our cue here from Ct's and Ck's comments on 6.91.21 above, where they understand the causal root $\sqrt{vāray}$ to mean "to retard or slow down." The idea, as we see it, is that Rāma is neither stopping nor deflecting Rāvaṇa's arrows but rather slowing their momentum so that, even when they strike him, they are no more harmful than solar rays. Cr, the only commentator to discuss this verse, has a completely different idea. He understands the subject to be Rāvaṇa rather than Rāma. He believes that, in order to stop Rāma's hail of arrows, the rākṣasa takes up arrows of his own, which are like rays of the sun [that is, blazing brightly]. (sa rāvanaḥ śaraiḥ śarajālāni vārayan vārayituṃ sūryasya gabhastīn kiraṇān iva pratijagrāha śarān iti śeṣaḥ.) No translator consulted precisely follows Cr's interpretation. However, Dutt (1893, p. 1465) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 301) similarly supply the word "arrows," understanding that Rāma takes up arrows that are like solar rays to counter those of Rāvaṇa.

*6. "sank" nijaghāna: Literally, "he struck." Although the reading nijaghāna is well supported, the syntax of the verse is awkward, as the only plausible object of nijaghāna, śarasahasrāṇi, "thousands of arrows," is difficult to construe with this particular verb. Most translators tinker with the syntax to force the sense "struck in the chest with thousands of arrows." The commentators are either unhelpful or silent. A number of primarily northern manuscripts—Ś2,Ñ,V1,2,B1,2,4,D1–5,8,12,13,G3,M1, as well as the editions of Lahore and Gorresio—read instead the apparent facilior nicakhāna, "he sunk, buried," which is idiomatic and perhaps serves as a northern gloss. Like Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1801), we have translated accordingly.

7. "looked like a . . . kiṃśuka tree in full bloom" dṛṣṭaḥ phulla iva . . . kiṃśukadrumaḥ: See note to 6.60.34.

9. "in the midst of that battle, shrouded as it was in the darkness of their arrows" śarāndhakāre samare: Cr explains, "in that battle in which the arrows themselves constituted the darkness (śara evāndhakāro yasmiṃs tasmin samare)." Cf. 6.87.27 and note for a similar image of arrows darkening the battlefield.

11. "helpless" vivaśā: Cr, apparently unwilling to ascribe powerlessness to the goddess Sītā, glosses, atikāntimatī, "exceedingly lovely."

"behind my back" ajñānāt: Literally, "because of not knowing or ignorance." Commentators are divided as to whether the reference here is to Rāma's ignorance of Sītā's abduction or to Rāvaṇa's ignorance of Rāma's true nature and great prowess. Ck, Ct, and Cr offer the second interpretation, while Cg offers both as alternatives. We believe the former is correct, as it fits well with Rāma's taunting Rāvaṇa for his cowardice. Cg glosses, "because of my ignorance, that is, because I did not see [it] or because of your own lack of discrimination (mamājñānān mamādarśanāt tvadavivekād iti vā)." In choosing the latter, Ct is forced to lend a somewhat unusual sense to the term vīryavān, "heroic," in pāda d. He explains, "Because of ignorance, that is, lack of discrimination and ignorance of my true nature, you are not possessed of heroism. The meaning is: 'You shall soon perish because of this crime that has kindled my rage.' (ajñānād avivekān matsvarūpājñānāc ca tasmāt tvaṃ vīryavān nāsi ca. matkrodhadīpakena tena pāpena śīghraṃ vinaṅkṣyasīty arthaḥ.)" Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 344), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 302) and Pagani (1999, p. 1152), believes that the reference is to Rāvaṇa's exploitation of Sītā's ignorance. He renders, "en abusant de son ignorance."

12. "You . . . abducted . . . And now you think" hṛtvā . . . manyase: Literally, "Having abducted, you think."

"when she was alone . . . without me to protect her" mayā virahitām: Literally, "deprived of me or without me."

"Oh, what a great hero am I!" śūro 'ham: Literally, "I [am] a hero."

13. "Molester of other men's wives!" paradārābhimarśaka: Ñ,V,B2–4,D9–11,T1,3,G1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead paradārābhimarśana[ṛṣaṇa—Ñ1,B2]m, "the molestation of other men's wives." In this variant, the abstract noun must be taken as a second object, along with kāpuruṣaṃ karma, "contemptible act," of the gerund kṛtvā, "having committed," in pāda c.

"against defenseless women" strīṣu . . . vināthāsu: Literally, "with regard to women who lack a lord or protector."

"Oh, what a great hero am I!" śūro 'ham: See note to verse 12 above.

14. "Oh, what a great hero am I!" śūro 'ham: See note to verse 12 above.

15. "Kubera, bestower of wealth" dhanada-: Literally, "the giver or bestower of wealth." See 6.4.16; 6.7.3; 6.22.10; 6.69.26; 6.82.20; 6.98.12–13; 6.110.23; 6.115.24,49; and notes.

"a great . . . deed" karma mahat: All the commentators are at pains, perhaps unnecessarily, to explain that Rāma is speaking mockingly (sopahāsoktiḥ—so Cg).

16. "the truly fitting reward" sumahat phalam: Literally, "the very great fruit or result."

"evil" ahitasya: Ck and Ct focus on the term's sense of "inimical or harmful," glossing, "of such a nature as to be harmful both in this world and in the next (ihāmutrānartharūpasya)." According to Dutt (1893, p. 1466), this is also Crā's interpretation.

"which you committed in your arrogance" utsekenābhipannasya: Literally, "endowed with arrogance or pride." We understand with Ct and Cm, who gloss abhipannasya, "endowed," with "performed, practiced (anuṣṭhitasya)."

17. "evil-minded wretch" durmate: Literally, "O evil-minded one."

"as if you were a common thief" coravat: Literally, "like a thief."

18. "If you had dared to lay violent hands upon Sītā" yadi . . . sītā dharṣitā syāt tvayā balāt: "If Sītā had been assaulted forcibly by you."

"then and there" tadā: We follow Ct, who reads the adverb emphatically, glossing, "that very moment (tadaiva)."

"you would have . . . joined your brother Khara" bhrātaraṃ tu kharaṃ paśyeḥ: Literally, "you would see brother Khara." Rāma is using this circumlocution both to taunt Rāvaṇa over the death of his brother and to indicate that he would have slain him as well had Rāvaṇa only had the courage to assault Sītā in his presence. See 3.28.25. See, too, note to 6.55.103.

19. "evil-minded wretch" duṣṭātman: Literally, "O evil-minded one." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mandātman, "O dull-witted one or fool."

"you have come into my presence" asi mama . . . cakṣurviṣayam āgataḥ: Literally, "You have come to the range of my vision."

"the abode of Yama" yamasādanam: Cr glosses, "I shall lead you to the place of the Nemins (yamasādanaṃ nemināṃ sthānaṃ nayāmi)." The term nemin is somewhat obscure and appears to have no lexical basis. It can be interpreted to mean "possessing time (nema)." The word nema could be understood to be a reference to Yama as Time or Kāla, the destroyer of all. Perhaps Cr is thinking of the vaivasvatakiṃkaras, or the servants of death, mentioned at 6.61.53. See 6.61.53 and note.

20. "your head" śiraḥ: Cg notes that we are to understand by this reference that now, in his final moments, Rāvaṇa has only a single head (as opposed to the ten heads that normally characterize his form in battle) (anena tadānīm antakāle rāvaṇa ekaśiraskaḥ sthita iti gamyate). See note to 6.47.106.

"as it rolls" vikīrṇam: Literally, "scattered."

21. "my arrowheads" bāṇaśalya-: The term śalya generally refers to a dart, spear, arrow, or other sharp projectile. In this compound, and in the present context, it would appear to be somewhat redundant with bāṇa-, normally, "arrow." We understand with Cr, who glosses, "the iron tip portion of an arrow (ayomayabāṇāgrabhāga-)." Cf. 6.91.27 and note.

22. "the carrion birds" patagāḥ: Literally, "ones who go by flying," i.e., birds. The reference here, however, as Cr notes, must be specifically to carrion birds. He glosses, "vultures and the like (gṛdhrādayaḥ)."

24. "the power of his divine weapon-spells . . . redoubled" dviguṇam . . . astrabalam: Cm understands that it is Rāma's calling to mind the power of the astras (astrabalaviṣayasmaraṇam) that has doubled. Ck and Ct believe that it is Rāma's recollection of the wrong that was done to him that causes the redoubling of his energies (apakārasmaraṇād iti śeṣaḥ).

25. "All the divine weapon-spells" astrāṇi sarvāṇi: Ck and Ct understand that the presiding divinities of the weapon-spells present themselves before Rāma. Ck specifies that these are the sons of Kṛśāśva (kṛśāśvaputrā astradevatāḥ sannihitā abhuvann ity arthaḥ). See 1.20.13ff.; 1.27.9; and notes. See, too, UttaRāC 1.1.14, lines 7, 8, 9, and verse 15.

"celebrated" viditātmanaḥ: See 1.41.7 and note, where both the context and the commentators make it clear that we are to understand the compound as having the sense "well-known, celebrated." There Ct and Cr gloss similarly (prasiddha or prakhyāta). Most translators consulted, however, have taken the term in its other sense, "knowing one's self" or "knowing the universal self." See notes to 6.24.7 and 6.31.58.

"And, in his excitement" praharṣāt: Ct and Ck understand that Rāma's excitement is a product of the presence of the presiding divinities of the weapon-spells (astradevatāsaṃnidhijāt—so Ct). Cr, however, takes it simply to be the joy produced by his zeal for battle (yuddhotsāhajanitānandāt).

"that immensely powerful hero" mahātejāḥ: Literally, "the immensely powerful one."

26. "within himself" ātmagatāni: Literally, "gone to the self." The term is somewhat ambiguous. Like most of the translators consulted, we believe that the term refers to the physical and psychological changes in Rāma mentioned in verse 24 above. Dutt (1893, p. 1466) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 303), however, understand the term to mean that the signs, including, one presumes, the astras, or divine weapon-spells, appear of their own accord. Thus, Dutt translates, "coming of themselves," while Shastri offers, "appearing of themselves." Cf. note to 6.94.29 below.

27. "his heart began to falter" vighūrṇahṛdayaḥ: Literally, "whose heart was agitated or wavering." Ct, who we believe is correct, glosses, "whose heart is wavering or frightened (vikalahṛdayaḥ)." Dutt (1893, pp. 1466–67) takes the term rather literally, rendering, "felt his heart undergoing a revolution." He then alludes to Ct in his note, saying, "Vighurnahridayah: had his heart paralysed, according to the commentator. I prefer the sense given as more graphic."

28. "Then" yadā: Literally, "when." This verse is technically a subordinate clause that appears to have no resolution until verse 30.

See note to verse 29 below.

29. There is a major difference in the reading of this passage (verses 28–30) on the part of the two schools of southern commentators: those associated with the texts of Ct, Cr, and Ck, on the one hand, and those associated with the texts of Cg, Cm, Crā, and Cv, on the other. The difference hinges on a variant in 29c, where the critical edition and the text of Cg et al. read na raṇārthāya vartante, which we have rendered, "proved useless in battle (lit., they did not exist for the purpose of battle)." V2,B1,3,D1–3,5–7,9–11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead maraṇārthāya, "for the purpose of [his] death." This variant forces the commentators who share it to understand 28c–29d ["with his heart faltering . . . or counter Rāma's valor in any way. Even those arrows and various other weapons he managed to deploy proved useless in battle—as he now approached the hour of his death (nāsya pratyakarod vīryaṃ viklavenāntarātmanā // kṣiptāś cāpi śarās tena śastrāṇi vividhāni ca / na raṇārthāya vartante mṛtyukāle 'bhivartataḥ)] to mean that Rāma desisted from attacking the stunned Rāvaṇa, but that the arrows and other weapons that he, Rāma, had previously unleashed betokened Rāvaṇa's death. (yāni maraṇārthāya vartante tāni śarāḥ śastrāṇi ca kṣiptā rāmeṇeti śeṣaḥ. ato mṛtyukālo 'bhyavartata rāvaṇasyeti śeṣaḥ—so Cr.)

D7,10,G2,M2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct additionally read the predicative phrase mṛtyukālo 'bhyavartata, "[Rāvaṇa's] hour of death approached," for the critical edition's mṛtyukāle 'bhivartataḥ (literally, "of him who was approaching in the hour of [his] death").

30. Following verse 30, D7 and KK (preceding 3024*) add two passages 3025* (three lines) and 3023* (one line), which continue the description of a faltering Rāvaṇa and a retreating chariot. These lines are not rendered in any translation consulted.

Following verse 30, Ś,Ñ,V,B (missing in the text of Gorresio),D1–4,7–13, and the editions of KK [numbered in brackets as 6.105.34, following 3023*], GPP, NSP, and Gita Press [6.103.31] insert a passage of four lines [3024*]: "Perceiving that the lord of the earth was flagging,[1] his strength all gone, the charioteer swiftly turned back that fearsome chariot that rumbled like a storm cloud and quickly[2] fled the battlefield."

[1]"flagging" patitam: Literally, "fallen."

[2]"quickly" śīghram: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bhītyā, "out of fear."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Sarga 93

1. "in his delusion" mohāt: Literally, "out of infatuation or confusion." We understand, with Cr, Cg, and Cm, that the term refers to the general lack of discrimination (avivekāt—Cg,Cm) that normally afflicts epic warriors in the moments before their death. Cr shares this view, stating explicitly that Rāvaṇa is enraged as a result of the delusion that arises from the fact that the hour of his death is at hand (āsannamaraṇakāla ity artho 'ta eva mohāt saṃkruddhaḥ). Ck and Ct, however, believe that the reference is to the stunned condition of Rāvaṇa that is a result of the assault by Rāma and the monkeys in the closing moments of the previous sarga. They understand that Rāvaṇa is only now gradually recovering from his stupor and is therefore able to rebuke his charioteer for removing him from the battlefield. They supply the phrase "gradually freed from his stupor (śanair mohena mukta iti śeṣaḥ)."

2–3. The various terms for a weak and powerless person used here naturally overlap considerably in meaning. Commentators and translators render them variously to avoid redundancy. See note to 6.2.14.

"Acting on your own authority" svayā buddhyā viceṣṭase: Literally, "you act according to your own idea or thought."

5. "utterly undermined" vināśitaḥ: Literally, "destroyed."

"over long years" cirakāla-: Literally, "for a long time."

"reputation" pratyayaḥ: Literally, "confidence, faith, trust." We understand the term, as do the commentators, to refer either to people's belief that Rāvaṇa is a true hero (pratyayo madviṣayo lokasya śūratvaviśvāsaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cr similarly) or to his reputation for never fleeing in battle (rāvaṇasya yudhi palāyanaṃ nāstīti sarveṣāṃ viśvāsaḥ—so Cg and Cm; Cv similarly).

6. "you have made me look like a coward in the eyes of an enemy" śatroḥ . . . paśyataḥ . . . ahaṃ kṛtaḥ kāpuruṣas tvayā: Literally, "by you I have been made a coward, although an enemy is watching."

7. "In that you stupidly failed to drive the chariot forward" yas tvaṃ ratham imaṃ mohān na codvahasi: Literally, "and you who out of delusion do not drive this chariot away." The phrase is somewhat problematic. We follow Cg, the only commentator who remarks on this reading. Cg explains as follows: "You who do not cause it [the chariot] to go facing but instead drive it away (yo nodvāhayasy abhimukhaṃ na prāpayasi kiṃtv apavāhayasi sa tvam)." The texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead yat tvaṃ katham idaṃ mohān na ced vahasi. The most probable meaning of this awkward phrase would be: "If somehow you do not drive out of delusion." The idea, then, is that if the charioteer is not acting out of incompetence, it must be because of corruption.

"bribed" upaskṛtaḥ: This term, which normally means "embellished, perfected," must be taken here in its less common meaning of "changed, modified." The commentators understand it to mean that the charioteer has been made to turn against his master by bribery (sa tvaṃ pareṇopaskṛta utkocena vikāraṃ prāpita iti—so Ct). Ct supports this reading by referring to the grammatical rule according to which the verb $\sqrt{kṛ}$, when preceded by the upasarga upa, takes the insert s (suṭ) in the sense of "change or cheating (vaikṛta)" (upādvaikṛte 'rthe karoteḥ suṭ). Compare Pā 6.1.139.

8. "Indeed, it is more typical of one's enemies." ripūṇāṃ sadṛśaṃ caitat: Literally, "And this is worthy of enemies."

"What you have done is wrong" na tvayaitat svanuṣṭhitam: Literally, "This is not properly done by you."

9. "If you are my longtime friend" yadi vāpy uṣito 'si tvam: Literally, "or if you have dwelt." The phrase is elliptical and we share the view of the commentators, who gloss, "if you have been by my side for a long time (cirakālaṃ matsamīpe sthitaḥ—so Ct)." Cv and Cg, as an alternative, suggest, "a person who has approached deceitfully (upadhayopasarpitaḥ—so Cg)."

"or if you recall my many favors" smaryante yadi vā guṇāḥ: Literally, "or if virtues are remembered." Although some translators render literally (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 304 ["virtues"]; Dutt 1893, p. 1468 ["merit"]; and Pagani 1999, p. 1154 ["vertus"]), we believe the context better supports the commentators' gloss, "favors, honor etc. (matkṛtopakāraḥ—so Ct, Ck; satkārāḥ—so Cg)" or "the virtues such as helpfulness that are resident in me (upakartṛtvādimanniṣṭhā guṇāḥ—so Crā, Cm)." The idea is that the charioteer is expected to show gratitude for his master's past favors, not merely his good qualities.

10. "by that fool" abuddhinā: Literally, "by that witless one."

"who wished his master well" hitabuddhiḥ: Literally, "of beneficial thoughts."

11. "I am not lacking in my affection for you" na niḥsnehaḥ: Literally, "not devoid of affection."

"the favors you have bestowed" satkriyā: Literally, "kind favors, respectful treatment."

12. "this favor" priyam: D5,7,9–11,M1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead hitam, "benefit."

"out of a desire for your well-being and to preserve your reputation" mayā tu hitakāmena yaśaś ca parirakṣatā: Literally, "by me who has a desire for well-being and [by me] protecting reputation or fame." Ct and Cr believe that, in saving Rāvaṇa's life, the charioteer is acting to protect both Rāvaṇa's reputation and his own (jīvanarakṣaṇenātmīyaṃ tvadīyaṃ ca yaśo rakṣatety arthaḥ—so Ct).

13. "In this matter" asminn arthe: As several of the commentators point out, the reference is to the charioteer's having driven Rāvaṇa from the battlefield (yuddhād apohanarūpe kārye—so Ct).

"you should not . . . find fault with me" na . . . tvaṃ mām . . . doṣato gantum arhasi: Literally, "you ought not understand me through fault." One must follow the commentators here in taking the root $\sqrt{gam}$ in its sense of "to know or think." Cm's gloss, "you ought not have a fault-finding eye toward me (mayi doṣadṛṣṭiṃ kartuṃ nārhasīty arthaḥ)," is perhaps the clearest rendering. The text of Gorresio (6.89.12), doubtless as a gloss, reads mantum, "to think or regard," for gantum.

"like some lowly and ignoble person" kaścil laghur ivānāryaḥ: Literally, "like some trivial, ignoble one." For reasons we cannot determine, several of the translators of the southern text, including Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 348), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 304), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 304), and Pagani (1999, p. 1154), read the simile as if both terms, laghuḥ, "trivial," and anāryaḥ, "ignoble," were in the accusative, modifying the charioteer, rather than in the nominative, referring to Rāvaṇa. In this reading, the charioteer is asking Rāvaṇa not to regard him as a lowly and ignoble person. According to the critical apparatus, a number of manuscripts, both southern and northern, read either one or both of the adjectives in the accusative (Ś2,B,D1–3,7–9,12,M2,T2,3—laghum; V3,B2–4,D5,9,T1—anāryam). However, no southern commentator consulted reads this variant. In addition, the only printed editions to read the accusative here are those of Lahore (6.89.12) and Gorresio (6.89.12), and only Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 194) translates accordingly. It is possible that Roussel, as sometimes appears to be the case, is influenced by Gorresio, while Shastri and, to some extent, Pagani often tend to follow Roussel. Raghunathan's choice, however, remains inexplicable. See Introduction, pp. 114–117, and notes to 6.3.16; 6.98.2; and 6.116.11.

14. "I will tell you" abhidhāsyāmi: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the elliptical pratidāsyāmi, "I will give back." Ct supplies the ellipsis by adding the word uttaram, "answer."

"from the battle" saṃyuge: Literally, "in battle." Ct corrects the awkward case ending, glossing, "from battle (saṃyugāt)." Cg notes the improper case ending of both this term and of his reading ābhoge (see the following note). A number of northern manuscripts and the editions of Lahore and Gorresio similarly correct to the ablative.

"as the current of a river is turned back by the rising tide" nadīvega ivāmbhobhiḥ: Literally, "as is the force of a river by the waters." Ct and Cm, whom we have followed, understand this to be an elliptical reference to the rising waters of the sea at moonrise, etc. (candrodayādinā pravṛddhasamudrodakair nadīvega iva—so Cm). D5,T1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cv (Crā and Cm as a variant) read ābhoge, "broad expanse," for ambhobhiḥ. Cg and Cm understand the term here to mean "higher ground" from which river waters flow back (ābhoge parvatādyunnatapradeśe nadīvega ivety arthaḥ—so Cm). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 304) translates, "as the force of a stream might be blocked by rising ground." He is, however, cognizant of the critical reading as he places in parentheses "(alt: by the rising tides of the ocean)."

15. "And, heroic warrior, I did not see your wonted enthusiasm and exuberance." na hi te vīra saumukhyaṃ praharṣaṃ vopadhāraye: Literally, "For, hero, I do not perceive your cheerfulness or excitement." Ś2,Ñ2,B1,D3,5,8,10–12,T,G,M1,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read vīrya-, "heroism, valor," for the vocative vīra, "O hero." This yields the compound vīryasaumukhyam, which Ct glosses as "cheerfulness or enthusiasm with respect to the acts to be accomplished through valor (vīryakāryaṃ prati saumukhyam)." Ck understands similarly. Cr reads the compound as a bahuvrīhi modifying the variant reading prakarṣam, "superiority." He glosses, "in which there is a manifestation of superior valor (vīryasyādhikaparākramasya saumukhyaṃ prākaṭyaṃ yasmiṃs tam)." This would give the line the sense: "I do not see your superiority in which there is a manifestation of your superior valor." D7,10,11,M1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read prakarṣam, "superiority," for the critical edition's praharṣam, "exuberance." D6,9–11,G1,M1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read na, "not," for the critical edition's vā, "or," yielding a double negative construction. In a footnote, Dutt (1893, p. 1468) says, "Two negatives in this verse amounting [sic] to an affirmative. This is the only instance of double negatives in Vālmīki." Despite this assertion, Dutt does not translate affirmatively, and his claim as to the uniqueness of the double negative is dubious at best. See 6.37.11; 6.67.36; 6.95.24; 6.101.36; and notes. See, too, 6.99.24, 3132*, lines 7–8, and n. 4.

16. "these" ta ime: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bhagnā me, "my [horses] are broken down."

"as cattle battered by torrential rain" gāvo varṣahatā iva: Literally, "like cattle struck by rain." The precise reference of the simile is not entirely clear, and the southern commentators offer little assistance. Perhaps the idea is that the horses, covered with sweat, are likened to drenched cattle. This idea is supported by a few scattered northern variants, such as B3's -klinnāḥ, "wet," and Gorresio's -svinnāḥ, "sweating." Several of the translators consulted add that the horses are perspiring (Dutt 1893, p. 1468; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 304; and Pagani 1999, p. 1155).

17. "all the many" bhūyiṣṭham: Literally, "to a large extent." Cr reads the term with apradakṣiṇam in pāda d, yielding the sense "overwhelmingly inauspicious."

"I foresee no good outcome for us" lakṣayāmy apradakṣiṇam: Literally, "I discern that which is inauspicious or unfavorable."

18–20. "a good charioteer" rathakuṭumbinā: Literally, "a caretaker of the chariot," i.e., charioteer.

"signs" lakṣaṇāni: According to Cv, Cg, Cm, and Ct, the reference is to "auspicious and inauspicious omens (śubhāśubhanimittāni)." Cm, however, offers, as a first alternative, "such signs as sluggishness in the use of astras (divine weapon-spells) and [other] weapons (astraśastraprayogamāndyādīni)."

"gestures" iṅgitāni: Cm, Cg, and Ct understand that these refer to a pale face (or hands—Cm) and other physical manifestations of emotional distress or well-being (mukhaprasādavaivarṇyādiceṣṭāś ca—so Ct).

"the . . . relative strength and weakness" balābalam: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahābala, "O mighty one."

"of his master" rathinaḥ: Literally, "of the chariot owner." The reference is to the warrior who fights from the chariot.

"the elevations and depressions of the terrain" sthalanimnāni bhumeś ca: We follow the commentators in taking the term sthala-, normally, "firm or dry ground," in its sense of "raised ground" (Apte s.v.). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 348) understands the term in its more common sense, translating, "Les endroits où le terrain est ferme." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 304). Pagani (1999, p. 1155) similarly renders, "le terrain sec."

"when to retreat" pratyapasarpaṇam: The commentators differ slightly on the meaning of this term. Ct, Cm, and Cg understand it to mean "retreating while keeping one's face toward the enemy (abhimukhasthitasya pṛṣṭhataḥ)." Cr, on the other hand, understands, "stationing oneself behind one's enemy (ripupṛṣṭhadeśe sthāpanam)."

21. "crushing" raudram: Literally, "dreadful, fierce." Ct and Ck gloss, "cruel (krūram)," while Cg and Cm gloss, "unbearable (duḥsaham—so Cg)."

"I acted in this fitting manner" kṣamaṃ kṛtam idaṃ mayā: Literally, "this fitting thing was done by me."

22. "on my own account" svecchayā: Literally, "through my own inclination or desire."

"heroic warrior" vīra: Literally, "O hero."

"overwhelmed with love for you, my master" bhartṛsnehaparītena: Literally, "overcome with affection for the master."

23. "proper" yathātattvam: The phrase is slightly ambiguous. We have translated with the majority of commentators, understanding the word yathātattvam adverbially in the sense of "what is fitting or proper." Ct appears to break the sequence into yathā tat tvam, glossing, "as you shall announce that, which is of the form of my obligation, I will do just that (yathā tvaṃ tat kāryasvarūpaṃ vakṣyasi tat kariṣyāmi)."

"With my mind discharged of its obligations" gatānṛṇyena cetasā: Literally, "With a mind whose debt is gone." The adjectival compound gatānṛṇyena is slightly obscure in its meaning and has been understood in various ways by commentators and translators alike. We believe that the context best supports the interpretation of Cg, who reads the compound as a paraniṗāta in the sense of "a mind that has achieved freedom from debt or obligation, that is, has taken a solemn vow to achieve this state (ānṛṇyaṃ gatena ānṛṇyaṃ kartavyam iti kṛtasaṃkalpena cetasā manasā)." The closest translation to this interpretation appears to be that of Gorresio (1858, vol. 10, p. 195), who renders, "con animo intento a sdebitarsi." Ct understands, "with a mind that has given or paid the traditional three debts with which every person is born [that is debts to the pitṛs, devas, and ṛṣis] (dattaṛṇatrayeṇa)." Cr believes that the charioteer's mind has been freed of its obligations to Rāvaṇa through his having saved the latter's life (gataṃ prāptam ānṛṇyaṃ tava rakṣaṇenaṛṇābhāvo yasmiṃs tena manasā). Cm glosses, "with a mind whose freedom from debt is anticipated or foreseen (prekṣitāṇṛṇyena cetasā)." Translators vary in their renditions. Dutt (1893, p. 1469) simply renders, "with my whole soul." This interpretation appears also to have been followed by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 348 ["de tout coeur"]) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 305 ["implicitly with all my heart"]). Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1805) understands, "which feels relieved of all obligations," while Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 305) offers, "desiring as I do only to do my duty." Pagani (1999, p. 1155) translates, "avec loyauté." On the debts with which everyone is born, see ŚatBr 1.7.2.1 and ManuSm 4.257.

26. "Then . . . pleased" tatas tuṣṭaḥ: V2,3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead rathasthasya, "of [to] him [the charioteer] standing in the chariot."

"ring" hastābharaṇam: Literally, "hand ornament." The exact nature of the ornament is not clear. We, along with Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 348), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 305), and Pagani (1999, p. 1155), assume that it is a ring. Other translators simply render literally.

27. The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Following sarga 93, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of sixty-four lines (App. I, No. 65), constituting a separate sarga (6.6.105—NSP, GPP, and Gita Press; 6.107—KK and VSP). All translators of the southern recension render this popular passage, which is commonly referred to as the Ādityahṛdaya. The passage is regarded as a significant hymn and is incorporated as an integral part of the Rāmāyaṇa. Many of the southern commentators consider the piece to be virtually a vedic hymn, assigning to it, in the manner of the vaidikas, a principal divinity (either Brahmā [Ct and Ck] or Rāma in the form of the sun [Cr]); a ṛṣi, Agastya; a vedic meter, anuṣṭubh; and an application (viniyoga) that includes the elimination of all obstacles, the acquisition of knowledge of the absolute, and the accomplishment of universal victory. These commentators also suggest that the piece, like the vedas themselves, has ancillary texts, variously described as homage to the radiant sun or to Gayatrī (cf. note to 6.1.1). In fact, some of the commentators, notably Ck, Ct, Cr, and Cm, invest the text with an almost upaniṣadic quality so that it seems, at times, that they regard its principal divinity merely as the sun, at other times as Lord Viṣṇu, sometimes as Rāma, and at still other times as the upaniṣadic Brahman.

Cg, alone among the commentators who accept this passage, seems less impressed with it. His comments are generally straightforward and avoid the esoteric etymologies and upaniṣadic exegeses of some of his colleagues. In fact, he expresses some disquiet at the way in which the hymn seems at times to exalt Sūrya, a relatively minor divinity in post-vedic India, above even Nārāyaṇa, the central focus of Vaiṣṇava devotion. He makes some effort to rationalize these two tendencies in a set of general comments on the sarga's final verse but indicates that he is also somewhat skeptical regarding the textual authenticity of the piece. He notes that Uḍāli (Cv), whose commentary we believe to be the oldest extant one, does not comment on this sarga. Moreover, Cg notes that Uḍāli enumerates 130 sargas in the Yuddhakāṇḍa and that, if the Ādityahṛdaya chapter were to be included, it would raise the total (in Cg's text) to 131. It should be noted, however, that our transcript of Cv's commentary, which includes this passage, numbers it as sarga 107 and enumerates the total number of sargas in the kāṇḍa as 131.

Some of the commentators understand that Agastya has come to bolster the confidence of Rāma, who is anxious about his ability to kill Rāvaṇa (so Cv and Cm). Ct believes that Rāma (as an omnipotent divinity) merely pretends to be afraid, since he wishes to receive the Ādityahṛdaya from Agastya for the benefit of the world. Cg understands that Rāma is concerned about how he is to defeat Rāvaṇa without revealing his nature as the supreme divinity.

The passage consists largely of a stotra, or hymn of praise, to Āditya, or Sūrya, and, as such, contains numerous names, kennings, and epithets for this celestial deity. Commentators exercise their ingenuity and demonstrate their devotion by providing many multiple interpretations of these names and terms, often giving both the standard mythological reference as well as a more esoteric "functionalist" interpretation based on the etymology of the name. These secondary interpretations tend to refer to the role of the divinity in the creation and maintenance of the world, the dispelling of ignorance and the pains of worldly existence, the salvation of devotees, etc. For the sake of brevity, we have refrained from providing detailed discussions of these interpretive strategies. Readers should be aware, however, that several of the translators consulted tend to interpolate these multiple interpretations of the commentators into their translations.

"Then the blessed Agastya, who, together with the gods, had come to witness the battle, seeing that Rāma was exhausted by combat and overcome with anxiety with regard to the battle and that Rāvaṇa[1] was positioned in the vanguard for further combat, approached Rāma and said [1–4]: 'Rāma, great-armed Rāma,[2] now hear this immemorial secret teaching by means of which, my child, you shall conquer all your enemies.[5–6] One should constantly intone[3] this holy Ādityahṛdaya,[4] which destroys all of one's enemies and brings victory. It is eternal, indestructible, supreme, and auspicious.[7–8] It is the auspiciousness of all auspicious things, and it destroys all sins. It calms anxiety and grief, and it is the greatest means for the extension of life.[9–10] So worship Vivasvān, bringer of light,[5] the lord of the worlds, rising with his halo of rays, worshiped by the gods and asuras.[11–12] He is the essence of all the gods. Filled with blazing energy, he brings all beings to life with his rays.[6] With his rays he protects the gods, the asuras, and all the worlds.[13–14] He is Brahmā,[7] Viṣṇu, Śiva, Skanda, and Prajāpati. He is great Indra, Kubera, the bestower of wealth, Kāla, Yama, Soma, and Varuṇa, lord of the waters.[8][15–16] He is the ancestors, the Vasus, the Sādhyas, the two Aśvins, the Maruts, and Manu. He is Vāyu and Agni. He is all creatures, the breath of life,[9] and the sun, bringer of light and author of the seasons.[10][17–18] He is Āditya, Savitṛ, Sūrya, he who moves through the sky, Pūṣan, and the many-rayed sun. He is the being as radiant as gold, he is the golden seed, the maker of day.[11][19–20] He is the thousand-rayed lord of the tawny steeds, the master of seven horses, and he has myriad rays. He is the dispeller of darkness and he is Śambhu, the auspicious one.[12] He is Tvaṣṭṛ and Mārtaṇḍa of many rays.[21–22] He is Hiraṇyagarbha, the golden embryo, the cooling one, the scorching one, Ravi, and the bringer of light.[13] The son of Aditi, he bears Agni in his womb. He is Śaṅkha.[14] He brings the winter to a close.[23–24] He is the lord of the heavens, the piercer of darkness, and the master of the Ṛk-, Yajur-, and Sāmavedas. Friend of the waters, he is the source of torrential rains. He flies across the path of the Vindhya mountains.[15][25–26] He is the scorching one, the great orb. He is death, the golden one who scorches all beings. A sage, omnipresent, of immense blazing energy, reddish in hue,[16] he is the source of all existence.[27–28] He is lord of the constellations, planets, and stars. He is the giver of life to all, most radiant of all radiant beings. I do homage to you, you of the twelve forms.[17][29–30] Homage to him who rises on the eastern mountain and who sets on the western mountain.[18] Homage to the lord of the hosts of heavenly luminaries. Homage to the lord of day.[31–32] Homage, homage[19] to the victorious one, to him of the tawny horses,[20] who offers victory[21] and auspiciousness. Homage, homage to him of the thousand rays. Homage, homage to Āditya.[33–34] Homage to the fierce warrior. Homage, homage to the swift one.[22] Homage to him who makes the lotus bloom. Homage, homage to Martāṇḍa.[35–36] Homage to radiant Sūrya, who is the lord of Brahmā, Lord Śiva, and the imperishable Viṣṇu,[23] whose radiance is that of Āditya and who, in his fierce form, devours all creatures.[37–38] Homage to the banisher of darkness and the bringer of the thaw,[24] to that immeasurable god who slaughters his enemies and destroys the ungrateful, the lord of heavenly luminaries.[39–40] Homage to Viśvakarman, the maker of all things,[25] to Agni,[26] whose luster is that of burnished gold. Homage to Ravi, the eye of all the worlds,[27] dispeller of darkness.[41–42] He is the lord who destroys the creation and then creates it anew. With his rays, he dries up, scorches, and inundates the world.[28][43–44] Lodged within all beings, he[29] remains awake while they sleep. He is the agnihotra sacrifice as well as the reward of those who perform it.[30][45–46] He is all the vedas,[31] all sacrifices, and the reward of all sacrifices. He, Lord Ravi, is everything.[32] He is all actions that are done throughout the worlds.[47–48] Even if a man be in distress, difficulty, or danger, or if he be lost in the wilderness,[33] he shall not, Rāghava, so long as he praises the sun,[34] succumb to any harm.[49–50] Therefore, with a focused mind, you should worship that god of gods, the lord of the worlds. For, having intoned this hymn[35] three times,[36] you will be victorious[37] in all your battles.[51–52] This very hour, great-armed warrior,[38] you shall slay[39] Rāvaṇa.' Then, when he had spoken in this fashion, Agastya departed just as he had come.[53–54] When immensely powerful Rāghava had heard that, he became free from care.[40.] Concentrating his mind and greatly pleased, he memorized it.[55–56] Gazing at Āditya and intoning that hymn,[41] he attained supreme happiness. Sipping water three times and having thus become purified, the mighty warrior[42] took up his bow and, his eyes fixed on Rāvaṇa,[43] went forth to battle[44] with a delighted heart.[57–59] Exerting himself to the utmost,[45] he was determined[46] to kill him.[60] Then Ravi himself, surrounded by the hosts of gods, anticipating with a delighted mind the destruction of the lord of the night-roaming rākṣasas, gazed upon Rāma and, in great excitement, said, 'Make haste.'[47][61–64]"

[1]"seeing that Rāma was exhausted by combat and overcome with anxiety with regard to the battle and that Rāvaṇa . . ." yuddhapariśrāntaṃ samare cintayā sthitam / rāvaṇam . . . dṛṣṭvā: The commentators and translators are divided as to whether Rāma or Rāvaṇa is represented in line 1 as suffering from battle fatigue and anxiety. Although Rāma is not mentioned in any of the first three lines as an explicit object of the gerund dṛṣṭvā, "having seen," Ct believes that the referent is Rāma, who, as noted above, he believes to be feigning these disabilities as part of his avatāric plan. Cg similarly understands the reference to be to Rāma, although, as indicated above, for slightly different reasons. Given the tenor of Agastya's remarks in which he appears to be bolstering Rāma's fortitude, we are inclined to agree with these commentators. Cv, Cm, and Cr, however, understand that the reference is to Rāvaṇa alone since he is exhausted and despondent from his having been worsted in the previous encounter. This view is reflected in the translations of Dutt (1893, p. 1469) and Pagani (1999, p. 1155). The remaining translators understand with Ct and Cg that the reference is to Rāma. See note 40 below.

[2]"Rāma . . . Rāma" rāma rāma: Cg believes that Agastya's repetition of Rāma's name is caused by three factors: 1) Rāma's being deeply absorbed in anxious thought; 2) Agastya's exceedingly profound respect for Rāma; and 3) Agastya's urgency to carry out his mission (rāmasya cintāviṣṭatvāt svādarātiśayāt kāryatvarayā).

[3]"One should . . . intone" japet: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cm read instead japam, "recitation or prayer."

[4]"this . . . Ādityahṛdaya" ādityahṛdayam: Literally, "the heart of the sun." In keeping with its quasi-vedic and esoteric nature, the commentators offer a variety of explanations of the name.

[5]"Vivasvān, bringer of light" vivasvantaṃ bhāskaram: Literally, "Vivasvān, maker of light." Cr, in keeping with his own theological reading of the Rāmāyaṇa, understands that references throughout this passage are both to the sun and to Rāma, who dwells within the sun, since they are both of the same essence (sūryatadantarvartirāmayos tādātmyāt).

[6]"he brings all beings to life with his rays" raśmibhāvanaḥ: Literally, "causing to exist with rays." According to Ct, Cm, and Ck, the sense here is that the sun brings into being all things through his rays of knowledge (jñānaraśmibhiḥ sarvaṃ vastujātaṃ bhāvayati sattāsphūrtimat saṃpādayati saḥ—so Ct). Ct attributes an alternative interpretation to unnamed others, who evidently associate the verb bhāvayati with the related term bhāvanā, "meditation." He says, "according to others, the meaning is that with his rays he causes yogins to meditate, that is, he causes them to attain the world of Brahmā (raśmibhir yogino bhāvayati brahmalokaṃ prāpayatīty artha ity anye)."

[7]"Brahmā" brahmā: Ct offers dual explanations of each of the names in the verse, referring, in each case, both to the normal mythological figure and also to some etymologically derived feature of the Supreme Being. Cg is chiefly concerned with differentiating those pairs of divinities that seem to be identical. Thus, he distinguishes Prajāpati from Brahmā by stating that the former name is a collective singular here for the nine Prajāpatis of traditional mythology. Similarly, he distinguishes between the normally synonymous Kāla (Time) and Yama by stating that the former term refers specifically to death personified, who is different from Yama, the lord of death. See notes to 6.21.26 and 6.55.93–96.

[8]"Kubera, the bestower of wealth . . . and Varuṇa, lord of the waters" dhanadaḥ . . . apāṃpatiḥ: Literally, "the wealth-giver, the lord of the waters." The latter reference is presumably to Varuṇa, who in post-vedic mythology is normally regarded as the lord of the ocean. On Kubera, see 6.4.16; 6.7.3; 6.22.10; 6.69.26; 6.82.20; 6.92.15; 6.98.12–13; 6.110.23; 6.115.24,49; and notes.

[9]"the Maruts . . . He is Vāyu and Agni. He is all creatures, the breath of life" marutaḥ . . . vāyur vahniḥ prajāḥ prāṇaḥ: Literally, "[He is] the Maruts, Vāyu, fire, creatures, breath." Cg is at pains to differentiate the three terms that refer to air or wind, viz., marutaḥ, vāyuḥ, and prāṇaḥ. He states that the first refers to the seven atmospheric winds of Hindu cosmology, such as the āvaha wind; the second, to the wind that blows on earth; and the third, to the wind or breaths located within the body. (marutaḥ āvahādivāyavaḥ. vāyur bhūlokasaṃcārī. prāṇaḥ śarīrāntaḥstho vāyuḥ.) See notes to 6.64.7. D7,11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cm (= VSP, KK 6.107.9) read the compound prajāprāṇaḥ, "life breath of living creatures," for the critical edition's prajāḥ prāṇaḥ, "creatures, breath of life."

[10]"and the sun, bringer of light and author of the seasons" ṛtukartā prabhākaraḥ: Literally, "maker of seasons, maker of light." We agree with Cg in taking ṛtukartā as a modifier of prabhākaraḥ (ṛtukarteti prabhākaraviśeṣaṇam). Some translators see two distinct entities, while one, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 349), sees three, whom he names "Ṛtu, Kartar, and Prabhākara."

[11]"He is . . . Savitṛ . . . he who moves through the sky . . . and the many-rayed sun. He is the being as radiant as gold, he is the golden seed, the maker of day." savitā . . . khagaḥ . . . gabhastimān / suvarṇasadṛśo bhānuḥ svarṇaretā divākaraḥ //: Literally, "Savitṛ, the sky-goer, the rayed-one, like gold, radiant, having golden seed, the day-maker."

[12]"he is Śambhu, the auspicious one" śambhuḥ: Literally, "Śambhu." The epithet is most commonly associated with the god Śiva.

[13]"the bringer of light" bhāskaraḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead, "[a]haskaraḥ, "maker or bringer of day."

[14]"He is Śaṅkha" śaṅkhaḥ: Unlike most of the names and epithets in this passage, the term śaṅkhaḥ, which most commonly means "conch shell," has no lexically grounded or commonly accepted usage as an epithet for a deity. The commentators break up the term in a variety of ways in an effort to turn it into an intelligible epithet. Thus, for example, Ck and Ct read the term as a kind of dvandva compound consisting of śam, "supreme bliss," and kham, "the sky." (śaṃ ca khaṃ ca śaṅkhaḥ. paramānandagaganātmety arthaḥ.) Cm expands upon this etymology by taking kham to refer to the space within the heart, understanding the meaning to be "he who possesses unending bliss in the space within the heart" (śaṅkhaḥ śaṃ sukhaṃ kha ākāśe hṛdayākāśe yasya sa śaṅkho niravadhikānandavān ity arthaḥ). Cg understands the term to refer to the fact that the sun extinguishes itself in the evening (śāmyati svayam eva sāyaṃkāla iti śaṅkhaḥ).
